Mention of the energetic and tasteful proprietor of the Grosvenor Gallery reminds me that a momentous event is imminent in the Republic of Letters. A limited company have taken a thirty-year's lease of a large block of buildings adjoining Sir Coutts Lindsay's gallery, and in the spacious premises will be established the new Grosvenor Library, which is to be a circulating one on the grandest scale; while, accessory to the library itself, will be reading and writing rooms, dining and refreshment accommodation, a box-office where tickets can be secured for all the theatres and concerts, and a poste restante. There is to be a graduated scale of subscriptions, but first class subscribers of three guineas are to enjoy all the privileges and facilities of an establishment which is started under undeniably distinguished auspices, and seems to me to promise very highly indeed.

Is an author justified in helping the sale of his own works? I have grave doubts on the subject; but it must be one to be argued in foro conscientiæ. My publishers (publishers are the most troublesome people that I know) have been worrying me for some days past to state in this column that a large edition of a book of mine called "Paris Herself Again," having been exhausted in less than a month, a second edition of the work will be issued next week. Very reluctantly and diffidently I accede to my booksellers' request, and I hope that my readers will pardon me for alluding in this place to any literary performance of mine. The book has been very successful, and (not for my own commercial sake) I rejoice that it has succeeded.

There is another reason perhaps, why, for once in a way, my readers may be tolerant to an old, blundering, crotchety, but, I hope, not wholly unfaithful servant. I am going away. "My boat is on the shore, and my barque is on the sea." On Saturday, the Fifteenth, I am (D.V.) to leave Liverpool by the Cunard steam-ship Scythia for the United States. Sixteen years ago I saw America in the midst of war, and now I hope to see the Great Republic in the midst of Peace and returning prosperity. I am going South, to New Orleans, if I can; and perhaps I may have a look at those West Indies, where (at Demerary in British Guinea) my dear mother was born, nearly ninety years ago. My connection with this journal will not, I hope, be severed; and ere long I hope to post some "Echoes from Afar" to 198, Strand. Good-bye, dear readers, and thanks, from the bottom of my heart, for all the kindnesses that you have shown to me and to those who, sometimes, I have been bold enough to plead for. G. A. S.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

"Robert le Diable," as given on Thursday week, included Mlle. Ilma di Murska's artistic singing of the florid music belonging to the character of the Princess Isabella. The aria "In vano il fato," and the solo passages in the second finale were finely sung; still better having been the delivery of the Romanza, "Roberto, oh! tu che adoro," which was an admirable display of brilliant vocalisation and dramatic feeling. Madame Marie Roze was an excellent representative of Alice, her arias "Vanne, disse al figlio" and "Nel lasciar la Normandia" having been sung with much grace and refinement, and her share of the music of the cavern-scene with genuine earnestness. Signor Fancelli as Roberto sang with great effect, as did Signor Foli as Bertramo—both artists having often before been successfully associated with the respective characters. Signor Tecchi, as Rambaldo, sang best in the characteristic duet with Bertramo—in the third act, in which both artists were much applauded. The unaccompanied trio in the cavern-scene—for Alice, Roberto, and Bertramo—was especially well given, and had to be repeated. The ballet action in the cloister-scene was effectively sustained, and included some very good solo dancing by Mddle. Palladino, as Elena, the principal Nun.

On the following evening Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" was given, with Mdlle. Minnie Hauk as Cherubino, Madame Hélène Crosmond as Susanna, Madame Pappenheim as the Countess, Signor Rota as the Count, and other parts also filled as before, with the exception of that of Figaro, which was assigned to Signor Pantaleoni, who gained much applause in several instances. The character, however, is scarcely so well suited to him as those in which he had already made so favourable an impression here.

At the second matinée, on Saturday, "Faust" was given, with Mdlle. Minnie Hauk as Margherita, and other familiar features, with the exception of the transference of the part of Siebel to Madame Pisani. In the evening the opera was "Aïda," the specialty in this instance having been Signor Fancelli's assumption, for the first time in England, of the character of Radamès, in which he sang artistically, although under the repressive influence of indisposition. The characters of Aïda, Amneris, and Amonasro were again effectively sustained, respectively, by Mesdames Marie Roze and Trebelli and Signor Pantaleoni. Signor Li Calsi and Mr. John Hill acted alternately as conductor.

On Monday "Carmen" was repeated, and on Tuesday "Il Trovatore" was given again with a familiar cast. A repetition of "Mignon" was announced for Wednesday evening, with Madame Marie Roze as Mignon, and the characters of Guglielmo and Lotario transferred respectively to Signor Frapolli and Signor Rota. "Don Giovanni" was promised for Thursday, with the appearance—after the first act of the opera—of Senorita Fuensanta and the Royal Spanish Ballet Troupe from Madrid. "Oberon" was to be given on the following evening; "Aïda" is the opera named for this (Saturday) afternoon, and "Carmen" for the evening.

At the opening concert of the ninth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, on Thursday week, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed, with a strong array of solo vocalists, chief among whom was Madame Albani, whose admirable delivery of the principal soprano music was distinguished by the same pure, fresh quality of voice and elevated sentiment as on previous occasions at provincial festivals—most recently at Hereford last autumn. Her rendering of the air "Hear ye, Israel," of her share in the great duet with Elijah, of the trio "Lift thine eyes," of the "Sanctus" (and of other incidental passages) produced a profound impression. In the trio—which was encored—Madame Albani was efficiently supported by Miss C. Clelland and Madame Antoinette Sterling, the latter of whom had to repeat her fine delivery of the air "O rest in the Lord." The other principal solo vocalists were Miss Dones, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Herr Henschel. The chorus-singing was of the high order usual at these concerts. Mr. Barnby conducted, and Dr. Stainer presided at the organ. There was an usually numerous audience. Haydn's "Creation" is to be given on Nov. 27.

At this week's Monday Popular Concert—the second of the new season—the quartet party was as before, the solo pianist having been Mdlle. Anna Mehlig, in lieu of Mdlle. Janotha, who was indisposed. Spohr's string quartet in A (from op. 93), and that by Haydn in B flat (from op. 55), were finely played, led by Madame Norman-Néruda; the other instrumental pieces having been Haydn's variations in F minor (the last one encored) and Schumann's pianoforte trio in D minor. Madame Cummings was the vocalist, and Sir Julius Benedict the accompanist. The first of the afternoon performances took place last week.

Mdlle. Janotha's pianoforte recital, announced for last Wednesday afternoon, is postponed to Dec. 3.

M. Rivière's promenade concerts at Covent-Garden Theatre closed on Monday evening with a special performance for the benefit of Mr. S. Hayes (the acting-manager), that of M. Rivière (the conductor) having taken place on Saturday.

Miss Emily Lawrence (pianist) gave an evening concert at the Steinway Hall on Saturday evening.

The promoters of the People's Concert Society, which has been established with the object of increasing the popularity of good music by means of cheap concerts, began a series of these entertainments last week, at the Bishopsgate School Hall. The prices, which were a penny, threepence, and sixpence, were sufficiently low to attract a large audience, but it was a noteworthy fact that the places at sixpence were fully patronised, while the body of the hall, to which the admission was only a penny, was somewhat thinly attended. The vocalists were Miss Sophie Lowe and Mr. F. Pownall. Miss Occlestone and Mrs. F. Harrison, both of them cultivated pianists, lent valuable aid to the concert, as did Mr. Enthoven on the violin, and Mr. Albert on the violoncello. Five other concerts of a similar description are to be given at the same place during the ensuing months up to April.

The members of the London Church Choir Association held their seventh annual festival at St. Paul's Cathedral last week, when about 1200 choristers attended. The object of the promoters is to encourage musicians to devote their talents to the production of works of something more than ephemeral interest. In this way the association has been enabled to produce several new anthems and other ecclesiastical compositions by well-known composers, besides securing the services of trained choirs drawn from various parts of the metropolis. At last week's service the "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis" were by M. Berthold Tours and the anthem by Mr. Henry Gadsby. Mr. W. S. Hoyte presided at the organ.

As already said, Exeter Hall will not be available for musical purposes after October next. The Sacred Harmonic Society has announced a final series of concerts there, and has issued a prospectus for the coming season, comprising a varied selection of works from the society's répertoire. The forty-eighth season will commence on Friday, Dec. 5, when Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" will be performed. Next in order will be the ante-Christmas performance of "The Messiah." The first concert of the new year will be on Jan. 16, when Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" will be given; following this come Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Spohr's "Last Judgment." "Elijah" and "St. Paul" are to be heard during the season, also Haydn's "Creation" and Costa's "Eli." The final performance will consist of Handel's greatest choral work, "Israel in Egypt." The names of the following eminent artists appear in the list of principal vocalists:—Mesdames Sherrington, Anna Williams, Osgood, and Emma Thursby (sopranos), Patey, Julia Elton, and Enriquez (contraltos), Messrs. Rigby, Cummings, Maas, and Lloyd (tenors), Santley, Lewis Thomas, Bridson, and Chaplin Henry (basses). The orchestra will, as heretofore, consist of many of the leading members of the profession, under the guidance of Sir Michael Costa, the society's conductor. Mr. Willing again presides at the organ.

Handel's "Jephtha" was given by the Brixton Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. Lemare, on Thursday evening. The solo vocalists announced were—Misses Catherine Penna and Marian Burton, and Messrs. H. Kearton, J. T. Hutchinson, and D. T. Roper.

THEATRES.

We are always glad to welcome to the metropolitan boards new candidates for histrionic honours, especially when they come heralded by many "golden opinions" won during a tedious initiatory provincial career. Mr. J. R. Gibson hails, we believe, from the principal cities of Scotland, and his appearance at the Olympic matinées as Sir Pertinax Macsycophant in Macklin's celebrated comedy "The Man of the World," has been already alluded to in these columns. The comedy, with Mr. Gibson as the eccentric Sir Pertinax, has since been transferred to the Adelphi, forming two of a series of matinées announced to take place at that theatre. In this assumption Mr. Gibson labours under the disadvantage of coming into comparison with an actor, recently deceased, whose name for years past has been identified with the character. We allude to Mr. Phelps, whose marvellous impersonation is still vivid in the minds of playgoers. To assert that the Sir Pertinax of Mr. Gibson is equal to that of his great predecessor would be simply to mislead him and the public. But we can conscientiously say that—dismissing from our memories the singularly graphic portraiture of the above-named gentleman, the new candidate is as good a representative of the canny Scotchman as the stage under its present conditions is likely to present. Mr. Gibson has cultivated a faultless Scotch accent, which, to begin with, is an essential qualification for the part; then, he has studied the character in its subtler bearings, and gives the oily, politic, cringing man of the world, with all his political and national prejudices, with close minuteness. His scene with Lord Lumbercourt, early in the comedy, where the man of the world, from self-interested motives, panders to the wickednesses of the pampered aristocrat, was exceedingly well depicted. Equally amusing was his delivery of the speech in which the wily Scotchman attributes his success in life to the principle of bowing, of course to the great and mighty ones of earth, and furthermore expatiates on his mode of courting a certain well-to-do, scraggy, middle-aged spinster, whom he describes as having wooed in a week, married in a fortnight, and buried in a month. This was the actor's best hit, and Mr. Gibson well deserved the applause bestowed upon him. Throughout, however, the impersonation was characterised by an absence of vigour. We missed the verve and robustness which should give vitality to the portrait, without which it is at best but lay a figure, excellent in its way, perfect in shape and outline, but still a lay figure. Mr. Gibson requires to identify himself more completely with the character, to divest it of some of its mechanism and invest it with more passionate force and spontaneity. We make these remarks not with a view to being critical, but as having an intuition that Mr. Gibson, from a feeling of diffidence or nervousness, or both, holds forces in reserve which it would better advantage him to allow free play, and thus give to his performance the technically termed "go" and artistic realism which alone are wanting to secure for it a permanent hold upon the public. Miss Louise Moodie gave a thoroughly enjoyable presentation of Lady Rodolpha Lumbercourt, her acting throughout being characterised by intelligence, vivacity, and humour. Mr. Frank Barsby was sufficiently droll as Lord Lumbercourt, the characters of Sydney and Egerton found able exponents in Mr. W. Holman and Mr. E. H. Brooke, Miss Minnie Davis was an effective Lady Macsycophant, and the Betty of Miss May Burney was manifestly to the taste of the audience. The comedy was preceded by a farce entitled "A Husband in Clover."

A change has taken place in the cast of "Rob Roy" at the New Sadler's Wells. Miss Bateman has gone on her provincial expedition, and the rôle of Helen MacGregor is now sustained by Mrs. Charles Calvert, widow of the late Mr. Calvert, of Manchester. The lady throws considerable animation into the character of the bold outlaw's wife, and her poses, in general, are impressive and dignified. The part of Francis Osbaldistone is now enacted by Mr. Edward Cotte, whose voice is shown to much advantage in the song "My love is like the red, red rose," and the subsequent duet, "Though you leave now in sorrow." The rest of the cast remains as heretofore.

All communications from intending British exhibitors to the Berlin International Fishery Exhibition should be addressed to Mr. Edmund Johnson, Commissaire Délégue, at the London offices of the Exhibition, 1, Castle-street, Holborn.

The German explorers at Olympia have resumed their excavations, and have already found some interesting pieces of sculpture, including the head of Titus, the head of a boy, whose figure, in a kneeling posture, had been previously discovered on the eastern gable of the temple, and a statue of the goddess Fortuna.

FINE ARTS.

RESTORATION OF ST. MARK'S, VENICE.

With reference to the proposal of the Italian authorities to demolish and reconstruct the west front of St. Mark's, Venice, the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings held a meeting at their rooms, 9, Buckingham-street, Strand, on the 7th inst. The meeting was attended by many distinguished artists, art-critics, and others, and the speakers held similar views to those which we gave in our last Number as to the non-necessity for and the mischief which must result from the contemplated "act of vandalism." It was resolved at the meeting that a memorial should be drawn up, to be signed by lovers of art in this country for presentation to the Minister of Public Works in Italy, praying that the destruction of this, in many respects, unique specimen of art should not be allowed. The case, as we have already intimated, is an urgent one, the Italian Minister having appointed a commission to sit this month to decide whether the rebuilding of the west front should be begun immediately, or whether it should be allowed to stand over for another twelve months.

Mr. Henry Wallis (whose drawing from the "Merchant of Venice" we recently engraved, and who has laid the scene of many other of his pictures in the immediate neighbourhood of St. Mark's, or in the church itself) has also written to the Times on the same subject, and added some interesting remarks from his own observation while working in St. Mark's. Mr. Wallis justly says that where restoration has taken place—as at the south-west angle of the front, to which we have already alluded—"the patina, which the marble surfaces had acquired from time, and which time only can bestow, has been scraped and ground off, and with what loss of tone and colour every artist knows and deplores." It is difficult to imagine what eyesores new patches cause in the case of white and coloured marbles; and now it is threatened to similarly vulgarise the whole of the west front! We drew attention last week to the hideous result of the restoration of a portion of the tesselated pavement of the church, which we need hardly say is matchless as regards the elaborate beauty of the patterns. Mr. Wallis now tells us how this restoration was effected. "About seven years ago the north aisle was boarded off, the pavement taken up, the floor laid flat, and the restoration commenced. Then it was found that the drawings of the ancient patterns had been so carelessly made that the workmen were hopelessly at fault. The architect or contractor, at his wit's end, applied to an English artist who had made studies of this pavement to lend them to him, and with their aid the job was got through. When finished, the new work could be compared with the old in the opposite aisle, and then it was seen that, although smooth and flat, all spirit and beauty of colour and design had for ever vanished." Apart from the bad colour and design of the new pavement, its levelness is, artistically considered, a great disadvantage. No doubt the extraordinary beauty of the old pavement is due in a considerable measure to its very marked undulation: the intricacy of the patterns is thereby apparently greatly increased, and the eye loses itself pleasurably in a labyrinthine sea of charming and curious devices and allegorical symbols, which vanish and reappear at every step. It seems difficult to account for the unevenness of the floor by a subsidence of the soil, the weight of the pavement itself being not only small, but distributed equally over the area. In the Pantheon at Rome the pavement has sunk all round, owing apparently to the weight of the walls and the cupola (originally bronze-coated), so that a concave surface is presented. But a slight concavity may have been intended to carry off rain entering through the aperture in the centre of the dome. In St. Mark's, however, the uneveuness is not greater near the walls than in the centre of the pavement, and one of our architects, observing that this unevenness enhances the effect of the vermiculato, seriously maintains that the pavement was originally so laid.

When, on another occasion, Mr. Wallis was working in the Baptistery he saw workmen removing portions of the precious mosaics in this part of the church with small pickaxes. These portions, of course, have been restored; but, "as must happen, bear the same relation to the old as a dried botanical specimen does to the living plant." Doubtless repairs have been necessary to various parts of St. Mark's; but if the work is strictly limited to what is absolutely required little danger need accrue to the general surface and effect. Certainly, the existing portions of the old pavement need not be tampered with. Nor is there any ground, as we have reason to believe, for the pretence that the west front is insecure. During several years past the Venetian municipality has been urging on the Government the restoration of St. Mark's and other monuments of Venice; but this is only a typical instance of the spirit of meddling and jobbery which so generally prevails in Italy. Since the unification of the country the Italians seem to think that they have not really appropriated the great legacy of their past in art-wealth till they have stamped it anew with the seal of Italia Ridenta. Since the centralisation of the Government at Rome every petty, and often poverty-stricken township sends in some claim to head-quarters for pecuniary aid, nominally for public works and restorations, or it runs itself into debt to the verge of bankruptcy, after the notorious example of Florence. In the process the local "authorities" acquire a cheap reputation for patriotism; money passes through their hands—creating patronage; much of it is often wasted in farming out jobbery; a portion only affords employment to the working classes—employment, however, that too often consists in needless unproductive or positively mischievous restorations.

At the annual meeting of the Royal Scottish Academy, held in Edinburgh on Wednesday—Sir Daniel Macnee, president, in the chair—Messrs. Robert Anderson, J. Z. Wingate, and J. C. Noble were elected Associates, in room of Mr. Gavin, Mr. Cassie, and Mr. Docherty.

The public will be glad to learn that the India Museum, instead of being broken up and discontinued, will be reopened at South Kensington in a few months, with many additions from the neighbouring museum that will render it more complete and attractive in the sections illustrative of life, manners, religion, and the manufacturing and artistic resources of India. The collections illustrative of the economic products of India are to be transferred to the Kew Museum. The zoological collections will be removed to the new Natural History Museum. The Buddhistic sculptures will also be taken to the British Museum, but casts of them will be made for South Kensington.

An exhibition in memoriam of the works of the late Mr. Edwin Edwards is opened at the gallery, 168, New Bond-street, lately known as the Continental Gallery. Both the upper and lower rooms are completely filled with oil-paintings, water-colour drawings, and etchings, testifying to the industry and considerable talent of the deceased. Like some other amateurs, Mr. Edwards attained to greater proficiency with the etching-needle than with the brush, and he is probably best known by a series of etched illustrations of old English inns.

The Yorkshire Fine-Art and Industrial Exhibition, which had been open since May 7 last, was finally closed last Saturday night. The number of admissions up to the night before the closing ceremony was 531,294, and the total amount received for admissions was £14,170. From other sources of income £4303 15s. 2d. had been received, and when to these has been added the amount of the loan and donation fund, which is £12,718, and the surplus of the exhibition of 1866, which (with accumulated interest) was £2315, the total receipts amount to £33,507 9s. 7d. It is expected that, after the payment of all claims, there will remain in the hands of the trustees permanent property to the amount of £26,353. In connection with the industrial department of the exhibition 150 medals and 142 certificates have been awarded to 289 exhibitors.

M. Edouard Detaille, the distinguished painter of military subjects, has returned to Paris after a long visit to this country, where he has made a number of sketches in water colours of our English troops, which are to be contributed to the next exhibition of the new French "Société des Aquarellistes."

Mr. G. W. Anson has projected a "Dramatic Fine-Art Gallery," which is to be located in New Bond-street. The gallery is to be provided for the display of pictures and sculptures executed by actors and actresses en amateur, sketches by scene-painters, and other works dramatic in subject. Portraits of actors living and dead are also to be included.

The eminent Italian sculptor Sangiorgio died recently at Milan, aged eighty-one. Among his principal works are the colossal sexiga of the Arco del Sempione at Milan, the equestrian monument to Carlo Alberto in Casale, and the group of Castor and Pollux in the Royal Palace, Turin, a cast of which is in the Crystal Palace, Sydenham.

The twenty-sixth report of the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education sets forth the total number of persons who received direct instruction as students or by means of lectures in connection with the department in 1878 was 794,547, showing an increase as compared with the number in the previous year of 113,180, or more than 16 per cent. The attendance at the Art and Education libraries at South Kensington and at the National Library of Ireland also showed an increase last year of 1731. But the number of visitors to the museums and collections under the superintendence of the Department—viz., 2,329,877—showed a decrease of 218,889. The expenditure of the Department during the financial year 1878-9, exclusive of the vote for the geological survey, amounted to £282,553 11s. 5d.

There has recently been established at Florence a manufactory of artistic majolica which well deserves a visit, and as it is outside the Porta Romana, such a visit could be conveniently combined with a drive to the Certosa. There has long been a factory of common pottery belonging to the family of the Cantagalli. This factory is now the property of two members of the family, who recently decided to advance their undertaking in an artistic direction. They opened their new majolica factory in May, 1878, and the work which has been turned out during eighteen months is most remarkable, when it is known with what material Messrs. Cantagalli have worked. With the exception of a few skilled designers, the whole of the work is done by boys of the humblest class—street arabs, in short. The distress in Florence has of late years been great. Messrs. Cantagalli are gentlemen holding a high social position in the city, and in undertaking the manufactory of majolica they had as much in view the charitable employment of the poor as their own profits. For this reason they have selected these poor boys, to whom they have opened a source of employment; happily, the success of the experiment promises its own reward. Much of the work, both in form and colour, is taken from antique models. Among other good works produced last winter were a pair of vases and brackets as a wedding present to the Duke of Connaught.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Though the sport provided at Liverpool last week was decidedly good, still every now and then the interest seemed to flag, and we think that a further curtailment of the meeting to three days would be a wise move. There are several rich stakes to be won after the curtain has dropped at Newmarket; but there is no getting over the fact that when the Cambridgeshire has been decided the rest is but "leather and prunella," in the opinion of many of the best supporters of the turf. Robbie Burns had nothing but old Omega to beat in the Queen's Plate, and then Lord Wilton's Brother to Cradle added one more to a long list of victories scored by the Stanton stable during the week. There were some old familiar names among the nine starters for the Grand Sefton Steeplechase, Chimney Sweep (11 st. 6 lb.) being the patriarch of the party. The Irish division are generally "there or thereabouts" when it comes to the illegitimate business, and this time they finished first and second with Woodbrook (11 st. 6 lb.) and Lottery (11 st. 13 lb.). The former had no trouble in winning, but was objected to on the ground of insufficient description, so, pending the decision of the Grand National Hunt Committee, the race remains in abeyance.

Despite the wretched acceptance in the Liverpool Cup—only about one fifth of those entered having cried "content"—the race proved a very interesting one, and brought out a very respectable field of eleven. Though Peter (8 st. 2 lb.) was notoriously rather short of work, and had a very big weight for a three-year-old, his undoubted class gained him such a host of followers that he ousted Westbourne from the position of favourite some time before the day, and held his own bravely up to the fall of the flag. Rylstone (8 st. 4 lb.) also had many admirers, while Sunburn (7 st.), Simba (5 st. 10 lb.), and Quits (6 st.), were heavily backed, so that the bookmakers had plenty of occupation. The race was run at a great pace throughout, thanks to Harbinger (6 st. 10 lb.) and Quits, the latter of whom tired to nothing in the last quarter of a mile, after, apparently, having the race in hand. Westbourne did not get well round the turns, and was several times interfered with so seriously that, though he came with a tremendous dash of speed at the finish, he could never get on terms with the leaders, of whom Simba led to the distance, at which point Master Kildare (8 st. 13 lb.) shot to the front and, after a very pretty race, passed the post with half a length in hand of Rylstone, who beat Sunburn by twice that distance for second place. Master Kildare's wretched exhibition at Lincoln effectually kept the public from backing him; but there is no getting over the great merit of this performance, and his "roaring," of which we have heard so much, must be of a very mild description. There were two very interesting races on the last day. In the Duchy Cup Discord (8 st.) made such an example of Rylstone (8 st. 11 lb.) and Touchet (9 st.) that he might almost have beaten them at level weights. Looking at this performance, and at his two grand struggles with Rayon d'Or, it is difficult to understand how he managed to cut such a poor figure in the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire, for both of which races he was very heavily backed. Sir Joseph (8 st. 4 lb.) was strongly fancied to repeat his victory of last year in the Great Lancashire Handicap; but, though he led at the distance, Reconciliation (6 st. 9 lb.) then came away at her leisure, and thus the second-best race of the meeting went to another roarer.

At the time of writing, the Shrewsbury Meeting has been quite devoid of any features of interest.

Magnificent weather made the Newmarket Champion Meeting most enjoyable to coursers last week; and as, contrary to general report, there proved to be plenty of hares, and Mr. Wentworth and Mr. Wilkinson gave every satisfaction as judge and clipper respectively, no fault could be found by the most hypercritical. The Champion Stakes for puppies was won by Decorator, by Baronet—Shade, who beat Alice Nedley, by Bamford—Rough Peg, in the final spin. The winner possesses a rare turn of speed, but at present is by no means clever with her game. Barefoot, by Birdcatcher—Highland Lassie, beat Lustre by Countryman—Jezebel in the final round of the All-Aged Stakes, though they had to go twice to the slips before a decision was arrived at.

On Monday last John Hawdon, of Delaval, and Wrightson Forster, of Gateshead, sculled a mile on the Tyne for £100. Hawdon, who has never been beaten except by Hanlan, started a hot favourite, and, after a rattling race for three parts of the distance, won easily by a couple of lengths.

The annual assault of arms of the London Athletic Club was brought off successfully at St. James's Hall at the end of last week. The programme was of the usual description, and the sparring, which was entirely by amateurs, seemed as attractive as ever.

Last Saturday afternoon the Fifty Miles Amateur Bicycle Championship, which was established by the proprietors of the Sporting Life, who presented a very handsome challenge cup, was decided at Lillie-bridge. There were ten starters, but no real racing took place until about three miles from the finish. A. E. Derkinderen (the holder) unfortunately fell, and the race was left to H. Osborne, W. T. Thorn, jun., and E. S. Hassall, who came in in the order named, Osborne winning by four yards, in 3h. 4 min. 6 2-5 sec.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The City Carlton Club reopened in its new premises on Wednesday.

The Royal Institution Christmas lectures will be given by Professor Tyndall, on Water and Air.

The nomination of candidates for the triennial election of the London School Board took place on Wednesday; the polling is fixed for the 27th inst.

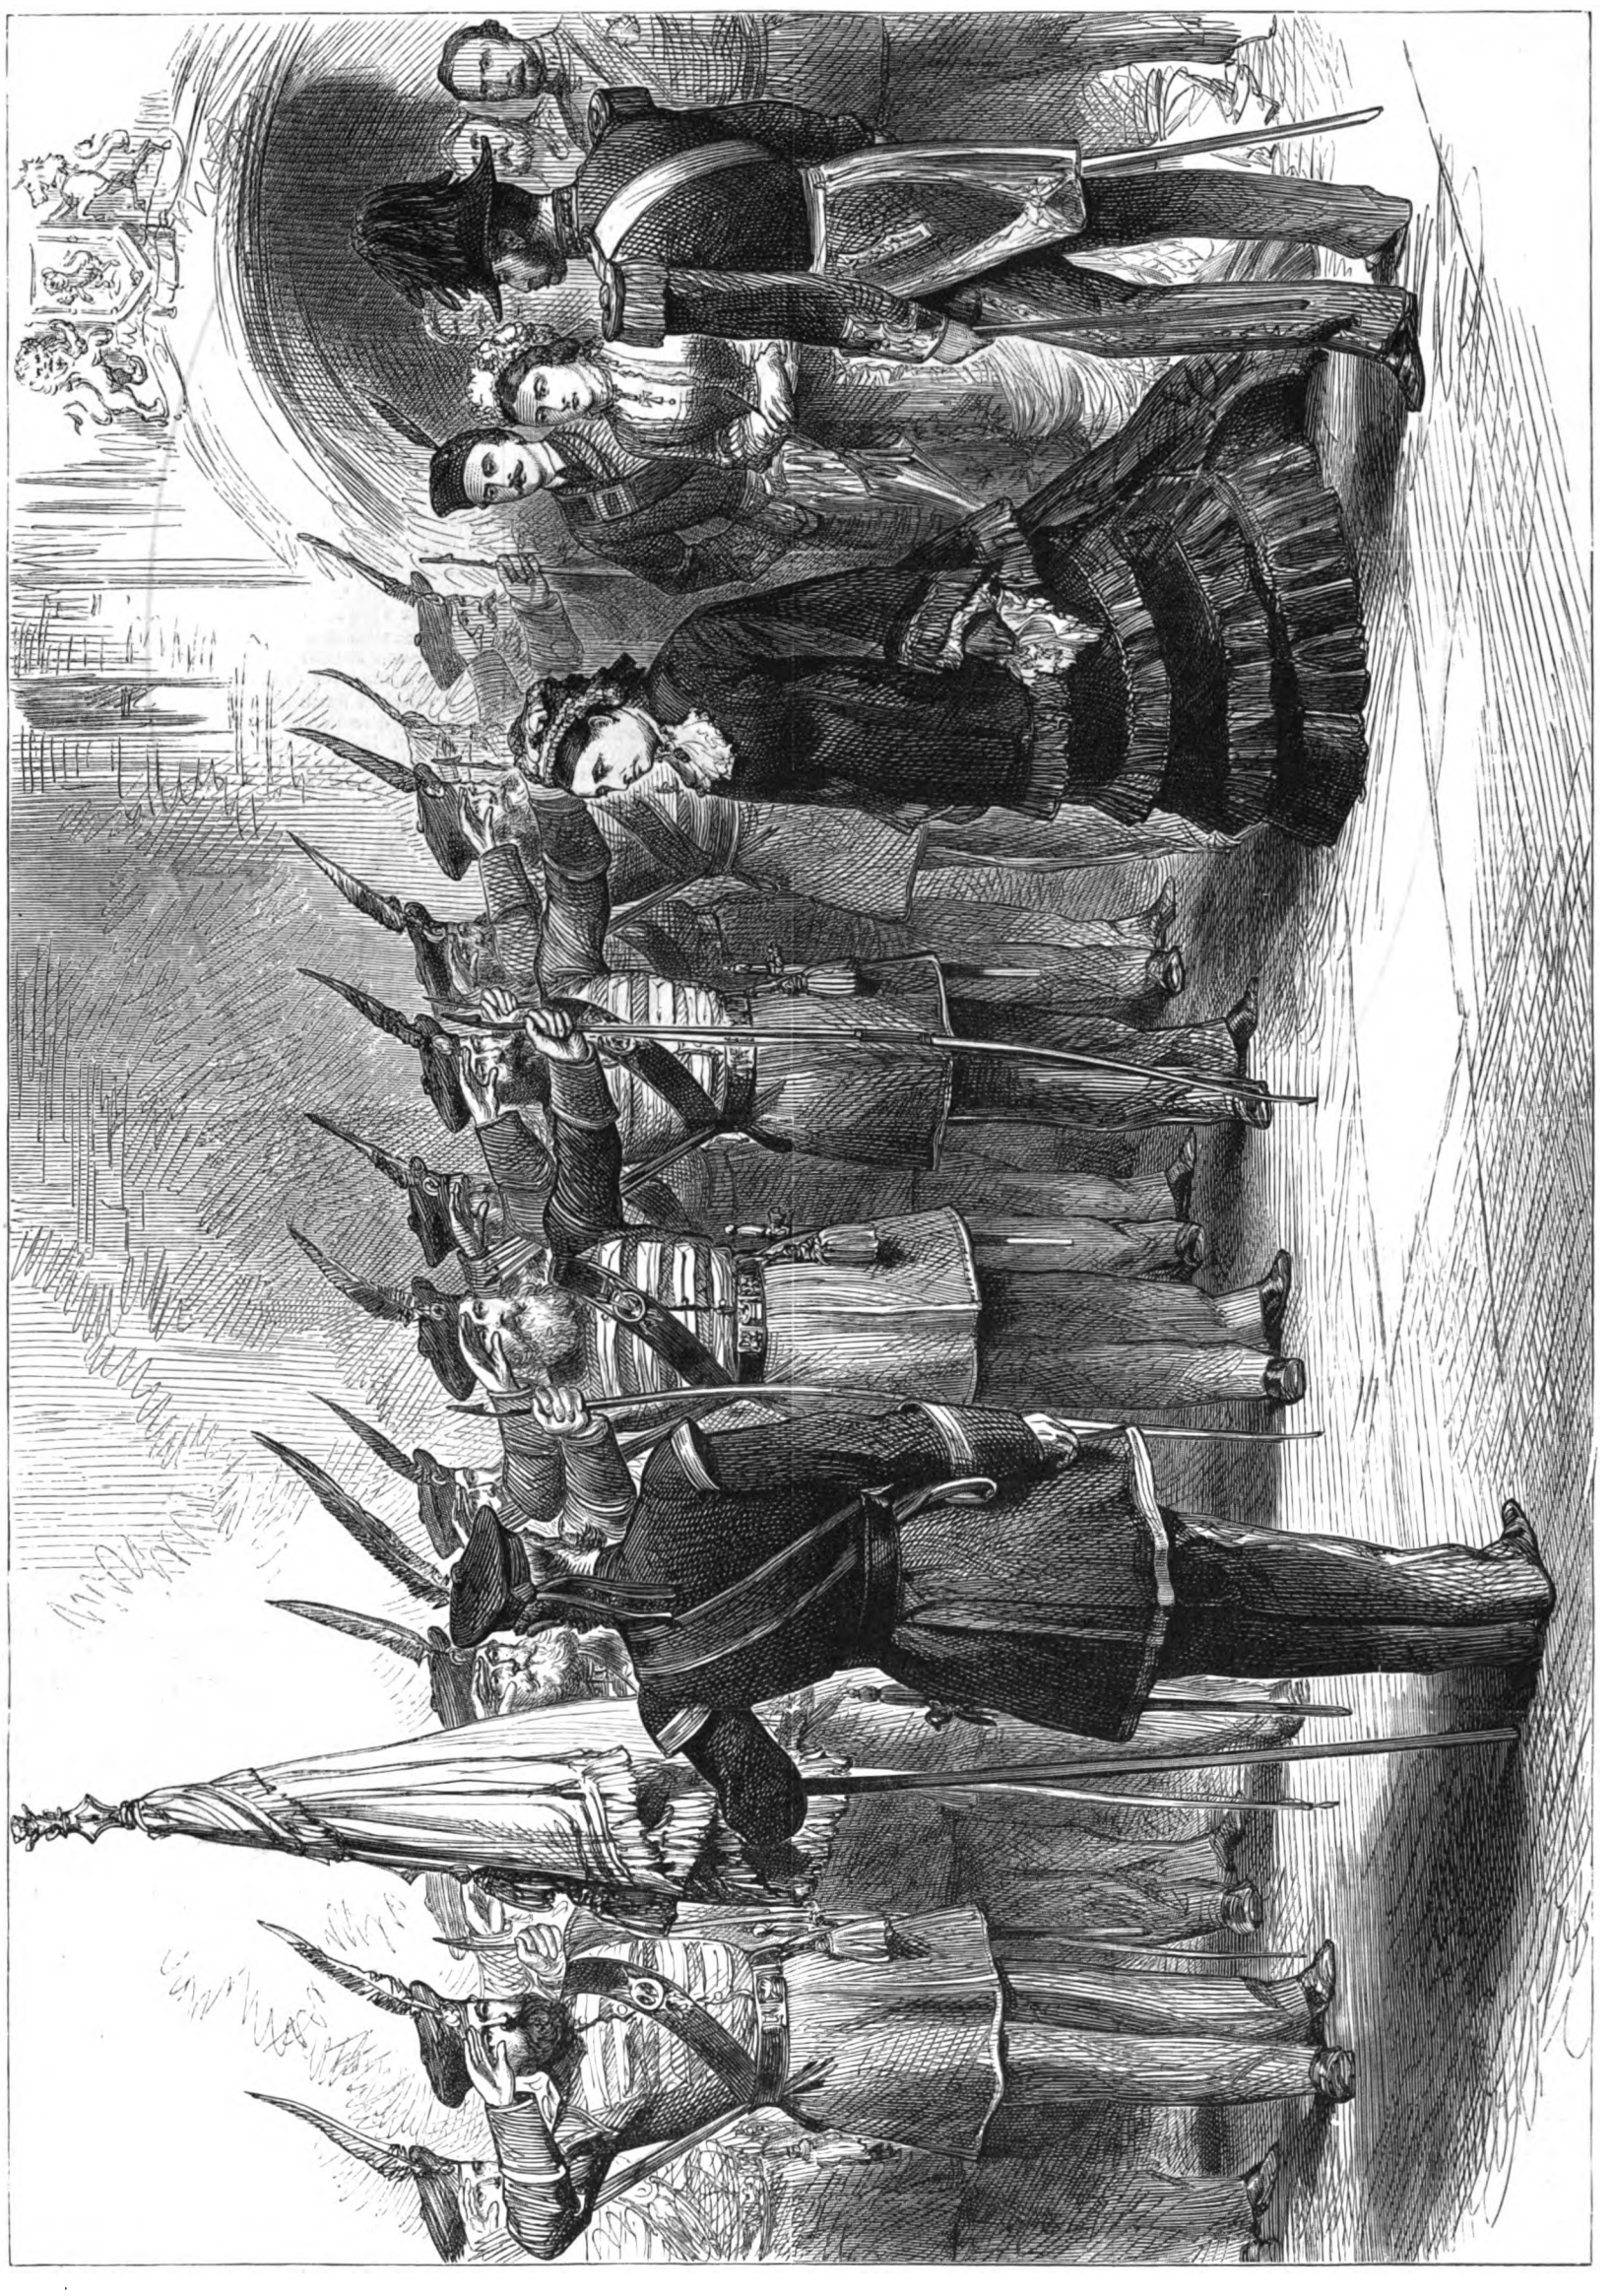
A series of Saturday evening lectures on popular subjects, under the direction of the Trades Guild of Learning and Social Education League, was begun last Saturday evening in the hall of the Society of Arts, when Professor Hales, of King's College, delivered a lecture on "Hamlet."

Captain Gildea, 20, Stafford-terrace, Argyll-road, Kensington, will be glad to receive, free, at the above address, parcels of newspapers (illustrated ones being especially appreciated by the sick), magazines, and periodicals for transmission to Afghanistan for the use of our soldiers during the coming winter. Subscriptions to meet expenses of packing and forwarding the same will also be received and accounted for.

We learn from the City Press that the City Lands Committee of the Corporation have entered into an arrangement with the trustees of Sion College—an ancient corporation of the clergy of the City—and certain other parishes in the diocese of London, by which a new hall and library will be built for the Fellows on the Victoria Embankment, at the corner of the intended new street from the Embankment to Fleet-street, in lieu of the present College in London-wall.

It is announced that the publications of the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, will, by the courtesy of the Committee of Council on Education, be regularly presented to the Lambeth Palace Library. The State papers and historical series of the Rolls publications have been given from the commencement, and form a most important adjunct to the archives of this library, which is open to the public three days in each week.

The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that on the last day of the fifth week in October the total number of paupers was 82,232, of whom 44,450 were in workhouses and 37,782 received outdoor relief. Compared with the corresponding weeks in 1878, 1877, and 1876, these figures show an increase of 4167, 3034, and 3159 respectively. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 845, of whom 635 were men, 177 women, and 33 children.



The Hotel Continental, at 1, Regent-street, adjoining Waterloo-place, was opened last Saturday evening by a dinner given to about one hundred guests in the magnificent salle-à-manger of the establishment. The chair was taken by the architect, Mr. Thomas Verity. The remarkable taste and costliness of the decorations, and the thoroughness with which the house has been made not only comfortable but artistically beautiful in its appointments and furniture, are quite exceptional.

A deputation from the Cannon-street Hotel Sir Rowland Hill Memorial Fund Committee on Tuesday attended at the Mansion House to ask the new Lord Mayor to identify himself with their fund. In reply, Sir Francis Truscott said he should most heartily accept the position offered him, and should do his best, by his own subscriptions and exertions, to give full effect to the intentions of the committee. The Earl of Derby has sent £50 for the national memorial to Sir Rowland Hill. All the children in the Commercial Travellers' Schools and the Orphan Working Schools have subscribed a penny each to the same object.

At Wednesday's meeting of the School Board for London—Sir Charles Reed presiding—a letter was read from the Drapers' Company intimating that they had voted another £100 to each of two lads who had distinguished themselves as holders of scholarships, to enable them to continue their studies at a place of education approved by the Court for a further term of two years. The questions of supply teachers sent to work in schools during the absence of mistresses through illness, and the opening of the playgrounds to the public were discussed. A report as to the difficulties experienced in obtaining a hearing for prosecution cases at certain metropolitan police courts was presented and approved.

There were 2721 births and 1524 deaths registered in London last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births exceeded by 152, whereas the deaths were 112 below, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 3 from smallpox, 50 from measles, 101 from scarlet fever, 11 from diphtheria, 25 from whooping-cough, 41 from different forms of fever, and 26 from diarrhœa. Thus to the seven principal diseases of the zymotic class 257 deaths were referred, against 224 and 226 in the two preceding weeks. These deaths were 6 above the corrected average number from the same diseases in the corresponding week of the last ten years. In Greater London 3345 births and 1783 deaths were registered. The mean temperature of the air was 43·2 deg., being 2·3 deg. below the average. The duration of registered bright sunshine in the week was 7 2 hours (against 5·8 hours at Glynde-place, Lewes); the recorded duration of sunshine was therefore equal to 11 per cent of its possible duration.

VOLCANO IN THE STRAIT OF MAGELLAN.

The intricate series of channels and sounds forming the navigable water-way from the Pacific to the Atlantic, south of the extremity of the American Continent, has of late years become an ordinary commercial route. Patagonia, the mainland shore of this "Strait of Magellan," or more properly "Magalhaens," from the Portuguese discoverer of that name, is part of the territories of the Chilian Republic. We are indebted to Lieutenant E. Fleet, R.N., serving on board H.M.S. Gannet, for the view he has sketched of a volcano observed in Smyth Channel, latitude 49 deg. 1 min. S., longitude 3 deg. 30 min. W. It was a magnificent sight: a dense volume of vapour suddenly arising from the crater of a snow-covered mountain; and, there being no wind at the time, the smoke ascended straight up to an immense height, there spreading out like a pall. The officers and crew of the Gannet had seen a peculiarly-shaped cloud on two previous occasions, and, imagining that it came from a volcano, had noted its direction by compass; but only upon their nearer approach could its precise position be ascertained. This volcano seemed to repeat its eruptions at intervals of three or four hours. Our readers may be reminded that the large and mountainous island and south of the Strait, opposite Patagonia, received from Magalhaens its name of "Tierra del Fuego," or "Land of Fire," because he saw the flames and smoke of several volcanoes there.

THE LATE MR. BUCKSTONE.

The funeral of this popular veteran of the English stage, whose declining condition and recent death had been repeatedly noticed in the public journals, took place in Lewisham Cemetery at the end of last week. As an actor, manager, and dramatist, John Baldwin Buckstone's continued efforts, during forty-five years, to provide acceptable theatrical entertainment for the world of London have long been highly esteemed. He was, though of an old Derbyshire family, quite a Londoner, having been born at Hoxton, in 1802, and educated at Walworth Grammar-School. In his boyhood, he was placed for a short time, as midshipman, on board a man-of-war, and had a brief taste, also, of an attorney's office. But the stage claimed him at the age of nineteen, and he joined a company of strolling players. Edmund Kean took notice of him, and in 1824 he was engaged at the Surrey Theatre. From this, in 1828, he passed to the Old Adelphi, and some years later to the Haymarket. Promotion steadily followed the development of his rare talents for broad comedy, of the true English humorous type. Meantime, his literary ability was displayed in the composition of melodramas for the two theatres which successively employed his services as an actor. "Ellen Wareham," written for Mrs. Yates at the Haymarket, to order of Mr. Webster, and "The Dream at Sea," performed at the Adelphi, were of a somewhat higher class. In 1840 Mr. Buckstone visited the United States, but his reception there was not equal to the favour he already enjoyed in England. The next five years witnessed a considerable advance in the exhibition of his powers, embracing some of the best comic characters of Shakspeare and of the eighteenth-century playwrights. "Box and Cox," that most amusing of cockney farces, also gave him an immense success at the Lyceum. The Haymarket was at that time held by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, for the beginning of their superb Shaksperean revivals. They unluckily chose to make Buckstone appear as the first witch in Macbeth; and the playgoers of that day, who were accustomed to see his well-known face in broadly comical situations, greeted him with roars of laughter as he spoke the "When shall we three meet again?" It was all up with the tragedy for that night, but the fun of the thing was delicious. In domestic comedy, however, he lent valuable support to Mr. Charles Kean's management, till it was transferred to himself in 1853. From that date till 1877, when failing health and pecuniary reverses obliged him to retire, Mr. Buckstone conducted the Haymarket with indefatigable industry, as well as sound judgment, liberality, and taste. He attracted to his side the most skilled comedy writers of his time—Mr. Planché, Mr. Tom Taylor, Mr. Oxenford, Mr. Stirling Coyne, Mr. Falconer, Mr. Leicester Buckingham, Dr. Westland Marston, Mr. T. W. Robertson, Mr. Gilbert, and Mr. Byron. "An Unequal Match," "Everybody's Friend," the "Overland Route," "Our American Cousin," "David Garrick," the "Favourite of Fortune," "New Men and Old Acres," "A Dangerous Friend," and "Pygmalion and Galatea" were among the pieces in his programme. He collected at the outset a remarkably efficient company, including Mr. Compton, Mr. Chippendale, and Mr. Howe; and among those who subsequently took service under his banner were Miss Sedgwick, Mr. Sothern, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mathews, Mr. John S. Clarke, and Mr. and Mrs. Kendal. In his own performances, the characters more particularly associated with his name are Bob Acres, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Tony Lumpkin, Mr. Lovibond in the "Overland Route," Chrysos in "Pygmalion and Galatea," Dr. Botcherby in "An Unequal Match," Major Wellington de Boots in "Everybody's Friend," Asa Trenchard in "Our American Cousin," Squire Chevy in "David Garrick," Bunter in "New Men and Old Acres," and Aminadab Sleek in "A Serious Family." His plays, too, have considerable merit, and it is probable that some of them will keep the stage.

Our portrait of Mr. Buckstone is from a photograph by Messrs. W. and D. Downey, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and of Ebury-street, Westminster.

THE ROYAL COMPANY OF SCOTTISH ARCHERS.

Perhaps it is not generally known that the Manchu portion of the inhabitants of Pekin form a body guard for the defence of the Emperor of China, and that they are armed with bows and arrows, which they may be seen practising with to this day. And it may also be among the things not generally known that when the Queen of England goes to Edinburgh, a Royal Company of Archers forms her Majesty's Body Guard; and they turn out on all occasions, while the Queen abides in the Scottish capital, to attend and defend their Monarch, armed with the same primitive weapons still in use among the Manchus of Northern China. At first blush this would seem to indicate that a similar condition of civilisation existed in those widely separated geographical regions; but we know that until a very recent period in China, where modern changes have gone on but slowly, the Imperial Guard of Pekin were not yet armed with muskets;—whilst the bow and arrow disappeared from the armies of Europe some few centuries ago. The Edinburgh corps bear on their seal figures of Cupid and Mars, with the motto, "In Peace and War." This device was adopted in 1676, when the company received the Royal sanction, and at that date there may have still been some remains of the idea that men armed with bows and arrows might be of service in the defence of their King and country. In the present age, we suppose, Mars might be obliterated as a symbol, and Cupid alone be retained, to express the motive which now bring ladies and gentlemen into the field as Toxophilites. There was a body of Archers which anciently furnished the guard to the old Scottish Kings; and the Royal Company still in existence consider themselves to be its legitimate descendants. But they have almost no definite history previous to 1676. It appears that a code of rules was drawn up in that year, and the King's letter still exists containing the Royal approval. A continuous history of the Royal Company of Archers has been kept from that time. This has lately been published by Messrs. Blackwood, with other documents bearing on the history of the corps. The author of the treatise is Mr. James Balfour Paul, a member of the Royal Company. It is well illustrated, and forms a handsome volume, and one most interesting to all lovers of archery. The existing corps is in reality a toxophilite society, with its regular meetings, prizes, and dinners; but its antiquity and its character of Body Guard to the Queen give it a position and public importance high above most bodies of a similar kind. The select character of the members is another indication of its rank. Nearly all the peers of Scotland belong to it. The Duke of Buccleuch is Captain-General, with Dukes and Earls as Lieutenants-General, Majors-General, Ensigns-General, and Brigadiers-General, under him in command.

On the occasion of her Majesty's visit to Edinburgh to unveil the statue of the late Prince Consort, the Royal Company were in attendance, under command of their Captain-General, the Duke of Buccleuch. We give this week an Illustration showing the uniform of the corps, and their mode of saluting the Royal Presence. The dress is of dark green, trimmed with black and a thin line of crimson, Glengarry bonnet with eagle's feather. They all require three uniforms, one of which is the "Court Dress," green and gold, with epaulettes, cocked hat and feathers. This is worn by the officers in command when the Queen is present, and one is introduced into our Illustration. The "Mess Uniform" is the same as the ordinary evening dress worn by gentlemen, only that the coat is of green, with velvet collar and silver buttons.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

The opening meeting for the season was held on Monday night, at the London University, Burlington-gardens. There was a considerable attendance of members.

The Earl of Northbrook, G.C.S.I., the new President, opened the proceedings in an address, in which he recapitulated all the geographical events which had occurred during the recess. Having referred to the distinguished position the geographical section occupied at the recent meeting of the British Association at Sheffield, over which Mr. Clement Markham, one of their most distinguished members, presided, he said the most remarkable geographical achievements of the year had been the completion of the North-east passage by the Swedish Arctic Expedition, under Professor Nordenskjold, in the ship Vega, and he was happy to announce that there was considerable probability that the Professor would in the course of the ensuing session visit this country and meet the members of this Society. With regard to African exploration, they had to regret the death of Mr. Keith Johnson, but his mission had been taken up by his second in command, Mr. Thompson, who, although only twenty-one years of age, had shown great qualities for successful exploration. The noble Earl read some extracts from the letters of Mr. Thompson, which described the remarkably desolate character of the country which the expedition had explored. The cause of African exploration had also suffered a great loss in the death of Dr. Mullens, of the London Missionary Society. With regard to the interior of Africa, great praise was due to the Belgian International Expedition; that of the German, under Herr Gerhard; and that of Herr Rholfs. He alluded also to the distinguished services rendered to geographical science by Major Pinto, a Portuguese explorer; Colonel Prigevalski, a Chinese authority, and Colonel Schechenyi, a Hungarian, whose labours had been of the greatest value, and all of whom were anticipated to visit the society in its coming session.

A paper on the Dutch Expedition to Central Sumatra, by Professor Veth, President of the Dutch Geographical Society, was read by Mr. Clement Markham. A cordial vote of thanks to the presideut terminated the proceedings.

THE SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT.

The Twenty-Sixth Report of the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education gives the following summary of results:—"The number of persons who have during the year 1878 attended the schools and classes of science and art in connection with the Department are as follows:—57,230 attending science schools and classes in 1878 as against 55,927 in 1877, and 727,874 receiving instruction in art, showing an increase upon the previous year of 117,254, or more than 19 per cent. At the Royal School of Mines there were 36 regular and 189 occasional students, at the Royal College of Chemistry 303 students, at the Metallurgical Laboratory 74. At the Royal College of Science for Ireland there were 22 associate or regular students and 53 occasional students. The lectures delivered in the lecture theatre of the South Kensington Museum were attended by 5491 persons. The evening lectures to working men at the Royal School of Mines were attended by 1685 persons, being 458 more than last year, and 169 science teachers attended the special courses of lectures provided for their instruction in the new Science Schools at South Kensington. The various courses of lectures delivered in connection with the Department in Dublin were attended by about 1421 persons. The total number of persons, therefore, who received direct instruction as students, or by means of lectures, in connection with the Science and Art Department in 1878 is 794,547, showing an increase as compared with the number in the previous year of 113,180. The attendance at the Art and Educational Libraries at South Kensington and at the National Library of Ireland in 1878 has been 76,064, or an increase of 1731 over that of last year. The museums and collections under the superintendence of the department in London, Dublin, and Edinburgh were last year visited by 2,329,877 persons, showing a decrease of 218,889 on the number in 1877. The returns received of the number of visitors at the local art and industrial exhibitions to which objects were contributed from the South Kensington Museum show an attendance of 513,986. The total number of persons who during the year 1878 attended the different institutions and exhibitions in connection with the department has been upwards of 3,589,487. This total, compared with that of the previous year, presents a decrease of 672,152. The expenditure of the department during the financial year 1878-9, exclusive of the vote for the Geological Survey, amounted to £282,553."

A new coffee-house was opened by the Mayor of Birmingham, Mr. R. Chamberlain, on Tuesday. The house has been erected at the expense of Miss Ryland, and the management has been undertaken by the Birmingham Coffee-House Company. Adjoining the coffee-house are seven cottages intended for artisans' dwellings. These also have been provided by Miss Ryland; and the total cost of the buildings, exclusive of the site, is about £3000.

The Exhibition of Sanitary Appliances at Croydon, in connection with the annual congress of the institute, was closed last Saturday, has been visited by several thousands of persons. Dr. Richardson read to a large assembly a short paper upon "Health at Home." He said if the ladies who had charge of the homes of England only looked after them a little better, there would be little work for the sanitarians.

Among the rent remissions recently made are the following:—The Duke of Westminster and Lord Tollemache of Helmingham, the two largest landowners in Cheshire, have intimated their intention of making material reductions in their tenants' rents. The Duke of Westminster is allowing on the average about 27 per cent on the year's rental, three fourths to be given in money and the other quarter to be expended in bones; and Lord Tollemache, on the first half-year's rental, shortly becoming due, is giving from 10 to 35 per cent, to be expended in drainage and bones.—The Earl of Chichester and the Right Hon. J. G. Dodson, M.P., have both allowed the tenants of their Sussex farms 10 per cent off their rents.—Mr. B. L. Frere, of Twyford House, Bishop Stortford, has instructed his agent to allow a deduction of 15 per cent on the rent due at Michaelmas last on his estates in Essex, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and Hertfordshire.—Several Essex clergymen have allowed from 10 to 20 per cent off the half-yearly tithe rent.—The Rev. T. B. R. Robinson, Rector of Milton, has remitted 20 per cent of his tithe rents.—Sir Edward Dering has granted to his tenantry on the Romney Marsh estates a reduction of 10 per cent at the half-yearly rent audit. Sir Edward made a similar abatement to his Surrenden tenants in July last.—Mr. Seely, M.P., has notified to his tenants in the Isle of Wight that he will deduct 20 per cent from their rents for the last half year, and 20 per cent at the end of the next half year.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL and COMFORTING.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly-nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

VELVETEENS.
In the year 1870—now nine years ago—the "Queen," in a review of my beautiful Samples, on Sept. 17, says:—"We have experimented on a fragment of this New Patent Velveteen by placing it in a glass of water. On examination, after twenty-four hours' exposure to the action of the fluid, a pale sherry colour was produced, leaving the material in possession of its original tint and lustre." Every succeeding year since I first brought them before public notice, improvements have been introduced in the manufacture, till at the present time it is no fallacy to say that my Specialty Velveteen is simply Perfect. Patterns free and carriage-paid to any part of Great Britain and Ireland.

EVERY MAKE of BLACK and COLOURED VELVETEENS kept in Stock and Sold at Lower Prices than any firm in the trade, varying from 1s. 9d. to 4s. 9d. per yard.

SILK VELVETS.
Black, 21 in., 4s. 11d. per yard. Coloured, same width, 5s. 11d. per yard. All qualities wonderfully cheap.

VELVET GOWNS.
Rich Lyons Velvet Gowns, 8½ guineas.
In Black or Colours, splendid quality. Self-measurements and patterns for approval free.

EVENING AND BALL DRESSES.—For young ladies' wear, thin Fabrics are generally preferred to anything more substantial for Balls and Evening Dances. A very choice and well-selected assortment of some beautiful Foreign Novelties are offered in Pekin Gauzes, Moiré Gauzes, Snowiall and Tinselled Grenadine, Fine Wool Tamatives in some exquisite New Shades, and many other Fancy Fabrics. Light Silks and Satins, for slips and trimming purposes, at very low prices, in good qualities. Every requisite for Ball Toilettes.

WOOLLEN OATMEAL CLOTHS.
Having in mind the remarkable Sale during the past season of washing Oatmeal Cloths, I have arranged with a celebrated Scotch firm to produce me a cloth which exactly resembles the summer fabric in manufacture, only that this is made entirely from wool. A most suitable cloth for winter purposes, and a great novelty, for which I am the sole consignee; 25 in. wide, 1s. 11½d. per yard.

ON an average about every seven days OPPOSITION VELVETEENS to the LOUIS are started and endeavoured to be introduced to public notice, under one name or another. Not only is the style of making up, and the stamping of the name on the back of every yard resorted to

IN ORDER TO DECEIVE,

but they are actually asserted to be equal or superior.
The Proprietor of the LOUIS Velveteen, whilst admitting that "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," can only but caution the public that the genuine article is stamped Every Yard at the Back the "Louis Velveteen," in plain letters.
Avoid all imitations under whatever names they are offered.

THE LATE MR. BLACKWOOD.

The death of Mr. John Blackwood, the eminent Edinburgh publisher, was lately announced. This gentleman, one of the younger sons of William Blackwood, founder of the well-known business and of Blackwood's Magazine, was born in Edinburgh on Dec. 7, 1818. From an early age he exhibited marked literary tastes. He was educated at the High School and at the University of Edinburgh. In his father's house he had the advantage of meeting with the élite of that literary society for which the northern capital was then famous. Wilson, Lockhart, Hogg, Moir, and Galt, Sir Walter Scott and Sir William Hamilton, were among the men with whom Mr. Blackwood in his youth was brought into contact. He completed his education after his father's death by several years of foreign travel, in company with his elder brother, Mr. Alexander Blackwood, and his tutor, Mr. William Hay, an excellent classical scholar, whose translations from the Greek Anthology are well known to the older readers of Blackwood's Magazine. In Italy, on the shores of the Mediterranean, and in visiting other places on the Continent, he spent several years. Mr. Blackwood, senior, died in 1834, and the management of his business devolved upon his sons Alexander and Robert. John, after his return from the Continent, was placed by his brothers for a short time in the house of Messrs. Whitaker and Co. to acquire some knowledge of London business. He opened a branch of the Edinburgh house at 22, Pall-mall, in the end of 1840, and transferred thither the business which Messrs. Caddell had previously carried on for the Blackwoods. John Blackwood applied himself with great success to work, and the catalogues of the firm about this time bear testimony to the publications which he was the means of bringing to the Edinburgh house. His office in Pall-mall was a literary rendezvous of the time. Lockhart, then editor of the Quarterly, Samuel Warren, William Smith, the author of "Thorndale," and Ferguson, one of the London contingent of Blackwood, were frequent visitors; also Mr. Delane and Mr. Thackeray. In April, 1845, Alexander Blackwood, who since his father's death had conducted the magazine with great success, died, and John joined his brother Robert in Edinburgh. The failing health of the latter soon threw the entire responsibility upon John Blackwood, and from 1846 to his death he continued to edit the magazine. It was his good fortune to inherit a brilliant and willing staff of contributors, amongst whom were Professor John Wilson, "Christopher North," Professor Aytoun, Sir Archibald Alison, the Rev. Dr. Croly, D. M. Moir, "Delta," and others. To these were soon added Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, with "The Caxtons," followed by many tales and essays of later date, to the death of Lord Lytton; George Eliot, with her "Scenes of Clerical Life;" Mrs. Oliphant, Dr. J. H. Burton, Charles Lever, General E. B. Hamley, and many more whose writings have obtained public favour. Mr. Blackwood's liberality, frankness, and courtesy in dealing with his literary assistants, as well as his discernment of their merits, greatly promoted the success of the magazine. He died at his residence near St. Andrews. Mr. Blackwood married, in 1854, Julia, youngest daughter of the Rev. Joseph Blandford, rector of Kirton, in the county of Nottingham. He has left one son and a daughter.

THE NAGA REVOLT.

We lately received, with much regret, the news from India that Mr. G. H. Damant, Deputy-Commissioner in the Naga Hills, on the Assam frontier, was killed by the Nuzema Nagas on the 14th ult. Mr. Damant went to Kohima with an escort to seize a quantity of ammunition which had been stored there by the Nagas. He expected that they would submit quietly, but on his approach the Nagas fired, killing the Commissioner and half the escort. The remainder, however, attacked the rebels, only a few of whom escaped. A wing of the 44th Regiment, under Colonel Johnstone, accompanied by 2000 Munipore auxiliaries, has since relieved the garrison of Kohima, which was closely beleaguered by the enemy. It had made a gallant defence, under Messrs. Hinde and Cayley. General Nation is at Gola Ghat, collecting a force to put down the insurrection.

We give the portrait of Mr. G. H. Damant, from a photograph by Messrs. Window and Grove, of Baker-street.

SURGEON-MAJOR REYNOLDS, V.C.

The memorable night of Jan. 22, after the disaster of the British arms at Isandhlwana, and the heroic defence of the post at Rorke's Drift, by a hundred of our countrymen, against three thousand Zulu assailants, will long be told in the history of English valour. Majors Chard and Gonville Bromhead, then holding the rank of Lieutenant in their respective corps, the former of the Royal Engineers, the latter of the 24th Regiment of Infantry, have received their meed of professional and public honours for that military exploit. But a share of the same merit has been recognised as belonging to one of a peaceful and scientific profession, the medical officer, Surgeon-Major Reynolds, who bore his part as an active combatant in the tremendous struggle, protracted through fifteen hours, and won the Victoria Cross. His portrait, drawn after a photograph, is engraved for this week's publication. He has been entertained with more than one complimentary banquet since his return to England, and has received an honorary medal.

THE MAYOR OF HYTHE'S BADGE.

A badge and chain for the Mayor of Hythe, the gift of Sir Edward Watkin, M.P. for that borough, is figured in one of our Illustrations. The design of this ornament may be described in detail. The pendant, or badge, represents the arms of Hythe as shown in its official seal; these are generally similar to the arms of other Cinque Port towns. The badge is inscribed "Portus et Burgus de Hythe." Immediately over it, forming the central link of the chain, is an eagle holding a scroll on which is the word "Mayor," an idea taken from the ancient seal of the fourteenth or fifteenth century, used by the Mayor, and having the device of an eagle. On each side of this is an enamel of the White Horse of Kent, with its motto, "Invicta," to indicate a Kentish cinque port. There is a small intermediate link consisting of a lion's head, the lion being the principal charge in the Arms of England. The occasion for giving this chain was the seven years' mayoralty of Henry Bean Mackeson, Esq. He was the donor of the seven links, while Sir Edward Watkin, M.P., contributed the badge. It is executed in 18-carat gold, with enamelling, by Messrs. Barkentin and Krall, after a design by Mr. John G. Waller.

We are desired to state that the ceremony of distributing the prizes to the successful students of the City of London College, Leadenhall-street, which was fixed for Thursday last, has, at the request of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, been postponed until next Thursday, the 20th inst., at seven o'clock p.m.

STATUE OF ALDERMAN BANNISTER AT HULL.

The marble statue of the late Alderman Bannister, in the Hull Townhall, was unveiled on the 15th ult. by the Mayor of that town, Alderman Waller, in presence of the members of the Corporation and many other gentlemen. Lieutenant-Colonel Pease, Chairman of the Memorial Committee, delivered the statue to the Corporation with an appropriate address, followed by the Mayor, and by Mr. Christopher Sykes, M.P. for the East Riding, Sir Henry Cooper, and other speakers. The late Alderman Bannister not only served municipal offices with great industry, but was the chief promoter of the Hull and Withernsea Railway, and of the Hull tramways, works of great local usefulness. The statue, of which we give an Illustration, is by Mr. Keyworth, jun., a sculptor who is a native of Hull, and who has already executed for the Townhall statues of Sir William De la Pole, Andrew Marvell, and the late Mr. James Clay, M.P. This statue of Alderman Bannister is a characteristic likeness of the man, and a fine work of art; the drapery of the aldermanic robe is very well managed. The pedestal bears the following inscription:—"Anthony Bannister, Justice of the Peace, Alderman, twice Mayor, twice Sheriff, and thirty-three years an active member of the Corporation of Hull. Born April 4, 1817; died July 18, 1878. Erected by subscription in recognition of his public spirit, kindness of heart, generous character, and unremitted zeal for his native town."

STATUE OF SIR W. FAIRBAIRN, BART., F.R.S.

This eminent mechanical engineer of Manchester, who died five years ago, was highly esteemed in that town, and throughout the manufacturing district of Lancashire and the West Riding, as well for his personal character as for his valuable scientific and practical achievements, which contributed to augment the industrial wealth of a busy community. The statue of which we give an Illustration has been placed in the Manchester Townhall. It is of marble, 7 ft. high.; and the sculptor, Mr. Edward Geflowski, of Bruton-street, has succeeded admirably well in representing the face, figure, and habitual attitude of Sir William Fairbairn, with his characteristic air of intent and profound meditation. Sir William, who was a native of Kelso, on the Tweed, and was born in 1789, was one of the first mechanicians to employ iron as the material of ship-building, and in the construction of bridges. He studied the properties and uses of that metal, especially its strength in resisting tension, with the greatest assiduity through a prolonged series of experimental researches and exact calculations. To the improvement and greater safety of steam-boilers, used in the manufacturing districts, his labours contributed in no slight degree. He was one of the founders of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and a President of that Association, a Fellow of the Royal Society, and author of several treatises upon the iron manufacture, engineering, and other subjects. He was created a Baronet in 1869, which title is now borne by Sir Thomas Fairbairn, his eldest son, a Commissioner of the Great Exhibitions in 1851 and 1862.

FLEMISH INDUSTRIES.

The manufacturing industry of the Netherlands, in diverse forms of production, has for ages past contributed greatly to the progress of material civilisation in Northern and Western Europe. It is scarcely too much to affirm that England is chiefly indebted to the example and instruction of Flemish artisans, and of the neighbouring Walloon population, for the commencement of textile manufactures in this country, and for those of metal and hardware, now developed to enormous magnitude. This historical consideration may be deemed to give some added interest to our Sketches of a few simpler workshop employments in the old Belgian towns of Ghent, Bruges, and Malines. Here, as we see, a multitude of female hands are constantly busied in lace-making; while the coppersmith hammers upon his anvil a piece of ornamental repoussé work, and the maker of sabots or wooden shoes, by dexterous application of the spokeshave, imparts a rounded form and smooth surface to the block which shall be turned into solid foot-gear, though "nothing like leather." Belgium, however, possesses great factories, ironworks, and establishment of machinists or mechanical engineers, which vie with the best of ours in their admirable results of combined skill, capital, and labour. We now and then hear a cry of alarm when trade is depressed at the increase of foreign industrial competition; but we trust there is room for all nations to work and to thrive by supplying the real wants of mankind all over the world.

A dividend of half-a-crown in the pound is being paid to the creditors of the West of England Bank, making a total of 16s. 6d., the previous dividends having been 10s. and 4s.

Twenty barristers were called on Monday in Dublin, the largest number at one call for many years, although the amount of business at the Irish Bar has been said to be declining.

Mr. Myles Fenton, general manager of the Metropolitan Railway, has been appointed general manager of the South-Eastern Railway. Mr. J. Shaw, who has for some time acted as general manager and secretary of the South-Eastern Railway, will in future act as secretary only.

Marden House, in the Caterham Valley, the property of Sir William Clayton, Bart., where Evelyn wrote his "Diary," and in which Macaulay lived for some time, was burned to the ground on Sunday, the valuable pictures and furniture being saved.

The South India "Wimbledon" meeting, with its various contests, terminated recently, and the Champion Plate, the blue ribbon of the meeting, was again won by Lieutenant C. F. H. Spencer, 48th Regiment. This gentleman was already the champion shot of the South India Rifle Association for the year 1878-9, and his success at the meeting recently concluded secures for him the unprecedented privilege and honour of winning the Champion Plate for two successive years. Lieutenant Spencer is the eldest son of the Hon. and Rev. C. F. O. Spencer, Vicar of Sutton, Isle of Ely.

The victualling departments of the Admiralty have under consideration a new culinary utensil destined to improve the seaman's diet on board ship, especially his pea-soup. The apparatus is termed a salt-extractor, and has been constructed at the suggestion of Mr. Baden Pritchard, F.C.S., of the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, being, in fact, the application of a well-known chemical process to cooking purposes. Boilings from salt beef or salt pork, or soup that is too much salted, as it usually is on board ship when placed in the salt-extractor, and this in its turn put into cold water, will part with its salt in a few hours, and the soup thus rendered once more palatable. Special attention has been called to the invention by its exhibition at the Dairy Show by Messrs. Kent and Co., of Holborn, who have constructed a simple form for kitchen use.

EDISON'S LOUD-SPEAKING TELEPHONE.

By means of this instrument, now in ordinary use in London and other large towns, a conversation can be maintained between two persons at a distance without the slightest personal inconvenience or difficulty, the transmitting part of the apparatus being placed conveniently for the mouth and the receiving portion in a line with the ear. The practical application of the system in London extends to an indefinite number of stations, all placed in connection with a central station called the Telephone Exchange, which is situated in Lombard-street. The earliest stations, or private offices, connected with the exchange are situated:—No. 1 in Copthall-buildings, No. 2 in Old Broad-street, No. 3 in Suffolk-lane, No. 4 in Lombard-street, No. 5 in Princes-street, No. 6 in Carey's-street, Lincoln-inn, No. 7 in Queen Victoria-street (the offices of the company), No. 8 in George-yard, Lombard-street, No. 9 in Throgmorton-street, No. 10 being the Times newspaper office. At the central office is a switch-board capable of being connected with twenty-four different stations, the working being in charge of Mr. E. H. Johnson, the engineer, and Mr. Arnold White, the manager, of the company. Loud-speaking this telephone certainly is, but it is none the less soft-speaking also, for conversations may be carried on between two parties in whispers, and the bystanders will be unable to catch the words of the speaker at the distant station. With a wire passing through the Exchange system of the Company, and conveyed for ten or twelve miles of the way on poles with many other wires, conversation is carried on with as much facility over a distance of fifteen miles as though from room to room. The manager, in a letter published this week, presents a graphic description of what can be done with the Edison telephone:—"A gentleman, with whose house the Edison Telephone Exchange has been placed in connection, was enjoying a day's hunting. At the time he left home the telephone had not been fixed in position, although the wire had been run. During his absence the work was completed, and on his return important letters were read to him, to which replies were dictated. A conference with his solicitors being necessary, the operator at the Central Exchange connected him in the manner already described in your columns. An important telegram from New York was received, and a reply dictated in time to reach New York three hours after the first message was despatched from America. The principal portion of a day's work in town was thus compressed into half an hour's occupation in a library. It must be borne in mind that what had thus been accomplished was no laboratory experiment. The conditions involved were the conditions of ordinary life."

No. 1 in our Illustration shows clearly the switch-board arrangement in use at the Telephone Exchange. As will be seen, the Number 24 is the highest that a board contains. But there may be any number of switch-boards in use in the same room, and any station on one board can be connected with any other station on another board. The operator, usually a boy, sits in front. Assuming that station No. 2 wishes to communicate with No. 3, the person at No. 2 calls the attention of the attendant at the Exchange by means of the bell shown above the transmitter, b. At the same moment a shutter on the switch-board falls and discloses the number of the applicant. The attendant acknowledges the signal, and No. 2 instantly says, "I wish to communicate with No. 3." One of the metal pins from the row at the bottom of the board is instantly inserted into the hole on the same horizontal with No. 2 and under the upright rod of No. 3, No. 2 also having a pin inserted. Nos. 2 and 3 are then left to communicate with each other. At the close of the conversation No. 2 gives a signal on the bell to signify that he has finished, the attendant then withdraws the pins, and Nos. 2 and 3 are instantly separated. In our Illustration, Nos. 4 and 13, 12 and 10, 23 and 15, 8 and 20 are also all conversing together at the same time, and any of these can be instantly connected or disconnected, and so on up to the twelve couples on the board. Of course, only one station can be connected with one other at the same time, but the coupling and uncoupling are effected so quickly that any person may communicate with any other in rapid succession. The clerk at the switch-board is unable to hear a word of the conversations going on.

No. 2. Part of the switch-board apparatus, showing more clearly that the upright and horizontal bars do not touch. The horizontal bars are brought forward in between and are carried behind the upright, but do not touch. The pin, a short brass rod with vulcanite handle, is at will inserted in any one of the circular spaces, so establishing connection between the two bars.

No. 3. Interior of receiver, looking in the back. a is the diaphragm of mica, covered on the outer side, with the exception of the central hole, by the vulcanite; it is therefore in shade. The mica is fixed in a circular vulcanite case, in which is also fixed, at a short distance from the diaphragm, the cylinder of chalk, mounted upon a spindle capable of being rotated by a cranked handle. This cylinder is composed of compressed chalk, impregnated with a solution of phosphate of soda. Attached to the centre of the mica is a brass slip, to which is soldered a projecting platinum knob. This latter presses on the cylinder. The amount of pressure is regulated by a screw having at its end an indiarubber pad. The wires are so attached that the electric current passes through the platinum and thence, at the point of friction, to the chalk.

No. 4. End view of chalk cylinder being pressed on by platinum knob. Upon turning the handle so as to rotate the cylinder outwards from the face of the disc, the friction between the cylinder and the slip will draw the centre of the disc inwards, giving it a curved face. If an impulse of electricity be passed over the wire the friction between the slip and the cylinder will be destroyed, and the disc will regain its normal position of the true plane. If a variable or undulatory current of electricity be transmitted through the instrument the diaphragm will be kept in continual motion by the constantly varying friction existing between the chalk and the platinum dragging the diaphragm in opposition to its own constant elastic tension. This simple mechanical arrangement is wonderfully sensitive to the smallest as well as to the most rapid and complicated variations in electrical intensity taking place in the transmitted current. So sensitive is it that all the complex sonorous undulations propagated by human articulation instantly produce their corresponding variations of frictional resistance, and the diaphragm reproduces, in a loud or magnified tone, words or sounds which are being uttered into the telephone at the other end of the wire.

In the ordinary and improved commercial instrument, as represented in our Illustration, this excessive loudness is not required; the receiver, with its chalk cylinder, is made smaller than that originally brought over from America by Mr. C. P. Edison in March last, and afterwards experimented upon at the Royal Society and the Royal Institution by Professors Huxley and Tyndall in April. We understand that for experimental researches the louder instrument will continue to be made.

No. 5. Under side of indiarubber and brass slip, and wire leading from platinum.

No. 6. Inside of carbon transmitter. a is the carbon placed between two metal discs of nearly three fourths of an inch diameter; these are in the centre of a ring of vulcanite. The connection between the wires and carbon is by means of a strip of tinfoil, shown here in dotted lines. The whole is embedded in and surrounded by a circular iron case of three inches diameter.

No. 7 are sections of the different parts of the transmitter, separated to show more clearly. On the centre of the stout iron diaphragm is fixed a short tube of brass, which holds within it a projecting length of glass tubing; this last and the screw opposite to it from the outside of transmitter press against the metal discs, between which is the carbon.

No. 8. The apparatus opened. a, insulating disc attached to brass rod: upon pressure a brass knob underneath establishes connection with bell at further station. b, this throws the bell, at the top of the same transmitter, out of current in a similar manner while conversation is going on. c, induction coil for long circuits, whose primary wire, having a very low resistance, is placed within the secondary in the usual manner. The transmitter is included in the primary circuit of the induction coil with a cell of battery.

The secondary circuit includes the line and the signal bell. The calling key when depressed cuts both the secondary coil and the bell magnet out of circuit and introduces a call battery for the purpose of sending the signal to the distant station. The chalk cylinder is in a third or tertiary circuit of the induction coil, no battery being included in this circuit.

It will thus be seen that there are three absolutely independent circuits wound upon the one induction coil, a particularly novel arrangement, and one which, by constituting the action of each of the three distinct working parts purely local, renders the entire apparatus peculiarly free from liability to disarrangement.

Respecting the chalk cylinder in Edison's receiving telephone, it appears that during some experiments with the electro-chemical telephone Mr. Edison discovered some peculiar phenomena; and when connecting the binding-posts of the telephone with a galvanometer, he found that the platinum knob and the chalk generated electricity of equal force to the half of a Daniel cell. Acting upon this discovery, he arranged four of the chalk cylinders upon a non-conducting spindle. He then connected the platinum knob or rubber of one chalk cylinder with the metallic central box of the next. Four chalk cylinders were thus arranged, one of the terminals being the platinum knob from the chalk, the current being conveyed along the usual brass slip. At the other end of this arrangement a metallic slip was connected with the central metallic box or core of the chalk cylinder. This battery, when the handle is rotated, is equivalent in power to two Daniel cells.

HUGHES'S ELECTRIC SONOMETER AND BALANCE, AND AUDIOMETER.

1. The Electric Sonometer and Induction Currents, Balance for assaying and physical researches.—The sonometer is a very sensitive instrument that indicates and measures the force of rapid induced currents:—a, primary coil of 5½ centimetres diameter, 10 millimetres deep, consisting of 100 metres of No. 32 silk-covered copper wire wound on a boxwood spool; b, primary coil similar to the other, but containing about half the quantity of wire. These coils are fixed at the two ends of a boxwood scale, c, and are so arranged that their poles oppose each other: they are connected with the clock microphone, d, and battery. e, f, secondary coil, precisely similar to a. Its poles are connected through the microphonic key, g, to a Bell telephone, h. f can be moved backwards and forwards on c, which is divided off up to 200 millimetres. The absolute zero point is at one fifth of the length of c, and nearer to b. i, primary coils, and j, secondary coils of the induction currents balance. They are exactly similar to a and f, but, being placed horizontally, i and j are fixed, and eparated from each other by a space of five millimetres. One pair of coils is furnished with a fine micrometer screw, k, so as to perfectly adjust the balance, it being found practically impossible to make the two pairs alike. i i are joined in circuit to the battery e and microphone d, which is fixed at the back of a drum clock, l. d and l, in actual use, may be miles away, but they are placed here to show connection. m m, movable box-wood cups to contain coin and metal discs; they fit into a space in the centre of the coils, of three centimetres diameter. The mahogany stand, n n, on which the sonometer, balance, and key are fixed, is 21 in. wide by 17 in. deep.

2. Microphonic key on a larger scale. a, brass arm with ebony finger-plate; a spring hinge gives it an upward tendency. b, the microphone, this being a fine platinum wire, pendant from a nicely-balanced and poised small brass roller. This causes an extremely gentle contact with a small piece of platinum fixed in the side of brass arm. A harder contact than this will not give any sound at all. c, switch to cut off current passed through microphonic key when the clock microphone is used. d, steel contact spring, which sends current through the balance when brass arm is raised. e, spring contact. Sends current through the sonometer when arm is down. d and e are checked from touching each other by the brass stop, f. g, spring, contacts when arm is down, and short circuits the movable sonometer coil when the balance is in use. h, button for holding down brass arm.

3. Sliding boxwood scale, divided up to 200 millimetres, furnished with a rest that fits over the right-hand balance coils, fig. 1. When this is used the other sonometer is dispensed with, and the metal discs or coin are simply dropped in the circular tubular hollow, which usually holds the boxwood cup.

The following is explanatory of the uses of this apparatus. If we place in the coils of the induction balance a piece of metal, say copper, bismuth, or iron, we at once produce a disturbance of the balance, and it will give out sounds more or less intense on the telephone, according to the mass, or if of similar sizes, according to the molecular structure, of the metal. The volume and intensity of sound is invariably the same for a similar metal. If by means of the switch the telephone is instantly transferred to the sonometer, and if its coil be at zero, we should hear sounds when the brass arm is up or in connection with the induction balance, and no sounds, or silence, when the key is down or in connection with the sonometer. If the sonometer coil was moved through several degrees, or through more than the required amount, we should find that the sounds increase when the arm is depressed; but when the coil is moved to a degree where there is absolute equality, if the arm is either up or down, then the degree on the scale should give the true value of the disturbance produced in the induction balance; and this is so exact that if we put, say, a silver coin whose value is 115 deg., no other degree will produce equality. Once knowing, therefore, the value of any metal or alloy, it is not necessary to know in advance what the metal is; for if its equality is 115 deg., it is silver coin; if 52, iron; if 40, lead; if 10, bismuth; and as there is a very wide limit between each metal, the reading of the value of each is very rapid, a few seconds sufficing to give the exact sound value of any metal or alloy.

4. The audiometer, an adaptation of the sonometer, being an instrument for exactly measuring our power of hearing and chronicling the progress of recovery from deafness. It was first applied by Dr. Richardson to some very remarkable investigations relative to our hearing powers. a is the scale measured into 200 millimetres. b b are the two primary fixed coils, both exactly similar to those in the sonometer as to length and size of wire, although what should be the thinner coil is here padded out, so that they look both alike as to depth.

The wires from these coils are connected with the microphone, c, and Leclanche's battery cells, d d; e, secondary and moving coil, connected through the binding screws, f f, to the telephone, h. The switch, g, is a brass arm pivoted on an ebony plate, on which are also fixed two brass studs. The free end of arm placed over either of these gives either the force of one or, when desired, two cells, the stronger current being used only for very deaf patients.

A fuller description of the battery and Bell telephone used with the electric sonometer and induction currents balance may be interesting. In fig. 1 Professor Hughes's battery of three elements is used. Each element is constructed thus:—A glass jar containing some solution of sulphate of copper, in which a disc of copper is placed attached to a strap of copper, protected along its length by gutta-percha. At its upper end is a terminal. A glass tube is closed at its lower end by a diaphragm of calico, then three fourths filled with pipeclay, the upper fourth with common sal ammoniac: into this is immersed a plate of zinc, which also has a terminal. This tube, with its contents, is placed in the jar to within an inch of its bottom.

These three Daniel elements are found amply sufficient; and even this weak force is so exquisitely sensitive that it will find out the smallest fraction of difference in weight or structure of metals. Two quite new coins, fresh from the Mint, apparently both of the same weight, when placed in the balance will be found to possess a difference which the millimetre scale at once indicates. The pocket form of the improved Bell telephone, h, fig. 1, is only 2½ in. in diameter. It differs in its construction from the original portable telephone described in this Journal on Dec. 15, 1877. In h the magnet (instead of being straight) is short and tubular, folded over so as to form a central tube within the outer. The circular vibrating plate is really an extension of the magnet, being fixed to and extending across its outer circumference or north pole, and rests against the inner or south pole. The coil of insulated copper wire fills up the space between the inner and outer tubes and the fold that connects them. The coil is attached to and vibrates with the plate, this being placed at the farther side from the outer orifice of the instrument.

Any good ordinary telephone can be used with the audiometer.

COWPER'S WRITING TELEGRAPH.

The object attained by this instrument, the invention of Mr. E. A. Cowper, is that it enables the operator to write at a distant station many miles away, just as though he were present there himself, without requiring the use of any special signal, codes, or signs (to spell each letter, as is now the practice), and without the assistance of any person to translate the signals as received. The instrument acts upon the simple principle of communicating at all times to the writing pen at the receiving end of the line, the exact position of the pencil of the operator at the sending station through two line wires, or so to speak, giving the latitude and longitude of the pencil continually; the position of the pencil vertically being communicated by one wire, and the position horizontally being communicated by the other wire. The pencil of the operator has two light "contact rods" jointed to it, and one of these slides over the edges of a series of "contact plates" having various resistances interposed between them and the line wire, while the other rod slides over a second set of such plates connected to the other line wire; at the receiving end of the line each of these wires actuates its own needle. The two needles (which are placed at right angles to each other, and are provided with light springs) actuate one writing pen, so that the pen moves up or down, and backwards or forwards, in exact obedience to the motions of the pencil in the hand of the operator at the distant station. Both the paper written upon in pencil by the operator at the sending station and that written upon in ink by him at the receiving station move along as the writing proceeds, and the messages have only to be cut off from time to time, wound round a piece of card, and sent out to their destination, or put into an envelope and dispatched. The resistance in each line wire is now arranged at 400 ohms, equal to a distance of, say, thirty-six miles on land, and the instrument has written well through 1000 ohms resistance, equal to, say, ninety miles on land.

The following is a detailed account of the parts of the apparatus, with references to our Illustrations of Cowper's Writing Telegraph:—

1. Cowper's writing telegraph. a, sending part of the instrument. b, the receiving portion. c, box containing clockwork: this pulls, at the same time, both the sending and receiving slips of paper when written on. d, rod communicating with metal lever inside, and which presses down upon the endless band of paper to give the necessary tension. The paper unrolls to the reel above and immediately contiguous to the writing-frame, e. A similar rod and lever are also placed on the wheel of paper inside, at the receiving end of instrument. f, wooden frames protecting the ends of sliding contacts. g, one of the horseshoe electro-magnets, a pair of these forming, with the coils and needles above, the galvanoscopes or current detectors, one for each line.

2. Writing apparatus of the sending part of the instrument. a, small pocket ever-pointed pencil. b, slip of paper being written on. c, metal writing-frame. d, small insulating plugs of wood, forming part of the light connecting-rods that carry the metal contacts, e. One pole of a sending battery is attached to each connecting-rod, the other pole is connected with the earth. There is a battery to each rod of the sending instrument. Only one rod is shown complete in fig. 2. The contact piece, e, is a rounded projection near the end of each rod. Part of the top covering of instrument is taken off to show more plainly the edges of contact plates, f. These are thirty-two in number, fixed closely together, but insulated from each other by paraffined paper. Connected to the plates there are resistance coils (placed in the bottom of the sending part of instrument), a coil to each plate. The first plate is connected direct to the line wire; the second plate is connected to the line wire through a resistance coil; the third through two coils, and so on. The action communicated by the pencil to the metal contacts may be explained thus: when sliding out and across the top of each one of the metal plates, the current from the battery has to pass through, successively, a limited number of coils; the connecting-rod short circuits the number of coils corresponding to its motion. The fewer of these resistance coils there are in circuit the stronger is the current in the main line. As is the greater or less extent of the motion in the direction of the length of the connecting-rod, so will be the corresponding change in the strength of the current in the main line. When the pencil, a, makes a long sweep or curve in the writing, there will be a weak current; if a small stroke, then a strong current will be caused to flow in the line. The same rule applies to both rods connecting the pencil movements, whether it is the up and down or the sidelong movements, each being connected with its own line wire.

3. The writing apparatus of the receiving end of instrument, on a larger scale than No. 2. a, pen of capillary siphon tube drawing off limpid aniline ink from small cistern, b. This glass tube is delicately suspended by a hook on to the end of a very fine steel spring, the exact adjustment of which is beautifully poised by a thumb-screw through the horizontal beam above. c, fine silk threads leading from the needles and guiding by their motion the movement of the pen. d, continuous band of paper, 1½ inch wide, on which the writing is reproduced. The writing frame has a somewhat curved shape, as shown; this allows for the freer motion of the pen, which, being suspended somewhat in the manner of a pendulum, necessarily describes a small segment of a circle.

4. Plan of the receiving part of instrument. Its general operation is briefly thus:—The current from one of the line wires flows at the receiving station through the galvanoscope to earth. The galvanoscope has a needle, one tip of which is connected to the glass pen by the fine silk thread, and just where the pen touches this thread it is crossed at right angles by another, connecting it in like manner to a second galvanoscope. The needles of each of these galvanoscopes deflect in proportion to the strength of the current flowing through its coil. The points of these two needles keep moving with the varying currents, caused by the motion of the sending-pencil. a, pivoted needles of exceedingly thin, soft iron plates. These needles are slightly curved in their sections, in order to stiffen them, their thickness being only 1-110th of an inch, mounted on polished hard steel bearings, and are thus exceedingly free and lively, as a very slight amount of friction in this part of the instrument would be fatal to good writing. The needles are surrounded by coils of insulated copper wires, b b, and acted upon by the electro-magnets, g g g g, placed on either side. The electro-magnets are magnetised by local batteries connected with the coils, b b. c c are terminals or screw clamps for attaching the various wires from the two main-line batteries, the local battery, the line wires, and the earth wire. The writing-pen is imprisoned and guided in its movements by the fine silk threads, d d, which are fastened to pins, e e, tightened by fine steel springs, these being attached to and adjusted by screws, g g. The threads, as before mentioned, are fastened to the needles. h, continuous slip of paper. i is a sliding sponge-holder, to be moved forward under the pen when that is not required to be used, so that the ink may flow into and be absorbed by the sponge.

5. Facsimile tracing of writing in aniline ink by the glass tube of Mr. E. A. Cowper's telegraph.

If the writing at the distant station should require to be written larger or smaller than the original message in pencil at the sending station, the alteration can be effected by making the contact-plates (f, fig. 2) thicker for enlarging, or thinner for reducing, the size of the writing. These plates requiring some little trouble to fix, this enlargement or reduction of the writing is obviously not merely a question of the will, as has been erroneously stated by some of our contemporaries.

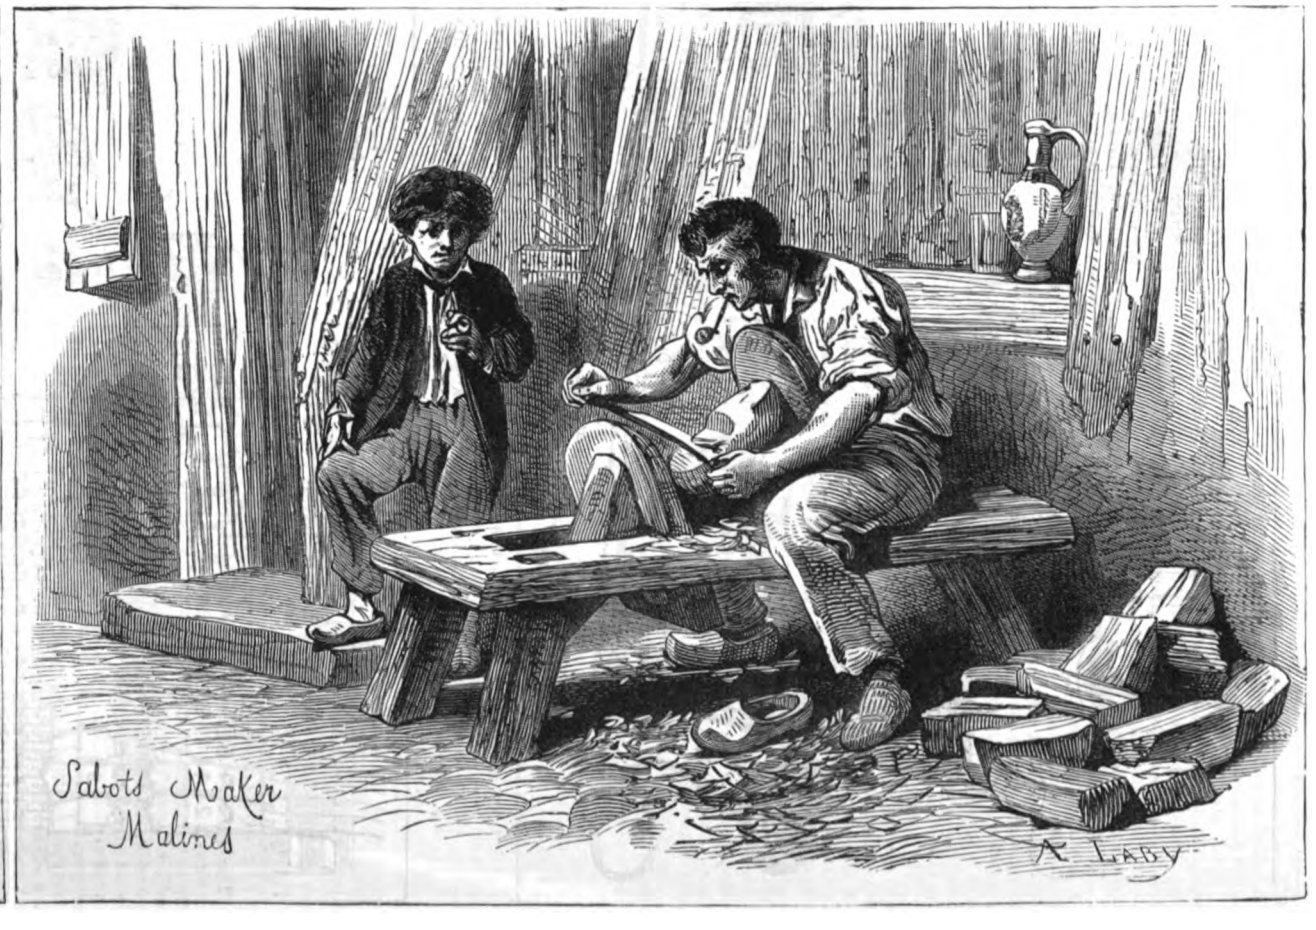
FUNCHAL, MADEIRA.

The mild and genial climate of this celebrated island in the Atlantic Ocean, a remaining colonial appanage of the kingdom of Portugal, and within a few days' voyage of European ports, has long been noted to such a degree as to attract many visitors in the winter season. Its scenery is also characterised by grandeur, beauty, and variety within a moderate compass of distance, with mountain ranges 6000 feet high, lifting their peaks in the nearest vicinity to each other, but divided by stupendous clefts and ravines, or intersecting the narrow strip of land in all directions, forming deep glens and gorges all round its coast up to the central rampart, which has an aspect truly sublime. The only drawback on the enjoyment of this place by invalids is the ruggedness of the roads and paths all over the island, and the rudeness of the mode of travelling, but for equestrians or pedestrians who are in good health there is an endless choice of delightful excursions. The situation of Funchal on the south coast, the port and chief town of Madeira, is very striking; the harbour is almost open, being only a slight curve between two headlands, with a sea exposure to the whole vast expanse of the ocean, as far as the South Pole; yet this mere roadstead, except during wintry storms, is perfectly secure, and vessels land their passengers or cargoes, by lighters drawn with ropes, on the beach in safety, while the smallest boats venture out into the bay. The town sits on a steep slope, which is rent into three divisions by precipitous ravines, and lofty peaks, often veiled by clouds, look down from behind, the masses of rock displaying many picturesque shapes and rich volcanic tints. At one end of the beach is the Portuguese Governor's house, with a noble avenue of plane-trees; at the other is a shady public walk, the Praça, guarded by an old fort of red stone with pepper-box turrets. The cliffs of Brazen Head, Loo Rock with the Castle, and the three rocky islets called the Desertas, in the offing, complete an enchanting mixture of land and sea views at Funchal, the port of Madeira.

The meteoric display of falling stars this month is expected to take place about the 27th inst.

Mr. A. M. Sullivan, M.P., gave, on Tuesday night, at the Townhall, Newcastle, a lecture entitled "Never; or, Lessons of Hope from the Schoolbook of History," in the course of which he said that young men must not look for guidance to statesmen and party leaders, but must survey the whole field of popular struggle, since statesmen and party leaders were little more than barometers, registering the official level which any popular question had attained.

Lord Hatherton is sitting as umpire to arbitrate on the proposed 10 per cent reduction in the earthenware trade, which affects seventy-six manufactories and about 30,000 hands. The masters' case is that the selling prices of earthenware have been reduced 30 per cent., while the price of materials has fallen only 13 per cent.; also that the American duty is 55 cents on the value; and that potters' wages in Belgium and Germany are only half what are paid here.



The first of two lectures on the benefits accruing to India from English rule was on Tuesday night delivered in the Queen-street Hall of the Philosophical Institution, Edinburgh, by Mr. W. W. Hunter, LL.D., of the Bengal Civil Service, Director-General of Statistics to the Government of India, and a Companion of the Order of the Indian Empire. The learned lecturer, who is one of the Council of the Royal Asiatic Society, and a well-known authority on all matters Indian, took for consideration in his first address that portion of his subject which deals with the rural districts of India, reserving the cities and the industrial development, education and the social organisation generally, for the second.

OBITUARY.

MAJOR-GENERAL BELL.

Major-General Edward William Dorrington Bell, V.C., C.B., Commanding the Belfast District, died at his residence, Lisbreen House, Fortwilliam Park, Belfast, on the 10th inst. He entered the Army in 1842, and attained the rank of Lieutenant-General in 1868. He served in the Crimean War, including the Battle of Alma, where he personally captured the first gun taken from the Russians. He was also at Inkerman and Sebastopol; and for his distinguished services throughout the campaign had received medal with three clasps, Victoria Cross, the Legion of Honour, the Medjidie, and the Turkish medal. He took part in the Indian campaign, including the siege and capture of Lucknow, for which also he had medal and clasp. In 1876 he was appointed to the command of the Belfast district, which he held till his death.

MR. GOOLD.

George Ignatius Goold, Esq., late Resident Magistrate for Waterford, died at Dunmore East, in the county of Waterford, on the 6th inst. He was born Sept. 7, 1805, the second son of Sir George Goold, second Baronet, of Old Court, in the county of Cork, by Lady Charlotte Browne, his wife, eldest daughter of Valentine, Earl of Kenmare; was educated at Oscott, and was afterwards called to the Bar. He was held in high esteem in all circles, and his legal opinion was highly valued. He married, Nov. 3, 1840, Clara, daughter of Major-General James Webber Smith, C.B., and leaves six sons and one daughter.

MR. WILSON, M.P.

William Wilson, M.P. for the county of Donegal, died at his residence, Dramancercy House, Raphoe, on the 8th inst. He was the second son of William Wilson, Esq., of Raphoe, was educated in that town, and for some time practised as a solicitor. In August, 1876, he was elected for the county of Donegal in the Conservative interest, succeeding the late Mr. Conolly, of Castletown. Mr. Wilson married, in 1865, Martha, daughter of the late D. Wilson, Esq., which lady died in 1875.

The deaths have also been announced of—

Mrs. Ward, wife of Dr. Michael Francis Ward, M.P. for Galway, on the 2nd inst., at Camden-road, aged thirty-three.

Major General Charles Moray Macleane (retired), Indian Army, on the 27th ult., at Guernsey, aged seventy-one.

Admiral Charles Edmunds, R.N., of The Albany, on the 1st inst., at 2, Park-place-villas, Maida-hill West, in his seventy-ninth year.

Colonel Arthur A'Court Fisher, C.B., Royal Engineers, on the 2nd inst., at Reay House, Inverness, aged forty-nine. He served at Sebastopol, and in China from 1857 to 1860.

Captain Edward Walter Home Crofton, 60th Rifles, only son of the late Colonel Crofton, C.B., Royal Artillery, and Mrs. Crofton, of Hampton Court Palace, on the 19th ult., in Afghanistan.

Captain John Becke, 21st Regiment Bombay Native Infantry, Marine Battalion, on the 27th ult., at Jhelum, Punjaub, aged thirty-seven. He was second son of John Becke, Esq., of The Cedars, Northampton.

The Hon. Mrs. Beaumont (Susan Hussey), widow of Richard Beaumont, Esq., R.N., and daughter of George, third Lord Macdonald, on the 5th inst., at Settrington House, Yorkshire, aged seventy-two.

Thomas Richardson Colledge, M.D., F.R.S. Edinburgh, for forty-two years President of the Medical Missionary Society in China, on the 28th ult., at Lauriston House, Cheltenham, in his eighty-third year.

Major George Anthony Aufrère Baker, 6th Bengal Cavalry, on the 9th ult., at Jhelum, India, on his way to take officiating command of the 10th Bengal Lancers. He served in the Indian Mutiny, including the siege of Delhi and Lucknow, and in the China War, 1860.

Lady Salusbury-Trelawny (Harriet Jane), wife of Sir John Salusbury-Trelawny, Bart., of Trelawny, Cornwall, on the 5th inst. Her Ladyship was eldest daughter of J. H. Tremayne, Esq., of Heligan, Cornwall, M.P., was married to Sir John Salusbury-Trelawny, Bart., in 1842, and had one son and two daughters.

The Rev. John Rawlin Trye, for thirty-four years Rector of Great Witcombe, Gloucestershire, on the 4th inst., aged seventy. He was the youngest son of Charles Brandon Trye, Esq., of Leckampton Court, in the county of Gloucester, F.R.S., an eminent medical writer, by Mary, his wife, sister of the distinguished antiquaries Samuel and Daniel Lysons.

General William Crokat, on the 6th inst., at 52, Inverleith-row, Edinburgh, in his ninety-second year. He served in Sicily in 1807, and in Portugal under Sir Arthur Wellesley, in Spain at Corunna, in the Walcheren Expedition, and in the Peninsula, and had the war medal with four clasps for Vimiera, Corunna, Vittoria, and Pyrenees. General Crokat was in charge of Napoleon at St. Helena at the time of his death.

The Hon. Mrs. Coote (Louisa), widow of Charles Coote, Esq., of Bellamon Forest, Cootehill, Ireland, on the 3rd inst., at Bath, in her eighty-eighth year. Mrs. Coote was youngest daughter of Richard Dawson, Esq., M.P. for the county of Monaghan, and was sister of Richard Thomas, Lord Cremorne, father of the present Earl of Dartrey. Mrs. Coote, with her sisters, had a patent of precedence as the daughter of a Baron.

Edward Knight, Esq., of Chawton House, Hants, J.P. and D.L., on the 5th inst., aged eighty five. He was eldest son of Edward Austen, Esq., of Godmersham, Kent (who changed his name to that of Knight), by Elizabeth, his wife, third daughter of Sir Brook Bridges, Bart., and was consequently nephew of James Austen, the celebrated novelist. He married first, in 1826, Mary Dorothea, daughter of the Right Hon. Sir Edward Knatchbull, Bart., and secondly, in 1840, Adela, daughter of John Portal, Esq., of Laverstoke, and leaves issue by each wife.

James Clerk-Maxwell, Esq., of Middlebie, F.R.S., Professor of Experimental Physics in the University of Cambridge, on the 5th inst., at Scroope-terrace, Cambridge. This distinguished scholar, who gained the highest University honours, was formerly Professor of Natural Philosophy in Marischal College, Aberdeen, and in King's College, London. He was born in 1831, the only son of the late John Clerk-Maxwell, Esq., of Glenlair, in the county of Kirkcudbright, by Frances, his wife, daughter of Robert Hodshon Cay, Esq., of North Charlton, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in Scotland, and was married, in 1858, to Katherine Mary, third daughter of the Very Rev. Daniel Dewar, D.D.

A correspondent points out that we erred in stating that the late Robert Henry Allan, Esq., of Blackwell Grange, Durham, whose memoir we gave last week, was the last surviving son of Robert Allan, Esq., of Newbottle. George Thomas Allan, Esq., of Barton Lodge, near Darlington, is the fourth and last surviving son, and inherits the Blackwell Grange entailed estate.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

F M T (New York).—We are obliged for the information. The congress has our best wishes for its success.

J G F (Ramsgate).—The card with address is at hand, and you shall hear from us about your problems in the course of the week.

H S Y.—The review of Mr. Gossip's "Theory of the Chess Openings" by Professor Wayte appeared in the September number of the Chessplayers' Chronicle.

C H C (Cavendish-square).—The fuller the solution the better; in labouring to be brief you are likely to become obscure.

B L D (Plymouth).—You are too positive by half. Like you, many correspondents have supposed that 1. Kt to Q 2nd solves problem No. 1863, overlooking the answer, 1. Kt to K 4th (dis. ch). The answer to 1. Kt to K B 6th is 1. P takes Kt!

Correct Solutions of Problem No. 1861 received from A H Tongue, M H Moorhouse, C B Carlon (Clifton), J M G (Sandycove), and W J E.

PROBLEM No. 1865.

By H. M. Prideaux.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

One of ten Games played by Mr. J. H. Blackburne, sans voir and simultaneously, at the Central Chess Club, Glasgow, on the 24th ult.

(Allgaier Gambit.)

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr. Broom).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th

5. Kt to Kt 5th	P to K R 3rd
6. Kt takes P	K takes Kt
7. P to Q 4th	P to K B 6th
8. B to K B 4th

In readiness to defend the K R P when Black plays his Bishop to K 2nd. Mr. Gossip gives:—

8. P takes P	B to K 2nd
9. B to B 4th (ch)	K to Kt 2nd
10. B to K 3rd	B takes P (ch)
11. K to Q 2nd, &c.
8.	B to K 2nd

13. P to K 5th	Kt to K 5th
14. Kt takes Kt	P takes Kt
15. B to Kt 2nd	Q to Q 4th

Black was premature in advancing the Queen's Pawn, and now he defends a paltry Pawn with the most powerful piece upon the board.

16. P to K B 5th	B takes P
17. Castles	K to K 3rd

Truly a curious position.

18. P to B 4th

Winning a piece, whatever course the adversary elects to pursue.

18.	Q takes Q B P
19. P to Q 5th (ch)	Q takes Q P
20. Q takes Q (ch)	K takes Q
21. R takes B	Kt to Q B 3rd

An old-fashioned continuation, which has been abandoned in favour of 6. B to Kt 5th (ch).

6.	P to K R 3rd
7. Kt to K B 3rd	P to K 5th
8. K Kt to Q 2nd

This loses time; the coup juste at this point is 8. Q to K 2nd.

14. P to K B 4th	B to Q 2nd
15. P to Q Kt 4th

Necessary, for Black now threatens to win the Bishop by 16. P to Q Kt 4th, a move he could not make with effect until he had played out the Queen's Bishop.

15.	B takes P (at Kt 4th)
16. Kt to B 3rd	B to Q 3rd
17. B to Q 4th	P to Q B 3rd

25. R to K Kt sq	K R to Q sq
26. Q R to K sq	Q to Q 3rd
27. R to K 5th	Q to Kt 5th
28. P to K B 5th	K to B sq

An unnecessary precaution; 28. B takes K Kt P wins at once.

29. P to B 6th

White is now as unconscious of danger as the adversary was of opportunity upon his last move. He should have retreated the Q R to K sq here.

29.	R takes P
30. P takes P (ch)	K to Kt sq
31. B takes P (ch)	K takes B
32. P to Kt 8th (a Queen) (ch)	R takes Q
33. R to B 5th (ch)	K to K sq and Black wins.

A great congress of chessplayers is announced to be held in New York in the first week of next year, and assurances have been already received that the best players in the States will attend and take part in the several tournaments it is proposed to organise for the occasion. There will be two game tourneys—a grand tourney, open to all comers, for a prize of not less than 500 dols., and a minor tournament for a prize the amount of which will be determined by the number of players entering the lists. The assured competitors in the grand tourney include Messrs. Mackenzie, Hormer, Delmar, Judd, Neill, Orchard, Ware, and Reichelm; and an invitation has been addressed to Mr. Mason, who is now residing in London. It is hoped in New York chess circles that Mr. Blackburne may be induced to cross the Atlantic and wield a lance for England in the mêlée. The undertaking cannot fail to be successful under a management that includes the names of Messrs. Allen, Gilberg, and the veteran Perrin.

A match between the members of the Ladies' College Club and those of the Belsize Club has been played at the rooms of the former association, Little Queen-street. The Ladies' College won easily twelve games to six, Miss Florence Down contributing a win and a draw to the victorious score.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated July 25, 1866) with three codicils (dated April 4, 1871; Nov. 13, 1877; and Sept. 12, 1878) of Mr. Kirkman Daniel Hodgson, formerly of St. Helen's-place, but late of No. 8, Bishopsgate-street Within, who died on Sept. 11 last, at Ash Grove, Sevenoaks, was proved on the 1st inst. by James Stewart Hodgson, the brother, Charles Lloyd Norman, and Robert Kirkman Hodgson, the son, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £400,000. The testator bequeaths to his daughter, Miss Caroline Anna Hodgson, in addition to other bequests, a pecuniary legacy of £60,000; to his said brother, in addition to his legacy as an executor, £10,000; and legacies to his own and his late wife's relatives, executors, clerks, servants, and others. The residue of his property, including the Ash Grove estate, the testator gives to his said son. The deceased sat as member of Parliament for Bridport from March, 1857, to November, 1868, and for Bristol from 1870 to 1877; he was a member of the Commission of Lieutenantcy of London, Justice of the Peace for Herts and West Kent, and was High Sheriff of Herts in 1845. Mr. Kirkman Hodgson was a well-known merchant, formerly as a partner in Messrs. Finlay, Hodgson, and Co., and latterly in the house of Messrs. Baring Brothers; he was also a director and ex-governor of the Bank of England.

The will (dated Aug. 14, 1879) with a codicil bearing the same date and two others (executed on Oct. 2, 1879) of Sir Anthony Cleasby, formerly one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, late of Pennoyre, Brecknockshire, and of No. 20, Queen Anne's-gate, Westminster, who died on the 6th ult., was proved on the 30th ult. by Richard Digby Cleasby, the son, Frederick Robert M'Clintock, and John Henry Hill, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £140,000. The testator devises the Pennoyre estate and all his other real estate to his wife for life, with remainder to his son, Richard Digby Cleasby, for life, with remainder to his sons successively, in tail male. There are several legacies; and, after payment of annuities to his said son and to his two daughters, Edith Mary and Lucy Antonia, during their mother's lifetime, and the setting apart of an annual sum out of the income for the purpose of providing at her death the sums covenanted to be paid by him under his children's marriage settlements, the residue of the personalty is to be held upon trusts similar to the uses declared of the real estate.

The will (dated July 25, 1877) of Mr. William Peale, late of Loose, near Maidstone, who died on Sept. 26 last, was proved on the 28th ult. by Philip Watson Ottaway and James Readman Coles, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £140,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife, Mrs. Kate Peale, £5000, and all his furniture, plate, jewellery, and household effects; he also bequeaths the sum of £50,000 upon trust to pay the interest to her for life, and at her death the capital is to be divided as follows—viz., one fourth to Mr. Ottaway; one fourth upon trust for Mrs. Lucy Coles, her husband, and children; one eighth upon trust for Mrs. Emily Walne, her husband, and children; one eighth upon trust for Mrs. Clara Catt, her husband, and children; one eighth to Margaret Sarah Heffer; and the remaining one eighth to Christiana Maria Erck; £4000 upon trust for Mrs. Elizabeth Child and her children; and many other legacies to wife's relatives, servants, old workmen on farm and their widows, and others. As to the residue of his property, he gives one fourth to his wife, one fourth to Mr. Ottaway, one fourth upon trust for Mrs. Lucy Coles, her husband, and children; and one fourth to the said Margaret Sarah Heffer.

The will (dated July 10, 1879) of Mr. Henry Rougier, late of No. 1, Inverness-gardens, Campden-hill, Kensington, who died on the 16th ult., was proved on the 25th ult. by the Rev. John Barclay, Vicar of Runcorn and Canon of Chester, Thomas Brooks, Thomas Oldham Barlow, A.R.A., and John Pattinson Guy, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £120,000. The testator bequeaths to his executors, Mr. Brooks £2000, Mr. Barlow £1000, and Mr. Guy £200; to his housekeeper, Eliza Craigmyle, and his cook, Eliza Lee Swan, if in his service at his decease, £100 each; and to the London Stock Exchange Benevolent Fund, for the relief of distressed members and their families, £500. As to the residue of his property, he leaves one fifth to each of his sisters, Mrs. Matilda Barclay, Miss Maria Rougier, and Miss Ann Rougier; one fifth to his brother, George Rougier, and the remaining fifth among certain of his nephews and nieces.

The will (dated June 13, 1877) of Mr. James Fellows, late of No. 15, Old Quebec-street, Hyde Park, who died on the 14th ult., was proved on the 30th ult. by John Sedgwick, the nephew, and Alfred Owthwaite Sedgwick, the great-nephew, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £30,000. The testator bequeaths £100 each, free of legacy duty, to the Charing-cross Hospital; the Ophthalmic Hospital, King William-street; the London Orphan Asylum, Watford; the West Kent General Hospital, Maidstone; the West Kent Ophthalmic Hospital, Maidstone; and the Home for Little Boys, Horton Kirby, near Farningham. There are three legacies of nineteen guineas each to certain Sunday and week-day schools, and numerous other legacies. The residue of his property is to be divided between his great-niece, Ellen Mary Bartlett, and his great-nephew, Frederick Bate.

The will (dated Feb. 8, 1870), with two codicils (dated March 17, 1874 and Feb. 11, 1879) of Lieutenant-General Charles Herbert, C.B., late of Boyle Cottage, Thames Ditton, who died on Sept. 19 last, was proved on the 28th ult. by Colonel Thomas George Glover and Arthur Maynard Denny, the acting executors, the personalty being sworn under £16,000.

The will (dated June 5, 1855) with a codicil (dated April 21, 1869) of the Rev. Robert Cowpland, late of Wecford, Staffordshire, who died on Sept. 9 last, was proved on the 30th ult. by Stafford Baxter Somerville, the sole executor, the personal estate being sworn under £14,000.

The will (dated April 6, 1875) with a codicil (dated July 15, 1876) of Thomas Harries, late of Cruckton Hall, Shropshire, Esq., formerly Lieutenant-Colonel 63rd Regiment, Knight of the Legion of Honour, who died on the 12th ult., at Hanwood, near Shrewsbury, was proved on the 1st inst. by Major-General Charles Vanbrugh Jenkins, the surviving executor, the personal estate being sworn under £12,000. The testator bequeaths all his personal estate and effects to his cousin, the said Charles Vanbrugh Jenkins, absolutely; and as to all his real estate at Cruckton over which he had any power of appointment, together with his freehold estate at Allesby, within the liberties of Coventry, he devises the same to the use of his said cousin for life, with remainder to Robert Edward Arthur Jenkins (the eldest son of the said Charles Vanbrugh Jenkins) for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively, in tail male.

The State Apartments of Windsor Castle are closed.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S
WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.
Happy Days! There is something of regret and gloom in the first appearance of grey hairs; our prospects are often blighted by their premature appearance. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER happily affords a safe and sure means for restoring hem again to the freshness and beauty of youth. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER is no new low-priced article.
It is the old-established standard and reliable article known and spoken most highly of in every civilised country. Every good thing for the hair that the most scientific men of the Old and New World can suggest are combined in Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. It requires only a few applications to restore grey hair to its youthful colour and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. Dandriff is quickly and permanently removed. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S
WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.
There are two special qualities which determine and fix the superiority and excellence of Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER:—First—Its prompt, quick action, and the new growth, life, and vigour that it is sure to give to the hair, never failing by a few applications TO RESTORE GREY OR WHITE HAIR TO ITS YOUTHFUL COLOUR, imparting to the hair a delightful aroma, fresh, delicate, and unchangeable in any climate. Second—Its easy application without any previous preparation of the hair; without that sticky and disagreeable sulphur odour found and complained of in other preparations. It never stains the skin or linen. It retains the hair in any desired position, and is cooling and cleansing to the scalp.

FLORAL BELL,
FRAGRANT ELIXIR OR
LIQUID DENTIFRICE.
The admiration of the world, "THE FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE." Language fails to give expression to the beauty or the utility of a beautiful set of white teeth. With no other charm the possessor may well feel proud. Dentists, chemists, and physicians all recommend and use the FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is truly unequalled for cleansing, preserving, and beautifying the teeth, giving them a pearl-like whiteness and hardening the gums. It removes all tartar hardens the enamel, arrests decay, and imparts to the breath at all times a most delightful fragrance.
A few drops on the brush night and morning is all sufficient. Tooth pastes and powders are discarded after a trial of FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is purely vegetable, which may account for the absence of froth in your mouth during its use. A chemical that produces froth may be necessary in soap to cleanse the skin, but all chemicals are certain destruction to the teeth. The enormous and constantly increasing sale for this article enables the proprietor to offer it at the very low price of Two Shillings and Sixpence in large Bottles. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Wholesale Dépôt, 114 and 116, Southampton-row, London.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Florline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants It is perfectly harmless, and delicious as sherry. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London. Retailed everywhere.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots where the glands are not decayed. Ask any Chemist for "The Mexican Hair Renewer," price 3s. 6d. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

DOES YOUR HAIR TURN GREY?
Then use HERRING'S PATENT MAGNETIC BRUSHES and COMBS. Brushes, 10s. and 15s. each. Combs, 2s. 6d., 5s., 7s. 6d., 10s., 15s., and 20s. each. Pamphlets upon application.—5, Great Marlborough-st., W.; 93 and 95, City-road; and of all Perfumers.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored by this valuable specific to its original shade, after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Used as a dressing, it causes growth and arrests falling. The most harmless and effectual restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials post-free.—R. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

GOLDEN HAIR.—ROBARE'S AUREOLINE produces the beautiful Golden Colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all Perfumers. Wholesale, HOVENDEN and SONS, 5, Great Marlborough-street W.; and 93 and 95, City-road, E.C. London; Pinaud and Meyer, 37, Boulevard de Strasbourg, Paris; 31, Graben, Vienna; 44, Rue des Longs Chariots, Brussels.

SOZODONT.—The Peerless liquid Dentifrice.
Its use imparts the most fragrant breath; it beautifies, cleanses, and preserves the teeth in a surprising manner. It gives a delightfully fresh taste and feeling to the mouth, removing all Tartar and Scurf from the Teeth, completely arresting the progress of decay, and whitening such parts as have already become black by decay or neglect. Impure Breath caused by Bad Teeth, Tobacco, Spirits, or Catarrh, is neutralised by Sozodont. The price of the Fragrant Sozodont is 3s. 6d., put up in large bottles, fitted with patent sprinklers for applying the liquid to the tooth-brush. Each bottle is inclosed in a handsome toilet box. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers, and by JOHN M. RICHARDS, Great Russell-street, London. Observe the Name SOZODONT on the label, box, and bottle.

"AND TEETH LIKE ROWS OF PEARLS."
JEWSBURY and BROWN'S Exquisite Compound, the
ORIENTAL TOOTH-PASTE.
The original and only genuine Oriental Tooth-Paste is signed "JEWSBURY and BROWN, Manchester.—Established 50 years." WHITE and SOUND TEETH, a healthy action of the gums producing that firmness and brightness of colour so essential to beauty, is insured by the use of this most perfect Dentifrice. In Pots, at 1s. 6d.; double size, 2s. 6d. All Perfumers and Chemists.

ORGANIC FACTS.—The decay of the Teeth arises from early neglect and the use of tooth pastes, washes and powders which, containing mineral and other deleterious acids, ultimately ruin the enamel. ROWLANDS' ODONTO, being free from injurious elements, is the best dentifrice that can be obtained, as it produces a pearl-like whiteness of the teeth, healthy gums, and fragrant breath; to smokers it is invaluable, as it removes the unpleasant effects of tobacco smoke on the breath. Ask any Chemist for Rowlands.

BREIDENBACH'S PHLOMIS (Sweet Scented). Beautifully fragrant and lasting. 2s. 6d. to 40s. Bottle. BREIDENBACH'S MACASSARINE, invaluable for preserving the growth of the Hair. 1s., 2s. 6d., 5s. Bottle. Of all Chemists and the Makers, 157a, New Bond-street.

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT.

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT (Trade Mark "Anti-fat," registered) is the celebrated REMEDY for CORPULENCY. It is purely vegetable and perfectly harmless. No particular change of diet required. Will reduce a fat person from 21b. to 5lb. a week. It acts upon the food in the stomach, preventing its conversion into fat.

THOMAS FAIRBANK, M.D., of Windsor, Surgeon to her Majesty the Queen, referring to Anti-Fat in the "British Medical Journal" of June 7, 1879, says:—
"I gave some of this extract (Fucus Vesiculosus) to a very corpulent lady, who in three months lost three stones in weight without any change of diet. Since then I have frequently given it for reducing weight, depending on the accumulation of adipose tissue, and have never found it fail. I may state that a patient who has been lately taking it as an anti-fat, and who always suffered very much from rheumatic pains about the body, has been entirely free from such trouble while she has been taking the extract, a fact which she quite independently noted."

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT, sold by Wholesale and Retail Chemists, everywhere. Price 6s. 6d. per Bottle. Send stamp for pamphlet, entitled "How to get Lean without Starvation."—BOTANIC MEDICINE COMPANY, Sole Proprietors, Great Russell-street Buildings, Great Russell-street, London, W.C.

IN "NOTES on CONSUMPTION and WASTING DISEASES SUCCESSFULLY TREATED with HYDRATED OIL, with Cases showing the immediate increase in weight by it," see Book published by Diprose, Bateman, and Co., Lincoln's-inn-fields.

G. OVEREND DREWRY, M.D., Physician to the National Free Dispensary for Consumption and Wasting Diseases, Gower-street, W., Author of "Common-Sense Management of the Stomach," &c., referring to cases treated at the National Free Dispensary for Consumption and Wasting Diseases, says that "'Hydroleine' (or Hydrated Oil) produces an effect such as neither cod-liver oil nor any preparation of it with which I am acquainted even faintly approaches, and patients are unanimous in their statement that the appetite is much increased by taking 'Hydrated Oil,' and that, so far from possessing the unpleasant taste of ordinary cod-liver oil, the taste of 'Hydrated Oil' is agreeable rather than the reverse, and is described by some as resembling Devonshire cream. These, I submit, are very important points in cases usually attended by great irritability of stomach. The general improvement in strength shown within a fortnight was in many instances surprising, even to myself, who had seen already in private practice many startling results from its use. My experience, however, shows that in cases where cod-liver oil or an emulsion of it has been depended upon, increase of weight is rarely obtained."—Page 16.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil).
Equal to Ten times the quantity of Cod-Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil).
Easier to administer than Cod-Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
entirely supersedes plain Cod-Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
may be relied upon to increase weight.

TRY YOUR WEIGHT.—HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil) has proved of the highest value as a food in consumption and all wasting diseases, invariably producing increase in flesh and weight. This preparation of Hydrated Cod-Liver Oil is tonic, digestive, and ten times more strengthening and nourishing, as well as far more pleasant to taste, than plain cod-liver oil. Hydroleine may be described as partially digested oil, which will nourish and produce increase of weight in those cases where oils or fat, not so treated, are difficult or impossible to digest. All tendency to emaciation and loss of weight is arrested by the regular use of Hydroleine, which may be discontinued when the usual average weight has been permanently acquired. Of all Chemists, 4s. 6d.; or sent direct, carriage paid, to any address in England for 5s.—Address Hydroleine Company, 493, Oxford-street, London.

READ the following Extracts from a few among the hundreds of letters received, showing that HYDROLEINE will nourish, and cause young or old to increase in weight where plain cod-liver oil will not; the original letters, with many others, may be seen at our Office.

MR. JAS. STEWART, CHEMIST, of Dalkeith, writing April 28, 1877, says:—
"I weighed only 116 lb. on March 26, took the Hydroleine very irregularly I must confess, and on April 19 weighed 120 lbs. I found it very pleasant to take, never experienced the least approach to eructation, and rather think it acted very much as a tonic."

WRITING of Hydrated Oil on May 14, 1877, Mr. KENNETH M'DONALD, of Dunkeld, says:—
"I had been taking cod-liver oil all winter myself, and thought I would first experiment on myself with the Hydroleine, and I must say, whether it is that or not, I am much better; in fact, all right again, and I certainly give it the credit, and will recommend it to all in preference to the ordinary oil—it is much easier taken."

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
can be taken by the most delicate stomach.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
is immediately assimilated.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
produces rapid increase in flesh.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
is pleasant to take.

is certain in result.

IN "NOTES on CONSUMPTION and WASTING DISEASES successfully treated with HYDRATED OIL," by G. Overend Drewry, M.D., he says:—"To brain-workers of all classes 'Hydrated Oil' is invaluable, supplying, as it does, the true nerve food. There are many in these days of feverish work and continued strain who insensibly are drifting towards degeneration of nerve tissue, without the evidence of any special disease, excepting nervous irritability and sleeplessness. In these cases I have found "Hydrated Oil" act like a charm, tranquillising and restoring tone to the nervous system with startling rapidity. It is an exceedingly difficult preparation to make, but from many hundred samples examined by Dr. Bartlett and myself, I am in a position to say that in the 'Hydrated Oil' all the chemical changes necessary to transform the oil from its original state to one of partial solubility in water are perfectly produced. The unstable nature of such a combination is one of its most valuable characteristics, and it frequently happens that changes of temperature and exposure to light cause a certain small separation of watery extractives from the essential hydration, which is, however, invariably permanent to the requisite extent. This is of no consequence, sufficient combination being again produced instantaneously by shaking the bottle."—Page 36.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil) has been favourably received by all classes of people, as well as by the press, as the following extracts will show:—

MRS. ELLEN COOKE, Weston-super-Mare, in a letter dated May 24, 1879, says:—
"I think the last bottle you sent me has saved the life of a little boy three years old."

MR. J. H. GREGORY, Master of Caxton Workhouse, Cambs., writing on March 12, 1879, says:—
"The effect of the bottle I received from you was so marvellous, as I increased nearly 4 lb. in weight, and felt better every way."

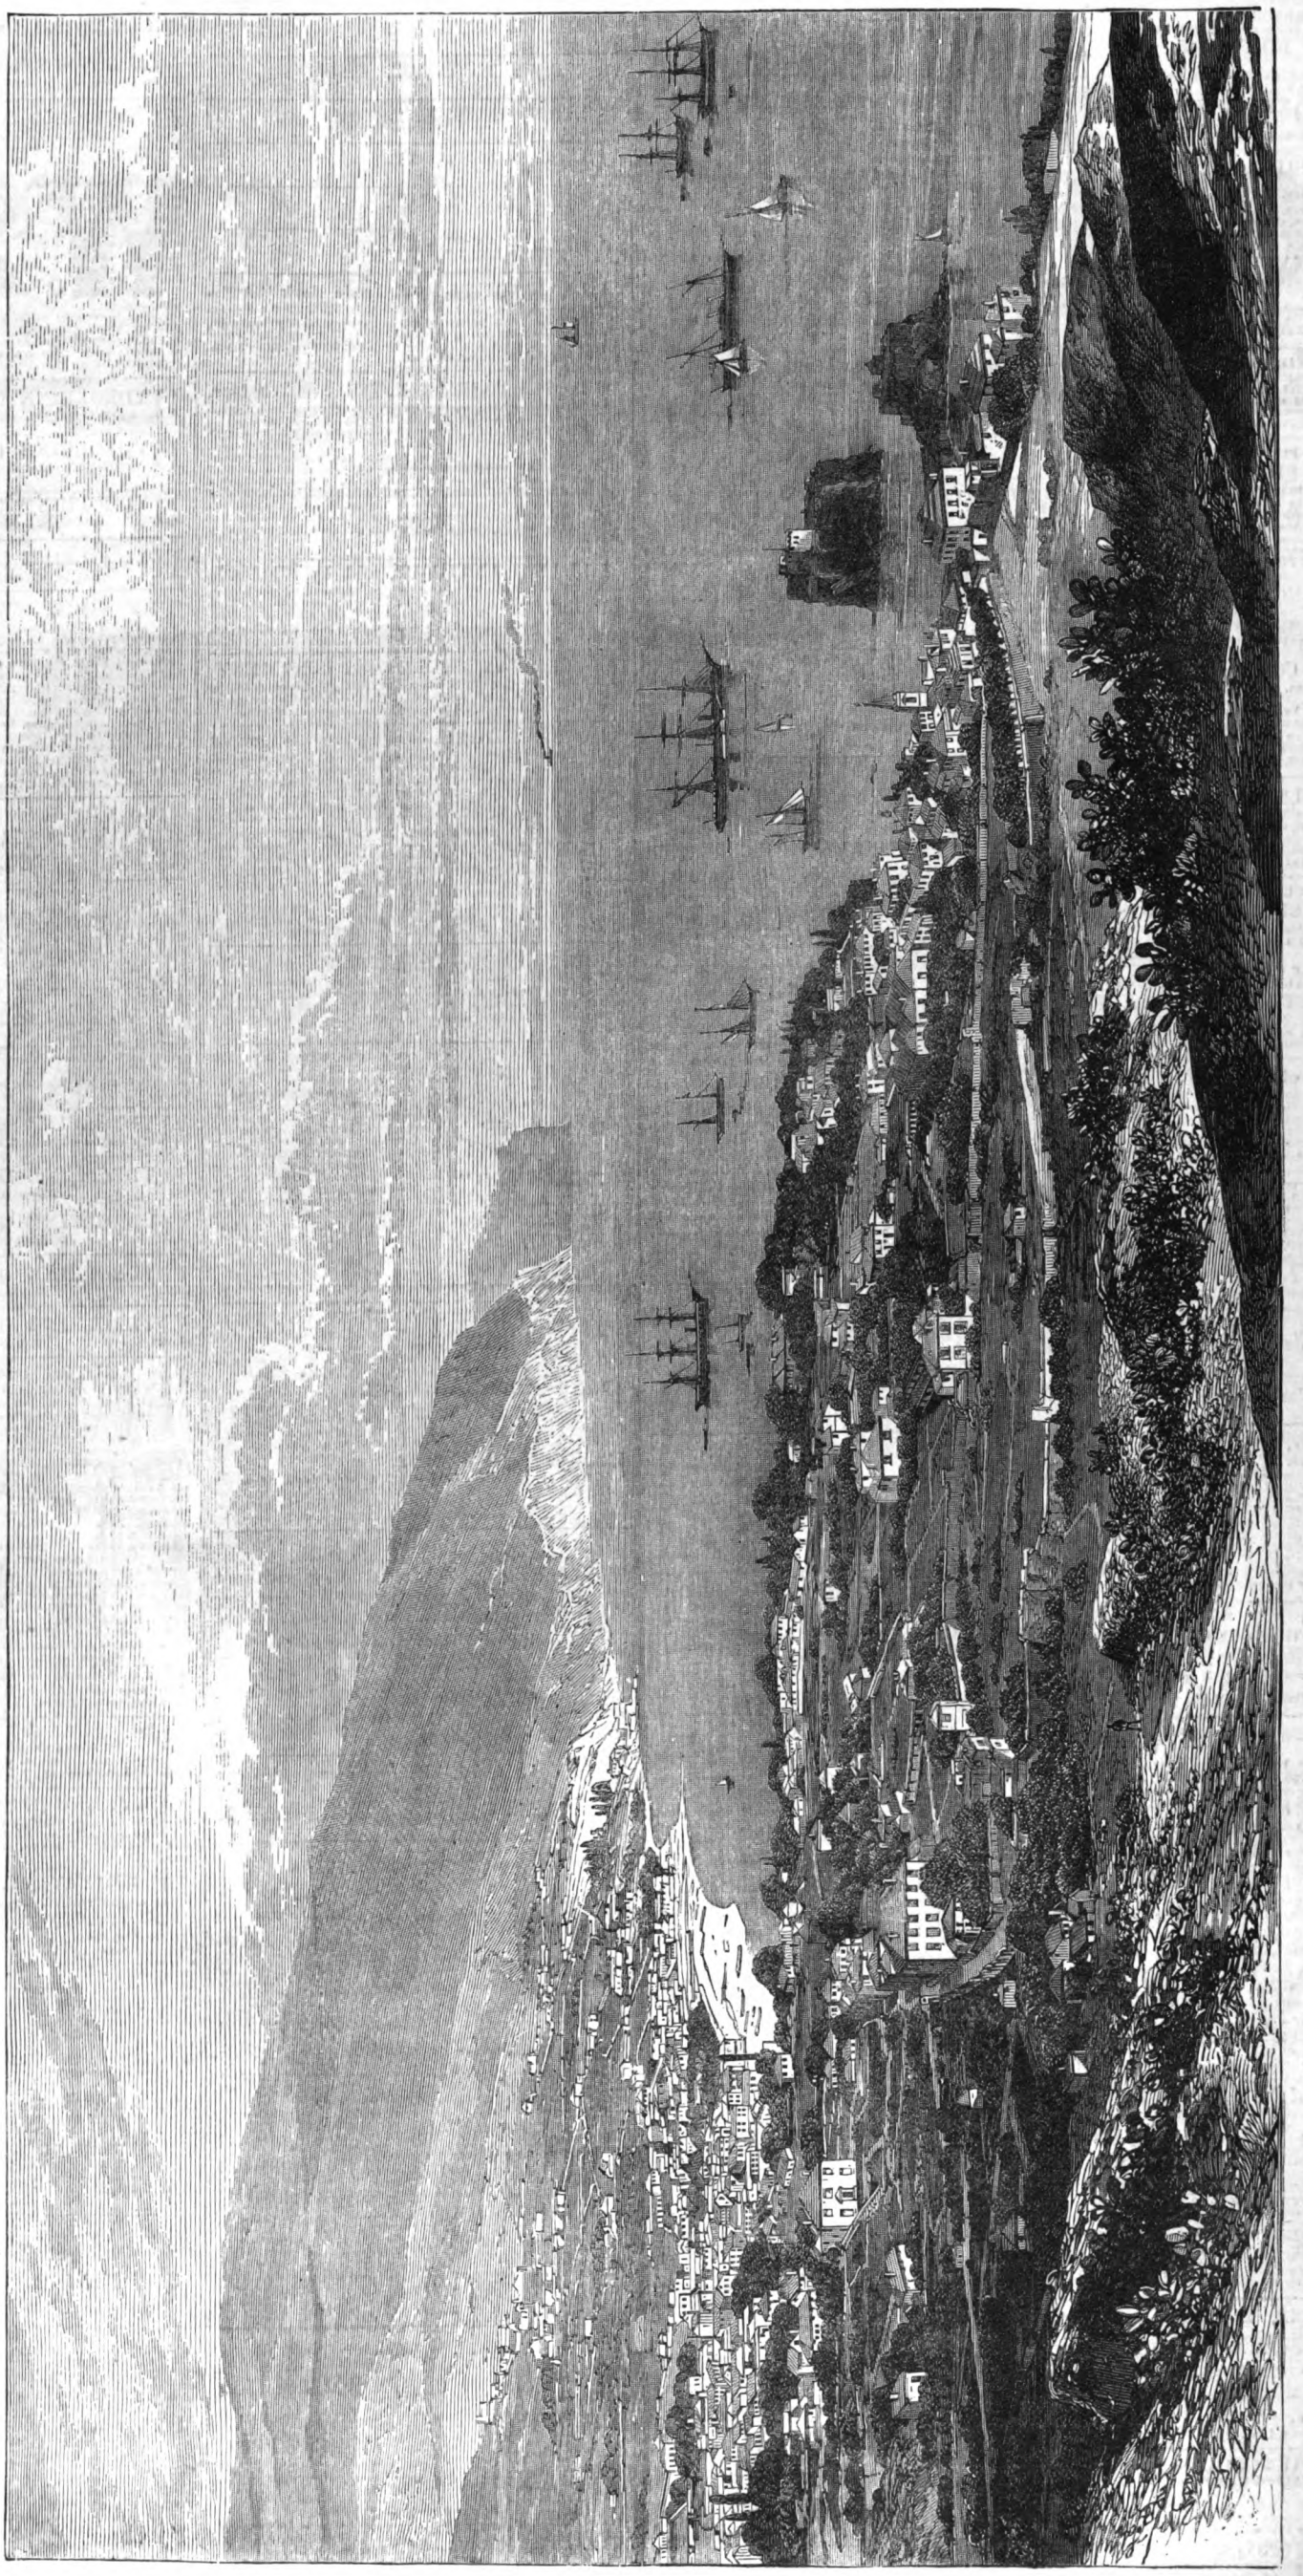
MRS. MARYATT, Bayswater, W., writing on Jan. 22, 1877, speaks of the Hydrated Oil in the following terms:—
"My little boy (aged five and a half years) is so extremely fond of it that he will take it just as it is, without the ginger or orange wine, and will smack his lips after it. As for myself, I can never sound its praises too loudly. I consider it a perfect life-giver."

MR. JOHN MILTON, writing from Liverpool on May 7, 1877, says:—
"Five weeks ago a small pamphlet was handed to me descriptive of your hydroleine, and since that time my wife has been taking just one bottle a week with certain benefit."

MR. A. BOYCE, Chemist, Hayward's-heath, writing on July 9, 1877, says:—
"I have given it to several consumptive cases, and am pleased to inform you with very good result. The effect of it on two persons (children) have had a wonderful effect. I am trying to make it known every where I can."

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
is not a secret preparation.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
is used by the nervous.



HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
is harmless as cream.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)
has the formula on every bottle.

is used in wasting diseases.

ALL persons taking HYDROLEINE are particularly urged to keep an ACCOUNT from WEEK to WEEK of their WEIGHT, that the gain and improvement may be shown. The HYDROLEINE COMPANY, having devoted special attention to perfecting a process by means of which uniformity in the production of HYDRATED OIL is secured, desire to direct the attention of the medical profession and the public to this preparation, to distinguish which the name of HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil) has been registered under the Trade-Marks Acts. Ask your Chemist for it. If your Chemist has not the "Hydroleine" in stock, a bottle will be sent from the Factory (carriage paid) to any part of England, on receipt of Post-Office Order, 5s., payable to the Hydroleine Company, 493, Oxford-street, London.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1879

What is to become of the Ottoman Empire? It is evidently going with rapid strides from bad to worse. It is touching upon the last extreme of political disease, and must presently take a decided turn for the better or die. The form of government (if, indeed, form it can be called) which prevails at Constantinople, and which injuriously affects almost all the outlying Provinces, European and Asian, of the Empire, has dwindled into a mere pretext for the gratification of Pashalic ferocity, covetousness, and lust. It has few or none of the relics of national vitality about it—little authority, less sense of justice, no regard whatever for what the Western world calls public opinion. Its machinery is all dislocated, its motive power is near to exhaustion, and the work which it turns out—it little matters where—is worthless, even where it is not absolutely deleterious. It may be said to form one of the richest inheritances of Europe, which, however, under its care, or want of care, produces little else than noxious weeds. The Great Powers of Europe took it in hand last year at Berlin, as it had more than once done before, to little purpose. England especially assumed heavy responsibilities in regard to its future, both international and internal; and already people are beginning to ask what good has come, what good can come, from interference from without? A dead stick thrust into the soil is as capable and as likely of putting forth living and fruit-bearing branches as Turkey is of adapting her government to the ideas of Western civilisation. No diplomatic cajolery can effect so strange a transformation. No menaces can do more than, for a brief time, and with mechanical results, enforce an amelioration of the existing condition of affairs. It has no life in itself. It carries its doom of extinction in its own bosom, and all the diplomatic worry of the European Powers, great or small, can do little more than hasten it to its end.

That this is so every observer of facts beyond the threshold of his own home will at once admit. That it ought to be so, that death ought to supervene upon decay, all moral philosophy teaches, and that the world should bury its dead out of sight is everywhere taught by experience. There is reason, however, to be observed, as the proverb tells us, in the boiling of an egg. Our methods too frequently conform themselves to the assumption that we can do what, in truth, we cannot do. The rumours which have filled the air for many days past as to the attitude of Sir Henry Austin Layard, her Majesty's Representative at the Porte, indicate that, having brought influence to bear upon the policy of the Ottoman Empire, in the shape of suasion, flattery, and moral pressure—and all in vain—we are now disposed to resort to coercion. We have said to the Porte "you ought" to so little purpose that the words "you shall" have almost involuntarily escaped us. The latter will, probably, even if they should be distinctly pronounced, be quite as ineffective as the others which they are meant to supersede. The Porte has not the will to reform—meaning, of course, by the Porte, the class of Pashas into whose hands the reins of government have fallen or may fall. Not one in ten of them, perhaps not one in twenty, desires to limit his own chances by purifying the administration, or will submit to any wholesome change further than as a pretext for covering selfish designs. They grow rich, while the Government of which they take part, or hope to take part, grows, if it were possible, more impecunious. They cannot afford to protect life or property, to administer justice, to stimulate industry or to foster commerce, to grapple with wrong-doing, or even to put up with honest and successful rule. What do these men really care for threats of compulsion, which pass by them as the idle wind?

But a policy of menace, if it is being, or is likely to be, resorted to by any one of the Powers, on its own responsibility, is not only too well calculated to fail in regard to the Ottoman Empire, but will be apt enough to become dangerous to European peace. Turkey threatened by one Power will most likely turn for support to some other. It is said that she is already drawing nearer to Russia. It is probable that France regards with some dislike any development of an active protectorate in Asia Minor by the rulers of Her Majesty's Realm. All this may be mere talk—the outward expression of what would be characterised as natural conjecture. It may have no basis of fact. In all likelihood it has no proportionate basis. But it tends to show the shapes which things will take in the public mind in the face of such and such circumstances, and thus to lead the way to dreaded results which, if they already exist, exist in embryo only. Another possible surprise is talked of. Silence at this season, it is said, is almost sure to cover anything but international inaction. For our part, we are not ready to assume either the accuracy or the applicability of such conclusions. Be this, however, as it may, we cannot take the state of the public mind as typifying any lively concern in the passing conflicts of diplomacy. No one, perhaps, can presume to forecast with any measure of confidence the course which the foreign policy of the United Kingdom will take between the present moment and the reassembling of Parliament. It may be singularly erratic, or it may be specially prosaic and tame, but we have no right, we think, to assume that the country will be committed, meanwhile, to any large and irretrievable international obligation. There is more bluster on the part of some than anything that has yet been done will fully warrant. There is more suspicion on the part of others than can perhaps be justified by what is actually occurring around them. But neither this party nor that, we apprehend, need be greatly troubled about the prospects of the Ottoman Empire. The law of decay is so indelibly graven upon it that, come what will, its political resuscitation would be a miracle which no reasonable man is bound to anticipate; and, at the present moment of writing, we observe what appears to us to be obvious evidence enough that if her Majesty's Ministers ever contemplated shaking the Porte into some consciousness of its responsibility, they have wisely suspended, if not abandoned, their intention.

THE COURT.

The Queen and Princess Beatrice attended Divine service on Sunday, performed at Balmoral Castle by the Rev. Archibald Campbell. Her Majesty and the Princess have driven out daily during this last week of their sojourn this year in the Highlands. The Queen, with the Princess, has made various visits among the old Royal retainers and paid numerous leave-takings to many esteemed by her Majesty around Deeside.

Her Majesty received with much concern the news of the death, yesterday week, of Prince Alamayu of Abyssinia, aged nineteen. The Queen sent Sir John Cowell twice to see the Prince, and she was also constantly advised by telegram as to his state during his illness. Her Majesty had always taken a warm interest in the welfare of the Prince, who was attended in his last illness, which commenced with inflammation of the lungs, by Sir James Paget and Sir William Gull, as well as by the medical doctors of Leeds.

Her Majesty has delayed her journey from Balmoral for three or four days, in consequence of her wish to show the last mark of respect to the memory of an old servant named John Grant, who died last Monday morning in a cottage near the castle, given him by the Queen. He had been for twenty-five years head keeper at Balmoral, and in constant attendance on the Prince Consort, with whom he was a great favourite.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales gave a county ball yesterday week at Sandringham, at which, among the guests staying in the house, were present the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Princess Louise of Lorne, the Duke of Cambridge, Prince Ferdinand of Glucksburg, and Prince Louis of Battenberg. Various foreign Ambassadors and the principal families of the county were invited. On Saturday the Prince and Princess, accompanied by their numerous guests, drove to Congham House, the seat of Mrs. Elwes, and joined the meet of the West Norfolk Hounds. The Royal party was received by the Master of Hunt, Mr. A. Hamond, and a very numerous field and a good day's hunting was enjoyed. The Duke of Cambridge left Sandringham for town, and Count Schouvaloff arrived on a visit to their Royal Highnesses. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, with their daughters and their various relatives and visitors, attended Divine service at St. Mary Magdalene's Church, Sandringhan Park. The Rev. F. A. Harvey and the Rev. W. V. Lloyd, Chaplain to the Duke of Edinburgh, officiated. On Monday the visiting party at Sandringham broke up, and the Prince left on a visit to Sir Richard Wallace at Sudbourne Hall. His Royal Highness travelled by special train from Wolferton to Lynn, thence by ordinary train to Dereham, and thence by special train to Wickham Market, whence he drove to Sudbourne, where he was received at the lodge by Sir Richard Wallace, a guard of mounted tenantry, and a court of Foresters. After which there was a torchlight procession to the hall.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales after landing at Gibraltar on the 6th inst. made the ascent to the Rock Gun, and in the evening dined with his Excellency Lord Napier of Magdala and Lady Napier at the Convent. On the 11th inst. Lord Charles Scott and the officers of the Bacchante gave an afternoon party on board in honour of the Prince their father's birthday. The Princes left Gibraltar on Saturday.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught went to the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening. The Duchess of Edinburgh has consented to become patroness and subscriber of the Royal Infirmary for Children and Women, Waterloo Bridge-road.

An exhibition of works of art, including needlework, by ladies, has been opened at 9, Conduit-street, W. Anything that encourages the useful and profitable employment of women deserves to succeed, and we are glad to see this undertaking under the patronage of many titled and distinguished ladies.

Mr. T. Brassey, M.P., gave, on Tuesday night, his address as President of the Statistical Society on the subject of Agriculture in England and the United States. He remarked that, in view of the extraordinary increase in the agricultural production of America, it became a grave question for consideration how far the British farmer could hold his own against the vigorous and apparently illimitable competition to which he was now for the first time exposed. He came to the same conclusion as that which Mr. Shaw Lefevre expressed before the British Association—that the agricultural development of America need not, and probably would not, permanently injure the economic condition of this country, and an indiscriminate reduction of the rentals of land in England should not be resorted to.—The Howard Prize Medal and Honorarium for the best Essay has been awarded by the Council of the Statistical Society to Miss Beatrice A. Jourdon. The essay was "On the Improvements that have taken place in the Education of Children and Young Persons during the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries."

ST. MARY'S CATHEDRAL, EDINBURGH.

The new Cathedral Church, named from St. Mary, which has been built at the west end of Edinburgh, for the use of the Scottish Episcopalian Church, was consecrated on Thursday, the 30th ult., in the presence of about 200 clergy, amongst whom were the Bishops of Durham, Peterborough, Oxford, Bangor, all the Scottish Bishops, and several from Ireland. This cathedral owes its origin to the bequest of the late Misses Walker, of Drumsheuch, Edinburgh, the last of whom died ten years ago, leaving for the purpose the residue of their joint estate, which amounted to £115,000 in cash, and an annual revenue from feus which at present amounts to £2000. The site of the cathedral is at the west end of Melville-street, a broad street of stately mansions, not far from the head of Princes-street, near Queensferry-road. Opposite the main portal of the cathedral, to the west, is a double crescent of handsome modern houses, with gardens, so that there is ample space for seeing the cathedral from that side. The building, which was the last effort of the late Sir Gilbert Scott, is worthy of its site and of the object of its founders. It is considered the most important specimen of Gothic architecture attempted in this country since the Reformation, while preserving many striking features of pre-Reformation churches. Its length is 278 ft. 2 in. and its breadth is 98 ft. 6 in. The central tower and spire, when completed, will be 300 ft. high, and the two subsidiary towers flanking the west front will be 209 ft. 9 in. The building is cruciform, the great tower rising over the transept. It is built wholly of Dunmore and Polmaise free-stone. The west front, when the towers are completed, will present the most splendid Gothic façade in Scotland. The portal is modelled on the remains of the much admired door-way of Holyrood Abbey. It is rich in relieved carving and mural sculpture. Up to this time the building is said to have cost £160,000. The nave is seated for a congregation of 1100, a proportion of the sittings being free.

THE LATE LIEUTENANT F. G. KINLOCH.

A month or five weeks ago we recorded the sad death of this young officer, who was murdered by hill marauders in the Khoorum Valley while on his way to join the 12th Bengal Cavalry on active service in Afghanistan. The portrait of Lieutenant Kinloch, which we now publish, is from a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry. It represents him in the uniform of the 92nd Gordon Highlanders, in which regiment he first served, on transfer to the army from the Highland Light Infantry Militia. Lieutenant Francis Garden Kinloch was the third son of Colonel Grant Kinloch, of Logie, Forfarshire, and of Miss Agnes Garden, of Troup, his first wife. He was only twenty-seven years of age, and was an officer of much promise, and a great favourite with his brother officers.

COLONEL J. W. FRY.

The Royal Humane Society has bestowed its medal on this gentleman, in recognition of the praiseworthy act performed by him at Boulogne on Sept. 24, which is, probably, still in the recollection of many of our readers. A party of English visitors to that favourite bathing-place, consisting of three young ladies and two gentlemen, had taken tickets at the regular establishment, and had ventured into the sea, attired in the usual French bathing-dresses. There had been a gale in the night, and the sea was rough; the tide was fast coming in, with breakers, and there was a strong current setting eastward. It was a very unfit day for bathing, and the managing authorities of the place should not have allowed it. These inexperienced strangers, however, received no caution from the officials or from bystanders, and were presently carried off their feet by the powerful current, in comparatively shallow water, along the smooth and shelving sands. The spectators on shore did not know what to do, and the sauveteurs, whose business it was to rescue these imperilled lives, were helplessly flinging out ropes, shouting directions, or blowing their horns, as if to warn the drowning persons of a danger which they already felt bearing them swiftly to death. Colonel Fry alone, who was on the beach in his bathing-dress, boldly rushed out into the sea, and seizing one of the young ladies, Miss Clarke, bore her safely to shore. He then beat his way out again through the breakers, and brought back the lifeless body, unhappily, of another, Miss Rose Brocksopp. All efforts failed to restore her to animation. The three other persons of the party were drowned. Much credit is due to him for this exploit, and equal discredit has accrued to the French bathing-place attendants.

We have engraved the portrait of Colonel Fry from a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry.

MAJOR CHARD, V.C., R.E.

This gallant officer, whose defence, jointly with Major Gonville Bromhead, of the beleaguered post at Rorke's Drift, through the long night of desperate fighting on Jan. 22, has gained him so much renown, was on Monday last presented with a sword and chronometer by his fellow-townsmen at Plymouth. The Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe took part in the proceedings, at the Guildhall of that town. Our Illustration shows the design of the sword, which has been manufactured by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. The scabbard, of silver, is ornamented with panels in repoussé, representing—1, the mission-house at Rorke's Drift; 2, shields bearing the arms of Plymouth and England; 3, "Vulcan forging the armour of Achilles," in allusion to the generally defensive character of the operations of the Royal Engineers. The lower part of this panel shows the thunderbolts, which form one of the devices of the Royal Engineers; 4, a trophy of broken Zulu weapons; 5, an allegorical device of lion and elephant, symbolising the pursuit and defeat of the enemy, and the triumph of the British arms in Africa. The opposite side has corresponding panels, shewing—1, the Victoria Cross; 2, shields with arms of Major Chard and the Royal Engineers; 3, Britannia; 4, trophy of Engineers' tools crowned with laurel by Fame; 5, St. George of England vanquishing the dragon. The guard is of silver, pierced and richly carved with the rose, shamrock, and thistle, surrounded by oak leaves. The blade, of finest-tempered steel, bears on one side the motto, "Strong to defend the right—swift to avenge the wrong;" and on the other a record of the presentation of the sword, "in recognition of his gallant defence of Rorke's Drift."

The Grocers' Company entertained Major-General Lord Chelmsford and other distinguished guests in their hall, Prince's-street, Bank, on the 13th inst. The chair was occupied by the Master, Mr. John V. Drake. Prior to the dinner the Court of Assistants had admitted Lord Chelmsford to the honorary freedom of the company, "in recognition of his public services in the Crimea, in India, and Abyssinia; and of the energy, endurance, and skill with which he brought the recent war in Zululand to a successful issue."

OLD ST. PANCRAS' CHURCHYARD GARDENS.

The spacious parish burial-ground surrounding the old Church of St. Pancras, in Camden Town, is a place of some historical interest. The church itself, now superseded in architectural and social dignity by that styled New St. Pancras, in Euston-road, is all but the most ancient foundation of a Christian place of worship in Middlesex. St. Paul's alone is perhaps of greater antiquity. It was, till 1760, the only church in the whole parish, except a chapel of Elizabethan date in Kentish (Cantelows) Town. It was the last parish church in England where the bell tolled for mass, and in which the rites and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion were performed. Probably upon this account, we are told, some time after the English Reformation, masses were said by appointment in the south of France, in a church of the same name, for the souls of the Catholics who might be interred at St. Pancras in England. This led to a custom, among the French and other foreign Catholics residing in London, of having their dead buried in St. Pancras'-churchyard. Many of the emigrants and exiles, some of noble birth or distinguished public character, who sought refuge in England from the French Revolution, or from subsequent political disasters in France, Spain, Italy, and Poland, were here interred, besides some members of foreign Embassies and Legations. Among other persons of note whose graves were made in this ground are Flaxman the sculptor, Sir John Soane the architect and antiquary, Samuel Cooper the painter, William Wollett the engraver, the Chevalier d'Eon, Jeremy Collier, Godwin and Mary Anne Woolstonecraft, and Walker, author of the "Pronouncing Dictionary." The last interment was in 1873; and the Midland Railway Company, when they constructed their magnificent terminal station in the Euston-road, cut up the old churchyard frightfully, driving broad lines of approach through the ground which was thick with hundreds of graves. The remains of coffins and human bones, so far as they could be gathered and lifted from the earth, were decently transported to other sites, and some were even removed to ancestral tombs in foreign lands.

It had long since been proposed that, upon the cessation of burials in this ground, and in the adjacent burying-ground of St. Giles's parish, a public garden should be made of it, which project was first advocated, as we remember, by the Rev. W. R. Arrowsmith, Vicar of Old St. Pancras, at least ten or twelve years ago. The parish vestry took it up more recently, with the sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. It obtained the liberal support of the Duke of Norfolk, and of Lady Burdett-Coutts, whose residence, Holly Lodge, West Hill, at Highgate, is within this parish. The gardens were opened to public enjoyment in June, 1877, by the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works. On the same day Lady Burdett-Coutts laid the foundation of a monument, in the form of a sundial, to commemorate many of the distinguished and notable persons formerly interred in this ground. We give an Illustration of the monument, which has been constructed by Messrs. H. Daniel and Co., cemetery masons and statuaries, of Church House, Highgate, under the direction of Mr. J. K. Aston, of Dean's-yard, Westminster; Mr. G. Highton, of Brixton, being the architect. It has cost about £2000, at the sole expense of Lady Burdett-Coutts, who visited the ground on Friday, the 8th inst., accompanied by the Rev. Canon Spence, Vicar of New St. Pancras Church, Sir T. Chambers, M.P., the churchwardens, and some of the parish vestry. The school children were assembled to sing a hymn, and there was a banquet in the Vestry Hall.

The monument stands 30 ft. in height. The superstructure, which is in the Early Decorated style, consists mainly of Portland stone, with four marble tablets and clustered granite columns at the angles. The tablets are surmounted by reliefs representing St. Pancras and St. Giles, also Night and Morning, by Signor Facigna. On the main tablet under the dial are inscribed the Beatitudes and the following lines:—

Here, in Christ's Acre where this dial stands,
With pious care and borne by reverend hands,
Lone wanderers garnered in from East and West
Among the home-loved lie in solemn rest.
Severed in life by lineage, race, faith. clime,
They bide alike the last soft stroke of time;
And when God's sun which shone upon their birth
Ends his bright course and vigil o'er the earth,
When o'er this disc that day's last shadows flee,
And Death no more divides, as doth the sea,
The dead will rise, retake the life God gave.
Creation's Saviour, bless earth's opening grave!
Thy word hath writ the blest. No conscience clear
In thought and word, all must Thy judgment fear.
Only our own wild words which fashioned prayer
When life was parting, stir the ambient air,
Pleading that God who made will grant that we May, with the pure in heart, the Godhead see.

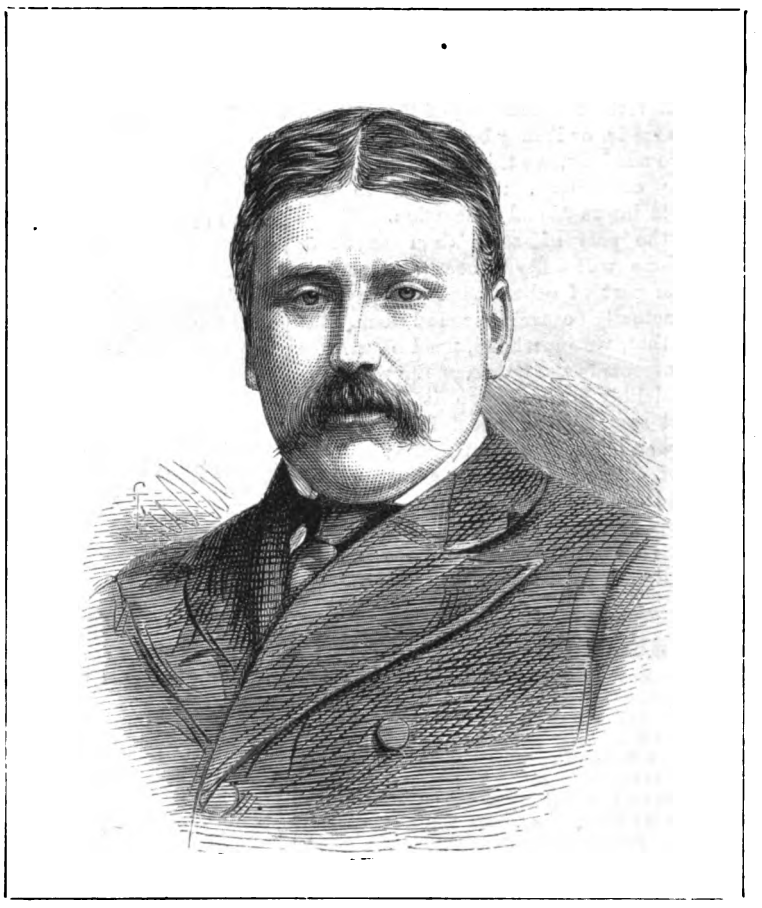
The reverse side of the tablet has an inscription:—

These grounds, formed out of the burying-ground of St. Giles and the churchyard of St. Pancras, are assigned for ever to the loving care and use of the parishioners. Hereon are inscribed some names, English and foreign, which have an interest for all time. The dial is, however, especially dedicated to the memory of those whose graves are now unseen, or the record of whose names may have become obliterated.

The remaining portion and the other two tablets record names of eminence, alphabetically arranged, including those of Sir John Soane, John Flaxman, John Walker, Peter Pasqualino, Thomas Mazzinghi, Father O'Leary, several members of the Norfolk family, Sidney Effendi, Turkish Ambassador to this country, Count d'Hervilly, Charles Louis Victor de Broglie, Archbishop Dillon, and others.

The terraces, which form flower-beds, are of red Mansfield stone, worked at the quarries. The panels of the two upper terrace tiers contain flowers in mosaics; the top one has also panels representing the four seasons, by Messrs. Wills, Euston-road; the bottom tier panels are also in mosaics, the latter executed by Simpson and Sons, of St. Martin's-lane. The whole is inclosed by a curb and iron railing with gates.



The medals awarded and recommended by the Council of the Royal Society for the present year are, the Copley Medal to Professor Rudolph J. E. Clausius, of Bonn, for his researches upon Heat; the Davy Medal to Mr. P. E. Lecoq de Boisbaudran, for his discovery of Gallium; a Royal Medal to Mr. William Henry Perkins, F.R.S., for his synthetical and other researches in Organic Chemistry, and a Royal Medal to Professor Andrew Crombie Ramsay, F.R.S., for his long-continued and successful labours in Geology and Physical Geography.

On Monday night the members of the Royal Asiatic Society held their inaugural meeting of 1879-80, Major-General Sir Henry C. Rawlinson, president and director of the society, in the chair. There was a very numerous attendance. Presentations to the society since its last meeting were acknowledged by the secretary, amongst the number being several from the Secretary of State for India, having reference to Indian laws, literature, and customs. Papers were read, first by the president, Sir H. C. Rawlinson, on "The Historical Evidence derived from the Recently Discovered Cylinder of Cyrus the Great;" and by Mr. Robert Sewell, Madras C.S, on "Hiouen-Tsang and the Amranati Stupa." A discussion followed the reading of the papers.

Extra Supplement.

THE CITY OF CABUL.

Our large Engraving, presented as an Extra Supplement with this week's Number of the Illustrated London News, is furnished by a Sketch we have received from an occasional Correspondent who was with the army of General Sir F. Roberts at the capture of Cabul. It is a view of that city, drawn on the 8th ult., from the hill above the British Camp, on the east side of the town, immediately after the arrival of the army there, subsequent to the action fought on the 6th, on the neighbouring heights of Charasiab, which is the subject of another Sketch by the same hand, published by us this week. This view shows the position that was still held by the enemy on the 8th, along the craggy hills above the city; and the position of General Baker's force then preparing to attack them, on the slope of the opposite hill, which is seen to the left hand. The palace garden, called the Sherepore, in which seventy-eight guns were found by General Dunham Massy, appears in the plain, just beyond the city.

The city of Cabul, which has been the capital of Afghanistan since the reign of Timur Shah, about one hundred years ago, is situated at the western extremity of a spacious and fertile plain, but 6400 feet above the sea-level. It lies in a triangular gorge, formed by the approach of two ranges of hills which, running from the north and east, meet at the south-west corner of the city. A narrow gorge separates these hills, and through it flows the Cabul river, bearing away to the north-east; while by its side runs the high road from Candahar and Ghuzni. The range which runs to the south of the city is only separated from the ruins of the old walls by a narrow path. These hills are steep, bare, and rugged, terminating in a commanding eminence, which dominates the south-eastern corner of the city, and on the slopes of which rise the walls of the Bala Hissar, or fortified palace of the capital. The Cabul river is spanned by a bridge at the gorge which separates the two ranges, and on its left bank the hills trending away to the north-west join in with the lower spurs of the Hindoo Koosh. Along the crest of both ranges, starting from the Bala Hissar, and conforming to the configuration of the ground, runs a long line of loopholed wall, flanked at short intervals by round towers. This wall is carried up the steep side of the hills and across the narrow gorge which lies between them, and well round the western flank of the city. There are no walls round the town at present, though formerly it was encircled by ramparts built partly of burnt bricks and partly of mud. These indications may be traced in many places. The houses are slightly and indifferently built, generally of mud and sun-dried bricks; the few of burnt brick are those of old standing. The city is divided into quarters, called mahalas, and these again into sections, kuchas. The latter are inclosed and entered by small gates, and are invariably occupied by people of the same class or profession. On occasion of war or tumult, the entrance-gates are built up, when the city contains as many different fortifications as there are sections in it. This means of defence is called "kucha-bandi." It must be obvious that an insecure state of society has induced this precautionary mode of arrangement in building the city. The principal bazaars, however, are independent of these sections, and generally extend in straight lines. The two principal bazaars—namely, the Shor bazaar and the Lahore bazaar—run parallel to each other, from east to west. The western portion of the latter street is occupied by the Charchata. The shops are tenanted by retail venders of manufactured goods, who sit perched cross-legged on low counters in front of their shops, on which are displayed their wares. In Cabul, as in most Eastern cities, the several descriptions of traders and artisans congregate. Thus the shops of drapers, saddlers, armourers, ironmongers, and curriers are found in their own quarter. Besides the shopkeepers or fixed tradesmen, a vast number of itinerant traders parade the bazaar. Their cries, it is said, equal in variety those of the costermongers of the east end of London. The population is estimated at between fifty and sixty thousand souls.

In a military aspect, Cabul is similar to most other Afghan fortresses, which generally consist in occupying with a citadel the detached knoll so frequently the termination of a spur from a mountain range. A series of works surrounds the knoll, and forms the main body of the place. In the present instance the space inclosed by the fortifications lies to the north of the citadel, and may be roundly stated to have an extreme length of 900 yards from east to west, with a breadth of 800 yards from north to south. The contour of the place is by no means regular, consisting of six sides of unequal length. The defences of five of these fronts consist in a masonry wall, flanked at irregular intervals by masonry towers. The walls, however, are in bad repair, the ditch is filled up, and the faussebraye, never completed, has long since fallen to ruins. Among the many places of interest in the neighbourhood of the capital are the burial-places of the various clans who people the town. Each sect has its own distinct resting-place—Sunnis and Shiahs, Jews and Armenians, all have their separate quarter—and many of the tombs are well worthy a visit. In the graveyard of the Assa Mahi hill, a neglected stone, distinguished by a sculptured mitre, denotes the place of rest of a Georgian Bishop who died at Cabul some 300 years ago. In the Armenian graveyard a mitre on one of the stones points to the rank of the person lying there. But the most curious, and to Englishmen the most interesting, gravestone about Cabul is to be found in a Mohammedan cemetery on the south-east of the city, a grave-stone with an inscription in plain Roman characters to this effect:—

"Here lyeth the body of John Hicks, son of Thomas and Edith Hicks, who departed this lyfe, the eleventh of October, 1666."

This date would be in the reign of Aurungzebe, at which time Cabul was under one of his Governors. Masson made inquiries as to who this Englishman could be, and learned from an old Kubbur-Khan, or grave-digger, who had heard through his predecessors, that the stone marked the burial place of an officer of artillery, who stood so high in the estimation of the governor of the time that they were both buried close to each other. This is a curious fragment of history regarding an Englishman in the East at an early date.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

The military news of the past week is almost entirely confined to that of preparations for the winter. General Roberts's division is now comfortably settled in or near Shere-pore cantonment, provisions for five months being laid in and transport animals procured. The Shutargardan route is finally closed, General Hugh Gough's brigade, consisting of two squadrons of the 9th Lancers, the 5th Bengal Cavalry, the 3rd Sikhs, and the Kohat Mountain Battery, having arrived at Cabul. This force marched into the camp carrying the crimson banner captured at the Surkhi-Kotal. General Roberts addressed the men outside the Bala Hissar, complimenting them on their gallant defence of Shutargardan, and mentioning specially Colonel Noel Money, Major Griffiths, Captain Morgan, and a native non-commissioned officer. Communication by the Khyber route is now fairly established. A flying column, under General Bright, left Jagdalak on the morning of the 7th, marching, one part through the Jagdalak Pass, the other part over the hills, and effected a junction at Katasang with General Macpherson's brigade, which had travelled through the Kurd-Cabul and struck across into the Tazin Valley to Badshahi Mina, and thence to Esak Bala. General Bright returned to Gandamak on the 9th. These movements were effected without any show of opposition, the only loss being a horse of the Guides wounded by robbers.

We learn from Simla that a force of 1000 Safis, who had attacked a foraging party of the 67th Regiment, has been routed with great loss by General Macpherson, and pursued for six miles. Our loss was four killed, and one officer and four men wounded.

General Roberts has issued a proclamation granting an amnesty, on condition that all arms are delivered up to the British authorities. The amnesty does not, however, extend to soldiers or civilians concerned in the attack on the British Residency at Cabul.

THE BATTLE OF CHARASIAB.

We have received letters from an occasional correspondent, who accompanied the British military force under command of General Sir F. Roberts, in its advance from the Shaturgardan Pass down the Loghur Valley to Cabul. He sends an effective and truthful Sketch of the action fought on the 6th ult. to clear the heights of Charasiab, in the approach to that city. Charasiab is a large and populous village, seven or eight miles to the south of Cabul, at the foot of a range of steep and abrupt hills, through which the Khyrabad defile winds nearly two miles, leading towards the Bala Hissar and to the open ground east of the city. The entrance to this defile, which is narrow and commanded by precipitous cliffs, is shown between the conical peaked hills on the right-hand side of the view in our Engraving. Here, too, is the river which flows through the defile behind the peak called Shakh-i-Baranti. To the left-hand side of our view, which looks north, is the road to Chardeh, turning westward, and affording a preferable route of approach to Cabul. But, on the morning of Oct. 6, as the enemy were seen gathering in force upon the heights above Charasiab, while numerous bands of hostile Ghilzais appeared on both flanks of the British army, threatening its communications with the rear at Zahidabad, it was needful at once to clear the entrance to the defile above mentioned. The following is our correspondent's own account of this very spirited and successful action:—

"Our cavalry patrols were driven in early on the morning of the 6th, and we saw large bodies of troops occupying the heights above the gorge through which our road lay, and to the left of it General Roberts at once resolved to dislodge them; and Brigadier-General Baker, late Military Secretary to the Viceroy, an officer who had already gained a name in the Crimea, New Zealand, and Ashantee, was selected for this difficult task. He moved the greater part of his force, consisting of the 72nd Highlanders, a wing of the 5th Goorkhas, part of the 23rd Pioneers, a hundred of the 5th Punjaub Infantry, four mountain guns and Gatlings, over to the low bare downs on the left-hand side, in order to threaten the enemy's retreat that way to Cabul. Meantime, he sent Major White with a wing of the 92nd Highlanders, two companies of the 23rd Pioneers, three guns of the G Battery 3rd Brigade of Royal Artillery, and some cavalry, to the orchards on the right hand. The artillery, under command of Major Sidney Parry, shelled the first hill to the right of the sketch, upon which Major White, advancing, stormed the hill with the 92nd Highlanders, supported by the 23rd Pioneers, in gallant style, against an obstinate resistance. Then, moving on, they took the second hill on the right-hand side, in the same manner.

"In the meanwhile, General Baker's force, advancing rapidly over the low downs, was suddenly checked by a large force of the enemy on the hill—that is, the second hill to the left hand, as shown in my sketch. The 72nd Highlanders and 5th Goorkhas stormed this hill in grand style at the point of the bayonet, the enemy retreating step by step. Here the Highlanders suffered severely, as they had to charge up a bare steep slope, against an enemy armed with breechloaders and hidden behind crags. The remainder of Baker's force moved steadily on; and, when the position I have mentioned was taken by the 72nd and Goorkhas, two of the enemy's standards fell into our hands. The retreat of the enemy now became a rout. Parties of our different regiments, advancing and storming height after height, soon captured the main peak of the range; and then, moving to the right, found that Major White's force had advanced, and was in possession of the conical hill commanding the gorge.

"The enemy's loss must have been great, as our men fired with extraordinary steadiness; and when they retreated over the Chardeh plain Baker brought Captain Swinley's mountain guns and the Gatlings to bear upon their fugitive crowds. We captured twenty guns, most of them imitation Armstrong breechloaders, and one 8-in. English howitzer, evidently one of the guns that were given to the late Ameer Shere Ali. Our loss was Captain Young, of the 5th Punjaub Infantry, Dr. Duncan, of the 23rd Pioneers (severely), and Lieutenant Ferguson, of the 72nd Highlanders, officers wounded; and about seventy other men killed and wounded. Of these the 72nd Highlanders had lost as many as thirty-six."

This action was next day followed by the passage of the defile and advance of General Roberts's force to Bini-i-Hissar, within two miles of Cabul.

GREEK CHURCH AT LARNACA, CYPRUS.

Among the ecclesiastical antiquities of this island, which has so recently passed under British rule, the seaport town of Larnaca, most frequently visited by foreign vessels, contains one that has a certain degree of interest. We give an Illustration of the interior of the Greek Church attached to the Monastery of St. Lazarus, at Larnaca. It stands in the centre of a large square, one side of which is a burial-ground, inclosed by tall iron railings, and the other three sides consist of the cells formerly inhabited by the community of monks, but now let out on hire to common lodgers, while the cemetery has become a boys' playground. The church is reported, by Greek religious tradition, to contain the tomb of Lazarus, who is said to have come from Bethany, long after Our Saviour raised him from the dead there, and to have ended a long life here in Cyprus. They keep tapers ever burning in the vault beneath the altar; there is a descent by a few steps, and in the dim light of the shrine a granite slab is visible, arched at the top, with a little spring of water under it, filling a stone basin. This water has miraculous properties, for the healing of sores, by the application of rags dipped in the water. It would seem that the Lazarus, the poor man who had sores, mentioned in the New Testament parable of Dives and Lazarus, is considered by the Greek clergy to be the same Lazarus that was raised from the dead.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

At a Cabinet Council held at the Elysée last Saturday, discussing the foreign situation, M. Waddington informed his colleagues that, although there were no doubt difficulties to be surmounted in the East and certain antagonisms to be reconciled, still no complication need be apprehended, and that the interested Powers would not take action on any but diplomatic grounds. The Cabinet agreed on Saturday that France should be represented at the Melbourne Exhibition of 1880.

M. Gambetta, General Gresley, and M. Lepère breakfasted with President Grévy on Sunday, and had a day's sport with him at Marly.

M. Lepère, Minister of Public Worship, has addressed a circular to the Prefects calling attention to the omission by some priests of the prayer for the Republic, which they were bound by law to recite, and asking whether this is done by order of the Bishops. He also calls attention to the cases of Bishops who leave their dioceses without the authorisation of the Government and go to distant places. The Government, he says, should have notice of these movements.

The President has signed a decree granting fifty-eight fresh pardons for insurrectionary acts committed in 1871.

M. Henri Martin's long-delayed reception at the Académie Française took place on the 13th inst. His speech, and that of M. Xavier Marmier, who replied, were devoted to a biography and eulogy of M. Thiers.

The Times' correspondent at Paris has received the following official reply from the Director of the Medal Department to an inquiry as to the delay in the distribution of certain of the Exhibition medals:—"All the gold and silver medals of the English winners at the Universal Exhibition of 1878 have been distributed. I wrote yesterday, moreover, to Sir P. Cunliffe Owen, Secretary of the Royal British Commission, to inform him that I was in a position to hand over to him the bronze medals. The 'honourable mentions' will be sent him in the first half of December. As regards the commemorative medals, which are in course of being struck at the Mint, they cannot be forwarded to those entitled to them till the months of January or February."

The Univers has been condemned by the Correctional Tribunal to a fine of 1000f. for having published false news.

SPAIN.

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 13th inst. the Minister for Foreign Affairs stated, in reply to a question, that the Royal marriage had no political significance. In reply to a question respecting the Sooloo Islands, the Minister said that the sovereignty of Spain over that Archipelago was absolute. Next day the Minister for Foreign Affairs supplemented his statement in regard to the political bearing of the Royal marriage. The policy of Spain, he declared, was to preserve friendly relations and show consideration towards all foreign Powers, irrespective of their importance, to further the internal interests of the country, and maintain an attitude of dignified and prudent reserve, till such time as the country shall be completely restored.

During the Royal marriage festivities the sittings of the Cortes will be suspended.

Much excitement has been caused in Madrid by the receipt of telegrams from General Blanco announcing further risings in Cuba. He demanded reinforcements, principally of cavalry, and these are to be embarked immediately.

A Paris telegram states that the Marquis de Molins, the Spanish Ambassador at Paris, and the Peruvian Minister on Saturday exchanged the ratifications of a treaty of peace and friendship concluded between Spain and Peru.

ITALY.

King Humbert arrived at Pegli on Sunday afternoon, and was received at the station by the German Crown Prince. The King and his Imperial Highness on meeting are said to have embraced affectionately, and remained for a short time in conversation on the platform. His Majesty, after taking luncheon with the Crown Prince, left for Genoa, the Prince accompanying him to the station.

Signor Cairoli, the President of the Italian Ministry, has resigned, having previously come to an agreement with Signor Depretis respecting the formation of a new Ministry. The crisis is stated to be caused by differences of opinion in reference to the Budget. The Chambers, which were to have met on Wednesday, have been prorogued to the 27th inst.

General Cialdini is to represent the King, as Ambassador Extraordinary, at the marriage of the King of Spain.

It is stated that the municipality of Florence will compound with its creditors by an annual payment of a million and a half of francs, rising fifty thousand each year until it reaches the sum of two millions.

HOLLAND.

In reply to some attacks which have recently been made upon him, the Prince of Orange has published a pamphlet, in which, speaking of his political views, he expresses hopes for the maintenance of the principles of the Dutch Constitution of 1848, of which he regards the educational clauses as the corner-stone, and he believes in the compatibility of Conservative principles with ideas of progress.

BELGIUM.

The patronal fête-day of the King was celebrated last Saturday in Brussels with the usual ceremonial. The Queen, with the Count and Countess of Flanders, attended a solemn Te Deum in the cathedral of St. Gudule; and ceremonies of the same import were conducted at the same time in the Protestant Church and in the Jewish Synagogue.

M. Frère Orban, Minister President, on Tuesday replied at length to the interpellation respecting the relations between the Belgian Government and the Holy See.

The Communal Council of Brussels has decided that instruction in the primary schools of the city shall be gratuitous.

GERMANY.

The Czarewitch and Czarevna arrived at Berlin on Sunday morning, and were received at the railway station by M. d'Oubril, the Russian Ambassador, the Commandant of Berlin, and the President of Police. Their Imperial Highnesses immediately after their arrival drove in a Royal carriage to the Russian Embassy. The Czarewitch had specially requested that there should be no official reception. The Czarewitch and Czarevna at about noon received visits from the Emperor and the Princes and Princesses of the Royal family at present in Berlin, and Prince Augustus of Wurtemberg. The Russian Heir-Apparent and his Consort returned the visits of the Emperor and the Princes shortly afterwards. The Czarewitch paid visits during the course of the afternoon to the Turkish, French, Austrian, and English Ambassadors. At five o'clock there was a dinner at the palace, attended by all the members of the Royal family in Berlin. The Czarewitch and Czarevna left Berlin on Monday night, after attending a dinner which was given by the Emperor to the Ministers and other dignitaries, and accompanying the Emperor and members of the Royal family to the theatre, to see the ballet of 'Sardanapalus."

On the 13th inst. the Lower House of the Prussian Diet concluded the debate upon the first reading of the Railway Purchase Bill, and resolved to refer it to a Committee, to be composed of twenty-one members. In the course of the debate Herr Miquel, speaking in the name of the great majority of the National Liberals, declared in favour of the views of the Government on the subject. Dr. Maybach, the Minister of Public Works, announced that at a future stage of the debate he would reply to the objections raised by the opponents of the measure.

A resolution was adopted on the 13th inst. by the committee of the senior members of the Berlin Exchange strongly repelling some severe strictures passed upon the Bourse by Herr Maybach, the Minister of Public Works, in the sitting of the Lower House of the Prussian Diet on the previous Tuesday.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Czarewitch and Czarevna accompanied the Princess's parents, the King and Queen of Denmark, on the 13th inst., in their journey from Gmünden, where they had been visiting the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland, to Vienna. The Emperor Francis Joseph, the Russian and Danish Ambassadors, and the chief authorities at Vienna received the Royal visitors at the Railway station. His Majesty kissed the hands of the Queen of Denmark and the Czarevna and shook hands with the King; but "affectionately embraced" the Czarewitch several times. The Royal party afterwards went to the Imperial palace, accompanied by the Duke of Cumberland, and were welcomed on their arrival at the Hofburg by the Empress. The Czarewitch and Czarevna left Vienna at two o'clock last Saturday afternoon for Berlin. At the request of the Czarewitch, there was no official leave-taking. The Emperor and Empress bade their Imperial Highnesses farewell at half-past one at the Hofburg. The Czarewitch and the Czarevna were accompanied to the Northern Railway station by the King and Queen of Denmark, M. de Novikoff, M. Talbe, and the gentlemen-in-waiting.

The ceremony of renouncing all rights of succession in Austria on the part of the Archduchess Christine in consequence of her approaching marriage with King Alphonso took place last Saturday. The Archduchess and her mother left Vienna on Monday evening for Madrid, where she is to arrive on the 23rd inst.

All the party leaders in the Austrian Reichsrath met on Monday at the residence of Count Taaffe to discuss the new Army Bill which the Government have presented. They declared, in the end, that they did not wish to treat the military question as a party one, nor to make it a question of confidence in any particular Cabinet; they desired only to consider it from an objective point of view. Later in the day a committee of the majority of the Lower House adopted the Government bill without modification.

The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet on Monday passed the bill for the administration of Bosnia by a majority of only nineteen, the numbers being 188 to 169. This (the Pesth correspondent of the Standard says) is the first blow which has been struck at that form of dualism which was created by Francis Deak. In Tuesday's sitting the Bill came on for discussion in paragraphs. Clause 1, together with the amendments which had been moved, was referred to a committee by 161 votes against 147, in opposition to M. Tisza's proposal that the clause should be adopted. The other clauses were agreed to as draughted in the Government bill.

A telegram from Athens on Monday states that the Austrian squadron has left the Piræus for Salonica. Its ultimate destination is, however, reported to be Besika Bay.

RUSSIA.

Whilst endeavouring to make his way into the presence of the Empress of Russia, in the Ville de Danes, where she is now residing, a man named Meyer, born at St. Petersburg, has been arrested. Letters addressed to the Empress and high Russian personages at Nice were found upon him. He remains in custody pending inquiry.

News has been received at St. Petersburg that General Tergoukassoff has arrived at Tchikislar. General Gurtschin is also at that place, suffering from a carbuncle, and is about to return to Tiflis. Scurvy has broken out among the Russian troops. A number of Kitghese kibitkas and a portion of the provisions for the winter have arrived at Tchikislar.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily News telegraphs that the expedition against the Tekke Turkomans is certainly to be given up for the winter.

TURKEY.

The pressure which the British Government has been placing upon the Porte seems to have produced some appreciable result. A telegram from Constantinople on Tuesday states that the Sultan has appointed Baker Pasha to be his Majesty's representative to superintend the introduction of reforms throughout the whole of Asia Minor, and that Baker Pasha will leave Constantinople in the course of a week to assume his post.

The Turkish Ministers have, it is announced, prepared a financial scheme, which proposes that a syndicate of bankers, presided over by Mr. Foster, the director of the Ottoman Bank, shall farm the gross revenue of the empire, with the exception of the Customs revenue. The revenues to be farmed are calculated to produce £2,450,000, of which £1,100,000 will serve to repay the Galata bankers, while the remaining £1,350,000 will be devoted to discharge the obligations of Turkey towards the foreign bondholders. In the event of the revenue not realising this estimate, the Porte proposes to undertake to cover the deficit. A Constantinople telegram states that the above arrangement of the public debt will have merely a provisional character, as the Porte recognises that it cannot cede hypothecated revenues without the consent of the foreign bondholders.

It is announced from Malta that Admiral Hornby has countermanded the order he is said to have issued to the squadron on the 12th, to be ready to proceed Eastward in four days from that date. The Morning Post, however, asserts that no order was ever sent to Admiral Hornby to prepare to proceed eastward; and, consequently, that no such order was ever countermanded.

A telegram from Athens of Tuesday's date, reports that the Austrian squadron had left the Piræus for Salonica. Its ultimate destination, however, was said to be Besika Bay.

At the sitting of the Turco-Greek Commission on Monday the line of frontier proposed by the Porte, was indicated, giving Greece an extension of frontier to the West but leaving Turkey almost the whole of Epirus.

SERVIA.

Out of a list of six names submitted to his Highness, Prince Milan has selected M. Touzakovitch as President of the Skuptschina, and M. Wassich as Vice-president.

Prince Milan opened the Skuptschina on Sunday. In his Speech from the Throne, after remarking on the progress which Servia had made in recent years, and formally announcing that the Great Powers had recognised the independence of the Principality, his Highness proceeded to declare that his relations with neighbouring States were of a cordial character. He next spoke of the commercial conventions concluded with Italy, England, Russia, Switzerland, and Belgium, and stated that the establishment of a national bank had been approved by decree. The speech concluded by saying that the Government was engaged in considering the various plans for the construction of railways which had been submitted to it.

EGYPT.

The Khedive signed on Sunday two decrees—one exempting the Domain lands from seizure under decisions of the courts in favour of the mortgage creditors, and the other defining the powers of the English and French Comptrollers-General. The latter contains some slight modifications from the original proposals of the French and English Governments. Messrs. Baring and De Blignières are empowered to make the fullest inquiry into the financial administration of Egypt and to have a consultative voice in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Malet, the new English Consul-General at Cairo, has had an audience of the Khedive; and, after presenting his credentials, expressed his belief that Egypt, under the direction of Prince Tewfik, would regain that prosperity to which the British Government attached so high an importance.

M. de Blignières has left Paris for Egypt, there to devote himself to the duties of his new official position.

AMERICA.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that statutes establishing a general system of trade-mark registration, and providing penalties for their violation, are invalid and unconstitutional.

General Grant last week attended at Chicago a gathering of veterans of the Civil War, and met with a magnificent reception. In the course of his speech, which he read, and which he described as the longest he had ever made, he said that the estimation in which the United States were now held was very different from that which was formed of them a quarter of a century ago, and concluded by saying that, after visiting many foreign lands, he proudly rejoiced in his American citizenship.

Official returns of the recent elections at New York show the return of the rest of the Republican State ticket by small majorities. In Virginia the supporters of the readjustment of the State Debt have a majority in the Legislature.

Mr. Seward, Assistant-Secretary of State, has resigned, and will be succeeded by Colonel John Hay.

Agricultural returns from the Department of Agriculture show a decided improvement in the condition of the cotton crop. Returns of the wheat crop received up to Nov. 1 show an increase of 26,000,000 bushels over the same period of 1878; and for the same period the entire corn product of the country promises an increase of 200,000,000 bushels, or nearly 15 per cent, over 1878.

The New York papers announce the death of the Rev. Jacob Abbott, the author of many books for the young, which in their time had a very large circulation both in the United States and in England. Mr. Abbott, who died at the age of seventy-six, was the eldest of three brothers, all of whom have become more or less famous for their literary productions. In 1825 he was appointed Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Amherst College, a position which he retained four years, when he took charge of Mount Vernon School for girls, in Boston, and in 1834 organised the Eliot Congregational Church in Roxbury, of which he became pastor. In 1838 he relinquished his charge to his brother, John S. C. Abbott, and removed to Farmington, Maine, where from that time he devoted himself almost exclusively to literary pursuits, chiefly the production of juvenile books. A complete list of his works would number more than 200. Many of them were translated into foreign languages, both in Europe and Asia.

SOUTH AFRICA.

By the arrival of the Cape mail at Plymouth on Monday we have advices from Capetown to Oct. 28.

There is a rumour that Umbulazi, who contested the Zulu succession with Cetewayo, is alive, and about to return to claim his inheritance. Several of Sir Garnet Wolseley's nominated chiefs are believed to be negotiating for a transfer of their districts to John Dunn, who has published the conditions on which a limited number of missionaries will be allowed to have stations in his territory.

The Cape Ministry have addressed a minute to Sir Bartle Frere expressing the opinion that the recent settlement of Zululand is prejudicial to a permanent peace in South Africa.

The Premier of Cape Colony had held a parley with Moirosi under a flag of truce, but no satisfactory conclusion was come to, and firing recommenced.

Two employés of a French trader have succeeded in discovering the sources of the Niger.

The Roumanian Chamber of Deputies has adopted a Bill providing for the establishment of savings banks throughout the country.

An interesting report of a visit by Captain F. C. B. Robinson, of her Majesty's ship Opal, to Pitcairn's Island, is published by the Admiralty. He had to convey to the islanders an organ, which was a present to them from the Queen.

The Agent-General for New South Wales has been informed by telegram of the arrival in Sydney of the ship Pericles, which sailed from Plymouth with emigrants in August last.

Serious floods have occurred in the Canary Islands, resulting in some loss of life, the downfall of several houses, the destruction of the cochineal crop, and considerable damage to other crops and property.

The shore end of the new French Atlantic cable has been landed in Massachusetts, and signals interchanged between the land and the Faraday, which vessel was to leave at daylight on Monday to make the final splice, seventeen miles out.

It is announced in the Gazette that the Queen has signified her intention to confer the Victoria Cross on Captain O'Moore Creagh, of the Bombay Staff Corps, for services in Afghanistan; and upon Acting-Assistant James Langley Dalton, of the Commissariat and Transport Department, for his conspicuous gallantry during the Zulu attack on Rorke's Drift on Jan. 22.

Two persons were killed and about forty injured on Tuesday evening by the falling in of a gallery at the Skating-Rink, Batley Carr, Dewsbury, where Mr. Serjeant Simon was to have given his annual address to his constituents. About 3000 persons were assembled. Serjeant Simon expressed his deep sympathy with the injured, and said he would meet his constituents on a future occasion.

At the Hanley County Police Court on Monday a young man was summoned for having kissed a girl named Curtis. He met the complainant on Saturday night, and having made a bet he would kiss her, did so roughly. He was fined £3 5s., including costs. At Dublin the same day a magistrate sentenced two young men to three months' imprisonment each, with hard labour, for assaulting two young girls, dressmakers, by attempting to kiss one and forcibly kissing the other, in the public streets.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The recent victories of Chippendale, La Merveille, and Master Kildare have taught backers some bitter lessons on the "glorious uncertainty of the turf;" but there was a yet lower depth, and that was reached with a vengeance when Rosy Cross (7 st. 5 lb.) cantered off with the Great Shropshire Handicap. Ever since Mr. Rymill leased her for her racing career the mare has caused him constant disappointment, and has been beaten so often when heavily backed that this time she started at 50 to 1 in a field of twelve. Fordham, who was married for the second time on the previous Saturday, postponed his honeymoon in order to don the scarlet jacket on Avontes (8 st. 11 lb.); but little Bendon, who has made a very promising début this season, kept Rosy Cross in front from start to finish, and never gave anything a chance of getting near her. Breadfinder (8 st.), who was third, did very well under her heavy weight; but Sun of York (6 st. 5 lb.), who started favourite, cut up badly, as did Reconciliation (8 st.) and Simla (6 st. 3 lb.). We learn that Mr. Rymill has purchased Rosy Cross outright, since her victory. The capital performance of Breadfinder caused her to be made a rattling favourite for the Shrewsbury Cup, in which she had 13 lb. less to carry than on the previous day. The field was by no means a strong one, and Lord Hasting's filly disposed of everything easily enough except Rhidorroch (7 st. 11 lb.), who proved a little too good for her, and at last got back some of the money that Lord Rosebery paid for him.

To-day (Saturday) we take our farewell of flat-racing until March next, and the present week will be a busy one at Warwick, Manchester, and Kempton Park. The Midland Counties Handicap was the chief event at the first-named fixture, and this event has suffered materially from the antagonism of younger rivals. Stitchery (8 st. 11lb.) was about the best of the seven who ran, and she won easily from Calabria (8 st. 7 lb.), who has taken part in about forty races this season. On Tuesday a five-days' programme was begun at Manchester, the only noticeable feature of the first day being the hollow defeat of Master Kildare (9 st. 10 lb.), upon whom odds of 5 to 1 were laid, by Umbria (8 st. 7 lb.). The ground was very heavy after the recent frosts, and Lincoln showed us that Master Kildare is by no means partial to mud.

We regret to learn that Mr. Barclay has sustained a very serious loss in the death of Grace Cup, who succumbed to some internal injury. She was by the Duke—Noyau, and was therefore half-sister to the flying Philippine. Her second in the Middle Park Plate and her easy victory in the Dewhurst Plate stamped her as the best two-year-old filly of the season, and Mr. Barclay has lost a grand chance of securing the One Thousand and Oaks of 1880.

The unexpected and severe frost from which we suffered at the end of last week marred the Altcar Club Meeting, and all the stakes had to be divided amongst several greyhounds. The Earl of Haddington was once more in great force, taking a share of each of the three principal stakes with Hawthornden, Herma, and Hubert respectively, all three of whom are performers of far more than average merit. His Lordship accepted 1000 to 80 about his nomination for the Waterloo Cup, and a far shorter price will be accepted before the day. The Earl of Stair and Mr. Briggs were also worthily represented.

A billiard tournament on the American principle is now being played at the Royal Aquarium, and will be finished on Monday evening. The heats are 500 up, and the following players are engaged:—Joseph Bennett, scratch; G. Collins and F. Bennett, 60 points start; G. Hunt and D. Richards, 110; J. Lloyd and W. Mitchell, 120; and J. Roberts, senior, 150. The feature of the affair up to the present has been the brilliant form exhibited by young Mitchell, with whose merits rumour has been busy for some time past. He has beaten Hunt and Richards with consummate ease, making some splendid breaks of 182 (60 "spots"), 100 (30 "spots"), and 127 (23 "spots").

REWARDS FOR BRAVERY.

At a meeting of the Committee of the Royal Humane Society, held on the 18th inst., William Hawes, Esq., in the chair, the secretary brought a large number of cases to their notice, and the following awards were voted:—Recommended for Silver Medals: Quartermaster-Sergeant J. Falconer, R.E., for saving a youth from drowning at Gillingham Pier, by jumping in with all his clothes on to the rescue at considerable personal risk. This is the ninth life saved from drowning by this soldier, and he is in possession of the Society's Bronze Medal. Frederick Knight, boy, H.M.S. Ready, for having jumped overboard on a dark night in a roadstead infested with sharks and saved from drowning T. Davies, a stoker of the same ship, who had accidentally fallen from the forecastle. Richard J. Duggan, barrister, Hamilton, Ontario, for having saved M. O. Jarvis from drowning in Burlington Bay, by jumping from his yacht in a gale of wind and swimming to the aid of the man through rough water on a dark night.

Bronze medals were voted to Thomas A'Alton, of Dublin, for jumping off the pier at Howth to the rescue of A. Campbell. To Lieutenant S. Greenwood, 10th Hussars, for gallantly saving the life of a private soldier from drowning when crossing the Cabul river at Jellalabad, after being separated from his own horse and in danger of drowning, being heavily encumbered with uniform and accoutrements. To William Biolletti, for rescuing a person from drowning by jumping from the Chain Pier at Brighton under very gallant circumstances. To A. Salmon, seaman, for jumping into the river at Waterford from a steamer and saving a man from drowning. To G. W. Endall, of Stratford-on-Avon, a boy of fourteen years, for rescuing a lad of ten. To Robert Shaw, seaman, for jumping into Cork Harbour and saving a woman from drowning who became immersed by her boat coming in collision with a steamer.

Testimonials on vellum were voted to Mr. A. W. Barnes for plunging into the Thames at Richmond and going to the rescue of Mr. Anson. To Mr. Albert Woodhams for saving A. Billot from drowning by swimming to his aid in a dangerous current at Littlehampton. To Daniel Magee for gallantly jumping into the Grand Canal at Dublin and saving a child's life. To William Seager for saving H. Ludgate at Calne, Wiltshire. To Mark Upward for saving P. Dennit from drowning in the river Stour.

Parchment testimonials and pecuniary rewards were voted to many persons for other acts of gallantry in saving life from drowning.

The Oakley Hunt Ball will be held at the Corn Exchange, Bedford, on Wednesday, Jan. 21.

Mr. George Augustus Sala, accompanied by Mrs. Sala, left England on Saturday to winter in the Southern States of America. On the 13th inst. this popular writer was entertained at a farewell banquet, given in his honour at Willis's Rooms, Mr. Edmund Yates presiding over the distinguished gathering, which included members of Parliament, and several well-known men of letters.

NEW BOOKS.

There are some professed observers of foreign politics who assert that Berlin is hereafter to supersede Paris as the predominating centre of influence all over Continental Europe. Except with regard to military forces and diplomatic negotiations, at the present crisis of affairs, we do not think it will be so. The more sociable and vivacious spirit of the French nation, with all its faults, is likely still to outbid the stern rigour of Prussian determination for the leadership of popular taste. Literature, the fine arts, the manners and fashions of society, will not readily be obliged to submit to Berlin regulation. Nor does the growing wealth and trade of that city, though remarkable of late years, warrant a belief in its future industrial and commercial supremacy. But it is a subject of considerable importance just now, and we have to thank Mr. Henry Vizetelly for a really instructive book upon this subject. Berlin under the New Empire, in two closely printed octavo volumes, published by Messrs. Tinsley Brothers, is a work of substantial information, conveniently arranged, clearly and agreeably written, and mingled with entertaining descriptive passages, and with lively notices of the habits of the townsfolk. It may very well stand comparison with Mr. Sala's amusing latest book, "Paris Herself Again," which adopts a similar method of showing us the recent aspects of the French capital. For though Mr. Vizetelly has not Mr. Sala's wit and fancy, he has equal knowledge of the actual life of various classes of people in foreign cities. His judgment of social questions, more especially of social and domestic economy, commerce, and manufactures, appears generally to be sound; and he has exercised not only much diligence in collecting statistics, but equal discrimination in comparing different reports. For the gratification of readers who wish to be diverted and amused, these volumes are furnished, like those of "Paris Herself Again," with a plentiful exhibition of small engravings, more than four hundred altogether, scattered about the pages; and they are not less attractive. Designed by some of the cleverest and most popular of German comic or satirical artists for several publications of the day, they represent the drollest figures, costumes, and accidents of city life, with as much freedom as was used by Cham, and other Parisian pencillers of the like, in their woodcuts lately borrowed to illustrate Mr. Sala's book. Views of the streets, palaces, and public buildings of Berlin, and portraits of exalted or distinguished persons, are given also in sufficient abundance. Mr. Vizetelly's first prolonged visit to the Prussian Capital was in the autumn of 1872, at the time of the meeting of the three Emperors, in all probability to agree upon their policy for settlement of the Eastern Question. He went thither from Paris, where he has resided a good deal, and was naturally led to much comparison of the one metropolis with the other, pretty sharply to the disparagement of Berlin. The majority of English visitors, as a mere matter of taste and pleasure, will be disposed to agree with him in this line of criticism. He has gathered, apparently, from the perusal of many authentic German essays and papers, as well as from personal inquiries when he again visited Berlin, a copious store of detailed information. It is tolerably comprehensive in its scope, and has the appearance of being tolerably exact. The topographical situation, the foundation and early history of Berlin, its several quarters and suburbs, its principal streets, the grand Unter den Linden avenue, the Thiergarten or Park, the Schloss and other Royal and Imperial Palaces, the Museums, the Opera-House and other theatres, the Börse, the Rath-Haus, the University, the Churches and Markets, are described not merely in their external aspects. The author goes thoroughly into all the particulars he can get at of the inner life of these national or local institutions. He seems to have been a shrewd and attentive student of Prussian social affairs, though not generally resident there, and to have read or heard much upon this subject, which has, indeed, largely occupied the foreign correspondence of the Times in the last eight or ten years. Mr. Vizetelly's political sentiments are by no means favourable to the Emperor William or to Prince Bismarck; nor does he admire the Prussian type of military and official absolutism, or its effect upon the social life, the morals and manners, of the people. His pictures of certain haunts of dissipation and profligacy in the overgrown city on the Spree are quite as shameful as any that can be drawn in Paris, and their unredeemed coarseness is even more disgusting. The comparatively innocent beer-cellars, and many different establishments for eating and drinking purposes, are duly reported upon in this round of inspection. Theatrical entertainments, concerts, and dancing-saloons are visited also in their turn. With respect to institutions of graver importance and official dignity, the legislative assemblies of Prussia and of the German Empire, the Herren-Haus and Haus der Abgeordneten, and the Reichstag or Imperial Diet, are minutely described. Some of the leading statesmen and party speakers or active politicians figure individually, both in the text and in the woodcuts, in the pages of the second volume. The University, the Gymnasien and Realschulen, the eminent Professors, the clergy of Berlin, and other notable men of doctrine or science, come in for secondhand notices, which are scarcely adequate to their merits. Such men as the historian Mommsen, and Virchow the physiologist, can hardly be estimated with correct appreciation by Mr. Vizetelly. The condition of the working classes, and the prevalence of Socialist theories among them, with the organised propaganda and system of agitation which has excited such great alarm, and the conspiracies and recent plots of assassination, are discussed at some length. These volumes contain, in short, a large amount of materials for the understanding of present home affairs in Prussia and North Germany, which are frequently made the topic of remarks in the current journals of political discussion.

The delightful and instructive study of nature from the descriptive scientific point of view should be constantly recommended. Miss Arabella Buckley, the author of "The Fairy-land of Science," which was published by Mr. E. Stanford, and has quickly reached its sixth thousand of selling copies, has also written A Short History of Natural Science. The new edition of this work, much improved and enlarged, and furnished with many illustrations, comes out now in charge of the same publisher. It is not, like the other above mentioned, a simple display of intellectual entertainment for the youthful mind, but a substantial and methodical text-book, though easy and familiar in style, for the use of schools and juvenile students, more especially for young ladies. These will here be supplied with a fair amount of well-arranged information concerning the progress of discoveries, physical theories, and classifications in the domain of natural history, from Thales, Anaximander, and Pythagoras, down to Lyell, Huxley, and Darwin, to the professors of our Royal Institution, and other scientific luminaries of the present day. The Greek philosophers of antiquity, the Alexandrian scholars, Ptolemy and others, Strabo, and Pliny and Galen, the Arabian students and translators, Roger Bacon and the learning of the Middle Ages; Columbus and the extension of geography, Copernicus and Galileo with the establishment of true astronomy, followed by Kepler; the advancement of science heralded by Francis Bacon, the experimental method of investigation applied to elementary analysis, the microscope, the telescope, the higher mathematical calculus, Isaac Newton and all the gains of knowledge in the seventeenth century, are treated of in due order, with a sufficiently correct description of their general results. This is continued with the institution of more regular categories in botany and zoology by Linnæus and Buffon, the rise of geology and modern chemistry, and the discovery of electricity, to the development of physics, acoustics, optics, spectrum analysis, advanced astronomy, cosmogony, physiology, and biology, in recent times. We are glad to quote the following paragraph in conclusion. "Those who labour in the spirit of seeking the truth for itself will find their reward in the ever-increasing delight they will feel in studying God's works, and in the assurance which they will meet with at every step, that nothing can happen except under the guidance of His laws. True science, like true religion, leads to an entire and childlike dependence upon the Invisible Ruler of the universe. It makes us eager to study the laws of the universe, that we may live in accordance with them, and diminish some of the gross ignorance which now prevails, with its attendant evils; while at the same time it leads even the most instructed to feel how extremely limited our knowledge is, and that we are, after all, like inexperienced children, dependent upon the love and power of our Maker to bring us safely out of darkness into light."

The first question suggested by such a title as Cyprus as I Saw It in 1879, by Sir Samuel White Baker (Macmillan and Co.), is naturally, How did the author see it? And it is satisfactory to be able to answer that he did not see it as a visitor making a few days' or even a few weeks' trip; but that he "examined Cyprus in every district, and passed not only a few days, but winter, spring, and summer, in testing the climatic and geographical peculiarities." When we remember, moreover, that the author is a traveller and writer of exceptional experience and exceptional powers, as regards both observation and description, and that his position and resources would be likely to give him unusual opportunities and advantages, there can be little hesitation about receiving his book as superior, both in authority and in literary pretension, to most of the works, good and interesting as many of these are, which have been written upon the same subject. He sighted Cyprus on Jan. 4, and by Aug. 22 his manuscript, describing the island as he saw it in 1879, had already been forwarded to England, so that the time he had for testing the effects of the climate may be approximately calculated without much difficulty. Now, the autumn is notoriously the most unhealthy season in many, if not all, regions; and this may, though we must by no means infer that it does, account for the clean bill of health he can show. "Neither Lady Baker nor myself or servants," he says, "had any climatic ailment throughout our journeys in every portion of the island. A horsekeeper had fever while at Famagousta, but he was a native who had suffered previously, and the fit was a return of chronic ague. My own people never required a dose of medicine, although we were living in tents through winter and summer." So much for his personal evidence as to the pestiferous character of the climate. "The water," he testifies, "is generally wholesome, therefore dysentery and bowel complaints are rare, consumption is unknown, and pulmonary affections are uncommon." Indeed, he prophesies that "at some future time Cyprus will become the resort of delicate persons to escape the winter and spring of England, as the climate of the southern portion of the island is most enjoyable during the cold season," though, when he vouches for the agreeableness of the climate "from the middle of October to May," it is clear that he must have taken the behaviour of two months and a half on hearsay, if his personal experience extended only from the beginning of January to the middle or end of August. Famagousta has been mentioned, and, touching the vexed question of that possible harbour and naval station, Sir Samuel is of the opinion which he attributes to "all competent persons"—namely, that "a very moderate outlay would secure a first-class port, which would, as an impregnable coaling dépôt and arsenal, complete the links of the chain of fortresses which are the guardians of the Mediterranean;" but he admits that "there is unfortunately a serious drawback in the extreme unhealthiness of this otherwise invaluable situation." This insalubrity, so unlike Cyprus generally, according to Sir Samuel's testimony, is the more to be regretted, because "the fruit orchards and gardens of Famagousta are the finest in the island." In respect of our position at Cyprus, Sir Samuel declares that the island "should belong absolutely to England, or we should have nothing to do with it." The fact, he says, is that, "as usual, the English Government has been hoodwinked in their hasty bargain. The island can pay its way, and, if free from Turkey, would become most prosperous; but we have inherited (?) an estate so heavily mortgaged by our foolish Convention that the revenue is all absorbed in interest, which leaves nothing for the necessities of development." Enough has been said to show the bias Sir Samuel received from what he saw, so far as his views upon certain important points are concerned; for his little adventures, his anecdotes, his descriptions of particular places and various people, and minor details, readers must be referred to the volume itself, a large one, provided with a quaint illustration, a valuable appendix, and a useful index.

Biographies of living personages must obviously be incomplete, and they show a disregard of the Greek sage's apophthegm, so strikingly illustrated by the example of Crœsus, but it is a question whether they are not read with the greater zest for the very reason which makes them incomplete; and certainly The Life of the Right Honourable William Ewart Gladstone, M.P., D.C.L., &c. (Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co.), is likely to be enhanced rather than depreciated in interest by the fact that the illustrious subject thereof is still to be seen and, what is more, heard, and, if not invariably applauded, invariably admired, though it may be with unwilling, extorted admiration, in the flesh. The biographer is Mr. George Barnett Smith, whose purpose "is of a biographical and historical, rather than of a polemical character," and who has endeavoured to be as impartial as similarity, not to say identity, of political convictions and "a high admiration for the subject of this biography" would permit him to be. There is a noble portrait of Mr. Gladstone, at the age of sixty-nine, as the frontispiece of the first volume; and on the corresponding page of the other equally bulky volume stands a portrait of the right honourable gentleman at the earlier age of thirty-one; compare the two portraits, "look upon this picture and on that," and the whole story of the intermediate life is revealed, a life spent in energetic and almost heroic effort, physical and intellectual, with a constant increase of indomitable will and mental power, a gradual ripening of all the faculties, a progressive development and ultimate "setting" of the whole man. The biographer, of course, touches but slightly upon Mr. Gladstone's private, domestic life; it is "the story of Mr. Gladstone's life—and his relations to the great movements of his time—through the medium of his writings and his speeches" that the biographer has undertaken to present. Perhaps, for lack of information, he had no other story to tell; but, in any case, this is assuredly not the time for telling it. Whether it was worth while to notice the ingenuity which has traced Mr. Gladstone's descent to Royal origin is a matter for readers to decide according to their own genealogical sentiments and more or less pronounced taste for blood; it will be enough for most people to know that it was not by reason of a problematical descent from Henry III. of England, or Robert Bruce of Scotland, or both, but by qualities distinctive of the middle class that the Gladstones of modern times "carved their own fortunes, and rose to positions of public esteem and eminence." William Ewart Gladstone, the "great commoner" of our age, is understood to have been born at Liverpool on Dec. 29, 1809, to have gone to Eton in 1821, to have left it in 1827, and, after an interval of study with a private tutor, to have entered at Oxford, where, as nearly everybody has heard, he took a "double first" at the final examination. He then travelled abroad, especially in that Italy where, in after days, his name was destined to be no more "unheard or unadored" than that of Mulciber in days of old; and in Italy he still was, in 1832, when "the people had just fought and won one of the greatest constitutional battles recorded in our Parliamentary history." And now we look back upon a singular spectacle, singular when viewed by the light of subsequent events; for in 1832, at the close of the year, he who was to be known familiarly hereafter as "the people's William," came forward, if not as nominee of the Duke of Newcastle, as invited representative of the Red or Conservative Club, to contest the borough of Newark, and was returned at the head of the poll. In December, 1834, the budding statesman was a Junior Lord of the Treasury under Sir Robert Peel; and he may be considered fairly started on that brilliant but chequered career, the course of which, up to this date, has been most industriously traced in the two volumes under consideration, and which, for the present, is affected by a certain solution of continuity, causing embarrassment, one would think, to his party, if not to himself, especially as we are reminded by the biographer that, "when the bow of Ulysses requires to be bent, only Ulysses can bend it." This, of course, refers to a possible change of Ministry, in which event Mr. Gladstone, as the biographer thinks, would have to become virtually, though perhaps not nominally, the head of the administration. On the other hand, such doctrine as that concerning "the bow of Ulysses" is of somewhat mischievous tendency; the more homely saying that "there are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it" is far more likely to prevent a party from falling to pieces at the loss of its leader, and to give an increase of spirit and strength to the young Telemachus when called upon to pull in earnest his political father's difficult bow, instead of playing with it, and "making believe" as heretofore. But to return to other considerations. Mr. Gladstone has been charged, and so has nearly every great politician who ever carried any great measure, with inconsistency, and some of his accusers have dared to assert that his personal ambition, his thirst for power, will account for the successive modifications of his views, for the remarkable changes effected in his opinions, or, at any rate, in his advocacy. It is difficult to see, however, in the record of his public life, how the accusation can be made out. Take, for example, the position in which he chose to place himself when the death of Sir Robert Peel left it open for him, had he been the mere self-seeker audacity has charged him with being, to throw in his lot with one of the two great parties, instead of standing aloof with Sir James Graham, Mr. Sidney Herbert, and other "Peelites," who were too Conservative for one side and too Liberal for the other. Who can doubt that, if speedy possession of power were his object, he missed a chance by the behaviour he exhibited? Of course it is easy to say that he "played a waiting game;" but that argument can only be fairly employed when there is good reason to believe that more was to be expected from waiting than from acting at once. The story of Mr. Gladstone's public life, on the contrary, suggests the question whether his wish has ever been father to the thought which impelled him, whether his convictions have not entailed one long sacrifice of cherished aspirations and innate predilections. What it must have cost such a man to be rejected by the University of Oxford, as if he were a traitor to the Church which none loves better than he, may be readily imagined; but he preferred national interests above the prejudices of however respectable, however venerable a constituency, and it is even possible to understand that, as his biographer puts it, his rejection was in some sense a relief, and he "felt like a man who breathes the fresh mountain air after a close confinement in the crowded city." Still, it is not uncommon to be relieved from what is oppressive by an operation which is painful at the time and leaves for ever behind it a depressing sense of void. It will be strange if any of Mr. Gladstone's countrymen, save only the bitter partisan, can read this story of his public life without feeling grateful to the biographer for giving them an opportunity of revising their preconceived ideas and forming a fresh estimate of a character well worthy of being studied, and it will be still more strange if the heretofore admirer be not confirmed in his admiration and the heretofore reviler be not constrained to hold his peace. The biographer, as has already been mentioned, does not enter very freely, for obvious reasons, into domestic details, but he pays a passing compliment to Mrs. Gladstone, who "is almost as distinguished for her many benevolent and social qualities as Mr. Gladstone is in political and public life;" and he adds some little items of information about the family, such as are generally interesting to the ordinary reader. Mrs. Gladstone, he remarks, "was Miss Catherine Glynne, daughter of Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, of Hawarden Castle, Flintshire." There are seven surviving children, he tells us, out of eight, four sons and three daughters. The eldest son, William Henry, is, as everybody knows, member for Whitby, sitting with his father in the House of Commons, just as that father sat with his own father. The second son, the Rev. Stephen Edward Gladstone, "is Rector of Hawarden. The third and fourth sons are named Henry Neville and Herbert John Gladstone respectively. The former pursues a commercial career." Of the three daughters, Anne, Mary, and Helen by name, in order of age, "the eldest is married to the Rev. E. C. Wickham, M.A., Head Master of Wellington College; the second daughter, Miss Catherine Jessy Gladstone, died in 1850." Mr. Gladstone's fame as a woodman, a wielder of the axe, is not forgotten; but the biographer, unless there have been some oversight in the perusal of his pages, gives no countenance to the anecdote related of the tailor who is reported to have said, "There is only one thing more remarkable than Mr. Gladstone's mind, Sir, and that is—his body." We are told, however, that "his recreation in retirement is such as befits a strong and muscular frame;" and we are reminded of the occasion upon which Mr. Disraeli, now Lord Beaconsfield, jocularly expressed his satisfaction at the presence of a substantial piece of furniture between himself and his athletic, as well as infuriated, antagonist. The volumes, it should be gratefully recorded, are provided with an index.

Extraordinary as are many, if not most, of the opinions enunciated in Thackeray, by Anthony Trollope (Macmillan and Co.), a little volume which should have been about the very best in execution, and about the very chiefest in interest among the "English Men of Letters," edited by Mr. John Morley, there is nothing in the pages more extraordinary than the view which Mr. Trollope has expressed concerning Thackeray's mode of working. Thackeray, according to Mr. Trollope's distinct admission, "accomplished what must be considered as quite a sufficient life's work," he "had about twenty-five years for the purpose, and that which he has left is an ample produce for the time," but "he could not bring himself to sit at his desk and do an allotted task day after day," and Mr. Trollope is plainly offended at the man of genius for not proceeding in accordance with Mr. Trollope's own cut-and-dried method. Literature, Mr. Trollope seems to hold, is a business to be carried on, like the production of leather, during a certain number of hours every day, no matter what the producer's humour may be; otherwise the author, in Mr. Trollope's estimation, fails in his first duty, which is to produce a certain amount of work within a given time, not to produce something which shall, on the whole, be sufficient in quantity and shall bear a stamp of superior quality. Mr. Trollope would make an excellent task master for a literary Pharaoh; he would, whip in hand, urge on the unfortunate author, when they had neither straw nor stubble at hand wherewith to make brick, saying, "Fulfil your works, your daily tasks, as when there was straw." The charge of idleness and irregularity made against Thackeray is almost ludicrous; we may not deny that he was both idle and irregular, but we may doubt whether, if he had not done what he did and what Mr. Trollope himself admits to have been, in sum total, "quite a sufficient life's work," in the desultory, haphazard fashion in which it was done, we should not have been immeasurably the losers by his steady diligence. In fact, Mr. Trollope's tone, throughout the two hundred and odd pages, is worthy of Petticoat-lane; how much work a man can do, sitting for so many hours a day on a three-legged stool, and how much money he can make, those are the points apparently considered of the highest importance. It seems, too, that even Mr. Trollope himself may relax some strict rule of his "for a consideration." It was always an excellent and most commendable theory of his that an author should see the end of his own work "before the public should see the commencement;" but, on one occasion at least, he was induced, by his own confession, to sacrifice principle on account of what he euphemistically terms "some interesting little details as to honorarium." This, in plain language, means that Mr. Trollope did once, and therefore may again, depart from one of his own theories for the sake of pecuniary profit; and, if so, it is absurd that he should adopt a tone of superior virtue at finding another of his theories disregarded by somebody else for some cause less sordid than pecuniary profit. And, if the tone of the little book is unpleasant, the style of writing is by no means admirable; it is a little slipshod, and adapted rather to an obituary notice of a successful but somewhat improvident tradesman than to the commemoration of a man of intellect, highly gifted and sorely tried, with many noble and many feeble qualities, a giant both in stature and in mind, with the pettiness, now and then, of a dwarf. What is admirable in the book is the manifest endeavour to be candid and impartial, the evident struggle to deliver an honest judgment. What may be the value of the judgment is another question altogether. There is, perhaps, too much obtrusion of the writer's personality; but the little work, with all its shortcomings, tells more than is generally known about the author of "Vanity Fair," and for that reason alone cannot fail to be read with profound attention.

Sometimes, as in the case of "Thackeray," the subject is handled in the "English Men of Letters" are difficult to deal with biographically for want of published material; but with Burns, by Principal Shairp, it is very different, for the great Scottish poet, we are told, has had so much honour done to his memory that "each decade since he died has produced at least two biographies of him." Who the various biographers may have been it were bootless to inquire and tedious to enumerate; but it is certainly according to the fitness of things that a "Professor of Poetry," the title held by Principal Shairp from his office at Oxford, should give us a sketch and expound for us the gifts and failings, touching at the same time upon the most notable productions, of Scotland's foremost singer. The Professor has performed his task apparently with sympathetic zeal, and certainly in methodical and business-like, as well as instructive and agreeable, style. The greater part by far of the volume is biographical; in the last chapter, consisting of barely twenty pages, there are some brief pregnant notes concerning the gauger-poet's "character, poems, songs," though, of course, there are critical and other remarks dropped here and there incidentally among the biographical portions. The career of Burns is not a pleasant one to contemplate; if we gather from it a sort of vague suspicion that he was somewhat hardly treated, we find it, at the same time, extremely difficult to answer the question whether there was any way in which such a man could have been saved from himself. It is all very well for Professor Shairp and others to hint at a pension of £300 a year. Burns was a very different sort of man from Dr. Johnson. Can anyone believe that any pension in the world would have secured Burns against pecuniary difficulties? It may be true that he was put into the position for which he was least fitted; but it is not easy to think of a position for which he was at all fitted. The best that could have happened to him, so far as one can see, would have been that the sale of his poems should have produced him a respectable income, and that he should have had somebody, in the unenviable capacity of a "keeper," to look after both him and it, without his cognisance, be it well understood. Such wayward, unmanageable children of genius remind one, when they are brought up before the public by the biographer, of another kind of children who are occasionally brought up before the magistrate with the complaint that the parents "can't do anything with them." The public, like the magistrate, are afraid that they "cannot assist the complainant;" and, in the case of the biographer, it would be too late, even if they could. We can only make moan over Burns and his troubles, and thank Heaven that they were no worse, and that he was not removed before he had accomplished the splendid work which he performed to the joy and wonder of his own generation and left as a possession for ever to posterity. One piece of modern cant the story of Burns has a tendency to explode—his genius was assuredly something totally unlike that late invention which is described as "nothing but an immense capacity for hard work;" his genius was unmistakably as spontaneous as the light of the glow-worm. Professor Shairp very justly and judiciously points out that, although objections may be made to the grossness of Burns, yet that, if he be compared with Scottish song-writers before his day, he can claim to have done for Scottish song what Hercules did for the Augean stables. This, of course, is greatly to the credit of Burns; but what the ordinary reader will consider most curious about the matter is that in Burns, who was not a model of sobriety, or morality, or piety, Scotland, which is nothing if not professedly sober, and moral, and pious, should have found a purifier and an ennobler of her muse. There is in this fact a little of that irony which made a gauger of the poet.

Excellent writing, striking scenes and situations, and curious analytical studies of manifold humanity will be found in Sebastian Strome, by Julian Hawthorne (Richard Bentley and Son), a novel which, after perusal of the three volumes, leaves an impression rather of the author's cleverness and power than of the story's intrinsic interest and faithful reflection of either conventional life or the natural man. The reader, in fact, is likely to be more charmed, contrary to ordinary experience, with the author's own undisguised sentiments, arguments, opinions and comments than with the tale which is told and with the proceedings and conversations of the characters who figure in it. Far be it from the author's servant to say that any sort of woman is impossible, or even improbable; but it may be safely asserted that, whether the hero of this novel be accepted generally as a true man and no mere phantom of an ingenious brain or not, the heroine will not recommend herself to the majority of readers as a satisfactory though certainly a very original and remarkable, if not very interesting, psychological conception. There is a certain piquant mystery about the circumstances connected with what may be called her first marriage, seeing that a second is clearly foreshadowed at the end of the story; and, if the secret of that mystery have been correctly divined, the most commendable discretion has been used in leaving readers to find their own solution of the puzzle. That the heroine was bound to be an extraordinary woman will be inferred from what is said about her early in the first volume, when she was but a girl: "once," it is related, "as she was returning home after pruning some trees," being of a Gladstonian turn in her ideas of exercise, "in a neighbouring preserve, with her axe in her hand, and dressed in a serge gown, with a thick quilted under-petticoat of scarlet cloth, she was chased into a corner by a bull. As she ran she loosened the petticoat, and, watching her chance, stripped it off in a moment, and cleverly tossed it on the animal's horns as he was charging her. At the same time she sprang to one side, and as he passed brought down her keen hatchet just behind his ears, and tumbled the huge creature dead at her feet." And yet "a mouse or a bat had the power to thoroughly terrify this redoubtable young woman," as she is very properly designated, who, by-the-way, is not stated to have studied under a Spanish bull-fighter, but must be supposed to have acted from a sudden clever impulse, an electric flash from the light of nature. Having performed her feat, she remarked, not to her maid but to a gamekeeper, "Wilkins, give me my petticoat." Something out of the common will be expected of a young woman who is introduced at the beginning of the novel with such credentials; and the expectation will be amply realised, though it may seem at a sacrifice of psychological consistency, notwithstanding the pains taken at the outset to prepare the reader for contradictory and perverse behaviour. As for the hero, he is also a strange medley; his character appears to have been suggested by reminiscences of St. Augustine and Admirable Crichton mixed together. His mother is the sweetest of Christian women, and his father is a model for Christian clergymen. The purpose of the story, if it have been rightly apprehended, is most praiseworthy: it is to show how necessary is the leaven of true Christian religion to leaven every lump, however superior in gifts and capabilities, of sinful humanity. Serious, however, as this object is, there is no lack of gaiety in the novel; of force there is abundance; and of the charm which constrains one to read there is, to say the least of it, enough.

Indian history and archæology will derive good service from a treatise on Buddha Gaya, by Rajendralala Mitra, LL.D., C.I.E. The learned author of this work lives in Calcutta, but his fame is not confined to India, for he is a member of most of the learned societies of Europe. He has written on the ancient religious books of his own country, and this is not his first archæological work. A few years ago he produced the first volume of a large and highly illustrated book on the "Antiquities of Orissa," which is an authority on the architectural remains of that part of India. This volume on Buddha Gaya is an important work, speaking of it only by its bulk, and the style in which it is got up. It is a large quarto, and illustrated with fifty-one plates, some of them autotypes, and the others lithographs, the latter are very creditable to the Surveyor-General's Office in Calcutta, where they have been produced. It may be explained that Buddha Gaya is situated about sixty miles south of the Ganges, and is something over a hundred miles east of Benares. It was the place where Buddha attained to Buddhahood, or Supreme Intelligence. This was while sitting under the sacred Bodhi-tree, the pipal-tree, or Ficus Religiosa. This particular tree was the parent stem from which the branch was carried to Ceylon, where it is still revered by the Buddhists of that country. Close to this tree and the Boddhi-manda, or the "Throne of Wisdom," a splendid temple was erected, and monasteries grew up around. The spot became a place of pilgrimage, and remains such to this day, for Buddhists still come from Burmah and other countries to this shrine at the present day. The Hindoos also venerate the spot, and make pilgrimages to it. The Burmese Government sent officers to make some repairs at this Buddhist shrine in 1876, and these repairs brought to light some of the foundations of the place. This led to a visit by Rajendralala Mitra, and the present work is the result of his visit. It would be absurd to say that any work on the archæology of a sacred shrine could be "exhaustive." But this work, from its size and supply of illustrations, will enable anyone to form a perfect idea of Buddha Gaya, both as to its history and architecture, and from it we may learn about all that is at present known on the subject. The author, being a native of India, has some advantages on his side. He is a Brahmin, and familiar with Sanscrit, and the literature of his own country, on which he draws for information. At the same time he shows a thorough knowledge of the art and architecture of the Buddhist and Brahminic periods. When it is added that the author writes English as if it were his native tongue, the merits of the book may be appreciated. But to those interested in such subjects, a reading of it is recommended as the best means of realising the ability and learning of its writer.

Two new editions of the Oxford Bible for Teachers have recently been issued from the Oxford University Press Warehouse, Paternoster-row. One is a thin edition for the pocket, the print of which is remarkably clear, considering the extreme fineness of the paper; the other has the border-lines and headings of chapters printed in red. In both the text corresponds, page for page, with previous facsimile editions published by this house; and some further improvements and additions have been made to the supplementary matter.

Dr. Phillips, who some time ago, having sustained an injury on the London and South-Western Railway, obtained in an action a verdict for £7000 damages, brought the case on a second time in the Common Pleas Division, and the jury on Tuesday awarded £16,000 damages.

Brigadier-General Sir Henry Evelyn Wood, V.C., K.C.B., attended at the Chamberlain's office at Guildhall on Tuesday and took up his freedom by patrimony in the Fishmongers' Company, he being entitled to the freedom through his father, the Rev. Sir John Page Wood, and his grandfather, Alderman Sir Matthew Wood, M.P., who was Lord Mayor of London in 1815 and 1816.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, M.P., has been re-elected chairman of the Board of Works at a salary of £2000.

The "People's Tribute" has found a home at last—at Madame Tussaud's, in Baker-street.

Captain Eyre Massey SLaw has been made a C.B., in recognition of his meritorious services as chief officer of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade.

An exhibition of drawings executed by scholars and pupil-teachers in the schools under the London School Board has been held this week at the offices of the board on the Victoria Embankment.

The first meeting of session 1879-80 of the Royal Colonial Institute was held on Tuesday evening, when a paper was read by Mr. Stephen Bourne on "Extended Colonisation a Necessity to the Mother Country."

The largest show of poultry ever held in England has been held this week at the Crystal Palace, being the eleventh of the great annual shows which are held at Sydenham. Like its predecessors, it included an exhibition of pigeons as well as of larger birds. The entries numbered 4134, and came from most of the principal fanciers in the country. The value of the prizes offered was about £1500.

The Lord Mayor presided for the first time on Tuesday at a meeting of the Court of Aldermen, and asked their assistance in the administration of the duties of his office. A letter was read from the Home Office offering to provide a site in the vicinity of Newgate for providing additional accommodation for the Central Criminal Court. It was referred to the Gaols Committee.

The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that the total number of paupers on the last day of the first week in November was 82,790, of whom 44,784 were in workhouses and 38,806 received outdoor relief. Compared with the corresponding weeks in the years 1878, 1877, and 1876 these figures show an increase of 3920, 3240, and 3153 respectively. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 787, of whom 593 were men, 155 women, and 39 children.

The directors of the Crystal Palace Company have issued to the shareholders a circular in anticipation of the extraordinary meeting on the 27th inst. The board state that after careful consideration they have come to the conclusion that they cannot recommend to the proprietors any proposal for selling or leasing the palace. In the event of the resignation of the directors being accepted, they recommend that a committee of selection be appointed, to whom the names of all candidates for the direction may be sent within ten days, and that the committee should report to an adjourned meeting the names of such candidates as they recommend for election.

The Lord Mayor announces that the head-quarters of the Rowland Hill Memorial Fund will from this time be at the Mansion House. More than £4000 has been received, and subscriptions are daily pouring in. A public meeting in furtherance of the objects of the fund will be held at the Egyptian Hall on the 26th inst. A comparatively small portion of the fund will be applied to the erection of a statue or monument of Sir Rowland Hill. Mr. Henry Edwards, M.P., writing to the Lord Mayor, said that, hearing the fund was for the benefit of aged and distressed employés in the Post Office, he had much pleasure in forwarding a cheque for £100, and earnestly hoped that the appeal would be liberally responded to, as the object was most deserving. Appeals to the Mayors of the United Kingdom and to the City guilds to assist the fund have been issued.

There were 2544 births and 1609 deaths registered in London last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births exceeded by 5, while the deaths were 138 below, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 63 from measles, 113 from scarlet fever, 14 from diphtheria, 44 from whooping-cough, 20 from different forms of fever, 23 from diarrhœa, and not one from smallpox. In Greater London 3112 births and 1930 deaths were registered. The mean temperature was 40·3 deg., being 2·4 deg. below the average. The duration of registered bright sunshine in the week was 13·3 hours (against 21·7 hours at Glynde Place, Lewes), the sun being above the horizon during 62·8 hours; the recorded duration of sunshine was therefore equal to 21 per cent of its possible duration.

About 200 convicted criminals met on Tuesday night at the third annual supper provided for them in the Mission Chapel, Little Wild-street, one of the narrow dirty street in St. Giles's. For two years Mr. G. Hatton, the pastor of the mission, Mr. W. Wheatley, the secretary, and their fellow-workers have been helping to reclaim convicts. They have a room in Elm-street, Clerkenwell, whence one of them goes each morning to the door of "The Steel," as Coldbath-fields Prison is called among thieves. On the discharged prisoners coming out they are invited to breakfast in Elm-street, preliminary to inquiring what can be done to keep them from evil courses. During the past year 5502 breakfasts were thus given. Further help was extended to 537 persons, of whom 214 received money, clothes, tools; 172 were placed at work; 50 sent to sea; 18 to various refuges; 45 sent home with their railway fares and other expenses paid; 25 are now in the home established in Elm-street, Seven Dials, in connection with the mission; and 13 have absconded or been expelled from that institution.

Mr. C. T. Newton, C.B., of the British Museum, lectured on Greek Art last Saturday evening at the College for Men and Women, Queen-square, Bloomsbury. At the close of his address he said that he should not ask his hearers to inspect for themselves some of the beautiful, original works of Grecian art, as they were hidden away in dark cellars at the British Museum. This was especially the case in connection with the famous Townley collection, for which the British nation paid £20,000 at the beginning of this century, a part of the collection having remained in the basement of the Museum for more than twenty-five years in a place so dark that the interesting specimens could only be seen with the aid of a lantern. There they would remain unless the public, whose property they were, urged upon the House of Commons, the authorities at the British Museum, or whoever was responsible—he wished he knew—the necessity of having a proper place assigned to them. We were supposed to be a very practical people, but it appeared to him that there was nothing more unpractical than to buy great collections with the money raised from public taxes and then to hide them away in holes and corners after having once exhibited and published a list of them. He was sorry that the public were content to leave their national collections in this scandalous state of neglect. The only people who were content with the present state of things were foreigners, who insisted upon seeing them, and for whom only the museum lanterns were brought into requisition. Mr. R. S. Poole, keeper of the coins and medals at the museum, in proposing a vote of thanks to the lecturer, said that this was a question the public only could determine. He urged upon them the necessity of demanding that these unique specimens of the work of the Greek sculptors should be taken from the dark cellars and properly exhibited.

"THE TWINS."

The good-natured wife of a German forester or gamekeeper has brought up in her cottage, we must suppose, two cubs of the she-bear that her husband killed last winter. She has made them her special pets, for it is most likely that she has no children; and here she is seen, in the Artist's picture, watching them greedily devour the contents of a porridge-bowl, which she has put on the chair for their morning repast. Bears are still not uncommon in the woodland and highland districts of Germany; and every juvenile reader of Grimm or Hans Andersen is aware that these animals play an important part in tales of marvellous romance. There is a sort of kindly feeling towards the uncouth beast among people of Teutonic race. Heine's "Atta Troll" may be taken as a literary example of this sentiment. The idea, therefore, of petting two young bears, as if they were kids or lambs, is not wholly alien to the German popular mind.

THE PULLMAN DINING CAR.

The Great Northern Railway Company has been the first in England to adopt this comfortable American system, which has been daily in operation, since Nov. 1, in one train each way between Leeds and London. The Pullman Palace Car Company, whose sleeping and drawing-room cars are in use upon several English and Scottish railways, have provided for the Great Northern line a handsome and convenient new carriage, the chief interior apartments of which are shown in our Illustrations. It was constructed at Detroit, in the United States, at a cost of £3000. It is fifty-two feet in length, eight feet in breadth, and runs upon eight wheels. It comprises a dining-saloon, in the middle, a kitchen behind, and a smoking-room in front, with steward's pantry, ladies' dressing-room, gentlemen's lavatory, cupboards, and stoves. The dining-saloon has six tables, three on each side, as represented in our Illustration; there are ten easy chairs, large, well-stuffed, and covered with crimson velvet, each revolving on a solid pivot. The ladies' dressing-room, which adjoins this, has a stove, inclosed in a metal-lined wooden cupboard. The sides or walls of the saloon are of American black walnut, decorated with veneer of French walnut. The smoking-room, of which we also give an Illustration, has two tables, and seats for nine persons. There are electric bells to summon the attendants, who are the cook, the steward or waiter, and the boy of the smoking-room. The refreshments, including wines, are supplied by Pullman's Company at ordinary hotel dinner charges. Any first-class passenger on the line may use this Pullman Car on payment of half-a-crown over and above the ordinary fare for his journey. He may enter or quit the Pullman car at any station where the train stops, but should give notice beforehand of his intention, lest the car should be full. The up train, to which this car is attached, starts from Leeds at ten a.m., and arrives at King's Cross, London, at two p.m. The down train, by which the car returns, leaves King's Cross at 5.30 p.m., reaching Leeds at 10.10 p.m. So that a Leeds man, by this arrangement, may start from home after his usual breakfast, fortify himself with lunch at one o'clock, take three clear hours for his business in London, dine comfortably at six or seven o'clock, and get to bed in his own house an hour before midnight. This seems to be just what one should want; and it is to be hoped that Manchester and Liverpool men will soon enjoy the same accommodation. We trust that the London and North-Western, the Midland, and the Great Western Railway Companies will not delay to follow the example of the Great Northern. Irregular dining hours, beyond all doubt, have shortened the lives of many prosperous and active men of business who were little past middle age. The Pullman Company therefore deserve our support in this department of their enterprise, as well as in the introduction of sleeping cars, which suit the need of a comparatively restricted number of travellers by night. The principal office of the Pullman Palace Car Company in London is situated in the Midland Railway Station, St. Pancras, Euston-road. Mr. J. Miller is secretary; Mr. H. S. Roberts, manager for England, and Mr. A. Rapp mechanical superintendent. We are informed that only one dining-car has yet been constructed for use in this country, and it has been under repairs for a day or two in the present week. It may be expected that this convenience will hereafter be universally applied to our railway passenger traffic.

Next Monday the extension of the St. John's-wood branch of the Metropolitan Railway from West Hampstead to Kilburn, Brondesbury, and Willesden will be opened for traffic.

The Albert Medal of the Second Class has been conferred upon Charles Morgan, collier, Abercarn, for gallant and humane work on the occasion of the disastrous explosion there in September, 1878.

The Pacific Steam Navigatien Company have determined to make use of the electric light for lighting the saloons of their steamers. An experiment made on board the Mendoza on the voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool is said to have resulted satisfactorily, and the British Electric Light Company have been instructed to provide the necessary apparatus for lighting the vessels.

Lord Alfred S. Churchill gave on Wednesday night the opening address of the session of the Society of Arts, giving an historical retrospect of the society's operations from its commencement. At the close of the address his Lordship delivered a number of medals and prizes to the successful competitors. The gold medal, offered for the best means for saving life at sea, was presented to Messrs. J. and A. W. Birt, "for the collection of buoyant articles sent in by them." A silver medal was presented to Mr. Herbert Singer "for his essay on the art of the silversmith." The usual silver medals for papers, read at the evening meetings of the society, were presented to Mr. Alfred Haviland, Mr. John Hollway, Mr. Conrad W. Cooke, Mr. Thomas Wardle, and Dr. W. Wallace. The Prince Consort's prize of twenty-five guineas was presented to Frederick John Arnold, of the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution, who had obtained nine first-class certificates in the present and three preceding years. The council prize (for female candidates) of £10 10s. was presented to Ada Frances Webb, of the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution, and of the College for Working Women, Fitzroy-street, silk-knitter. The second free Saturday evening lecture, given under the direction of the Trades Guild of Learning, at the Society of Arts, was given by Mr. C. Pfoundes, the secretary of the Japan Institute, on the subject, "The Far East; or, Japan and its People." The lecture, which was heartily applauded, is to be followed to-day (Saturday) by a discourse on "The Rise of Parliamentary Parties," by Professor Gardiner.—The first course of the Society of Arts Cantor Lectures for the session will be delivered by Dr. Charles Graham, Professor of Technology at University College, London, on "The Chemistry of Bread and Bread-making." The first lecture will be given on Monday next, and the course, which comprises five lectures, will be continued on successive Mondays till Dec. 22.

POLITICAL.

The upshot of the large Liberal gathering at Leeds yesterday week was a reaffirmation of the resolve to return Mr. Gladstone as the colleague of Mr. Barran at the coming election. So, with the Liberals of Leeds and Midlothian soliciting his services, the right hon. member for Greenwich has two strings to his bow. It is probable that at Leeds he would but have to woo to win. But Mr. Gladstone courageously inclines to the harder task. He begins his courtship north of the Tweed in earnest next week; and both Edinburgh and Glasgow are moving to present the illustrious suitor with duly appreciative addresses. Mr. Gladstone has meanwhile found leisure to send an encouraging missive to Mr. Arch on the subject of cottage farming and gardening, to avow to another correspondent that he takes a wider view of the Church than he did forty years ago, and to express to the new Junior Liberal Club of Reading his firm adherence to the Liberal creed.

Mr. Forster's and the Duke of Argyll's speeches at Leeds yesterday week were solid contributions to the indictment which the Liberal leaders have framed against the Government for neglecting home affairs to seek matters for embroilment abroad. Entertained with Lord Houghton, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and the Liberal candidates for the ridings at a luncheon in the Victoria Hall in the afternoon (Mr. John Dent in the chair), Mr. Forster repaid the hospitality of Leeds by favouring the company with a long and elaborate adverse criticism of the Ministerial policy, qualified with well-balanced sentences appealing to unprejudiced Conservatives. An "Imperial danger" to our power was threatened by the Ministry's underrating the magnitude of our responsibilities. The relations between this country and Russia had been embittered, and the Marquis of Salisbury's late "glad tidings of great joy" had naturally increased the ire of Russia. Mr. Forster disbelieved the likelihood of a war with Russia; but argued that, if war were to come, the Government had placed England at an enormous disadvantage by the guarantee with Turkey to defend Asia Minor, and by the advance into Afghanistan. In England's co-operation with the other European Powers to bring about reform in the Turkish dominions, Mr. Forster hoped to find a hopeful solution of one phase of the Eastern Difficulty. But he feared the Government meant to annex Afghanistan, or a great portion of it; and he feared India was already too overtaxed to bear the added burden of paying the cost of this conquest. Coming to home questions, Mr. Forster rather emphatically remarked that "there are only two men in England who have a right to speak for the Liberal Party, and these are our trusted leaders, Earl Granville and Lord Hartington." But Mr. Forster reckoned without Mr. Gladstone when he made this sweeping statement. Be that as it may, the right hon. gentleman obligingly compressed his enumeration of the reforms which a Liberal Ministry would introduce into the narrow compass of half a sentence, which will bear quoting:—

> Well, if the next Parliament really deals with enfranchisement, household suffrage for the counties, the redistribution of seats, with county government, the land laws in Ireland and England, and the licensing law ("the Scotch Church"), I do not think we can be charged with a scanty programme, not even by my friend who wishes to put upon it the Church.

The Duke of Argyll, at the gigantic evening meeting in Messrs. Fowler's shed, had too tumultous an audience to make his powerful speech generally heard; but it was well worth the hearing. Standing there as one of the last four survivors of the Aberdeen Cabinet, the noble Duke manfully avowed his share of responsibility for the Crimean War, but said the principle of the Government was that the fate of Turkey "was a question not for Russia alone, but for Europe." The present Ministry, on the other hand, had set up the doctrine that "the Turks were to be kept up as a garrison, at whatever cost to the subject population of Turkey," whereas Europe had previously taken the good government of the Christians of Turkey on her shoulders. In the case of the Syrian massacres, England and France had intervened and coerced the Turks to order. Why had Mr. Cross affirmed that the Treaty of Paris prohibited such coercion. As for the Treaty of Berlin, that was but a comparatively unimportant modification of the Treaty of San Stefano. With caustic severity throughout did the Duke treat the Eastern and Afghan policy of the Government, traversing old ground already sufficiently cultivated, however. The Marquis of Salisbury, in a letter to Tuesday's papers, directly controverted his Grace's allegation that it was untrue "that the Ameer refused because if he accepted a British Embassy he would be obliged to accept a Russian." His Lordship gave chapter and verse to show that his alleged "mis-statement" was a fact.

Lord Rosebery (who inaugurated the Scottish Liberal Club at the Royal Hotel, Edinburgh, on the 13th inst.) on Saturday last presided at a meeting of the Hawick Liberal Association, and had a lighter tilt against the Government; but the Ministry found stanch friends and true in Mr. Raikes the previous evening and on Monday at Chester, in Sir Henry Drummond Wolff (with the image of "two old scolds trundling mops full of dirty water" for Mr. Bright and Mr. Lowe) at Bournemouth on Monday. Mr. Henry Chaplin at Alford yesterday week confined himself to a dispassionate consideration of the land question; and Mr. E. Stanhope on the same occasion remonstrated against the strong language used against the Government. Mr. Rylands cheerily returned to the attack on Monday at Burnley, and devoted himself to the demolition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's finance. Lord George Hamilton made a very effective reply to the criticisms of Lord Hartington and Mr. Bright at the Conservative Colston banquet at Bristol; and the Marquis of Ripon returned the compliment as chief spokesman at the Liberal banquet the same evening.

Mr. Parnell continues his tenant-right meetings in Ireland. Emblems of force are conspicuous at these gatherings; and on Wednesday a man was arrested for using seditious language at one of the meetings.

Twenty-two persons are stated to have perished, and a number of scows and dredges to have been sunk, in a violent storm which prevailed on Lake Ontario last Tuesday night.

The strike in the nail trade in Staffordshire and Worcestershire, involving 25,000 hands, has been terminated by a decision come to by the nail-masters to give an advance equal to from 20 to 30 per cent on recent wages.

Three explosions, following in quick succession, recently occurred on the San José Santa Cruz Railway, in California, caused by the ignition of a vein of petroleum exposed during the excavation of a tunnel. Twenty-five Chinamen were killed, and seventeen Chinamen and two whites were injured.

Early on Wednesday morning Michael Davitt, an ex-Fenian prisoner, and James Bryce Killen, were arrested in Dublin, on a warrant charging them with having, at a land meeting held at Gurteen, in the county of Sligo, on the 2nd inst., used language calculated to incite to a breach of the peace. James Daly, proprietor of the Connaught Telegraph, was also arrested the same day at Castlebar, on account of an inflammatory speech made by him on the same occasion.

A window has been inserted by public subscription at St. Lawrence's, Norwich, to the memory of the late Rector, the Rev. Joseph Crompton, who died last year.

The parish church of Balcombe, near Lewes, has been thoroughly restored, chiefly through the liberality of Mr. J. G. Dodson, M.P. The Bishop of Chichester preached the reopening sermon.

A service took place at noon on Saturday last in the parish church of Kensington, to commemorate the completion of the spire, which is 278 ft. high—76 ft. higher than the Monument. After the singing of special psalms and hymns the top stone was placed on the spire.

Bishop Claughton preached on Sunday morning in the cathedral church of Gloucester; in the afternoon at Upton St. Leonard's; and in the evening at St. Nicholas's, Gloucester, for the Propagation Society. On Saturday a meeting was held in the palace, when Miss Patteson, sister of the late Bishop of Melanesia, gave an address to a large number of friends, invited by the Bishop and Mrs. Ellicott, on behalf of the ladies' association of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel for ameliorating the condition of poor women in heathen countries. Fourteen years ago the annual income of this branch of the society's work was £100, now it is £5000.

Two public meetings were held on the 13th inst.—one at Exeter Hall and the other at St. James's Hall—on the proposal to alter the Prayer-Book. The Earl of Devon presided at one, and Earl Nelson at the other. Resolutions were passed declaring it inexpedient at the present time to alter the Prayer-Book, urging that if at any future time such alterations be contemplated the Lower Houses of the Convocations of Canterbury and York should be first made better to represent the clergy of the two provinces, and disapproving of the Bishop of Carlisle's Bill. It was also resolved to draw up a declaration embodying the resolutions, and to circulate it for signature by Churchmen.

The Archbishop of Canterbury preached last Tuesday on the reopening, after partial restoration, of the choir in the cathedral church of his diocese. At the luncheon which followed the Dean spoke in justification of such works as had been carried out in the cathedral. While respecting the labours of the great men of the past, it was necessary that such repairs should be made as would enable this generation to hand down the churches intact to its successors.—Two deputations have waited upon the Archbishop of Canterbury to complain of the observations in one of the National Society's school reading-books, said to have been written by Archbishop Whately, upon the tyranny of trades unions. The Archbishop promised to exert his influence to prevent the continued use of the passages objected to in Church schools.

In June of last year the Court of Arches made an order suspending the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie from the celebration of Divine service for three years, on account of continued Ritualistic practices at St. Alban's, Holborn. A writ of prohibition was obtained from the Court of Queen's Bench, but on the case being carried to the Court of Appeal the prohibition was annulled. Last Saturday application was made to the Dean of Arches to carry out the original order. Lord Penzance expressed his regret at the delay which had been caused in carrying out the order of suspension, through the exercise, by a temporal Court, of a jurisdiction over the Court of Arches, which was not warranted by law. He ordered the publication of the suspension in the church on the 23rd inst., to take effect from that date.

The annual general court of the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy was held at the Corporation House, Bloomsbury-place, on the 13th inst., when the Archbishop of Canterbury was re-elected president, Lord Hatherley vice-president, and Mr. Henry Pownall, Archdeacon Jennings, and Mr. Alderman Finnis, treasurers of the corporation for the ensuing year. The Bishop of St. David's and Mr. Edward Thornton were elected upon the court of assistants in the room of the Rev. Prebendary Evans and the Rev. William Tennant, deceased, and several gentlemen who had contributed thirty guineas or upwards to the funds of the corporation were elected governors. Last Saturday was held the usual monthly court of assistants for the transaction of the general affairs of the corporation and the distribution of grants. The Estates Committee presented a report recommending considerable temporary reductions from the rents of many of the corporation estates as the best means of helping the tenants over the present period of depression and loss. This step, however necessary, must seriously diminish this year's income, unless the deficiency can be provided for by an increased number of donations and subscriptions. More than a hundred applications for aid, mostly on this occasion towards the education or start in life of clergy children, were laid before the court, and in almost every case a grant was made, the governors desiring to further in every way in their power this mode of helping the poorer clergy. The total amount distributed was £1345.

Patrick M'Donnell, who was charged by the authorities of the South Dublin Union with obtaining admission to the casual ward as a vagrant while having £103 in his possession, was on Tuesday liberated on payment of £1 to the Hospital Sunday Fund.

NOW READY, SECOND EDITION OF PARIS HERSELF AGAIN.
By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.
Containing a New Preface and four hundred Illustrations by the first French Artists of the day. Two vols., demy, 25s.
The demand for this book was so great that the first edition was exhausted in three weeks. The second edition is now ready, and obtainable at all Libraries and Booksellers.
"Few Englishmen have the French verve like Mr. Sala, or so light a touch on congenial subjects. He has stores of out-of-the-way information, a very many-sided gift of appreciation, with a singularly tenacious memory, and on subjects like those in his present volumes he is at his best."—Times.
"For those who do and those who do not know Paris these volumes contain a fund of instruction and amusement, which can be 'drawn' at almost any page with the certainty of a 'find.'"—Saturday Review.
"Such a pleasant mixture of anecdote, observation, experience, knowledge, intelligence, and insight as none but Mr. Sala could supply."—Pall Mall Gazette.
These short extracts give a fair idea of the opinion of the entire press on Mr. Sala's pleasant volumes.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL and COMFORTING.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly-nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

GALWAY MARKET WOMEN.

The old city of Galway, a decayed commercial seaport, as well as the chief town of Connaught, which is the least prosperous part of Ireland, presents a mournful aspect to the visitor who earnestly desires the welfare and contentment of all our fellow-subjects in the western island. There was a time, before the advent of Protestant Ascendancy, when Galway enjoyed a lucrative trade with Spain, and her wealthy merchants built stately mansions here, resembling those of Cadiz and Seville, or Malaga, in their architectural fashion. It seems that the city had then a certain degree of municipal independence and self-goverment, like Hamburg or Bremen, since its remote situation on the Atlantic coast, with the unsettled and lawless state of Connaught, made it impracticable for the English rulers of Ireland to enforce their authority. Galway, however, was long since deprived of her ancient privileges and sources of wealth. The fishery, carried on by a distinct class of people, the inhabitants of a quarter named the Claddagh, whose customs are peculiar in many ways, now forms one of the most remarkable industrial features of this town, while the maritime trade is sadly in need of more energetic development. We present a Sketch of the rustic market women congregating in the Old Booths, their figures, dress, and gestures being quite characteristic of the Celtic race in the West.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

The annual rifle contest of the 50th Middlesex (Bank of England) for prizes presented by the Governor of the Bank, Major J. P. Currie, Captain S. O. Gray (deputy cashier), commandant, and others, was brought to a close at the Wimbledon ranges with the following results:—For the best aggregate scores, with seven shots each, at 200, 500, and 600 yards—the first prize, presented by the Governor of the Bank of England, was won by Sergeant John Pike; 2nd prize, presented by Major James P. Currie, by Lieutenant J. H. Green; 3rd prize, presented by the officers of the corps, by Private Huggins; and 4th prize, also presented by the officers, by Captain S. O. Gray, but relinquished in favour of Quartermaster-Sergeant E. Bance. Range prizes, 600 yards—Sergeant G. Pike, 26; Quartermaster-Sergeant Bance, 19; and Sergeant E. Hutt, 16. Five hundred yards—Lieutenant J. H. Green, 24; Private W. Huggins, 23; and Lance-Corporal J. Blake, 21. Two hundred yards—Captain S. O. Gray, 24; Private T. Ford, 23; and and Sergeant E. Hutt, 23. In addition, a prize presented by Mrs. S. O. Gray was awarded to Sergeant J. Pike as the best shot of the corps for the year. The returns of the corps just forwarded to the War Office show that on the 31st ult. the enrolled strength was 76; efficient, 73; proficient officers, 3; ditto sergeants, 6; present at inspection, 60; number of marksmen, 8.

Last Saturday the complete returns of the strength and efficiency to which the volunteers of the City of London attained in the official year ending the 31st ult. were issued. The five corps of the City (1st London Artillery, 1st London Engineers, and 1st, 2nd, and 3rd London Rifles) had on the 1st inst. 3585 enrolled members as against 3485 last year. The officients have increased from 3221 to 3380; the non-efficients decreased from 264 to 255. The proficient officers increased from 87 to 93; the proficient sergeants also increased from 111 to 112, and the official inspection field-states show that the number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and men actually present on parade on that important occasion was 2954 as compared with 2684. Besides the above "City of London corps" there are four others with head-quarters in the City, but possessing Middlesex designations, which have a claim to be reckoned in the City force. These are the 2nd Middlesex Artillery (Custom House) Corps, the 26th Middlesex (Customs) Rifles, the 49th Middlesex (Post-Office) Rifles, and the Bank of England (50th Middlesex) Rifles, the latter being attached to the Civil Service Regiment. Altogether there are in the City 5855 enrolled volunteers; 5593 efficients, 523 proficient officers and sergeants, while 5010 of all ranks were at inspection.

It has been announced that a communication has been sent, by order of the Council of the National Rifle Association, to the adjutant of every corps in Great Britain, with a view to elicit the opinion whether or not the "Snider rifle should henceforward be altogether discontinued at Wimbledon and the Martini-Henry substituted for it in all competitions hitherto confined to the Snider."

The official reports which have been issued on the proceedings of Artillery Volunteers encamped at Shoeburyness in August state that sixty-four officers and 707 men attended during the first week and eighty-three officers and 897 men the second. The discipline of the force was good, and the results of the practice showed that satisfactory progress had been made since last year.

Major-General Edward Newdigate, who has been the guest of the Earl of Dartmouth, distributed the prizes to Lord Dartmouth's company of volunteers at Patshull Hall, near Bridgnorth, Staffordshire, on Monday.

This (Saturday) afternoon the Lady Mayoress will present the London Brigade prizes, in the presence of the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and other distinguished visitors.

Mr. R. E. Turner, of the South-Eastern Circuit, has been elected a Bencher of the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple, in place of the late Sir John Lefevre.

The experiments in fish culture which have been carried on for the last few years at Ercildoune, Sir Samuel Wilson's estate in Victoria, have this year, according to the Melbourne Argus, yielded remarkably successful results. There are four imported species of salmonidæ now in the ponds, consisting of fine specimens of English salmon reared from ova brought out from England, the fish being now eighteen months old; also of salmon trout, brown trout, and Californian salmon.

A despatch from Valparaiso, received by way of Lisbon, states that a great demonstration took place there on the arrival of the Peruvian ram Huascar in tow of the Chilian vessels. It was hoped that the Huascar would be completely repaired in a fortnight. On the news of her capture becoming known at Lima a riotous popular and military demonstration against the President and the Government took place, and the Cabinet reigned on the following day. A despatch from Lima of a latter date says:—"The behaviour of the people has been wonderful. Subscriptions have been raised in Lima to purchase another Huascar or ironclads. In one day nearly a million and a half has been raised in Lima. The Archbishop has offered all the Church jewels if needed. An appeal has been made to the towns and the municipalities in the Republic, and money will be forthcoming. The women of Lima are giving their jewellery, and large sums will be daily coming in in this and other ways." According to the latest news received from Buenos Ayres, the Chilian army was advancing, while the Bolivians were reported to be about to retire, in consequence of disputes having arisen between them and the Peruvians. Orders have been given by the Argentine Government for the purchase of two more ironclads in Europe.

A banquet was given at Leamington on the 10th inst. to the ex-Mayor, Mr. Harding—his successor presiding—and a presentation of silver plate was made to Mr. Harding in recognition of his services.

A silver cradle of 200 oz. has been presented to Mrs. Morson, wife of the Mayor of Stafford, who has borne a daughter during his year of office. A similar compliment has been paid Mrs. Pope, ex-Mayoress of Dorchester.

In view of the forthcoming meeting of the British Association at Swansea, it was resolved, on the election of the Mayor at that town, that the salary be £800 a year instead of £300, which has hitherto been paid.

Alderman Tatham, who has been elected Mayor of Leeds, addressing the Town Council, said that he had felt some hesitation in accepting the post, and his misgivings arose regarding the social duties which he should have to perform. But, if the people of Leeds wanted for their Mayor a Quaker and a teetotaller of strong convictions, who would lead them for the next twelve months in the line of self-denial, sobriety, and economy with efficiency, he dared not and could not refuse the office.

CALLS TO THE BAR.

The undermentioned gentlemen have been called to the Bar:—

Inner Temple.—John Yeates; William John Martin, B.A., Camb.; Walter Ross Phillips, LL.B., Camb., Whewell Scholar, 1878, and holder of a studentship awarded Hilary Term, 1875; Henry Sheehy Keating, B.A., LL.B., Camb.; Robert Jardine Browning, B.A., Oxford; John Fielden Cobbett; Thomas Mansfield Forbes Parkyns, Oxford; Austin Percy Lousada, B.A., Oxford; William Thornton Sharp, B.A., Oxford; Barada dâs Bose; Edward Lovett Henn, M.A., Camb.; Henry Thomas Kemp, LL.B., B.A., Camb.; Evelyn Leighton Fanshawe, B.A., Oxford; John Lowis, B.A., Camb.; Harold Edward Trower, B.A., Oxford; Fitzpatrick William Bulkley Praed, B.A., Camb.; George Cope Cope, B.A., Camb.; Walter Morgan de Saram, Oxford; Arnold George Rogers, B.A., Camb.; Henry Wace, M.A., Camb.; Frederick Lancelot Hamilton Morrice, LL.B., Camb.; Richard Foulkes Griffiths; Christopher Alexander Williams; Herbert Marlow Shelverton, London; John Thomas Meeson, B.A., Melbourne; Edward Ponsonby; Frederick Sims Williams, LL.B., Camb.; William Chance, B.A., Camb.; the Hon. YARMOUTH AND ITS BLOATERS.

Peggotty owned to David Copperfield that she "was proud to call herself a Yarmouth bloater!" and, although it would not be either polite or correct to designate the inhabitants of Great Yarmouth, in Peggotty phrase, as "bloaters," yet to speak of that important seaport and watering-place without special reference to its cured and smoked herrings would be to play "Hamlet" without the rôle of the melancholy Dane. For, although Yarmouth can boast of being the eighth port in England, and of possessing the largest quay in Europe, with the exception of that at Seville, yet the herring-fishery is the staple trade of the town; and it might be said of Yarmouth, as was said of Amsterdam, that it is "built on herring-bones"—in the same metaphorical sense, that London Bridge is said to have been built on wool-sacks. The Dutch took advantage of the Scotch and English fishermen deserting the tiny herring for the mighty whale; and, having come to Loch Fyne, as early as the year 836, to purchase salted herrings, they did not lose their relish for the delicacy, but contrived to get the trade into their own hands; so that, by the year 1603—according to the testimony of Sir Walter Raleigh—the Hollanders employed 200,000 men on the coasts of England and Scotland for catching herrings that were of the value of a million and a half of money. It was one Beukles, a Dutchman, to whom the world is indebted for the invention of the pickled herring; and when he died, in the year 1536, the Emperor Charles the Fifth erected a splendid tomb to his memory, as to a benefactor of mankind. Why a Merry Andrew should be called "a pickle-herring" is, I believe, a conundrum in etymology that has not yet been rightly answered.

Between August and Christmas is the chief season for the Yarmouth herring fishery, though there is also a spring season, from March to May, and a short midsummer season in June and July. But it is the late season, the "autumn or home fishing," that is of chief importance, because the herring is then in its finest condition. Just now, then, the bloater season is at its height; and it is proved that the Yarmouth herring fishery is equal to one fifth of the entire fishery of the United Kingdom. The gains of the fishermen are something like £25,000; the curers and packers have also to be paid; at least 10,000 tons of salt are required for the curing; and some 60,000 barrels of herrings are annually sent abroad from Yarmouth, of which more than half go to the Mediterranean. These few figures will be sufficient, without entering into further details, to show the importance of this particular "harvest of the sea" to the people of Great Yarmouth. A single boat, in the month of November, will bring in as many as 264,000 herrings or 20 lasts of fish, and the beauty of such a sight, and also of the herring-shoal with its phosphorescent splendours, is so wondrous, that we need not marvel at Mr. Hunt devoting all the resources of his artistic genius, in his courageous endeavour to depict, at the bidding of Mr. Ruskin, a solitary herring in its silver coat of scales. This drawing was exhibited at the Old Water Colour Exhibition, in 1858; and, if it ever passes out of Mr. Ruskin's possession, it should be secured for some public gallery in Great Yarmouth.

Standing on one of the piers or on the jetty, or strolling along the magnificent Marine Parade, and watching the fleet of fishing-luggers sailing out to the Yarmouth Roads and shooting out their nets at sunset, one sees, in November, 1879, a very similar scene to that which might have been witnessed from the same beach, in November, 1079, or even before the date of the Norman Conquest. A Herring-Fair, or Free Fair, was held here, from that early date up to the close of the eighteenth century, between Michaelmas and Martinmas (Nov. 11); and during the later period, when the Dutch came to Yarmouth to purchase herrings, one particular Sunday, that was given up to the purposes of a fair, was called "Dutch Sunday." The bailiffs of the Barons of the Cinque Ports were sent here on these occasions, under the pretext of keeping order; but they did their spiriting so ungently that their presence was the signal for fighting and rioting. These annual scenes of feud were carried on not only on the land, but also on the sea: so that on one occasion as many as twenty-five vessels were burned in a single encounter. There were also difficulties with drift-nets and drag-nets, and those quarrels that would seem chronic to herring-fishers, whether they are seeking for Loch Fyne "Glasgow baillies"—as Sam Slick termed those Highland delicacies—or the equally famous herrings at Yarmouth. Some such encounters as these may have formed the subject for that "New ballad on the herring fishery" that is being studied by the woman in Hogarth's picture of "Beer Street." Then, besides blood being shed by herring-fishers who spoke the same tongue—and, this, too, in the very teeth of their superstition that, if blood be drawn in a quarrel, the herring will at once go away from that coast, and not return for a season—they had, occasionally, encounters with French and Dutch fishers who were poaching on their own peculiar herring-grounds. History does but repeat itself; and, on the night of Monday, Oct. 13, the drift-net fishing-boat Jessamine, while off Lowestoft, had her nets trawled into by a French boat, the Alsace-Lorraine, of Boulogne, whose crew fired at the Englishmen and wounded three of them. In consequence of this the Government dispatched an armed cruiser to the fishing-grounds for the protection of the English boats.

During eight days that I recently spent in Yarmouth I was unable to procure a fresh herring from any of the fishmongers, unless I had chosen to eat it quite late at night. The reason was that the fish on being brought to shore were at once dispatched to other markets, or taken to the fish-houses, in the "swills" or wicker baskets, and there salted before breakfast-time the next morning. The salting is completed in twenty-four hours for the home market, and in ten days for the foreign market; and the herrings, hung up in rows, with wooden spits thrust through their gills, are subjected to the smoke of oak-wood fires, and, thus cured, become bloaters. The red herrings are those fish that have been thus smoked for fourteen days, and have thereby acquired a deeper golden colour. In fishermen's cottages in the West Highlands I have seen and sketched similar strings of dried herrings, cured in peat-smoke, slung across corners of the heather-thatched house or fixed upon triangular frames of wood hanging upon the wall. In London, Yarmouth herrings are turned into bloaters by the summary process of a brine-pit and smoke-hole; and red-herrings (otherwise "Californians" or "soldiers") are doctored with a solution of pyroligneous acid, and sold in poor localities at a cheap rate. In purchasing a Yarmouth bloater, therefore, it is needful, as a certain advertisement says, to "see that you get it," as it is one of those delicacies that is frequently subjected to adulteration. From the Exchequer accounts of the thirty-first year of Edward III. it appears that the Royal household was supplied with 9000 red herrings at a cost of 50 marks, and with 3600 white herrings at a cost of £12. At that time herring pies were a great delicacy; and, by charter, the town of Yarmouth had to send one hundred, baked in twenty-four pies, annually to the King; and, in the reign of Edward I., thirty acres of land were held by tenure, on condition that the King was supplied with twenty-four herring-pies at the beginning of the season.

Redolent of the smell of bloaters are those narrow paved lanes, or "Rows," which are such a feature in the town of Great Yarmouth, and make its ground-plan to resemble an extended gridiron. There are 156 of these Rows, which barely admit the passage of that very peculiar vehicle, the Yarmouth cart or trolly, which may, possibly, be a poor descendant of an ancient British war-chariot, and is now greatly used for the transit of herring-barrels. Many of these Rows open upon the South Quay, the picturesqueness of which is greatly increased by an avenue of trees. Here I saw a public-house, with the sign of "The Three Herrings"—a sign that is, probably, not to be met with elsewhere; but the three herrings—or, rather, their tails—empaling three demi-lions, are on the arms of the town—a town, the staple trade of which has, in the herring-fishery, supplied the training for the skill and daring which have ever distinguished the beachmen, fishermen, sailors, and coastguard men of Great Yarmouth.

FINE ARTS.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

Several pictures, acquired by purchase or bequest, have been added to the National Gallery collection. The most important of the number is a large tempera picture in Room XIV., by Perugino, painted in his mature manner, about 1507-8, containing figures, nearly lifesize, of the Virgin standing with the Child, and on each side SS. Francis and Jerome, also erect; the former in the brown frock of his order, the latter in the red robe of his cardinalate. Above are two angels, with outspread wings, supporting a crown over the Virgin. This picture is very distinctively Peruginesque in the somewhat conventional types of the heads, especially of the Virgin—which clearly prompted Raphael's conception while he was in the master's studio and for some years after—and in the purity of feeling and sweet though timid, formal execution. A more characteristic example it would be difficult to cite, and it is only surpassed in grandeur by the master's frescoes in the Sala del Cambio at Perugia, from which town the picture was bought of Baron della Penna. For quality, preservation, and representative value in relation to the history of art this is one of Mr. Burton's most fortunate purchases. Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle quote an extract given by Professor A. Rossi, of Perugia, from the "Annali Decemvirali" for 1507, which sets forth that on June 8 of that year the executors of Giovanni, a carpenter of Perugia, commissioned of Perugino, then present, a Virgin erect holding the Child, similar to that of Loreto, with St. Jerome and St. Francis, for the price of forty-seven florins. Another picture of the "Umbrian School," formerly ascribed to Perugino, and representing the "Incredulity of St. Thomas," has been placed in Room XV.; as also an effective picture of the Farrarese School representing a conflict of cavalry in armour; and a "Portrait of a Man," of the Milanese School, bequeathed by the daughters of Mr. Solly. In Room XIII. the two wings have been added to the centre panel by Bernardino da Siena of the "Virgin Enthroned," bought at Mr. A. Barker's sale in 1874. These wings, which complete the triptychal altarpiece, represent SS. Peter and Nicholas of Bari, and were obtained by Mr. Burton from Mr. Barker's heirs. An early German picture of the "Crucifixion," which has been in the possession of the trustees for a long time, is placed in Room XII. Two small Canalettos and a view in Venice by Guardi are a portion of Mr. J. Henderson's bequest. Two studies in monochrome by Copley, for his picture of the Death of Chatham, are interesting for comparison with the picture itself. They were bought at the Anderdon sale. Lastly, Room V. has received a charming portrait by Romney, entitled "The Parson's Daughter."

DRAWINGS BY S. PROUT AND W. HUNT.

A loan collection of drawings, by Samuel Prout and William Hunt, is being exhibited at the Fine-Art Society's Gallery, New Bond-street. The object of the exhibition is to enable Mr. Ruskin to exemplify certain principles of art, especially as illustrated by Prout, which he (Mr. Ruskin) has set forth in an accompanying pamphlet of "Notes," as in the case of the previous exhibition of Turner drawings at the same gallery. The series of works by Prout will disappoint some who may expect to find a considerable proportion of the artist's large finished drawings in water colours, which, although they are nominally more "important" in the eyes of ordinary collectors, and command high prices under the hammer, are studio products really less complete in essential detail and character than his pencil studies, while in colour and effect they are still more rudimentary. Of this class of work there are only a few samples, such as the view of the Ducal Palace, Venice, the largest of the Scaliger monuments at Verona, and a few others. The pencil sketches or studies of Prout have been by preference selected by Mr. Ruskin, very wisely we think, in order "to justify or at least to explain" the enthusiastic encomia he has passed on them in his early books and recent Oxford lectures. These sketches are interesting by virtue of their artistic or at least their workman-like qualities, and still more so perhaps from adventitious circumstances. They are careful outline transcripts of many of the noblest Gothic monuments of Europe, done on the spot, and accurately done so far as they go—which, however, is not very far. Their artistic merits are their sense of magnitude and relative proportion, their perception of architectonic characteristics, their feeling for composition, their picturesque ruggedness—accompanied, however, with much conventionality of touch, which has been reproduced ad nauseam especially in lithography—above all, the power they evince of compendiously, equally, and lucidly indicating the leading features of the most intricate architectural detail, notwithstanding the painter's ignorance of perspective. By this last power unity and keeping are secured in subjects where an artist is ever in danger of falling into chaotic loss of balance in relative scale; but at the same time it gave to Prout's work too much of the aspect of a uniform pattern. This method, or mannerism, also precluded the possibility of rendering the more delicate beauties of tracery, and Mr. Ruskin may fairly quote one of his own drawings here as evincing a higher sensitiveness to such beauties than Prout ever displayed. When we think of the grandeur of a Gothic cathedral, its infinite variety and intricacy of form, its time-toned colouration, the mystery of its chiaroscuro and its poetical suggestiveness, we can but repeat that Prout's work was but rudimentary, and we must regard Mr. Ruskin's estimate of him as greatly exaggerated. Prout's appearance was synchronous with the birth of the Gothic Revival; and he came just in time to preserve for us records, precious though inadequate, of many of the finest buildings in Europe, before—to paraphrase Byron—the effacing fingers of "restoration" had swept the lines where beauty lingered. And to these and other accidental causes must be ascribed the adventitious interest of Prout's drawings to which we have alluded. Mr. Ruskin but expresses the sentiment of many of his readers when he says that his "feelings towards this painter are much founded on, or at least coloured by, early associations." To such associations (so difficult to shake off, as we all know), to a love of the Past so passionate that nothing but scorn and contempt for the Present can find place, to a poetical imagination which colours and magnifies the smallest detached fact or truth till it is relatively almost entirely false, and which confounds ethics and religion with æsthetics where they have no sort of connection, and to an extraordinary but most perilous command of rhetorical resource which tempts into exaggerations that can hardly represent the writer's own sane convictions, and of which he can hardly be conscious—we must attribute Mr. Ruskin's "reverence" for Prout. The same constitution and attitude of mind can alone explain Mr. Ruskin's still warmer acceptation of a later clique of "Mediævalists"—far less sincere and manly imitators, not more competent, and immeasurably more puerile. Mr. Ruskin's "Notes" are, of course, not the least interesting incident in connection with this exhibition, and the public will rejoice to find in them evidence of the author's restoration to health. Apart, indeed, from their inevitable peculiarities, they contain many observations—particularly on technicalities—which are as true as they are acute. Yet, while acknowledging Mr. Ruskin's great services to art in this country, we cannot but feel how much less partial his influence as a teacher would have been had the rare gifts of his high, pure, and fertile mind—employed dispassionately, moderately, and justly—led him to the discovery that the beautiful relics of mediæval art were not the outcome of all the virtues, political, social, religious, and that the different tendencies of the nineteenth century in art, as in other matters, are not infallible proofs of all the opposite vices. A truer philosophy surely points to the conclusion that not only laws of compensation but also of progress are in operation ever since nations were enslaved to build a pyramid.

The drawings by William Hunt need not detain us long. Included are many of his best works, both figures and still-life—with most of which our readers will have made acquaintance already. Nor, in the main, will there be much divergence from Mr. Ruskin's opinions on them—although he could not refrain from having a fling at the Old Dutch Masters' treatment of similar subjects. All will agree that within the narrow limits and taste of William Hunt's art (when he does not attempt heads of the scale of nature) his imitative painting is almost unrivalled, and entirely original in method.

ST. MARK'S, VENICE.

Since our first article, a fortnight back, on the threatened destruction of the west front of St. Mark's, Venice, the fate of that matchless gem of semi-Oriental art has been a subject of general comment. And since the meeting held under the auspices of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings, another meeting has been convened by the Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, at which Messrs. Street, Burne-Jones, and others, recorded an indignant remonstrance against the unnecessary, wanton, and inexcusable vandalism in contemplation by the Venetian Municipality and Italian Government. Other meetings have been held at Cambridge and Birmingham. Mr. Ruskin likewise has lent the weight of his name to the effort that is being made to avert the danger. In his "Notes," also, to the collection of drawings by Samuel Prout and William Hunt, now being exhibited in Bond-street, which we have reviewed above—which "Notes" contain, as might be expected, many characteristically discursive but instructive and charming remarks on topics suggested, directly or indirectly, by the drawings—he says:—"At this very hour the committees of Venetian builders are meeting to plot the total destruction, and re-erection according to their own notions, and for their own emolument, of the entire west front of St. Mark's—that which Barbarossa knelt under, and before which Dandolo took his vow for Palestine! . . . The floor of St. Mark's [that is, at least, the floor of one aisle] is already destroyed, together with the north and south sides; only the west front and roof mosaics are yet left, and these are instantly threatened." Mr. Ruskin proceeds to say that he has got Mr. Rooke to undertake the copying of the whole series of mosaics yet uninjured. Three of these copies are included in the Bond-street exhibition, and they are admirably faithful to the style, colour, and effect of the mosaics.

UNDERGROUND LONDON.

Few Londoners have any idea of the vast and complicated network of passages and channels beneath their feet in connection with railways, subways, the telegraph, water, gas, and sewerage or drainage. There is much that is interesting in this "underground London;" but perhaps one of the most curious and weird sights that belong to it would be seen by making a descent into one of the large "Penstock chambers" situated at various points on the main drainage system. One of these slimy and not over pleasant "chambers" is represented in our Illustration. The "Penstock" at the right-hand of the Engraving is a great iron gate, which can be lowered, like a portcullis, by machinery, so as to shut up or direct into other channels the dark current of sewage which rushes from the circular brick tunnel below. These "Penstocks," of which there a large number in use, are most essential to the proper regulation of the drainage, not only when things are going on as usual, but in the event of any mishap occurring, or in the case of sudden floods occasioned by an exceptionally heavy and rapid rainfall.

The system of Metropolitan Main Drainage has often been described in this Journal. It is, beyond question, the grandest and most perfect work of its kind that has ever been devised. Provision is hereby made for the secure reception and conveyance of an aggregate quantity of liquid and mixed matter, including the average surface water from rainfall, amounting to sixty-three million cubic feet daily. That is equal to a lake three feet deep, fifteen times as large as the Serpentine, or nearly as large as the whole of Hyde Park. The portion consisting of water from rainfall, on the north and south sides of the Thames, is nearly forty-six million cubic feet daily, while the sewage liquid, composed of water from houses mixed with refuse solid matter, is above seventeen million cubic feet. Two thirds of this sewage belongs to the north side, which has, at least, twice the population of South London. There are nearly 1500 miles of street sewers, and eighty-two miles of main intercepting sewers. The latter were constructed between 1859 and 1865, for the most part, at a total cost of more than four millions sterling, by the Metropolitan Board of Works. Their chief engineer, Sir Joseph Bazalgette, by whom this great public work was designed and superintended, gave a precise account of it in a paper he read, in 1865, to the Institution of Civil Engineers. But we can only here mention some leading features of the system.

On the north side of the river three main lines of sewer—the High Level, the Middle Level, and the Low Level—proceeding, though not in a direct course, or parallel to each other, generally from west to east, converge and unite at Abbey Mills, on a creek in the marshes of the river Lea, where their aggregate contents flow by the Northern Outfall Sewer to Barking Creek, thereby entering the Thames about twelve miles below London Bridge. The discharge into the river takes place only at high tide, so as to be carried down by the ebb. It goes down nearly twelve miles with the ebb tide, and no part of it returns with the flood tide beyond one mile above the point of discharge. The outfall on the south side of the Thames is at Crossness, in the Erith Marshes, somewhat lower down the river; so that none of the London sewage comes back to London.

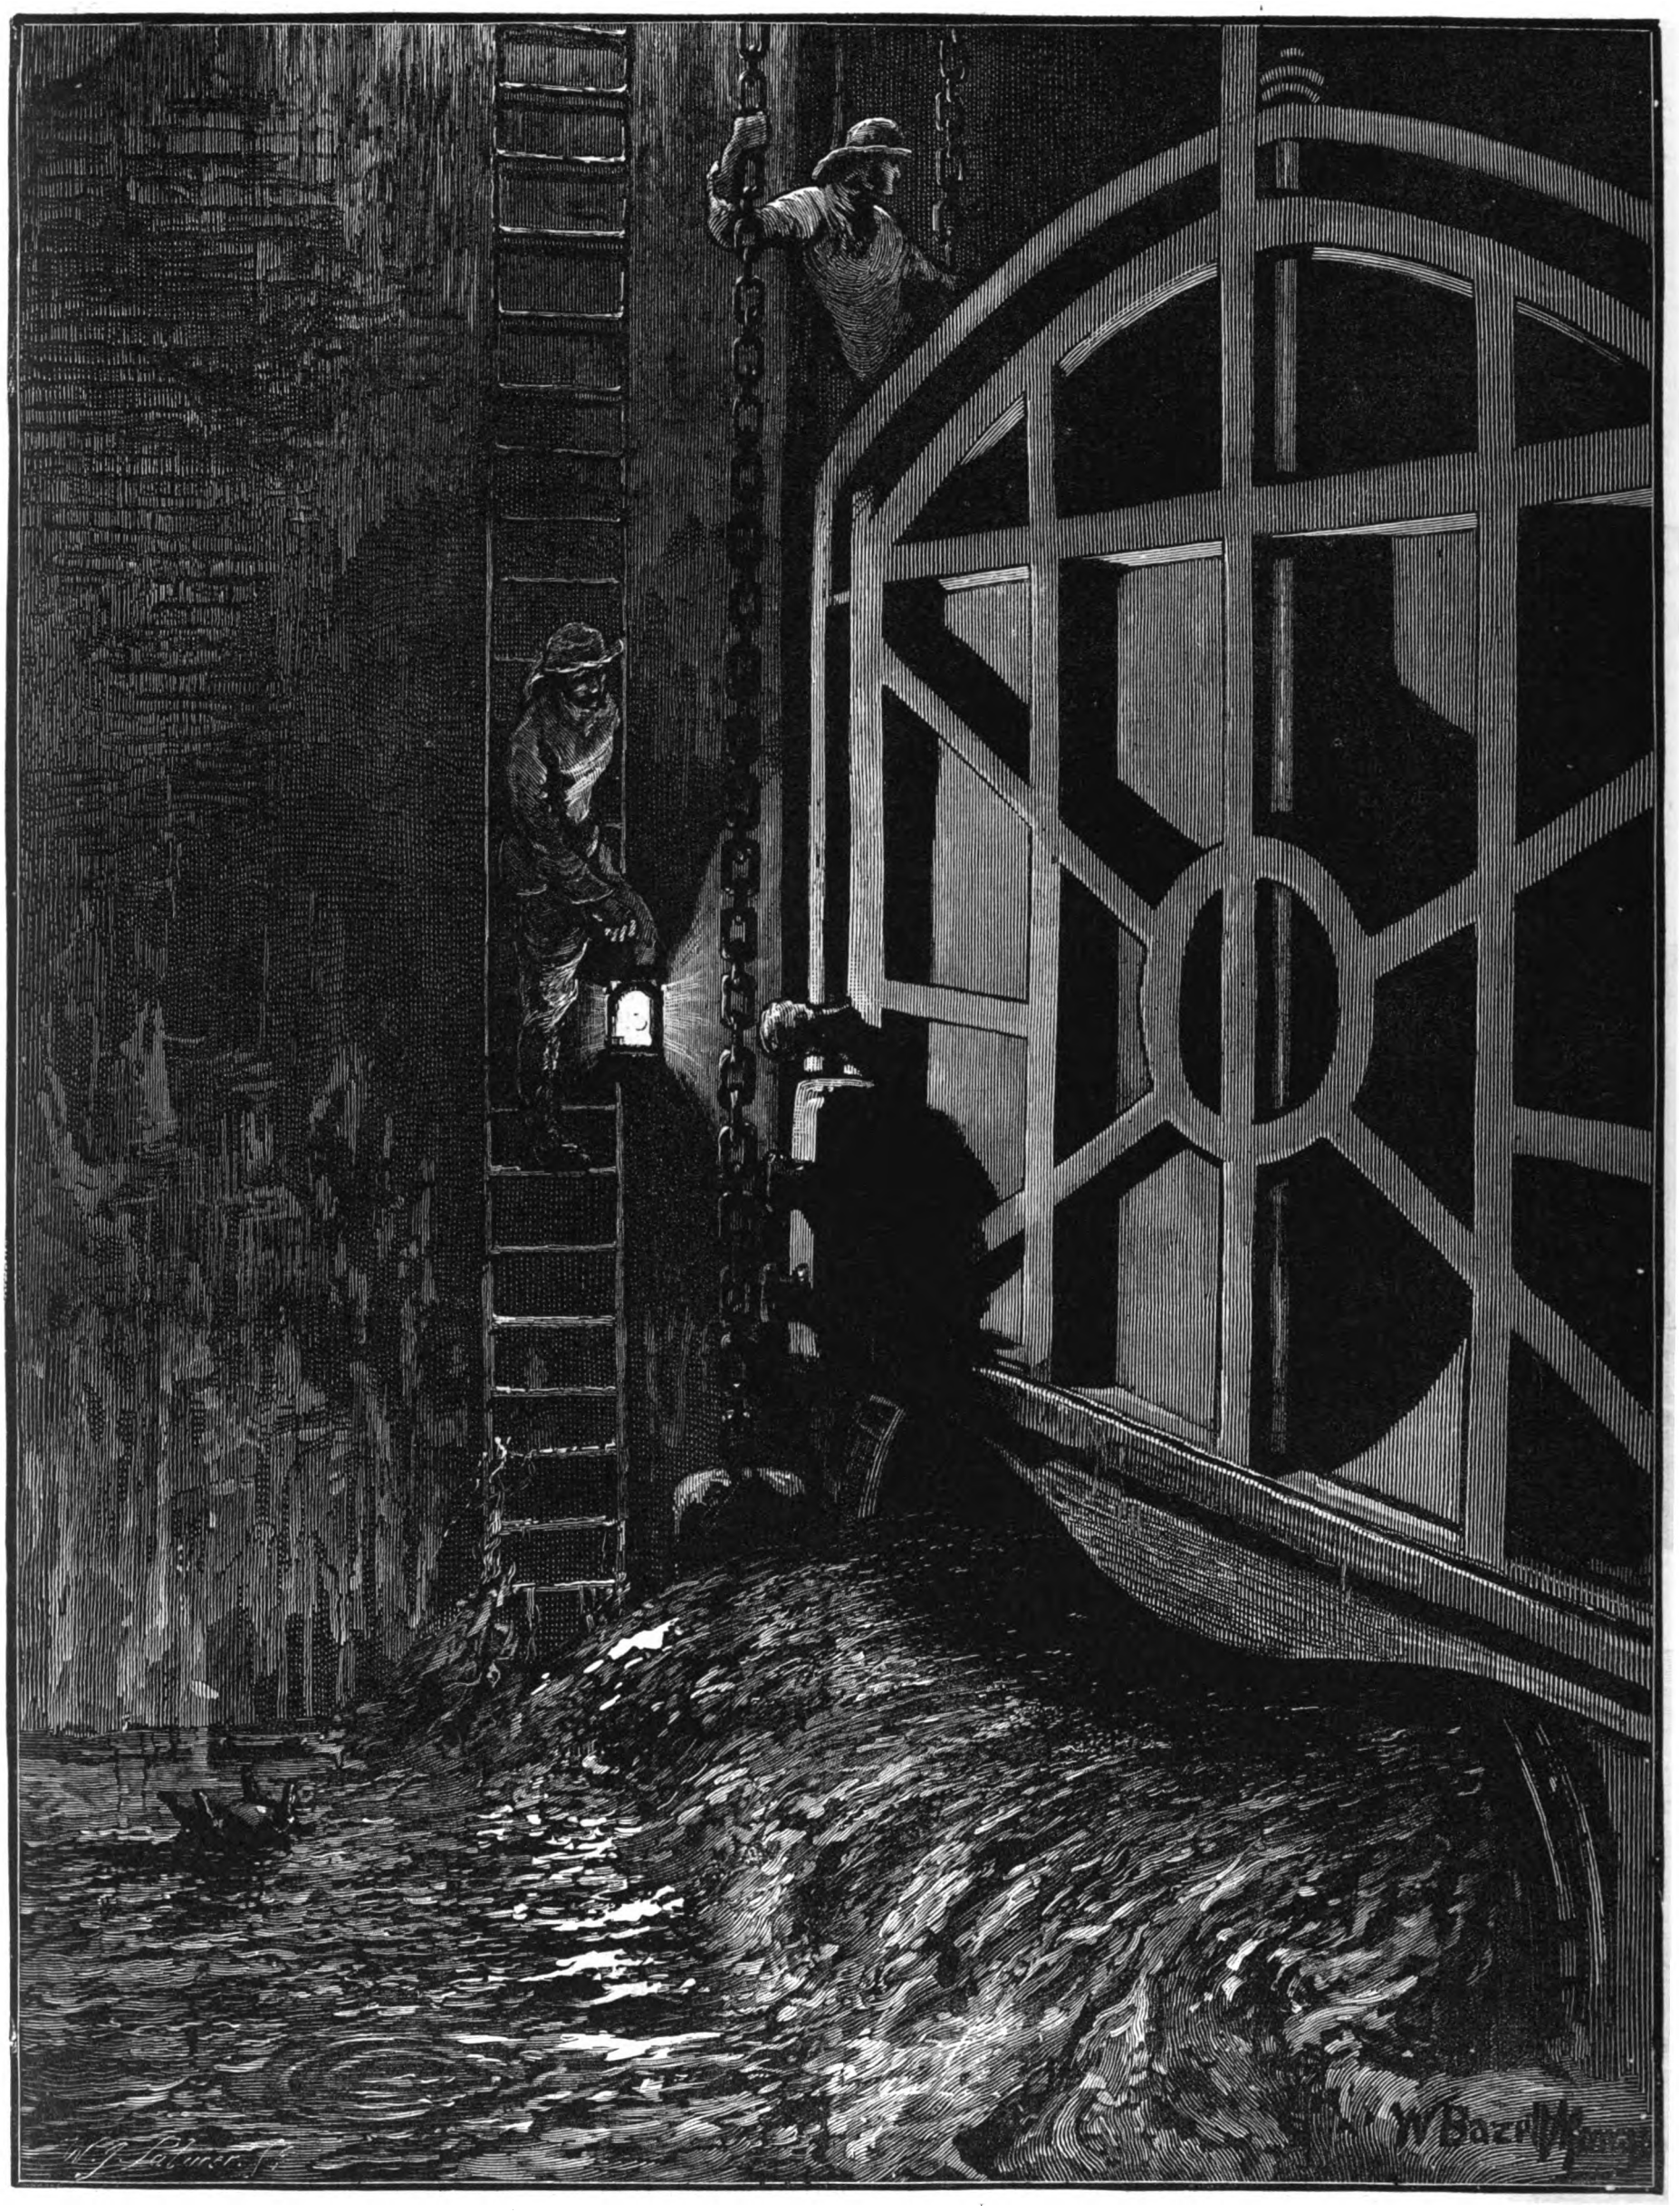
The High-Level Sewer, in Middlesex, is seven miles long, draining an area of ten square miles, including Hampstead, Highgate, Holloway, Hackney, and other northern suburbs. The Middle-Level Sewer has a length of eleven and a half miles, including the branch from Piccadilly crossing Leicester-square and Lincoln's-inn-fields to Gray's-inn-road; and the area which it drains, seventeen and a half square miles, comprises some of the most populous quarters of London. It begins at Kensal-green, and passes on from Notting-hill, along Oxford-street, through Clerkenwell, Shoreditch, and Bethnal-green, to a junction with the High Level at Bow. The size or calibre of these main sewers gradually increases, from 4 ft. or 4 ft. 6 in. diameter, to 9 ft. 6 in. by 12 ft. at the outlet; they are of circular shape, and of stout brickwork, which becomes massive towards the end. The Middle-Level Sewer is carried over the Underground Railway, in one place by a wrought-iron aqueduct of 150 ft. span. The Low-Level Sewer, beginning at Pimlico, goes along the Thames Embankment, and from the City, at Tower Hill, along Commercial-road to Limehouse, and thence to Bow. Its contents are pumped up by the engines at Abbey Mills, a height of thirty-six feet, to the level of the two other main sewers at their discharge into the Northern Outfall; but these find their outlet by gravitation. The Low Level, which was the last main sewer completed, is eight or nine miles long, with four miles of branches, and drains eleven square miles. There is also the Western division, with branch sewers for Chiswick, Fulham, and Acton, and their neighbourhood. The Outfall Sewer, from Bow to Barking Creek, the pumping station at Abbey Mills, and the reservoir at Barking, are engineering works of great magnitude. The use of the reservoir is that the final discharge into the river may be regulated, to be allowed only at the proper hour, according to the state of the tide. This reservoir, which is covered, has an area of nine and a half acres, with nearly seventeen feet depth.

The main drainage of South London is formed on a similar plan, by intercepting sewers at different levels, uniting at Deptford Creek, whence their streams flow eastward in one outfall sewer, through Greenwich and Woolwich, to the Kentish bank of the Thames at Crossness. The main High-Level Sewer begins at Clapham, and there is a branch sewer from Dulwich; these meet at New Cross, draining about twenty square miles. Their excess of storm rainfall waters is poured into Deptford Creek. This, we believe, is a great fault in the system, as Deptford Creek has enough to do, after heavy rains, with its natural duty of carrying off the swollen streams of the Ravensbourne and Quaggy, from Lewisham and Lee; those unfortunate suburbs are hereby victimised, and suffer terribly from occasional floods. The sewage of the High Level is, at Deptford, separated from the surplus water, and is conveyed by four iron pipes across the Creek, to the Outfall Sewer, and on to Crossness. The Low-Level Sewer drains Putney, Battersea, Lambeth, Southwark, Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and Deptford, which mostly lie below the high-tide level of the Thames, but are now rendered perfectly dry, in spite of their porous gravel soil. There is a pumping station at Deptford, by which, as at Abbey Mills, the contents of the Low Level are raised to the Outfall Sewer. The Outfall Sewer, from Deptford to Crossness, is nearly eight miles long, has 11 ft. 6 in. diameter, and lies 16 ft. below the surface of the ground, with a tunnel under Woolwich. At Crossness there is a reservoir, six acres and a half in area, like the Barking Reservoir, with powerful engines to pump and discharge the sewage into the Thames at high tide.

It must be acknowledged that these grand works have proved most effective in punctually removing from the metropolis, day by day, the noxious refuse of dwellings inhabited by above three millions of people. Many Londoners have a disagreeable recollection of the state of this huge city, and of its noble river above the bridges, even so far up as Chelsea or Hammersmith, twenty-five years ago. The health of those living on the south side of the Strand or Fleet-street was positively endangered, and it was perilous to travel by the steam-boats in sultry weather. Now, thanks to the Metropolitan Board of Works, the City and the West Central District are quite as salubrious as any of the suburbs. We believe that no feat of sanitary engineering has been accomplished in any age or country which can for a moment be compared with this achievement. If the New Zealander who shall visit London and "sketch the ruins of St. Paul's," as Macaulay fancied, in A.D. 2500, or thereabouts, will explore the remains of our Main Drainage System, beneath the surface of the desolate streets, he will find something not less worthy to be admired than all that is left of Ancient Rome.

The salary attached to the new office of British Resident in Zululand has been fixed at £600 per annum, and the appointment has been accepted by Mr. W. D. Wheelhouse, who is charged with the duty of "observing the progress of affairs in that country."

A popular demonstration against the game laws took place last Saturday at Exeter on the release from prison of two young men who had undergone a month's imprisonment for killing a hare on land farmed by the father of one of them. A large crowd escorted them to the railway station, and on their arrival at the village in which they reside they received a similar ovation, and were entertained at a public dinner.



Mr. Doyle, one of the Assistant Agricultural Commissioners, stated at a meeting of the Warwickshire Chamber of Agriculture that at whatever place he had visited he had been told that the cost of labour had increased from 50 to 60 per cent within the memory of existing farmers, and that less and far inferior work was now done compared with what used to be done for infinitely less money.

The Government Commissioners appointed to investigate the circumstances attending the late fatal riots in Lurgan issued their report in Dublin on Monday night. They recommend generally an increase in the local police, the addition of Roman Catholic magistrates to the Bench, and the suppression of party processions; but they do not consider the police were at fault in firing upon the mob.

The new life-boat station founded at Southend by the National Life-Boat Institution was inaugurated on the 13th. This life-boat is intended to assist the crews of vessels which may go ashore on the Nore and Leigh Middle Sands, and other outlying banks at the entrance to the Thames. The cost of the life-boat establishment has been partly defrayed by thousands of young children.

At the annual meeting of the Royal Manchester and Liverpool Agricultural Society, held at Warrington on the 13th inst., it was decided, by 46 votes against 38, to hold the next show at Crewe, a counter-proposition having been made in favour of Chester. The report of the council showed that the society was in a flourishing condition, there being a surplus on last year's transactions of £1000.

BUDDHIST REMAINS IN AFGHANISTAN.

Our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, who was lately accompanying the head-quarters of Lieutenant-General Sir S. Browne, with Major Cavagnari and the Political Mission to Afghanistan, in the Khyber and the Cabul Valley, has already contributed to Oriental archæology some valuable notices of the remains of Buddhist sacred architecture and sculpture, especially in the neighbourhood of Jellalabad. We have published some Engravings of these objects drawn by him, with his descriptions and comments, to which are now added the following with reference to six Illustrations given in a page of our present Number:—

The Khaista, or Beautiful, Tope.—This is the most perfect of the many topes yet remaining in the Jellalabad Valley. On two sides the remains of the pilasters on the square base can still be seen; and, on the circular part above, the pilasters and arches are tolerably complete all round. From this monument it is evident that the topes of Afghanistan had the form of towers rather than mere domes. It will be seen here, also, what a long neck the structure had, above which was the dome, unfortunately now gone. This tope stands on the base of the Siah Koh range, near to Daronta. It seems to have belonged to a very large Buddhist establishment, for there are the remains of a large tank about 400 feet square on the level ground, and the Ummer Kheyl Tope, one of the largest in the valley, belongs to this important group. The circular part of this last tope is one hundred feet diameter, while the Khaista is only fifty feet.

Tope at Hada, near Jellalabad.—The remains at Hada are all in a very ruinous condition. There is a large mass of this tope still standing, but of its outer skin of architecture nothing remains. Masson calls this the "Tope Kelan," or the great tope; he found in this monument no less than 202 silver coins and seven gold pieces, besides rings, ornaments, and precious stones. There is a square ridge all round this formed of mounds, eight of them in all, which may have been small topes round the large one.

Ashock Boorjé.—It is difficult to say whether this is an ancient work or not. Its outer surface is modern, but I suspect that it covers an old tower or tope. It is on the south side of the site of Nagarahara, the old Buddhist capital of Jellalabad, and may have formed part of its defences.

Figures on the Ahin Posh Tope.—While carrying on the excavations at this tope I came upon five figures in plaster, sitting on the upper moulding of the square base. They had been painted in a bright yellow colour, and one of the figures had still some of the tint remaining. Instead of a circular nimbus, a form was given from a lotus-leaf, the lotus being intimately connected with Buddhist symbolism.

Buddhist Caves at Makhan Khan, near Jellalabad.—This is a very small group of caves, south of Jellalabad, close on the road to Hada. These caves, like most others, have been used as houses, and are blackened by the smoke of fires. Fragments of plaster are still visible on them, and on the plateau over the caves are the usual accompanying mounds, being the remains of monasteries and Topes.

The Bara Bat Tope, near Jellalabad.—This is on the left bank of the Cabul River, about three miles below the Pheel Khana Tope and caves. It has a course of pilasters, in which the Greek character of the Corinthian capitals, as well as of the cornices, is unmistakable. There is an arch only between the pilasters at the southern point of the Tope. Thick fragments of plaster still remain on the surface.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"Linger not Long" (Messrs. R. Cocks and Co.) is a pretty song, by J. H. Croxall, in a tripping six-eight measure, with an effective intermediate change to the minor key. A moderate compass of voice will suffice for its execution. Messrs. Cocks and Co. have also recently issued some pianoforte music which may be found useful for teaching purposes. "Faith," "Hope," and "Charity," by Eugen Woycke, are three graceful pieces, of moderate difficulty, pleasing in style, and calculated for the improvement of young executants, the leading passages being carefully fingered. The same firm also issues Beethoven's favourite Waltzes, carefully arranged as pianoforte duets by G. F. West.

"Spanish Serenade" ("Pedro's Sweet Guitar"). Chappell and Co. This is a very characteristic song, by Edward T. Terry, who has successfully reflected the national tone. A violin accompaniment is added to that for the pianoforte, the occasional employment of the "pizzicato" for the former instrument giving a good imitation of the sounds of a guitar. The voice part is easy, and requires but a limited compass.

"Summer Evening" (Weekes and Co.) is a very pleasing song, by Alfred Lewis. The melody is essentially vocal, flows smoothly, and lies within the most ordinary compass of voice.

"Honest Heart" (Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.) is a song by Lady Lindsay of Balcarres to words by Sir Coutts Lindsay. The melody is bold and striking in character, and, although simple, is not commonplace. The compass is little beyond an octave. From the same publishers we have "Biondina's Song," a graceful setting, in an easy style, by Charles Salaman, of words by M. C. Salaman. The compass required is little more than an octave. "Rondo Scherzando," from the same publishers, is a spirited and well-written pianoforte piece by Maud V. White, another publication by the same firm being "The Vade-Mecum, a Practical Handbook for the Piano," by T. Sydney Smith. Within the space of fourteen pages are comprised scale exercises, preludes, canons, and other pieces, with copious fingering, constituting an excellent course of study for the command of mechanical difficulties.

"The Young Vocalist" (Griffith and Farran) is a series of twelve pieces, selected from the works of Mozart, Weber, Mendelssohn, Spohr, and other composers, by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew, and arranged in an easy manner for the use of children too young to sing operatic songs, and beyond the age for mere nursery jingle. The words have been taken from various poets, and the book is a suitable present for young people.

Another juvenile presentation book, similar to that just referred to, is a series of twelve of "Æsop's Fables," versified and adapted to popular tunes by L. Williams. Mr. B. Williams, of Paternoster-row, is the publisher.

Among the interesting series of "Albums" recently issued by Messrs. Enoch and Sons is the first volume of a selection from the pianoforte works of Joachim Raff. The pieces included in the publication now referred to are a "Barcarolle," "Nocturne," "Minuet," "Cavatina," "Bolero," "Valse," "Gavotte," "Berceuse," and "Landler." Each of these movements has the distinctive individuality which characterises most of the numerous productions of one of the most remarkable instrumental composers of the day. This selection will give a good general notion of Raff's powers; the extracts ranging from his op. 8 to op. 162.

Dean Stanley opened a new coffee-tavern last Saturday, situated in Wardour-street, Oxford-street, and in the course of a brief address advocated the establishment of such resorts.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

"Don Giovanni" was given on Thursday week, with a cast mostly similar to that of previous occasions. Madame Marie Roze as Donna Anna sang with much dramatic power and genuine earnestness, and Madame Trebelli rendered the music of Zerlina with the same grace and charm as heretofore. Mdlle. Lido gained another step in advance by her effective performance as Donna Elvira, an arduous part which is not always so efficiently sustained. Signor Rota and Signor Brignoli were again respectively the Don Giovanni and Don Ottavio, Signor Susini the Leporello, Signor Zoboli the Masetto, and Mr. Pyatt Il Commendatore. Between the acts of the opera a divertissement was introduced in which Senorita Fuensanta and the Royal Spanish Ballet Troupe from Madrid made their first appearance in England, with great success. The lady is a powerful and accomplished dancer, and her several solos were executed with great skill and neatness. Her coadjutors are also well trained in their art; and the dances of combination, and the various groupings, with the national costumes, are highly picturesque and effective. The ballet is of moderate length, and will, doubtless, prove attractive. The production of "Oberon" was again postponed, from last week to yesterday (Friday) evening. "Le Nozze di Figaro," with a familiar cast, was substituted for it; "Aïda" was repeated on Saturday morning and "Carmen" in the evening.

This week is announced as the last but one of the season. "Aïda" was given again on Monday, with Madame Pappenheim's first assumption of the title-character, in which that artist displayed much genuine dramatic power. "Carmen" was repeated on Tuesday, "Faust" on Wednesday, and "Robert le Diable" on Thursday.

At the seventh of this series of Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace Miss Carlotta Elliott made her first appearance, and produced a very favourable impression by her rendering of Rossini's difficult aria "Bel raggio," and two songs by Macfarren. Mr. E. Lloyd was the other vocalist. Mdlle. Anna Mehlig played with great effect Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor, and the programme included well-known orchestral pieces. Mdlle. Mehlig was again the pianist at last Saturday's concert, at which she gave a very fine interpretation of Mendelssohn's first pianoforte concerto (in G minor), and of two studies by Chopin, and a valse caprice by Rubinstein. On this occasion a new symphony by Joachim Raff was played for the first time. It is his eighth work of the kind, and is entitled 'Frühlingsklänge" ("Spring Sounds"). The symphony consists of four divisions—"Frühlings Ruckkehr," "In der Walpurgisnacht," "Mit dem ersten Blumenstraus," and "Wanderlust." The work contains many beauties—especially in the third and best movement—and is throughout instrumented with masterly skill; but, as a whole, is somewhat diffuse and over-prolonged. We shall doubtless have an early opportunity of again speaking of this new work by one of the prominent composers of the day. Mr. Santley was the vocalist at this concert, the programme of which concluded with the beautiful ballet music from Gounod's "Polyeucte."

Mr. John Boosey opened his fourteenth season of the London Ballad Concerts at St. James's Hall this week with a programme of strong interest and variety, as to the selection and the executants. Of the performances we must speak next week.

At this week's Monday Popular Concert Mr. Charles Hallé was the pianist, his solo having been Beethoven's sonata in E flat (from op. 29), which he played with his accustomed finish and refinement. The programme was otherwise also of a familiar character, Madame Norman Néruda having been the leading violinist, and Signor Pezze the violoncellist, in lieu of Signor Piatti, who was indisposed. Miss Hope Glenn sang with great effect Haydn's "Spirit song," a "lied" by Schubert, and an aria by Carissimi. Mr. Zerbini was the accompanist.

Miss Ockleston and Miss Hopekirk gave a recital on Wednesday afternoon at Willis's Rooms. These ladies are accomplished pianists, and their programme on Wednesday comprised solos for each and duets for the two.

Messrs. Carrodus and E. Howell gave the first of three subscription concerts of chamber music at the Beethoven Rooms on Thursday evening, when their programme included an interesting selection. The quartet party consisted of the gentlemen just named, Mr. Nicholson as second violin, and Mr. Burnett as viola. Mr. Walter Bache was the pianist, and Mr. Lewis Thomas the vocalist.

Smart's dramatic cantata "The Bride of Dunkerron," the words by Frederick Enoch, with orchestral accompaniment, and a miscellaneous selection, formed the bill of fare at the monthly concert, yesterday, of the Grosvenor Choral Society, of which Mr. Henry Baker is the hon. conductor.

Mrs. Weldon announces her benefit concert for to-day (Saturday), at St. James's Hall, with a varied programme, including Gounod's cantata "Gallia" and Sir J. Benedict's overture, "Die Minnesinger" (conducted by the composer), besides other instrumental pieces and vocal music.

The second concert of the ninth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society takes place next Thursday evening, when Haydn's "Creation" is to be performed, with Mrs. Osgood, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli as the solo vocalists.

An interesting concert (orchestral and vocal) is to be given on Tuesday evening, Dec. 2, at St. James's Hall, by Herr Henschel, in aid of the Victoria Hospital for Children at Chelsea. The programme comprises Brahms's first symphony (in C minor), and his "Triumphlied" for double chorus and orchestra; Chopin's Fantasia on Polish National Songs for pianoforte and orchestra; and Herr Henschel's psalm, "Out of the darkness" (the two last for the first time in England). The band and chorus will number 300 performers; Mdlle. Janotha will be the solo pianist, and the performances will be conducted by Mr. Barnby and Herr Henschel. The concert is under the patronage of Princess Louise.

We have received from Mr. Albert Hildesheimer, of 41, Jewin-street, E.C., some packets of very pretty Christmas cards. One set, containing four floral designs, is particularly good. They represent Water-Lilies and Forget-Me-Nots, Narcissus, Snowdrops and Yellow Holly, and Hawthorn. They are accompanied by some pleasing verses by F. E. Weatherley.

A Promenade Concert, in connection with the Fancy Dress Ball of the previous day, was given at the Dome, Brighton, yesterday week by the Coldstream Guards, under the direction of Mr. F. Godfrey. It was a complete success, the company present numbering over 1500.—The annual distribution of prizes awarded by Government to the pupil teachers of the several Board Schools, as well as for prizes given by the Board, took place the same evening. It was stated that the pupil teachers who had passed well and fairly had increased from fourteen and twenty-one last year to sixteen and thirty-one this year, whilst the grant given as prizes by the Government had increased from £90 to £104.

THEATRES.

A third Adelphi matinée has introduced to the boards another candidate for histrionic honours. Miss Elaine Verner comes heralded as a pupil of Mr. George Neville, and she makes her début as Juliet in Shakspeare's world-renowned tragedy. A less ambitious rôle would have been a surer test of the lady's actual attainments. Of Juliet, we remember hearing it remarked by an old and, in his day, celebrated actor, that the character could never be successfully essayed by an actress till she was sixty, and then she was too old to look it. Without positively endorsing this judgment, which would place the part without the pale of adequate representation, we are prepared to admit that it is one of the most difficult assumptions in the repertoire of the drama, and altogether beyond the reach of the most highly-gifted and ambitious neophyte. Miss Verner has the essential qualifications of youth, dark eyes, and a handsome countenance, which enable her at the outset to make a favourable impression upon her audience. Of her acting it would be unfair at present to attempt anything in the shape of absolute criticism. Suffice it that on Saturday last she manifested aptitudes which, with time, study, and perseverance, may develop into positive powers, and her impersonation become the realistic embodiment of the poet's grand ideal. The débutante was well received by a numerous and intelligent audience. The Mercutio of Mr. Charles Harcourt was a highly finished performance, and as Romeo Mr. E. H. Brooke acted with much care and discrimination. Mr. James Fernandez gave an effective and intelligent rendering of Friar Laurence. The Nurse of Miss Emily Thorne was well conceived and cleverly enacted. The Lady Capulet of Mrs. C. H. Stephenson is also deserving of recognition. The rest of the characters were adequately represented.

At the New Sadler's Wells Sheridan Knowles's play of "The Hunchback" has succeeded the spectacular production of "Rob Roy." The Islingtonians are thus treated to a slice of their favourite fare, the legitimate drama, and they evince the same alacrity as formerly to accept the dainty sample presented to them. Miss Isabel Bateman makes her first appearance at this theatre as Julia, a character originally enacted by Fanny Kemble, and which requires on the part of the artiste much tragic and realistic power to give it due significance. In the earlier scenes Miss Bateman, by her natural rendering of the innocent country damsel, secured the goodwill and sympathies of her audience. In the subsequent portions her acting was characterised by much discrimination. Her happiest efforts, however, were in the fourth act, where the forlorn Julia, now the affianced bride of the Earl of Rochdale, discovers her former lover in the person of his Lordship's secretary, and, bursting all the restraints of prudence and convention, her passion asserts itself in the face of obstacles. The lady was recalled at the close of the act, and received from her admirers a cordial greeting. A notable feature in the cast is the Helen of Miss Virginia Francis, who also makes her first appearance at this theatre. This lady possesses all the qualifications for a popular comédienne; the expression of her features is provocative of a titter, and her vivacity, naïveté, and general bonhomie are of the most enjoyable kind. Her spirituelle acting in the two great scenes with Modus secured for her in both instances an enthusiastic recall to the footlights. Her success was so marked as to justify our chronicling it as a decided "hit," and we opine she will become one of the bright particular stars of this little theatrical firmament. As Master Walter, Mr. Charles Kelly, though somewhat ponderous, and in the last act slightly wanting in energy, was generally effective. Mr. Walter Bentley gave an earnest and intelligent rendering of Sir Thomas Clifford. The Modus of Mr. F. W. Wyndham and the Lord Tinsel of Mr. Robert Lyons were both clever portraitures. The other characters do not call for particular specification.

The Folly has reopened under the auspices of Mr. J. L. Toole, who now appears in the double capacity of actor and manager. The popularity of this gentleman has gone on steadily increasing from the date of his first appearance at the Lyceum Theatre, under the management of Mr. Charles Dillon, down to the present time. He must now be regarded as the most successful delineator of grotesque comedy the stage possesses. Mr. Toole, wisely or not we cannot say, has chosen to inaugurate his new venture with two of his own well-known assumptions rather than with a fresh novelty. Hence we find him luxuriating in the character of Chawles, in Byron's favourite comedy, "A Fool and His Money," and repeating, with unabated vigour, the comicalities of "Ici On Parle Français." To expatiate on the merits of these performances would, at this late date, be superfluous. Suffice it that an enthusiastic greeting testified to the actor's unbounded popularity, and that those little exaggerations which occasionally characterise his impersonations were, as usual, the points the most richly enjoyed by the audience. On the first night the new manager made a speech, in which he thanked the audience for their earnest co-operation. Mr. Toole is at present supported by his provincial company; but we doubt not that in promised forthcoming novelties a stronger cast will be offered to the public.

The revival of the "Beaux Stratagem" at the Imperial has been preceded by a new and original comedietta, in one act, by Mr. Claude Templar, entitled "Luck." We shall not attempt to give a synopsis of the plot, which is not of the most intelligible nature. Suffice it that the story turns on the peculiarities of one Timothy Robbinson, whose mind is imbued with a number of old-womanish superstitions, and who believes in luck as a potent agency. The cast is a good one, including the names of Mr. Lionel Brough, Mr. Bannister, Mr. Kyrle Bellew, Miss Ellen Meyrick, and Miss Emily Miller. On the occasion of the first representation the author was summoned to the footlights at the fall of the curtain.

Mr. Gooch, of the Princess's Theatre, has consented to give a morning performance of "Drink" to-day (Saturday) on behalf of the Royal General Theatrical Fund.

St. Leonard's Established Church in Edinburgh was destroyed by fire early on Sunday morning. It is supposed that the fire was caused by the overheating of the stove. The church was opened about seven months ago.

The Session of the Danubian Commission was opened at Galatz last Saturday, under the presidency of Baron Hans, the Austro-Hungarian delegate. In the evening a dinner was given, at which twenty-two notables and the foreign Consuls were present.

The Duke of Bedford's tenantry in the parishes of Thorney, Sibson, Wansford, and Thornhaugh, to the number of 110, have presented to his Grace a handsome album, containing an illuminated address thanking him for his gift of half a year's rent to his tenants.—At the half-yearly rent audit on Saturday at Charleville, Mr. J. Rice, Crown Solicitor, of Fermoy, land agent to Captain John Evans, of Anerley, Surrey, remitted from 10 to 20 per cent off the half-yearly rents on that gentleman's county Cork estates. Mr. Rice also informed the tenants that Captain Evans intends expending £3000 to £4000 on the drainage and improvement of the lands during the coming winter.

OBITUARY.

BARONESS BRAYE.

The Right Honourable Henrietta, Baroness Braye, died at Stanford Hall, Leicestershire, on the 14th inst., in her seventieth year. Her Ladyship was youngest and last surviving daughter of Sarah, Baroness Braye, in whose favour the abeyance of the ancient barony of Braye was terminated Oct. 3, 1839. Sarah, Baroness Braye, was only daughter of Sir Thomas Cave, Bart., and wife of Henry Otway, Esq., of Cas le Otway, in the county of Tipperary. At her death, Feb. 21, 1862, the barony again fell into abeyance among her daughters, the Hon. Maria Otway-Cave, the Hon. Mrs. Anne Arnold, Catherine, Countess Beauchamp, and Henrietta, Baroness Braye, the lady whose death we record. The three eldest of these daughters died without issue, whereupon the youngest inherited the title originally created by writ of summons in the time of Henry VIII. Lady Braye married, Sept. 24, 1844, the Rev. Edgell Wyatt-Edgell, formerly Vicar of North Cray, Kent, and had issue one daughter, the Hon. Frances Catherine Sarah Wyatt-Edgell, a nun, and three sons—viz., 1, Captain the Hon. Edmund Verney Wyatt-Edgell, 17th Lancers, who was killed at Ulundi; 2, Henry Adrian, who died under age, 1866; and 3, Alfred Thomas Townshend, present Lord Braye, who was born July 23, 1849, and married, Sept. 9, 1873, Cecilia Harriet, daughter of the late Gerard Walmesley, of Westwood Park, Lancashire, by whom he has a son, Verney Adrian, born 1874, and a daughter, Cecilia Violet.

MR. SAUNDERS, OF WENNINGTON HALL.

William Allen Francis Saunders, Esq., of Wennington Hall, Lancashire, and Black Torrington, Devon, J.P. and D.L., died at the first-named seat on the 12th inst. He was born Aug. 22, 1818, the only son of Richard Saunders, Esq., of Fair Lawn, Lancashire, by Anna Maria, his wife, daughter of John Leaper-Newton, Esq, of the Manor House, Mickleover, Derby. Mr. Saunders was educated at Rugby, and at Trinity College, Oxford. In 1862 he was High Sheriff of Lancashire, which county he unsuccessfully contested in 1864. He married, Dec. 30, 1841, Dorothy, daughter of the late Josias Morley, Esq., of Beamsley Hall and Marrick Park, Yorkshire, and leaves issue three sons and two daughters.

The deaths have also been announced of—

Henry Cowper, Esq., J.P. for Sussex, on the 12th inst., at Mundham House, near Chichester, aged eighty-two.

Miss Isabella Rosa Curzon Fitzroy Kelly, third daughter of Lord Chief Baron Kelly, at Hyères, in her nineteenth year.

Admiral Joseph Sherer, K.H., on the 8th inst., at 2, Les Châlets, St. Heliers, Jersey, aged eighty-one. He attained the rank of Admiral in 1875.

Miss Somerville, only surviving daughter of William Somerville, Esq., and his wife, the late celebrated authoress, Mrs. Mary Somerville, at Florence, aged sixty-five.

Major Herbert Wood, R.E., recently, in India. He accompanied the Russian army in the Khivan campaign, and was recently engaged on the Indian canal schemes.

The Rev. Dr. Gillam, parish Minister of Inchinnan, Renfrewshire, a well-known divine of the Scottish Church, and in 1873 Moderator of the General Assembly.

The Rev. Edward Bagot, M.A., LL.D., on the 6th inst., at Bournemouth, aged sixty-two. He was second son of the late Edward Bagot, Esq., J.P., of Kildoon, county Kildare.

Charles Whittingham, Esq., late Madras Civil Service, eldest son of the late Lieutenant-General Sir Samford Whittingham, K.C.B., K.C.H., on the 10th inst., at 2, Southwick-place, Hyde Park, aged sixty-six.

Elizabeth, Lady Philipps, relict of Sir Thomas Philipps, Bart., of Middle Hill, Worcestershire, and Thirlestaine House, Cheltenham, on the 5th inst., at Cheltenham. Her Ladyship was eldest of the four daughters and coheirs of the Rev. William John Mansel, eldest son of the late Sir William Mansel, eighth Baronet, of Ischoed, Carmarthenshire.

James Starke, Esq., J.P., F.S.A., of the Scotch Bar, formerly a Judge of the Supreme Court, Ceylon, aged eighty-one. He held the judgeship from 1840 to 1853, and was author of various papers on historical and antiquarian subjects. Mr. Starke married, in 1835, Hamilton, daughter of Major James Gibson, and leaves, with other issue, James Gibson Starke, M.A., F.S.A., Judge of the District Court, Jamaica.

The Rev. Francis Cradock Twemlow, of Doddlespool and Peatswood, Staffordshire, on the 12th inst., suddenly, aged sixty-one. He was second son of the late Francis Twemlow, Esq., of Betley Court, in the county of Stafford, by Elizabeth, his wife, daughter of Sir Thomas Fletcher, first Baronet, of Betley. He married, Jan. 11, 1848, Charlotte, daughter of R. Wilbraham, Esq., of Rode, Cheshire, and had a son and a daughter.

The Hon. Charles Henry Danvers-Butler, late of the 9th Foot, on the 4th inst., at Honfleur. He was born Nov. 22, 1844, the younger son of the Hon. Charles Augustus Danvers-Butler, by Letitia, his wife (now married to the Rev. George Napleton Treweeke, Rector of Swithland, Leicestershire), youngest daughter of the late Colonel Freese, and was brother to the present Earl of Lanesborough. He married, July 20, 1872, Alice, younger daughter of George Ward, Esq., of Redditch, Worcestershire.

George Edward Wilson, Esq., of Dallam Tower, Westmorland, J.P. and D.L., aged sixty-four. He was eldest son of Colonel George Smyth (afterwards Wilson), by Sarah, his wife, elder daughter and coheiress of Daniel Wilson, Esq., of Dallam Tower. He served as High Sheriff of Westmorland, 1849. Mr. Wilson was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He married, March 3, 1842, Gertrude Mary, daughter of William Hulton, Esq., of Hulton Park, Lancashire, and leaves issue.

The Rev. Henry Legge, of Mareland and Bramdean, Hants, Rector of East Lavant, on the 8th inst., at the Rectory, aged seventy-six. He was third son of the late Hon. and Rev. Augustus George Legge, Prebendary of Winchester, and Rector of Wonston and North Waltham, Hants, by his wife, Honora, niece of William, first Lord Bagot, and was grandson of William, second Earl of Dartmouth. He married, May 4, 1830, Elizabeth Louisa, eldest daughter of the late Rear-Admiral Stair Douglas, and had four sons and one daughter.

The steam-ship Quebec, which arrived in the Mersey on the 13th inst., in addition to a large cargo of live stock, apples, onions, &c., brought 3000 lb. of fresh salmon, which arrived in splendid order.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

M D B (New Bond-street).—We prefer the solutions given in full. If you attempt to condense them you may be misunderstood.

POLICHINELLE.—Stalemate is a drawn game. There is no better work for beginners than Staunton's "Handbook," published by Bohn, Covent-garden. It should, however, be studied in conjunction with a more modern treatise upon the openings.

TRIAL (Glasgow).—The nearer the approach to naturalness of position the greater the merit of the problem. A position that could not possibly occur in a game of chess is not a chess problem, and is, of course, inadmissible.

J S (Middlesbro').—There is no charge for the acknowledgment of correct solutions.

T R R (Munich).—Your suggestion shall be carefully considered.

H T Y (Staplehurst). The problems are very acceptable.

D A (Dublin).—Both problems are marked for insertion.

THOMAS THE RHYMER.—No. 1863 cannot be solved by 1. Kt to Q 2nd.

HEREWARD (Oxford).—We are sincerely sorry to hear of your prolonged illness. The correction of your problem is noted, and you shall have a report next week.

J H A H (Bangor).—A very pretty variation, and perfectly correct.

C E T (Bristol).—Thanks; the problem shall be examined.

J G F (Ramsgate).—Your letter anticipated our purpose of recommending you to withdraw all your problems for re-examination. Is it possible that you have kept the position described in your letter for two years without observing the solution by 1. Kt to Q 4th? A competitor in a problem tourney should not address the judges on the subject of the competition.

HON. SEC. BATH CHESS CLUB.—Thanks for the report. The rules of the British Chess Association will be found in the "Book of the Congress (1862)," published by Bohn, Covent-garden.

E H H (Epsom).—The games are interesting, and they shall appear shortly.

EAST MARDEN.—Your contribution to the Evans fund—5s. in stamps—will be forwarded to Mr. Parkinson, Rock Cottage, Ventnor.

ALPHA.—We contrive to find time to look at contemporary problems, so there would have been no trouble in complying with your request. You should have tried again; "fair" is a very favourable verdict upon a first attempt.

B G L (Liverpool-road).—Very good. If found correct, it shall soon appear.

J A (Calcutta).—The corrections of your problems are noted. There is no market for chess problems.

G B (Cheadle).—We are obliged for the report. There was no game inclosed.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 1862 received from H N Morgan, Orazio, C B Carlon, Ryecroft, L G Batson, H A Moes, Dr F St, H J Baker, D A (Dublin), J M F (Dublin), B G L, and Royal Mail-Steamer "Warwick Castle," off Madeira.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM No. 1863.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Kt takes Q B P	*Kt to Kt 4th (dis. ch)
2. Kt to Q Kt 7th. Mate.

* If Black play 1. Q to Q 4th (ch), White mates by 2. Kt to K 4th; if 1. Q takes Kt, then 2. R to K 4th, mate; and if 1. R takes Q, then 2. Kt to Q Kt 3rd, mate.

PROBLEM No. 1866.
By FRANK KIDSON.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in three moves.

A Game played at the Artists' Club, Moscow, between Messrs. MAUDE and SABANIN.—(Evans's Gambit.)

WHITE (Mr. M.)	BLACK (M. S.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to B 4th	B to B 4th
4. P to Q Kt 4th	B takes P
5. P to Q B 3rd	B to B 4th
6. Castles	B to Kt 3rd
7. P to Q 4th	P takes P
8. P takes P	P to Q 3rd
9. Kt to B 3rd	B to Kt 5th
10. B to Q Kt 5th	B to Q 2nd
According to Mr. Gossip, Black gets a good game here by 10. B takes Kt. The move in the text is certainly weak.
11. P to K 5th	P takes P
12. P to Q 5th	Kt to Q 5th
Already Black has a bad game. If he had now retreated the Kt to Kt sq, then follows:—
13. Kt takes P	B takes B
14. Kt takes B, with a strong attack. If, instead of 13. B takes B, Black play 13. Kt to K 2nd, White continues with 14. Q to Kt 4th, &c.
13. B takes B (ch)	Q takes B
14. Kt takes P	Q to B 4th
15. Q to R 4th (ch)	P to B 3rd
16. P takes P	P takes P
17. Kt takes P	Q to Q 2nd
18. R to K sq (ch)	Kt to K 3rd
19. B to R 3rd
White also wins by—
19. R to Q sq	Q to B 2nd
20. Kt to K 8th (ch)	K to B sq
21. Kt to Q 7th (ch)	K to K sq
22. Kt takes B (ch), &c.
19.	R to B sq
20. Q to Kt 4th
A deadly stroke, that leaves Black without resource.
20.	Kt to R 3rd
21. Q R to Q sq	Q to Kt 2nd
22. Kt to R 5th	Q to B 2nd
23. Kt to Kt 5th
All this is very well played by Mr. Maude.
23.	Q to B 4th
24. Kt to Q 6th (ch)	K to K 2nd
25. Kt takes R (ch)	R takes Kt
26. Q to R 4th (ch).
Black resigned.

A subscription has been opened at the Birmingham Chess Club in aid of the widow and family of the late Captain Evans, the amount of each contribution to be not less than a guinea.

The Cheadle Chess Club is a young association, but it has already won a battle against the players of Tunstall, and is now engaged in a correspondence match with Birmingham. Mr. Blackburne visited this club last week, and, playing sans voir against ten of the members, scored seven won games and three draws. In the simultaneous games the champion was even more successful, for he defeated the twenty amateurs opposed to him.

The winter season of the Bath Chess Club was inaugurated last week, and the occasion was signalised by Mr. Thorold playing nine games simultaneously. The nine players scored one win and two draws, and the remainder fell to Mr. Thorold. A handicap tourney has been organised and is now in progress.

High Grove, Eastcote, near Pinner, the residence of Sir H. Hume Campbell, Bart., was destroyed by fire early on Sunday morning. The strong-room, containing plate, was the only room which resisted the fire.

As the Canada, one of the National Company's ships, was being towed down the Thames on Monday afternoon, on the turn of a high ebb tide, she came into collision with Woolwich Pier, and the bridge, upwards of 100 feet in length, connecting the pier with the shore, was destroyed.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Aug. 11, 1879) of the Right Hon. Louisa Catherine, Dowager Countess of Lichfield, late of No. 28, Hill-street, Berkeley-square, who died on Aug. 20 last, was proved on the 11th ult. by the Hon. and Rev. Adelbert John Robert Anson, the son and sole executor, the personal estate being sworn under £7000. Among other legacies, the testatrix bequeaths £50 to H.R.H. the Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein; £100 to the National Orphan Home, Putney; and £100 to the Incumbent of the parish church of Woolwich, to be applied for the benefit of the said parish in any way he may think proper. The residue of her property she gives to her said son.

The will (dated April 11, 1874) of Field Marshal Sir William Rowan, G.C.B., who died on Sept. 26 last, at his residence, No. 9, Gay-street, Bath, was proved at the Bristol district registry on the 22nd ult. by Lieutenant-General Henry Sebastian Rowan, C.B., the nephew, and John George Jarvis, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £18,000.

The Irish probate, granted on the 15th ult. at Belfast, of the will (dated Oct. 24, 1878) of Mr. John Francis Ferguson, J.P., D.L., late of Belfast, in the county of Antrim, who died on Sept. 17 last, to William Crawford, Thomas Douglas Crawford, and Thomas Montgomery, the executors, was sealed in London on the 27th ult., the aggregate personal estate in England, Ireland, and Scotland being sworn under £100,000. The testator makes bequests to his sisters, nephews, nieces, and executors; his plate, furniture, household effects, farming stock, &c., he gives to his nephew, Major John Stephenson Ferguson; and the residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust for his said nephew for life, and then for his children or issue, as he shall appoint.

The will (dated Jan. 25, 1869) with four codicils (dated July 14, 1870; July 5, 1872; and April 19 and May 12, 1875) of Miss Eliza Finch, late of No. 377, Kentish Town-road, who died on the 16th ult., was proved on the 5th inst. by Robert Reid and Raymond Henry Thrupp, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £60,000. The testatrix, among numerous other legacies, bequeaths £100 each to the Kentish Town National School, the St. Pancras Female Charity School, and the St. Pancras Almshouses. As to the residue of her property, she gives one third upon trust for her cousin Mrs. Duncan McCallum, one third to the children of her late cousin Mrs. Allen Park Paton, and one third upon trust for her cousin Mrs. Francis Campbell.

The will (dated Nov. 11, 1862) of Mr. James Carlyle, formerly of Birkenhead, master mariner, but late of No. 22, York-terrace, Regent's Park, shipowner, who died on the 2nd ult., was proved on the 3rd inst. by Mrs. Mary Tait, the sister, the personal estate being sworn under £60,000. Subject to the payment of his just debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, the testator leaves all his property to his said sister, Mrs. Tait.

The will (dated Jan. 9, 1873) with five codicils (dated April 15, 1873; May 17, 1875; Dec. 24, 1878; and Aug. 14 and 26, 1879) of Mrs. Susanna Cater, late of the Liberty of the Town Close, Norwich, who died on Sept. 2 last, was proved on the 11th inst. by Miss Caroline Willins and the Rev. William Harris Cooke, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £25,000. The testatrix bequeaths £300 to the Charity Commissioners upon certain trusts for the poor inhabitants of Trinity Church South District, in the hamlet of Heigham, in the county of the City of Norwich; £319 19s. to the Jenny Lind Infirmary for Sick children, Norwich; £300 each to the Norwich Asylum and School for the Blind, the Governors of the Norwich Dispensary, the Norwich Soup Society, the Norwich Society for the Relief of the Sick Poor at their own homes, the Norwich District Visiting Society, and the Norwich Provident Coal Society; £200 to the Norfolk and Norwich Hospital; and 19 guineas to the Sailors' Home, Great Yarmouth, all free of legacy duty.

The will (dated Nov. 18, 1875) of Mr. Daniel Hayton, late of Oakland House, Upper Tulse Hill, who died on the 20th ult., was proved on the 31st ult. by Richard Pennington, Thomas Richard Farrow, and George Hayton, the son, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £25,000. The testator gives to his executors, Mr. Pennington and Mr. Farrow, £50 each; to Elizabeth Milburn and Isabella Milburn, if in his service at the time of his decease, nineteen guineas each; and all the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for his children in equal shares.

The will (dated May 26, 1875), of Mrs. Charlotte Hutchinson, late of Strathfield House, Lillington, Warwickshire, who died on Sept. 28 last, was proved on the 4th inst by the Rev. Samuel Hopper Powell and Captain Thomas Folliott Powell, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £25,000.

We learn from the Bristol Times that the will of the late Mr. Crosby Leonard, surgeon, of that city, who died on the 13th ult., has been proved in Bristol by his executors, Messrs. E. M. Harwood and Robert H. Warren, the personalty being sworn under £70,000. Amongst other specific and pecuniary legacies are the following:—Bristol City Mission Society, £300; Bristol Auxiliary Baptist Missionary Society, £300; Bristol Education Society (instituted in 1770), £100; Bristol Royal Infirmary, £300—the interest to be awarded as a prize annually to the student who, in the third year of his attendance at surgical practice, supplies the best written reports of ten surgical cases occurring in the wards (not being the surgical Suple prize). The residue goes to the relatives of the deceased.

A wealthy City parish, having of late considerably augmented the income arising out of a charitable bequest, and finding that the proceeds far exceed the provisions of the ancient donor, has decided (according to the City Press) to apply to the Charity Commissioners for authority to make the following donations, viz.:—The London Hospital, £1000; Metropolitan Free Hospital, £500; King's College Hospital, £250; Victoria Park Hospital, £250; Westminster Hospital, £250; and the City of London College, £250; making a total of £2500; in addition to advancing the allowances to the qualified recipients of the charity 25 per cent. The London Hospital has before received from the same source a similar gift of £1000.

Sir N. M. de Rothschild, Bart., M.P., is about to present a new literary and scientific institute to Aylesbury.

The owners and ratepayers of King's Lynn, at a public meeting on Monday, agreed to consent to the Corporation applying to Parliament for a further contribution of £35,000 to be raised by mortgage upon the borough fund towards the dock extension.

The centenary of the birth of the Danish poet Oehlenschlager was celebrated at Copenhagen yesterday week by a commemorative festival, held in the Royal Theatre at noon, at which the Crown Prince, the Ministers, the representatives of the University, the principal authorities, and a numerous public were present. Business was suspended, and the city was decorated with flags. In the evening there were special gala performances at the theatres and a torchlight procession.

ON an average about every seven days
OPPOSITION VELVETEENS to the LOUIS are started and endeavoured to be introduced to public notice, under one name or another. Not only is the style of making up, and the stamping of the name on the back of every yard resorted to
IN ORDER TO DECEIVE,
but they are actually asserted to be equal or superior.
The Proprietor of the LOUIS Velveteen, whilst admitting that "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," cannot but caution the public that the genuine article is stamped Every Yard at the Back the "Louis Velveteen," in plain letters.
Avoid all imitations under whatever names they are offered.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO
has been proved, by its unparalleled success of fifty years, to be the best Dentifrice for procuring White and Sound Teeth. Healthy Gums, and fragrant Breath, being perfectly free from all deleterious and acid compounds, which give a temporary whiteness to the teeth, but ultimately ruin the enamel. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Each Box bears a 3d. Government stamp.

DOES YOUR HAIR TURN GREY?
Then use HERRING'S PATENT MAGNETIC BRUSHES and COMBS. Brushes, 10s. and 15s. each. Combs, 2s. 6d., 5s., 7s. 6d., 10s., 15s., and 20s. each. Pamphlets upon application.—5, Great Marlborough-st., W.; 93 and 95, City-road; and of all Perfumers.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored by this valuable specific to its original shade, after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Used as a dressing, it causes growth and arrests falling. The most harmless and effectual restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials post-free.—E. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

GOLDEN HAIR.—ROBARE'S AUREOLINE produces the beautiful Golden Colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all Perfumers. Wholesale, HOVENDEN and SONS, 5, Great Marlborough-street, W.; and 93 and 95, City-road, E.C. London; Pinaud and Meyer, 37, Boulevard de Strasbourg, Paris; 51, Graben, Vienna; 44, Rue des Longs Chariots, Brussels.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants. It is perfectly harmless, and delicious as sherry. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London. Retailed everywhere.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots where the glands are not decayed. Ask any Chemist for "The Mexican Hair Renewer," price 3s. 6d. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

BREIDENBACH'S PHLOMIS (Sweet Scented). Beautifully fragrant and lasting. 2s. 6d. to 10s. Bottle. BREIDENBACH'S MACASSARINE, invaluable for preserving the growth of the Hair. 1s., 2s. 6d., 5s. Bottle. Of all Chemists and the Makers, 157a, New Bond-street.

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT.
ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT.
ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT (Trade Mark "Anti-fat," registered) is the celebrated REMEDY for CORPULENCY. It is purely vegetable and perfectly harmless. No particular change of diet required. Will reduce a fat person from 2 lb. to 5 lb. a week. It acts upon the food in the stomach, preventing its conversion into fat.

THOMAS FAIRBANK, M.D., of Windsor, Surgeon to her Majesty the Queen, referring to Anti-Fat in the "British Medical Journal" of June 7, 1879, says:—
"I gave some of this extract (Fucus Vesiculosus) to a very corpulent lady, who in three months lost three stones in weight without any change of diet. Since then I have frequently given it for reducing weight, depending on the accumulation of adipose tissue, and have never found it fail. I may state that a patient who has been lately taking it as an anti-fat, and who always suffered very much from rheumatic pains about the body, has been entirely free from such trouble while she has been taking the extract, a fact which she quite independently noted."

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT, sold by Wholesale and Retail Chemists, everywhere. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. Send stamp for pamphlet, entitled "How to get Lean without Starvation."—BOTANIC MEDICINE COMPANY, Sole Proprietors, Great Russell-street Buildings, Great Russell-street, London, W.C.

ALLEN AND HANBURYS' "PERFECTED" COD-LIVER OIL
is not only freer from taste and smell than any oil ever before offered to the public, but it does not give rise to the nausea and eructations which render the use of ordinary oil, even of the finest quality, so repulsive. It is the pure oil, made at A. and Hs.' own factory in Norway, and prepared by an entirely new and special process. It presents in the most effective condition all the invaluable properties of the remedy. All who have difficulty in taking Cod-Liver Oil should insist on having A. and Hs.' "PERFECTED" OIL. Sold only in Impl. Pts., 4s. 9d.; ½ Pts., 2s. 6d.; ¼ Pts, 1s. 6d. Trade mark, a Plough. Of all Chemists; and of Allen and Hanburys, Plough-court, Lombard-street, London.

FER BRAVAIS (Bravais' Dialysed Iron).
Used in every Hospital. Recommended by all Physicians. For Anæmia, Chlorosis, Debility, Exhaustion, &c. FER BRAVAIS (liquid iron in concentrated drops) is the only one entirely free from acid; it is without smell, tasteless, and produces neither constipation, diarrhœa, inflammation, nor fatigue in the stomach; it is besides the only iron that never blackens the teeth. It is the Cheapest of all Ferruginous Compounds, as a bottle of it lasts a month. General Dépôt in Paris, 13, Rue Lafayette (near the Opera); and at all Chemists. Beware of dangerous imitations, and see that the Trade Mark is on every Bottle, which can be had of all Chemists in the United Kingdom. An interesting Pamphlet on "Anæmia and its Treatment," sent free on demand (post-paid).—London: 8, Idol-lane, E.C., R. Bravais and Co. (Dépôt and Agency For Bravais); and at Barclay and Sons', Farringdon-street; Roberts and Co., New Bond-street, and Jousau's, Haymarket.

DR. DE JONGH'S
(KNIGHT OF THE ORDER OF LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM. KNIGHT OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR)
LIGHT-BROWN
COD-LIVER OIL,
proved by nearly thirty years' medical experience to be
THE ONLY COD-LIVER OIL
which produces the full curative effects in
CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST, THROAT AFFECTIONS, GENERAL DEBILITY, WASTING DISEASES OF CHILDREN, RICKETS AND ALL SCROFULOUS DISORDERS.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.
SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, that DR. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

DR. HUNTER SEMPLE,
Physician Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest.
"I have long been aware of the great reputation enjoyed by the LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL introduced into medical practice by Dr. DE JONGH, and have recommended it with the utmost confidence. I have no hesitation in stating my opinion, that it possesses all the qualities of a good and efficient medicine. Its taste is by no means disagreeable, and might even be called pleasant. I have found Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."

JOSEPH J. POPE, Esq., M.R.C.S.,
Late Staff Surg., Army, Prof. of Hygiene, Birkbeck Institution.
"I found during my Indian experience that the worth and character of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL remained unchanged by tropical heat or foreign climate, and it was, from its uniformity of character, particularly adapted for long-continued administration. The value of 'hydro-carbons' in all debilitated states of the system is now becoming thoroughly recognised; and it is, without doubt, from the animal oils and fats, rather than from their vegetable substitutes, that we may hope to derive the surest benefit. The Oil of Dr. DE JONGH places in everyone's reach a reliable and valuable remedy, one that cannot be too widely recognised."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capsuled IMPERIAL Half-Pints, 2s. 6d.; Pints, 4s. 9d.; Quarts, 9s.; by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the World.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1879.

Barely a month ago an alarming rumour as to the material condition of Ireland pretty freely circulated through all parts of the British community. It was said that another Famine was on the eve of making its appearance; that the coming winter would, in all probability, exhibit scenes of suffering comparable only to those of the Potato Famine in the last generation; that the bad seasons of late years had ruinously diminished agricultural property in Ireland; that the tenant-farmers were unable to pay their rents; that the labourers had before them a prospect of utter starvation; and that it behoved the Government, by means of public works on a large scale, to provide employment for the thousands who, without some such resource, would have nothing to fall back upon in their extremity. It has subsequently been proved to the satisfaction of competent and well-informed judges that this was the language rather of excited apprehensions than of the "irresistible logic of facts." There is distress in Ireland, as there is in England. As winter sets in it will, no doubt, be aggravated in both instances, and will put some strain upon the sympathies and energies of those who have aught to spare. Locally, here and there, the aid of Government may be required for the maintenance of life. But the available evidence is far from establishing the conclusion that Ireland is, in this respect, worse off than England. The last harvest, both of grain and potatoes, has, owing to the long spell of recent dry weather, turned out much more favourably than had been anticipated; and there seems reason to hope that the ordinary machinery of the Poor Law, ailed, if necessary, by the generous contributions of the public, will quite suffice to meet the emergency to which the social state of Ireland will not unlikely be exposed.

The rumour, however, to which we have above adverted, afforded an opportunity for political agitation of which Mr. Parnell, M.P., and his not very numerous band of consociates, has taken full advantage. We are not about to prejudge either him or them. The change they advocate will, no doubt, be accurately defined after legal investigation. We leave it, for the present, in all its vagueness. It may have more to say in justification of its claims than we can profess ourselves able to discern; but the mode in which the theory—whatever it may be—is being reduced to practice in Ireland is one which can hardly secure the approving acquiescence of law-abiding citizens. It may be that rents in the Sister Isle are higher than they should be. It may be that, in places, they are exacted with undue severity. But it cannot be that under a system of terrorism any evil of this kind, even if it can be clearly proved to exist, should be combated. Now, upon the surface of the facts before us, it would appear undeniable that a few agitators have taken their stand with a view to wring from the Legislature by physical force, or rather, perhaps, we may say, by threats of physical force, a practical submission to a certain doctrine of rental rights which they are understood to maintain is being attempted to be enforced. We are not, as our readers well know, inclined to look with sympathy upon any abridgment of the liberty of speech. At the same time, they who take upon themselves to work up untutored multitudes to indiscriminate rage, and who countenance in them responsive manifestations tending to a breach of the peace, can hardly expect to enjoy the forbearance which the law, both in England and Ireland, has of late ordinarily exercised in reference to rough-speaking rhetoric.

The Irish Government, it will be observed, has arrested Messrs. Davitt, Davy, and Killen, of Sligo, for words of sedition alleged to have been spoken by them at an anti-rent meeting held at Gurteen some time last week, and are resolved to put them upon their trial. Be the issue what it may, the effect of this act, we fear, is not likely to be permanently beneficial. The public authorities may possess information fully justifying the intervention they have decided upon. It may have become incumbent upon them, whether they liked it or not, to assert the supremacy of the law in the face of the most violent agitation. Nevertheless, the obligation imposed upon them can hardly be otherwise than deeply regretted. Prosecutions for seditious speech have become almost obsolete. Where sedition so expends itself and does not take an organised form it generally passes away into prompt oblivion. In this very case, we are told, that the anti-rent agitation was gradually subsiding—at least, in its proportions of danger. Collision with the law will now give to it a factitious importance. The sympathies of many good men and true, both in Ireland and in England, will be drawn towards the accused. The arrests will possibly provoke secret combinations, and the harsh shocks of opinion and feeling to which they will necessarily tend will not increase in that country respect for the majesty of the law. There is some fear, moreover, lest constitutional freedom should be trenched upon, and lest, along the borderland between authority and liberty, room may be found in which either the one or the other will take more than is customarily due to it.

On the other hand, however, it might prove a mistake to give place to insolent defiance on the part of agitators. There are bounds beyond which it is inexpedient, under certain circumstances, to allow them to pass. Contempt of the law, openly expressed, even upon social subjects, is never without concomitant peril. The spirit of it becomes contagious, the tone of political morality is thereby lowered, and that reverential regard for the embodied will of the nation which is the most conservative element of great communities, appreciably degenerates under treatment which detracts from its unquestioned supremacy. It is often a puzzle to know when to forbear and when to strike. There are evils attendant upon both courses. We should take it, however, to be presumptuous to pronounce upon insufficient data upon so momentous a decision. We must wait awhile and hope the best; but, above all, remembering the past and calmly contemplating the future, we must "possess our souls in patience," and give expression to the charity which "hopeth all things."

THE COURT.

The Queen and Princess Beatrice were present yesterday week at the short service performed at Rebreck by the Rev. Archibald Campbell, upon the occasion of the funeral of John Grant, formerly her Majesty's head-keeper at Balmoral. The gentlemen in waiting, the servants, keepers, a large number of the tenantry, and some of the neighbouring gentry and clergy were also present, and afterwards attended the funeral. The Queen and the Princess have visited the widow. Her Majesty, with Princess Beatrice, attended by General Sir H. Ponsonby, Lord Sackville, and suite, arrived at Windsor shortly before nine o'clock on Wednesday morning from Scotland, having travelled through the night by special North-Western train from Carlisle, which was left at a quarter to twelve. Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice drove at once to the castle to breakfast.

The Queen will be represented at the marriage of King Alfonso at Madrid by Lord Napier of Magdala.

Her Majesty has contributed £350 to the funds of the British Orphan Asylum at Slough on behalf of Princess Beatrice, by which her Royal Highness is entitled to a life presentation of one child to the benefits of this old-established institution.

The Crown Princess of Germany attained her thirty-ninth year yesterday week. The day was celebrated with due honours in England and Scotland, and at Berlin, but the customary Court ceremonies were deferred.

Her Majesty has forwarded to Captain Chard a very handsome ring, as a mark of her appreciation of his heroic conduct at Rorke's Drift. The gift is accompanied with an autograph letter. The ring is a valuable diamond waterkloof.

The Queen has sent £3 to Christy Macpherson, of Skye, who will reach her 107th year on Christmas Day. Her case had been brought under her Majesty's notice by Dr. Spence Jefferies, medical officer of Sleat, where Christy resides.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales terminated his visit to Sir Richard Wallace at Sudbourne Hall, Suffolk, yesterday week, and came to London. His Royal Highness left Marlborough House on Monday on a visit to Lord Hastings at Melton Constable, Norfolk. The Prince travelled from St. Pancras station by the ordinary 2.35 p.m. train to Wymondham, whence he proceeded by special train, viâ Dereham, to Great Ryburgh, and drove thence to Melton Constable. The Princess, with her daughters, has remained at Sandringham. Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg and Prince Louis of Battenberg returned to Sandringham on Saturday last from visiting Mr. Sykes, M.P., at Brantingham. On Sunday the Princess, with Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg and Prince Louis of Battenberg, attended Divine service at St. Mary Magdalene's Church, in the park. The Rev. F. E. Hervey, M.A., Rector of Sandringham, officiated. Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg left Sandringham on Monday, and proceeded to Kimbolton Castle on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Manchester.

The Duke of Edinburgh returned to Clarence House on Saturday last from Didlington Hall, Brandon, Norfolk, where he had been on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Tyssen Amherst. His Royal Highness subsequently proceeded to Eastwell Park, where Princess Louise of Lorne, Prince Louis of Battenberg, Count Schouvaloff, and other guests arrived on Monday, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught were present at the annual meeting of students of the City of London College on Thursday week, when the Duchess distributed the prizes in the theatre of the building in Leadenhall-street, and the Duke addressed the students. Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by Princess Louise of Lorne, have visited the Prince of Wales's, the Gaiety, and the Strand Theatres, and have inspected the twenty-seventh annual exhibition of pictures by British and Foreign Artists at the French Gallery, Pall-mall.

The Duke and Duchess of Teck returned to White Lodge, Richmond Park, on Saturday last, from Heaton Park, near Manchester, where they had been passing a week with the Earl and Countess of Wilton. During their stay the Duke and Duchess visited the Manchester New Townhall, and were entertained at luncheon by the Mayor.

The remains of the late Prince Alamayu of Abyssinia were interred yesterday week at St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle. The body had lain in state since the previous evening in a simple mortuary chapel, which had been erected opposite the cenotaph of Princess Charlotte in St. George's Chapel. The mourners were—Prince Christian, Colonel Gordon, Sir Stafford Northcote, the Right Hon. Robert Lowe, General Napier, General Dillon, Sir J. Cowell, Professor Ransome, Dr. Jex Blake, Captain Speedy, Captain G. Napier, Mr. Victor Biddulph, Captain Cooper King, and Mr. Robins. The Mayor and Corporation of the borough were present. The coffin bore the inscription:—"Prince Alamayu of Abyssinia. Born April 23, 1861. Died at Leeds, Nov. 14, 1879." The Queen and Princess Beatrice sent wreaths, which were placed upon the coffin, and other wreaths were brought by various ladies connected with the Court. The Dean of Windsor officiated.

His Excellency Musurus Pasha has returned to the Turkish Embassy, Bryanston-square, from Bohun Lodge, East Barnet. His Excellency the Danish Minister and Madame Bülow have returned to town from visiting the Earl and Countess of Wilton. The Duke and Duchess of Westminster, accompanied by the Marchioness of Ormonde and Lord Robert Grosvenor, have left for the south of France. Eleanor Duchess of Northumberland has arrived at her new residence in Upper Grosvenor-street, from Stanwick, Darlington. The Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter and the Ladies Cecil have left Burleigh House for Paris en route for the south of France. The Marquis and Marchioness of Bristol and Lady Mary Hervey have arrived at Ickworth Park. The Earl and Countess of Derby have arrived at Keston, Kent, from Knowsley. Earl and Countess Howe returned to Gopsall Hall, near Atherstone, on Saturday last, from Heaton Park. The Earl and Countess of Minto have left London for Algiers.

The marriage of Mr. Sigismund Cathcart de Trafford, of Croston Hall, Lancashire, with Miss Clementina Frances Mostyn, fourth daughter of Sir Pyers and the Hon. Lady Mostyn, was solemnised on Thursday week at the Church of the Oratory, Brompton. The bride arrived, accompanied by her mother, and was received by her father and attendant bridesmaids—namely, her sisters (Miss Mostyn, Miss Mary, and Miss Gertrude Mostyn), Miss Mary de Trafford, sister, and Miss de Trafford and Miss G. de Trafford, cousins of the bridegroom. The best man was Mr. Randolphus de Trafford, brother of the bridegroom. The bride wore a dress of ivory satin duchesse, trimmed with Brussels lace, and, over a wreath of orange-blossoms, a Brussels lace veil. Her jewels consisted of diamonds, a diamond and ruby pendant, and gold bracelets set with pearls. The bridesmaids' dresses were of cream-coloured Indian barège, with drawn fronts of ruby satin, and trimmed with point d'Alençon, and ruby velvet hats to match. Each lady wore a crystal locket, with monogram surmounted by a wreath of corals and pearls. The nuptial rite was performed by the Right Rev. Dr. Knight. After the marriage there followed a low mass. The wedding party breakfasted with Sir Pyers and the Hon. Lady Mostyn at their hotel in Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, after which the bride and bridegroom left for the Isle of Wight, for the honeymoon. The bride's travelling dress was of grey cashmere, with bordering of velours plumes of the same shade. The wedding presents were very numerous, including gifts in silver from the servants and employés of Talacre and from the servants at Croston Hall.

THE MEMORIAL TO SIR ROWLAND HILL.

A largely-attended influential public meeting was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Mansion House for the purpose of considering the propriety of raising a national memorial in recognition of the great public services of Sir Rowland Hill. The Lord Mayor, who presided, expressed his gratification at being able to inaugurate the movement by a public meeting in the Mansion House. The movement had taken hold of the mind of the nation, and it had now assumed a national character, and he had much pleasure in commending it to the support of all admirers of the great services of Sir Rowland Hill. Mr. Whitehead, secretary to the fund, read letters of sympathy with the movement from the Prince of Wales, who expressed his willingness to become honorary patron of the fund; from the Earl of Derby, Earl Granville, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Duke of Argyll, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Northbrook, and others, as also from the Prime Minister, regretting his inability to be present. It was stated that 125 mayors and provosts throughout the country had promised to open subscriptions in support of the fund. A resolution recognising the world-wide importance of Sir Rowland Hill's services having been approved of, it was resolved that a benevolent fund should be founded for the assistance of aged and distressed Post-Office employés, their widows and orphans, throughout the kingdom, and by the erection in Westminster Abbey of a memorial of Sir Rowland, and of a statue in the City, near the General Post Office. Resolutions were also approved in favour of steps being taken to make the movement world-wide, of making a special appeal to the working classes to aid it by penny subscriptions; and the proceedings terminated with the usual complimentary votes.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Monday being the Lord Mayor's birthday, the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress entertained a select company at dinner in the Long Parlour of the Mansion House.

Dr. John William Ogle, Consulting Physician to St. George's Hospital, has been appointed, by the Council of the Royal College of Physicians, Harveian Orator for 1880.

Baroness Burdett-Coutts has made a donation of £100 to the Samaritan Fund of the Ophthalmic Department of the Royal Free Hospital.

The new Holborn Townhall, Gray's-inn-road, will be opened on Thursday, Dec. 18, in the presence of the Lord Mayor, accompanied by the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex.

Mr. Val Prinsep, A.R.A., and other gentlemen addressed the students of the City School of Arts at the annual distribution in the School-hall, Skinner-street, Bishopsgate, on Friday evening.

The question whether the Free Libraries Act should be adopted in Camberwell has been decided in the negative. Less than two thousand of the ratepayers polled, but there were nearly two to one against the adoption of the Act.

Mr. Denton, secretary to the Bethnal-green Philanthropic Pension Society, states that the Bazaar opened by Lord Ebury on Nov. 11, at the Victoria Hall, Approach-road, in aid of the funds of the society, resulted in a net profit of £500.

Through the kindness of the Duke of Wellington in freely lending the Riding School at Knightsbridge for this year's exhibition of the London Columbarian Society, the fanciers, whose head-quarters are at 100, High Holborn, were enabled to show their pets to great advantage. About one thousand specimens were on view on Tuesday and Wednesday.

The Arctic Campaign of 1879 in the Barents Sea was the subject of a paper by Captain A. H. Markham, read at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday evening. Lord Northbrook presided, and a discussion which followed was participated in by the Netherlands Minister, Sir H. Gore Booth, Sir Leopold McClintok, Sir G. Nares, Admiral Hamilton, and Captain [illegible]den.

The Court of Common Council on Monday resumed the discussion of the recent scandal as to the commissions in the Remembrancer's and Solicitor's offices. Mr. G. N. Johnson moved a resolution dismissing Mr. Howkins from the service of the Remembrancer's department of the Corporation. Several other resolutions and amendments were proposed, but after a long discussion the Court adjourned without coming to any decision.

In the absence of the Duke of Manchester, the president, Mr. W. E. Forster, M.P., took the chair at the opening meeting of the session of the Royal Colonial Institute, held at the Pall Mall, Regent-street, on Tuesday evening. There was a large attendance of members. Mr. F. Young, the secretary, announced that since the last meeting ninety-nine new Fellows, thirty-one resident and sixty-eight non-resident, had been elected.

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has issued his annual caution to householders. He states that larcenies are in most instances effected by thieves entering through doors and windows left open, or so insecurely fastened as to be readily forced; and he calls attention to different modes of entering dwelling-houses, which may be readily defeated by the observance of caution on the part of the occupier.

The number of paupers, exclusive of lunatics in asylums and vagrants, in the metropolis on the last day of the second week of the present month was 83,723, of whom 45,046 were in workhouses and 38,677 received outdoor relief. As compared with the corresponding weeks in each of the three preceding years, this total shows an increase of 4428, of 3838, and of 3161 respectively. The number of vagrants relieved was 886, of whom 654 were men.

A new coffee-tavern was opened yesterday week at No. 106, High-street, Kensington, by Lady Wolverton, in the presence of a large number of ladies and gentlemen interested in the movement. The idea of erecting the tavern was first of all mooted by the Kensington Branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, of which the Hon. and Rev. E. Carr Glyn, Rector of the parish, is president, and a committee, consisting of Mr. F. Guy, the Rev. W. Law, Mr. Townsend, Mr. J. W. Duffield, and J. Batten, was at once formed for the purpose of carrying it into effect.

Vice-Chancellor Malins has sanctioned a scheme for investing the sum of £52,000, the balance of the fund raised by public subscription for the relief of the survivors and the widows and children of the victims of the Abercarne Colliery explosion in 1878. It was stated that £59,000 had been received by the relief fund committee, and £7000 had been distributed. A large number of annuities had been granted to widows; and, in order to increase the annual sum at the disposal of the committee, it was proposed that the surplus should be invested in municipal securities yielding half per cent per annum more than Consols.

There were 2374 births and 1760 deaths registered in London last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 82 below, whereas the deaths exceeded by 27, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included one from smallpox, 57 from measles, 106 from scarlet fever, 20 from diphtheria, 41 from whooping-cough, and 33 from different forms of fever. In Greater London 2881 births and 2056 deaths were registered. The mean temperature of the air was 37·4 deg., being 4 deg. below the average. The duration of registered bright sunshine in the week was 8·5 hours (against 6·1 hours at Glyndeplace, Lewes), the sun being above the horizon 60·4 hours.

Mr. William Simpson, F.R.G.S., one of the Special Artists and War Correspondents of this paper, gave a lecture on Illustrated Journalism at the opening of the thirty-fourth annual session of the Streatham-hill and Tulse-hill Institution on the 20th inst. Beginning with his first mission to illustrate the incidents of the Crimean War, Mr. Simpson gave a brief but interesting account of his experiences in India, Abyssinia, China, Japan, Russia, America, the Franco-German War, ending with the Afghan campaign, in connection with which he made a touching allusion to his intimate relation with the late Sir Louis Cavagnari and the other heroes of the massacre at Cabul. Other persons of note are announced to lecture at this institution.

The Lord Mayor, Lady Mayoress, Sheriffs, and Civic functionaries were present in state at the annual distribution of prizes to the London Rifle Brigade, which took place last Saturday at the Crystal Palace. Lieutenant-Colonel Sir A. D. Hayter, M.P., the commanding officer, having explained the position of the corps, the Lord Mayor, in the name of the Corporation, offered his congratulations. The Lady Mayoress presented the prizes to the successful shots, chief amongst whom were Corporal Mardell (best shot in the regiment), Sergeant Hills (first cadet prize), Private Watkins, Private W. S. Smith, Private Fletcher, Corporal Rothon, Sergeant Tayton, Sergeant Davidson, Sergeant Hemsley, Corporal Cocks, Private Dismore, Private Green, Private Desmond, Private Allison, Sergeant Haines, Private Runtz, Colour-Sergeant Geen, Lieutenant Piggott, Colour-Sergeant Rogers, Private C. Cross, Sergeant Hall, Corporal Junkison, Private Churchill, Private Siegert, Captain Earl Waldegrave, and Colour-Sergeant Preston, the latter receiving the Gold Medal of the Brigade, Company Silver Medal, gold watch, and a Martini-Henry rifle. The champion was received with loud cheers, the band playing "See, the conquering hero."

The last meeting of the members of the London School Board, prior to the election of a new board, took place at the offices on the Thames Embankment on Wednesday afternoon, Sir Charles Reed, the chairman, presiding, and at its close Mr. Arthur Mills, M.P., moved—"That the cordial thanks of the board be presented to the chairman, in grateful recognition of the ability with which he has discharged the administrative duties of his office, and the dignity and impartiality with which he has governed the deliberations of the board." Canon Money seconded the resolution, which was carried with acclamation. Sir Charles Reed briefly expressed his acknowledgments, and similar compliments were paid to the Rev. John Rodgers (the vice-chairman), the chairmen of the various committees, and the hon. members of the sub-divisional committees. The board adjourned till next Wednesday, with the understanding that if the official notification of the result of the election last Thursday, should not be received till next Monday, the adjournment will be extended to the Friday following, Dec. 5. A noteworthy feature of the present contest is the number of ladies who are seeking seats on the board; they being Miss Rosamond Davenport-Hill, for the City; Mrs. Julia Augusta Webster, for Chelsea; Mrs. Elizabeth Surr, for Finsbury; Mrs. Florence Fenwick-Miller, for Hackney; Miss Muller, for Lambeth; Mrs. Alice Westlake and Mrs. Jane Ann Simpson, for Marylebone; Miss Helen Taylor and Miss Mary Eliza Richardson, for Southwark; Miss Helena Pauline Bowning, for the Tower Hamlets; and Miss Edith Jemima Simcox, for Westminster.

THE KING OF SPAIN'S BRIDE, ARCHDUCHESS CHRISTINA OF AUSTRIA.

THE KING OF SPAIN'S BRIDE.

His Majesty Don Alfonso XII., King of Spain, who is just twenty-two years old, having been born on Nov. 28, 1857, has now taken a second wife; his first being his cousin, Maria de las Mercedes, youngest daughter of the Duke de Montpensier and of the Duchess de Montpensier, who is sister to the ex-Queen Isabella II. of Spain. The young King began to reign in January, 1875, and was married, three years later, to his cousin, Princess Mercedes, who died June 26, 1878, having been only six months Queen.

The new Queen that is to be is an Austrian Princess, the Archduchess Maria Christina, youngest child of the Archduke Karl Ferdinand, cousin to the Emperor Francis Joseph I., King of Hungary; her mother being the Archduchess Elizabeth, another member of the Hapsburg-Lorraine Imperial family. She was born on July 21, 1858, and has been educated under the watchful care of her mother, to whom she is deeply attached. She is as well acquainted with four foreign languages as with her own; she draws and paints, mostly flowers, and is an excellent pianist. In Gmünden, where the family of the Archduchess regularly passed the summer, the Archduchess occupied herself with wood-carving, under the tuition of a clever artist. Every year she forwarded a number of warm garments, made by herself, to the poor children of Gmünden. The Archduchess is much attached to her former teachers and governesses, and is full of kind attention and regard for her attendants. Immediately on the arrival of a former instructor on a visit, the Archduchess will herself place footstools and cushions for her visitor's comfort, and numerous are the occasions when the Archduchess has been seen plodding her way down the steep wooden steps in Gmünden to visit one of her former governesses. She yields without any contradiction to any wish expressed by her teachers, be it ever so difficult, and rejoices like a child when praised. She is perfectly free in her political views, not in the least moved by outside influences, and never conceals her most decided antipathies. The young Archduchess was devotedly attached to her uncle, the Archduke Francis Charles (the Emperor's father), and whenever he announced his coming from Ischl to Gmünden to dine with the Archduchess and her mother the day was sure to be kept as a festival. The kind-hearted Archduke never neglected any occasion of giving his dear 'Christa' pleasure. When, two years ago (the last summer of his life), the young Archduchess was hard at work collecting stamps for a poor young lady in Munich, who wished to win a splendid Börsendorfer piano by collecting a million of stamps, in return for which an English gentleman offered to give this piano, her uncle Francis Charles forwarded stamps to further his darling's wish. The young Archduchess, when seventeen years of age, shed many tears when she was informed that the "Emperor" had selected her to be the Abbess of the Ladies' Convent at Prague. It took a long time to convince and persuade her that she had not to take the veil and go into the cloister, but that this was simply a place of high honour and income, and that she could at any moment exchange it for the bridal veil.

The Archduchess Christina is very girlish looking, and appears younger than she is. Her hair is flaxen, her complexion very blonde, without ruddiness, her figure very slender, and her stature below the middle height, though her photographs represent her as being tall. Whenever the bride-elect speaks to anyone the Archduchess Elizabeth remains at some distance to put her forward. The future Queen is shy, but has amiable manners, and a smile that pleases. Her attitude is deeply respectful in the presence of her elders of equal rank. She lost her father just a twelvemonth ago.

The arrival of this Royal bride at Madrid on Monday morning last, and her meeting there with the King, whom she already knew well, since his boyhood was partly spent in Austria, and with whom she had some interviews at a French watering-place last summer, are noticed among the foreign news of this week. On her way through Paris she was met by his mother, the ex-Queen Isabella, who intends to be at Madrid for the wedding.

Our Portrait of the King of Spain's bride is from a photograph by Luks, of Vienna.

SYDNEY INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

We gave some months since an Illustration of the building erected at Sydney, New South Wales, for the International Exhibition there. On Sept. 17, as we learnt very quickly by telegraph, and as we announced the same week, the ceremony of opening that Exhibition was performed, in beautiful weather, by Lord Augustus Loftus, the Governor of New South Wales. The day was observed as a public holiday, and the streets were densely crowded by the townspeople and by visitors from all parts of Australia. The proceedings commenced with a procession of the public bodies, who were followed by Lord Augustus Loftus; the Marquis of Normanby, Governor of Victoria; Sir W. F. D. Jervois, Governor of South Australia; Mr. Weld, Governor of Tasmania, with their respective staffs, the Colonial Ministers, and the military, naval, and civic authorities. The procession paraded the principal streets, and reached the Exhibition at noon, where Lord Augustus Loftus performed the ceremony of unveiling the statue of Queen Victoria, amid great enthusiasm. His Excellency then proceeded to the dais, which was surrounded by a brilliant assemblage, consisting of the Commissioners of the foreign countries and of the Australian and other colonies which have sent exhibits to Sydney, the colonial members of Parliament, the clergy, Judges, and others. The whole spectacle was of a most imposing character. After the choir had performed an inaugural cantata, the Sydney Commissioners presented an address to Lord Augustus Loftus, asking him to declare the Exhibition open. His Lordship, in replying to the address, congratulated the colony upon the success of its efforts to gather together in its capital a representation of the arts and of the achievements of the industrial forces of the entire globe. The event, he said, was an era in Australian progress. After welcoming in appropriate terms the various foreign and colonial representatives, the Governor formally declared the Exhibition open. The announcement was received with the firing of salutes, and the choir sang the National Anthem.

The Colonial Governors were then conducted through all the courts of the Exhibition and were introduced to the several foreign Commissioners, who awaited their approach in the sections devoted to the exhibits of their respective countries. The whole ceremony was universally considered a great success. The concourse of people was immense. Our Special Artist, Mr. L. Sedgefield, has sent us an Illustration of the scene. The main building, which is styled the Garden Palace, is much admired. The exhibits represent the products of England, almost all foreign countries, and the Australian and other colonies.

The Exhibition Palace, as it is called, stands in that beautiful public park of Sydney known as the Inner Domain, and its noble proportions are seen from all points of view. It overlooks the Botanic Gardens and the Harbour. The building itself covers about seven acres and a half, including all the galleries and basement, which is 800 ft. long, and 500 ft. broad. The floor space represents 333,750 ft., apportioned as follows:—Basement, one acre and a half, or 62,491 ft.; ground floor, four acres and three quarters, or 210,000 ft.; galleries, one acre and a quarter, or 51,259 ft.; the central refreshment-room, 10,000 ft. The sloping nature of the site presented at first some difficulties, but these were overcome by taking advantage of the fall of the land on the north-eastern side, which is the principal façade, and erecting two stories there, while at the rear, fronting Macquarie-street and Governor Bourke's statue, there is only one story. The structure does not equal in size the main hall at the Philadelphia Exhibition, which covered an area of twenty-one acres and a half, but covers rather more than one third of the space occupied by the Great Exhibition of 1851, and some 90,000 ft. more than the proposed Melbourne Exhibition of 1880. In shape the building is cruciform, having a nave 800 ft. long, a transept 500 ft. long, 50 ft. wide, and 60 ft. high, surrounded by a gallery 25 ft. wide on either side, and two aisles 50 ft. wide and 25 ft. high on the south-western side. There are annexes, or continuations of the aisles, 450 ft. long, by 100 ft. wide, and 25 ft. high. The basement floor on the north-eastern side, where the building is two stories, is 1000 ft. long, 75 ft. wide, and 20 ft. high. There are four towers—north, south, east, and west—50 ft. by 50 ft., divided into three floors, the first two being used for exhibits, and the upper floor (90 ft. high) is intended for a lookout. In the north tower a fine organ has been erected, and immediately beneath there is ample platform accommodation for the singers and musicians. At the south tower there is a flight of steps 30 ft. wide, leading from the main floor to the gardens, where the machinery, refreshment, and other rooms are erected.

At the intersection of the nave and transept rises the central dome, which is not less than 100 ft. in diameter and 210 ft. high, ranking, it is said, sixth in the world for size. It is 89 ft. to the springing of the ribs, 153 ft. to the apex, and the lantern is 37 ft., making the total 210 ft. The dome is a thirty-six-sided polygon, covered outside with galvanised iron, and is lighted in the dormer by twenty-six oval windows and a skylight at the foot of the lantern 20 ft. in diameter, but owing to its great height it does not look to be a third of that width. The decoration of the dome was intrusted to Messrs. Lyon and Cottier. Light tints are used in the adornment of the lantern above the skylight, and the skylight itself is glazed with variously patterned and coloured glass. The iron covering of the dome is painted in light blue, dotted with gold stars. Various tints and colours, harmoniously blending, are used in the decoration of the principals and other parts of the woodwork, while on the dome there is a band in chocolate colour bearing the scripture, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, the world, and they that dwell therein." Below the dome at the four angles there are allegorical representations in frescoes of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, and under these are other frescoes, emblematic of the industries of the colony. The arches opening into the nave and transept are also embellished, the arts and sciences being represented by appropriate emblems. Under the dome tower is an opening 30 ft. wide in the main floor. This is intended to light a refreshment-room 100 ft. square, erected in the basement. Through the opening there is a large fountain with a pedestal holding Marshal Wood's famous statue of her Majesty the Queen. This rises 23 ft. above the floor. The painting of the nave and transepts has been done in what is technically called distemper colouring. The caps of the columns are picked out in vermillion fleur-de-lis, the soffits and purlines in crimson, and all the beams in blue. The prevailing hue of the great nave and transept is yellow, broken with lines of red and blue. Along the base of the galleries, which are now adorned with small flags, the triple device of the rose, shamrock, and thistle, with the native flower known as "the waratah" painted at regular intervals. Ample provision has been made for the ventilation of the building, the windows overlapping, yet open like louvre ventilators, and spaces have been left in the flooring-boards, so that air can rise into the hall from the basement. It is also believed that every precaution has been taken to prevent fire.

We cannot here describe the various contents of the Exhibition. There is one department which should be most useful to the colonies—namely, a very complete display of agricultural implements. The machinery-in-motion department is on a great scale, and will be of great interest and practical use. The pottery and glass section is very good and extensive. There are 800 British industrial exhibitors, and 513 fine-art entries, including photographs. Germany has 695 entries, including 108 fine-art; Austria, 170; France, 350 industrial and 168 fine-art; Belgium, 236 industrial and 50 paintings. America has 150 industrial collections. Among the best-filled sections are railway apparatus and material, steel and cutlery from Sheffield, guns and miscellaneous manufactures from Birmingham, Manchester goods, sewing cottons, cloths, hats, indiarubber manufactures, chemicals, preserved foods, lamps and stoves, paper and stationery. The British Government collections comprise those of the Admiralty Science and Art Department, and the School Board for London. The paintings include those lent by the Queen and Prince of Wales and by the Society of Arts. There are 175 British oil-paintings, 111 water colours, and 97 architectural drawings.

At a banquet held to celebrate the opening of the Exhibition the Queen's health was received with great enthusiasm, and warm acknowledgments were expressed for the appointment by her Majesty of the British Royal Commission for the Australian Exhibitions. Much gratitude is felt for the valuable services rendered by the Prince of Wales, as president of the Royal Commission; to the Earl of Belmore, as president of the London Commissioners; and to Sir Daniel Cooper, the chairman, and to Mr. Edmund Johnson, the hon. secretary of the London Committee, to whose active initiation of the movement in England it is felt is mainly due its subsequent success in Europe generally.

The opening cantata, sung by a choir of six hundred voices, was a piece of music, specially composed by Signor Paolo Giorza for the occasion, adapted to verses written by Mr. Henry Kendall, of Camden Haven, New South Wales, who also won the prize of a hundred guineas offered by the Sydney Morning Herald for the best poem, in heroic couplets, upon the subject of this interesting event in colonial history. There were about two hundred and fifty competitors for the prize, not only from different provinces of Australia, but also from the United Kingdom and from the United States of America.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Archduchess Elizabeth of Austria and her daughter, the Archduchess Marie Christine, passed through Paris on their way to Madrid; and M. Grévy, the President, and M. Waddington, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, paid a visit to the Archduchess.

The Empress Eugénie passed through Paris by authorisation of the Government on her way to Spain, whither she has been called by the fatal illness of her mother, the Comtesse de Montijo. The authorisation was solicited through the medium of the English Embassy, and was at once granted and conveyed to England by General Fleury. The Empress stayed on Thursday night at the house of the Duc de Mouchy, and left yesterday week for Madrid. During her Majesty's stay in Paris the doors of her host were rigorously closed.

The new telegraph cable between France and America was formally inaugurated on the 20th inst. by the transmission of a cordial message from President Grévy to President Hayes.

In consequence of the dismissal of M. Gent from the post of Governor-General of Martinique, M. Lepère, the Minister of the Interior, offered his resignation to the President, and it was only at the earnest entreaty of M. Grévy and M. Gambetta that it was withdrawn.

Fifteen thousand mètres of tubing, the Daily Telegraph Paris correspondent states, are now laid down under the main thoroughfares of that city for the purpose of unifying all the public clocks and setting them all by Observatory time. These pneumatic clocks will also be placed in private houses, and in future the time of day will be laid on just like gas or water.

In the inner court of the Louvre, called the Sphinx, the marble fragments are being put together which form the pedestal of the statue of Victory in the hall of the Caryatides, and which represent the front of an old Greek war vessel. In 1863 M. Champoiseau, the French Consul at Samothrace, found the statue of Victory and sent it to Paris; but the remains of the marble pedestal had to be left behind on the island until the present Government supplied M. Champoiseau with the means of dispatching them to France. There are twenty-four marble blocks altogether in the pedestal, each of them weighing from nearly one ton to more than two tons. This pedestal is of considerable value and interest, as it forms almost the only complete model of an old Greek war vessel which has been preserved. It dates from about 280 B.C.

While one of the steam tramcars was passing along the Boulevard Montparnasse, at Paris, on Monday last, the engine sank into the catacombs, which at this point undermine the city. The car, fortunately, did not follow the engine, and nobody was hurt.

SPAIN.

The Archduchess Marie Christine of Austria, accompanied by her mother, arrived at the Northern Railway station, Madrid, at eight o'clock last Monday morning, on her way to the Royal residence at Pardo. She was received at the station by the King, the Princesses, the Ministers, the Court dignitaries, and the principal civil and military authorities. The Archduchess proceeded immediately to Pardo, accompanied by the Court dignitaries and authorities, the King and the Princesses returning to the Royal palace in Madrid.

Queen Victoria will be represented at the Royal nuptials by General Lord Napier of Magdala.

The Archduchess Christine's wedding trousseau, remarks the World, contains some twenty-five dresses in all. The toilet to be worn on the occasion of the state entry into Madrid is exceedingly handsome. It is red and yellow—the Spanish colours—and consists of a tight-fitting yellow satin body cut en cœur and trimmed with scarlet "ruching," the sleeves puffy and slashed between shoulder and elbow. The skirt is likewise of yellow satin, the train of scarlet velvet beautifully worked with the arms of Spain semé over it. The fan is of black ostrich feathers, each of which is ablaze with fiery rubies and golden topazes.

The Congress decided on Monday evening to adjourn until Dec. 5. It was also resolved to appoint a committee to wait upon the Archduchess Marie Christine at the Pardo Palace, to congratulate her on her arrival in her new country and upon her approaching marriage.

The Countess of Montijo died on Saturday night, at the age of eighty-five. The Empress Eugénie reached Madrid on Saturday, but not in time to see her mother alive.

The funeral of the Countess of Montijo took place on Tuesday morning with great pomp in San Isidor cemetery. The cortége was followed by many poor persons. The Empress Eugénie, though much depressed, continues in good health. By her will the Countess leaves to the Empress the largest share of her fortune, the rest going to the Duke of Alba.

Marshal Martinez Campos, replying to a question in the Congress, denied that any Ministerial crisis existed, and said that, notwithstanding the fact of there being a number of insurgents in arms in Cuba, he would, after the King's marriage, lay before the Cortes a bill for the introduction of such reforms into the island as were in accordance with justice.

An official despatch received at Havannah announces that the Spanish troops attacked the camp of the insurgent leader Guillermon in the province of Santiago de Cuba on the 15th inst., and 400 huts were burned by the troops.

ITALY.

General Cialdini, who has been charged with representing the King of Italy at the Royal Spanish marriage, left Paris for Madrid yesterday week.

Signor Cairoli has completed his Cabinet as follows:—Minister for Foreign Affairs, Signor Cairoli; Minister of the Interior, Signor Depretis; Minister of Finance, Signor Magliani; Minister of Justice, Signor Villa; Minister of Public Works, Signor Baccarini; Minister of Public Instruction, Signor De Sanctis; Minister of War, Signor Bonelli; Minister of Marine, Admiral Acton; Minister of Agriculture, Signor Miceli.

A marble medallion of Father Secchi has been placed in front of the Stilvio Observatory, 2513 mètres above the level of the sea. The observatory owes its establishment to him.

The female students at Italian Universities, who numbered five last year, are this year nine—namely, three at Turin, two at Rome, two at Bologna, one at Naples, and one at Padua.

The Italian ironclad frigate Varese, bound for the Bay of Assab, on leaving Zante on the 23rd inst. ran on a rocky shoal one mile out. She was immediately lightened, and an Austrian steamer attempted to haul her off, but unsuccessfully, owing to the difficult position in which she had grounded. The weather was calm.

BELGIUM.

The Estimates of the Ministry of Justice have been discussed in the Chamber of Representatives. In the course of the debate, M. Goblet Alviella expressed his surprise that the general ordinances provided by law for dealing with ministers of the Church who attacked the existing laws from the pulpit were not enforced. He concluded by moving for the reduction of the salaries of the Bishops.

In the Chamber on Tuesday Count Goble d'Alviella's amendment to the Public Worship estimates, proposing various reductions, without touching the salaries of the Bishops, was rejected. The budget of the Ministry of Justice was adopted by eighty-two votes to five.

GERMANY.

The 21st inst. being the birthday of the Crown Prince, it was celebrated at Court in the usual way, and throughout the town by a profuse display of bunting. The Crown Prince is expected to return here from Italy after Christmas, and the rest of the family about April.

The Emperor has appointed five officers from various regiments of the Guards to attend on his behalf the impending nuptial ceremony in Spain.

Yesterday week his Majesty, in ceremonious audience, received the credentials of General Sergio Camargo, the newly-appointed Envoy and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of Columbia, and afterwards left for Wusterhausen, accompanied by the King and Crown Prince of Saxony, with the Grand Duke Vladimir of Russia, to enjoy some more hunting.

A scheme has been formed for canalising the River Maine from Frankfort to its confluence with the Rhine, the city of Frankfort promising to give 1,250,000 marks for the construction of a harbour.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Cis-Leithan Lower House yesterday week agreed to the first twelve paragraphs of the Bill for the incorporation of Bosnia and Herzegovina into the Zollverein of Austria-Hungary. Par. 13, which fixes the amount of the customs to be paid by the occupied districts at 600,000 fl., was discussed at great length, as the Government, with a view to harmonise the Cis-Leithan vote with the law already passed by the Hungarian Parliament, proposed to change the terms of this arrangement from "three years" to "until it shall be further considered." The debate was adjourned.

According to a telegram from Pesth, the Liberal party have unanimously accepted the proposals of the Government Bill fixing the strength of the army at 800,000 men for a term of ten years, expiring at the end of 1888.

The general debate on the Army Bill was brought to a conclusion on Tuesday in the Lower House of the Hungarian Diet. In the course of the discussion Herr Tisza, replying to a question, acknowledged the Legislature's right to initiate a reduction in the strength of the military forces even during the ten years for which the army law is to be voted.

The report that the Austrian squadron had received orders to proceed from the Piræus to Salonica and Besika Bay, is, the Eastern Budget understands, incorrect. The squadron has left the Piræus, but it has gone to Smyrna, not to Salonica.

TURKEY.

The Sultan has entertained Sir H. Layard and Baker Pasha at dinner, and (according to a Reuter's telegram) expressed "very satisfactory views" with respect to the mission of the latter. His Majesty, it is added, has ordered a modification of the too positive terms of his firman relative to Baker Pasha's powers of inspection. The gendarmerie is to be placed under the Ministry of War.

Down to Monday evening the Sultan had not signed the firman appointing Baker Pasha Inspector of Reforms in Asia Minor, and his departure for his post has been deferred until Saturday.

Saivet Pasha has represented to the Turkish Council of Ministers the expediency of ceasing negotiations upon the Greek frontier questions, and calling in the joint mediation of the Powers, or, as an alternative, conferring new powers upon the Ottoman members of the Commission.

Aleko Pasha has been decorated by the Sultan with the order of the Osmanie of the First Class.

General Vitalis, Commander-in-Chief of the militia in Eastern Roumelia, has been appointed Aide-de-Camp to the Sultan.

The Sultan has signed a decree that from Jan. 13 next a sum of 1,350,000 Turkish pounds will be annually appropriated to pay interest half-yearly on the home and foreign debt. This interest will be guaranteed by the revenues of Cyprus and Roumelia, as well as by the receipts from the duties on tobacco, spirits, stamps, fish, and silk, after a previous deduction from the receipts of £1,100,000 to meet the claims of the Ottoman Bank and other creditors secured by mortgages. In case of a deficit the Porte undertakes to make it good. Besides the sum of 1,350,000 Turkish pounds above referred to, the Turkish Government cedes irrevocably to the bondholders the Bulgarian tribute and the Servian and Montenegrin contributions towards the Turkish Debt; also one third of the proceeds of any new taxes, especially in the event of increased duties and the receipts from patents—the mode of payment to be arranged with the representatives of the creditors. The Porte enters into the above engagement for a period of ten years unless modified with the consent of all parties interested.

ROUMANIA.

The extraordinary Session of the Chamber of Deputies was prolonged till the 27th inst., when the regular Session commenced. M. Cogalniceano, the Minister of the Interior, is now at Galatz taking part in the labours of the European Commission relative to the navigation of the Lower Danube. A bill has been presented to the Chamber, and referred to the Sectional Committee, proposing to retain Galatz and Ibraila as free ports, and further to create free ports at Tultcha, Sulina, and Kustendje.

BULGARIA.

The National Assembly on the 19th inst. terminated the verifications of the elections, with the exception of those in four districts. The House subsequently appointed a committee of twelve deputies—consisting of nine Bulgarians, two Turks, and one Greek—to draw up the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

At Tuesday's sitting the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was presented to the House. It thanks Prince Alexander for having visited the foreign Sovereigns, and for having established friendly relations with the neighbouring States, and it begs him to express the gratitude of the Bulgarian nation to the Emperor and people of Russia; on the

SOUTH AFRICA.

News has been received from the Cape to the 4th inst. A Reuter's telegram says that "the aspect of affairs in the Transvaal is less threatening." The Daily News' correspondent, on the other hand, telegraphs that "Transvaal affairs are still in a disturbed state, and serious fears are entertained that the Boers will offer armed resistance." It is said that Sir Garnet Wolseley has determined on storming Secocoeni's stronghold. The uniform of the late Prince Louis Napoleon, has been recovered.

INDIA.

The Viceroy left Simla on the 20th inst. on a tour through the Rajpootana country. He arrived at Delhi on the 22nd, and proceeds thence to Ajmere and Gwalior. He will arrive at Calcutta on the 12th proximo.

The North-West Provinces, especially the districts of Allyghur, Bulandshahr, and Meerut, are suffering from a severe epidemic of malarious fever, which has enormously increased the death-rate and temporarily disabled a large proportion of the agricultural population.

AUSTRALIA.

The Agent-General for South Australia (Sir Arthur Blyth) has received the following telegram from the Government of South Australia, dated the 21st inst.:—"Reaping commenced in the northern districts of the colony; the season is exceptionally good, a million and a half acres under crop; the expected average is twelve bushels to the acre. It is estimated that there will be for export 375,000 tons of wheat. Splendid rains have fallen throughout the outlying pastoral country, and all the dams are full."

Melbourne news to Oct. 9 states that the second reading of Sir Charles Sladen's Reform Bill, by which it is sought to popularise the Legislative Council by reducing the property qualification for both candidates and electors, was, after a long debate, agreed to in the Upper House without a division. In the Legislative Assembly the discussion on the new tariff has been continued, and the proposed duties on oils and reapers and binders have been withdrawn, while the duty on patent medicines has been fixed at 25 per cent. Mr. Berry, the Premier, is indisposed, and had been unable to attend the sittings of the Assembly, but was recovering.

There has been a severe snowstorm in the canton of Ticino, in Switzerland, causing an interruption in the postal, telegraph, and steam-boat services, and destroying thousands of vines and trees.

According to intelligence received at New York from San Domingo, President Guillermo has been defeated by the revolutionists, and has taken refuge in the capital, where he is besieged. His cause is regarded as hopeless.

The Dominion Line steamer Borussia left the Mersey on the 20th inst. with sixty-five farmers and their families for Texas. These emigrants have all a little capital, and were mostly from the counties of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Durham, a few being from Scotland and Ireland.

The Sydney Morning Herald of Oct. 1 says:—"The steamer Strathleven, designed to test the possibility of conveying frozen meat from Australia, is to leave Sydney for London about the middle of November. She will take from Sydney 600 carcases of beef, 200 of mutton, and a quantity of wool, and fill up similarly in Melbourne."

It has been decided by the Tribunal of Brunswick that the will of the late eccentric Duke, by which he bequeathed all his property to the town of Geneva, is null and void. Of this fortune, six millions of francs have been spent by the town on a commemorative monument to the Duke, and perhaps as much more on a magnificent opera-house.

The Swiss Federal Council having been memorialised from several quarters to put a stop to the propaganda of Mormon missionaries in Switzerland, have decided, in view of the powers possessed by the Cantonal Governments for the punishment of polygamy, and of the efforts being made by the United States Government to suppress the institution in Utah, not to take any general action in the matter. In special cases, however, the Council will interfere; and last year they procured the return to her family of a girl who had emigrated at the instigation of a Mormon agent.

Yesterday week the ship Devon was dispatched from Plymouth with 399 emigrants for Adelaide, South Australia.

The tide of victory which was set rolling in favour of the Chilians by the capture of the Huascar has been swelled by another brilliant success. A battle has been fought at Iquique between the Chilians and the allied forces of Peru and Bolivia. The latter are said to have met with a crushing defeat. It is also announced that a Peruvian corvette has been captured by the Chilians. According to advices from Panama, the capture of Pisagua on the 2nd inst. was effected by 12,000 Chilians, who disembarked under cover of the guns of the fleet. The garrison, consisting of Bolivians, evacuated the town and effected a junction with the Peruvians near Iquique. It is this combined force which appears to have been now defeated. A despatch is said to have been received in New York from Valparaiso, dated the 19th inst., announcing that the blockade of the Peruvian ports has been re-established.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught were present on the 20th inst. at the annual meeting of the City of London College for the distribution of the prizes and certificates to the successful students at the yearly examinations of the college, the Society of Arts, and the Department of Science and Art. The Lord Mayor presided. As the Duchess of Connaught distributed the prizes she spoke a few gracious words of compliment and encouragement to the recipients. Subsequently her Royal consort addressed the students assembled in a speech which impressed on the minds of the young men the advantages of the higher education which the college was giving, and of the duty of making the best of their time whilst they were young and ambitious.

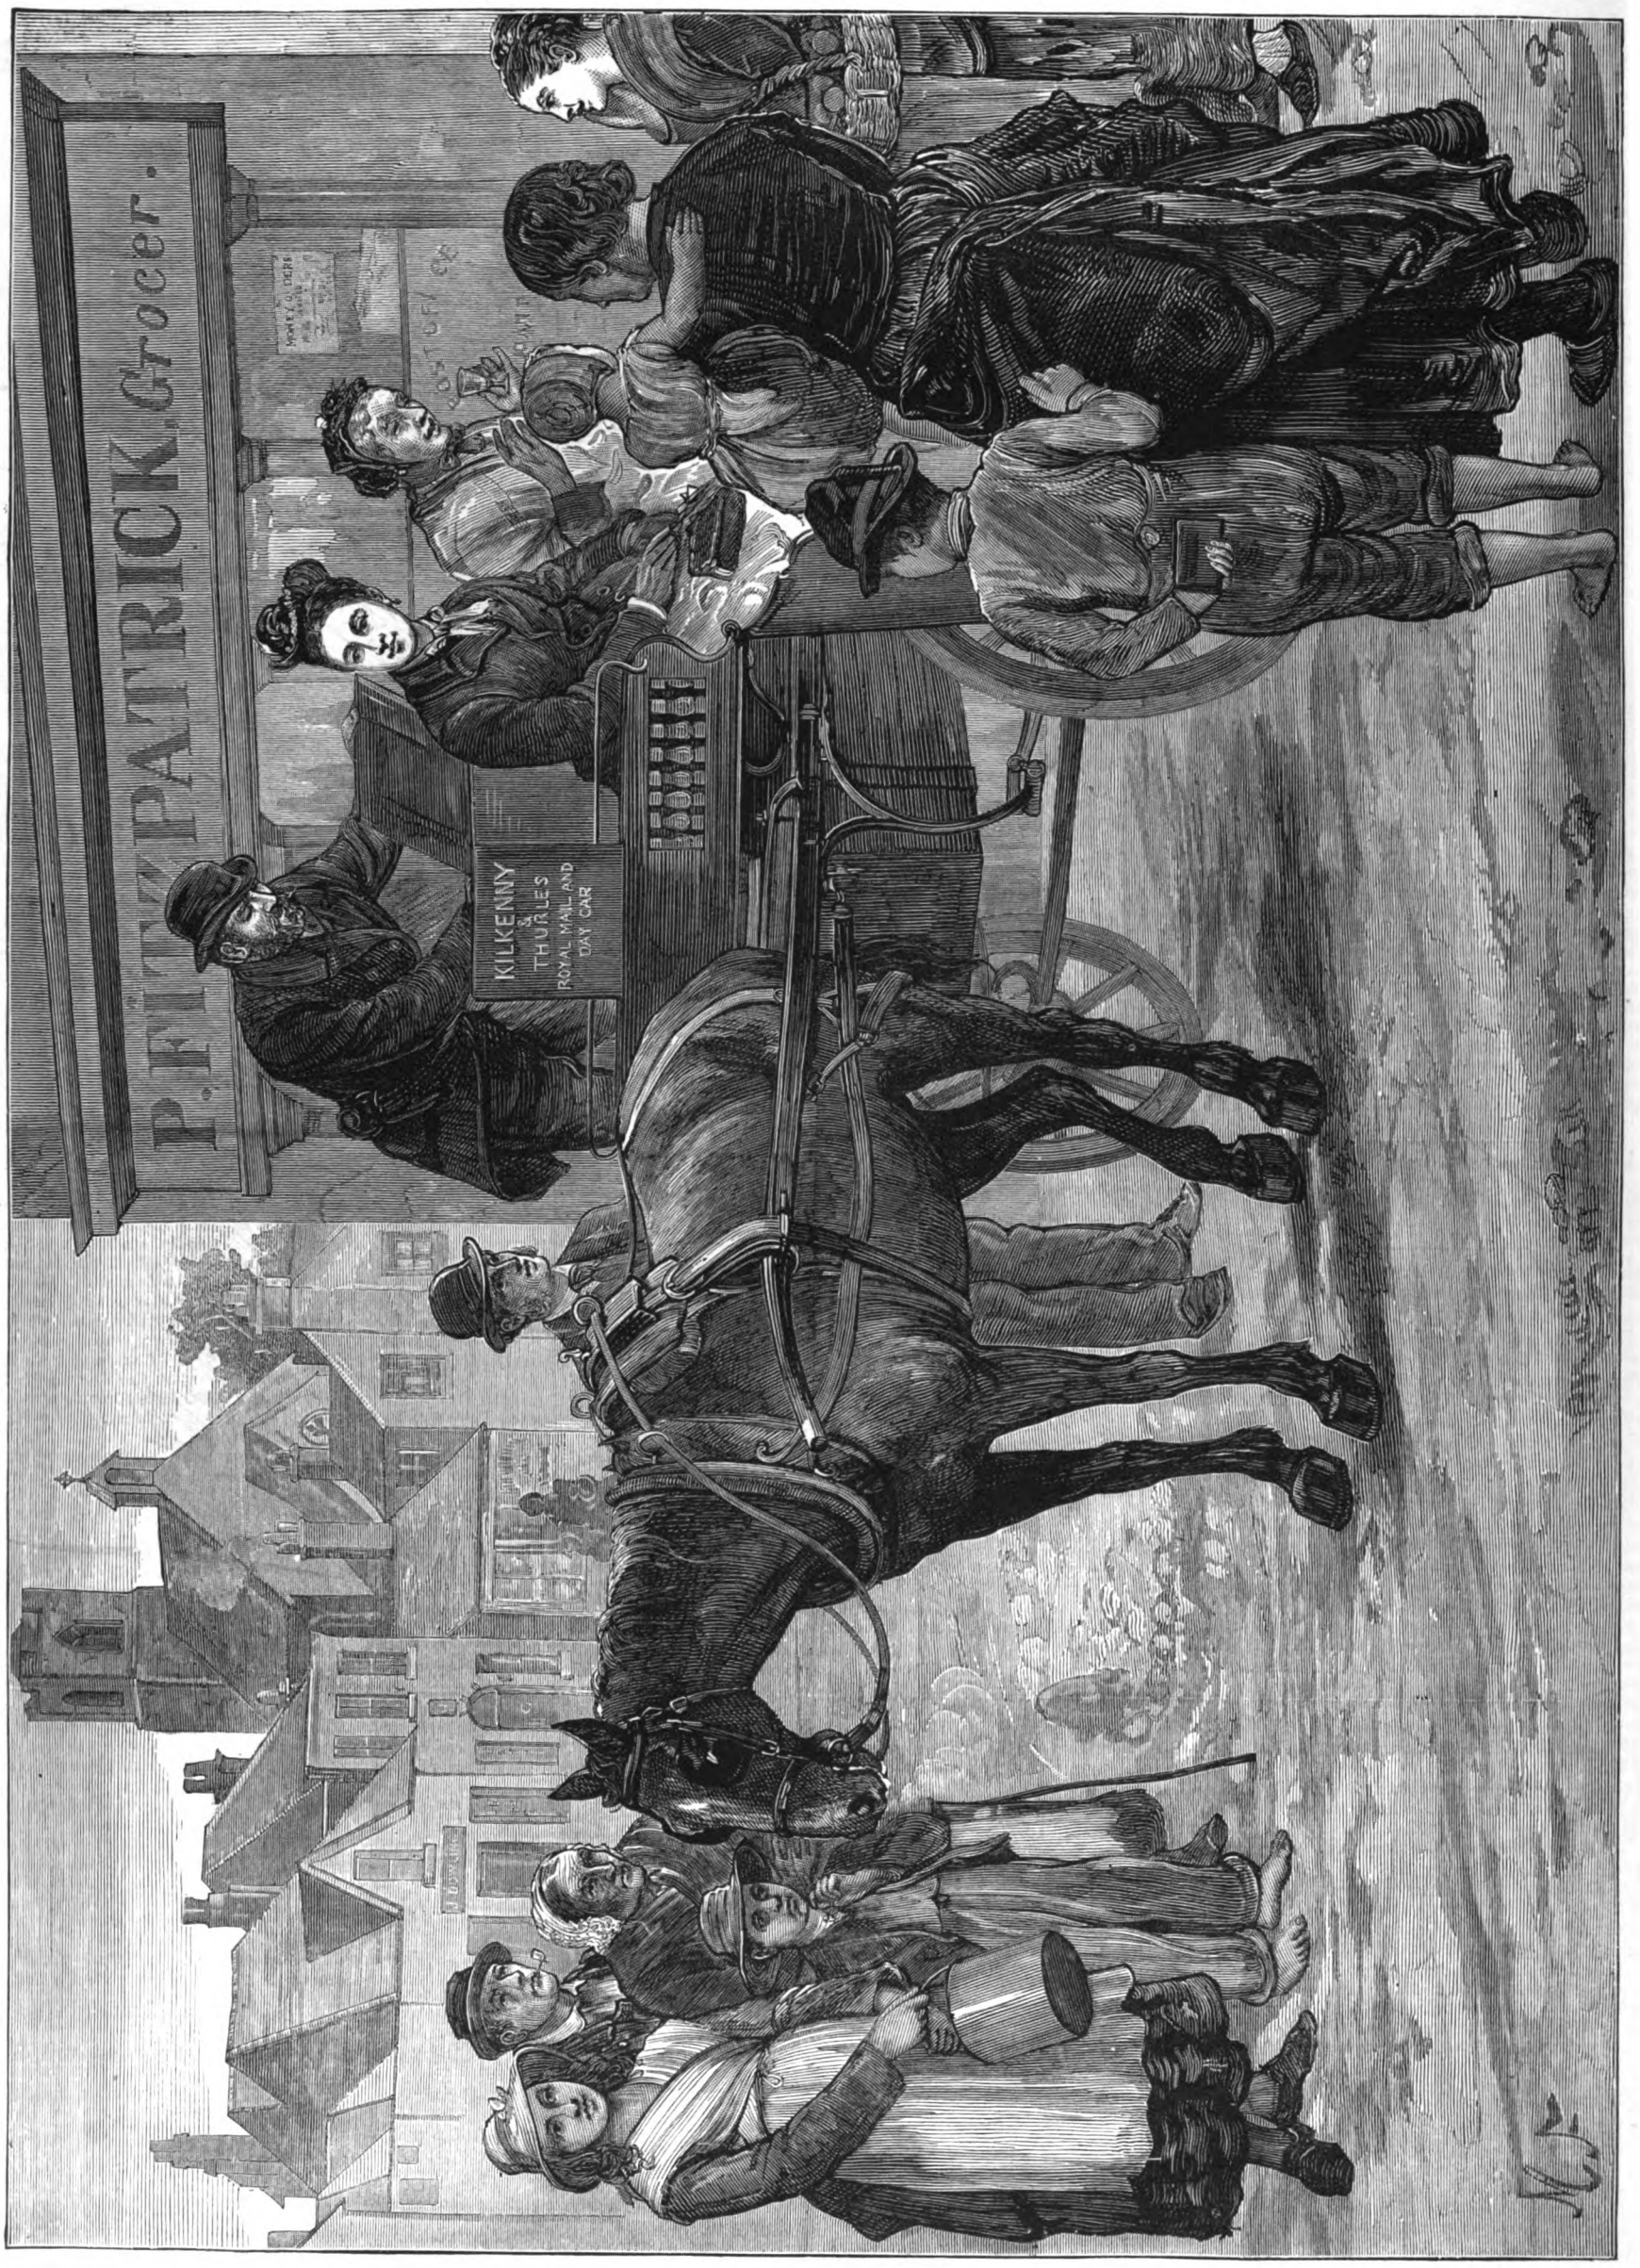
The 20th inst. being the annual "speech-day" at St. Saviour's Grammar School, Southwark, the Bishop of Rochester distributed the prizes to the scholars. He was supported by all the governors of the school and their treasurer, Mr. Bevan. Dr. Boger, the Head Master, who was warmly congratulated by the Bishop on the completion of the twentieth year of his mastership, gave a short résumé of the history of the school during the past twelvemonth, and of the successes achieved by its pupils. The list of honours gained by former pupils of the school was unusually large, including a Sizarship at St. John's College, Cambridge; a School Exhibition and a First Class at the Matriculation Examination of the London University (W. Greenstreet); a First Class at the London University Matriculation Examination and an Open Scholarship at Westminster Hospital (Swain); an Open Scholarship at St. Paul's School (C. Greenstreet); and first-class certificates at the Royal College of Chemistry and in the Science and Art Department (A. Wingham). Besides these, Messrs. Farr, Coombes, and Nicholls had gained certificates at the College of Preceptors; Mr. W. H. Ruston had been appointed to a Mathematical Tutorship at the Military College, Oxford; and Mr. E. D. Holditch, a former pupil of Dr. Boger, had been appointed Head Master of the Wisbech Grammar School.

Mr. D. F. Ranking, M.A., Head Master of Wallasey Grammar School, Cheshire, has been unanimously elected Head Master of the Kingsbridge Grammar School.

The Rev. R. J. Griffiths, M.A., LL.D., Head Master of the Church of the Ascension School, Lavender-hill, has been appointed Second Master of the Haberdashers' Company's Aske's Hatcham Schools, New-cross, in succession to the Rev. D. L. Scott, M.A., LL.M.

The examination for the Junior Scholarships annually offered by the Royal Agricultural Society of England was held on the 20th inst, at the several schools from which candidates have been entered to compete. This year there were twenty-three candidates, as compared with twenty-nine last year, and thirty-two in 1877.

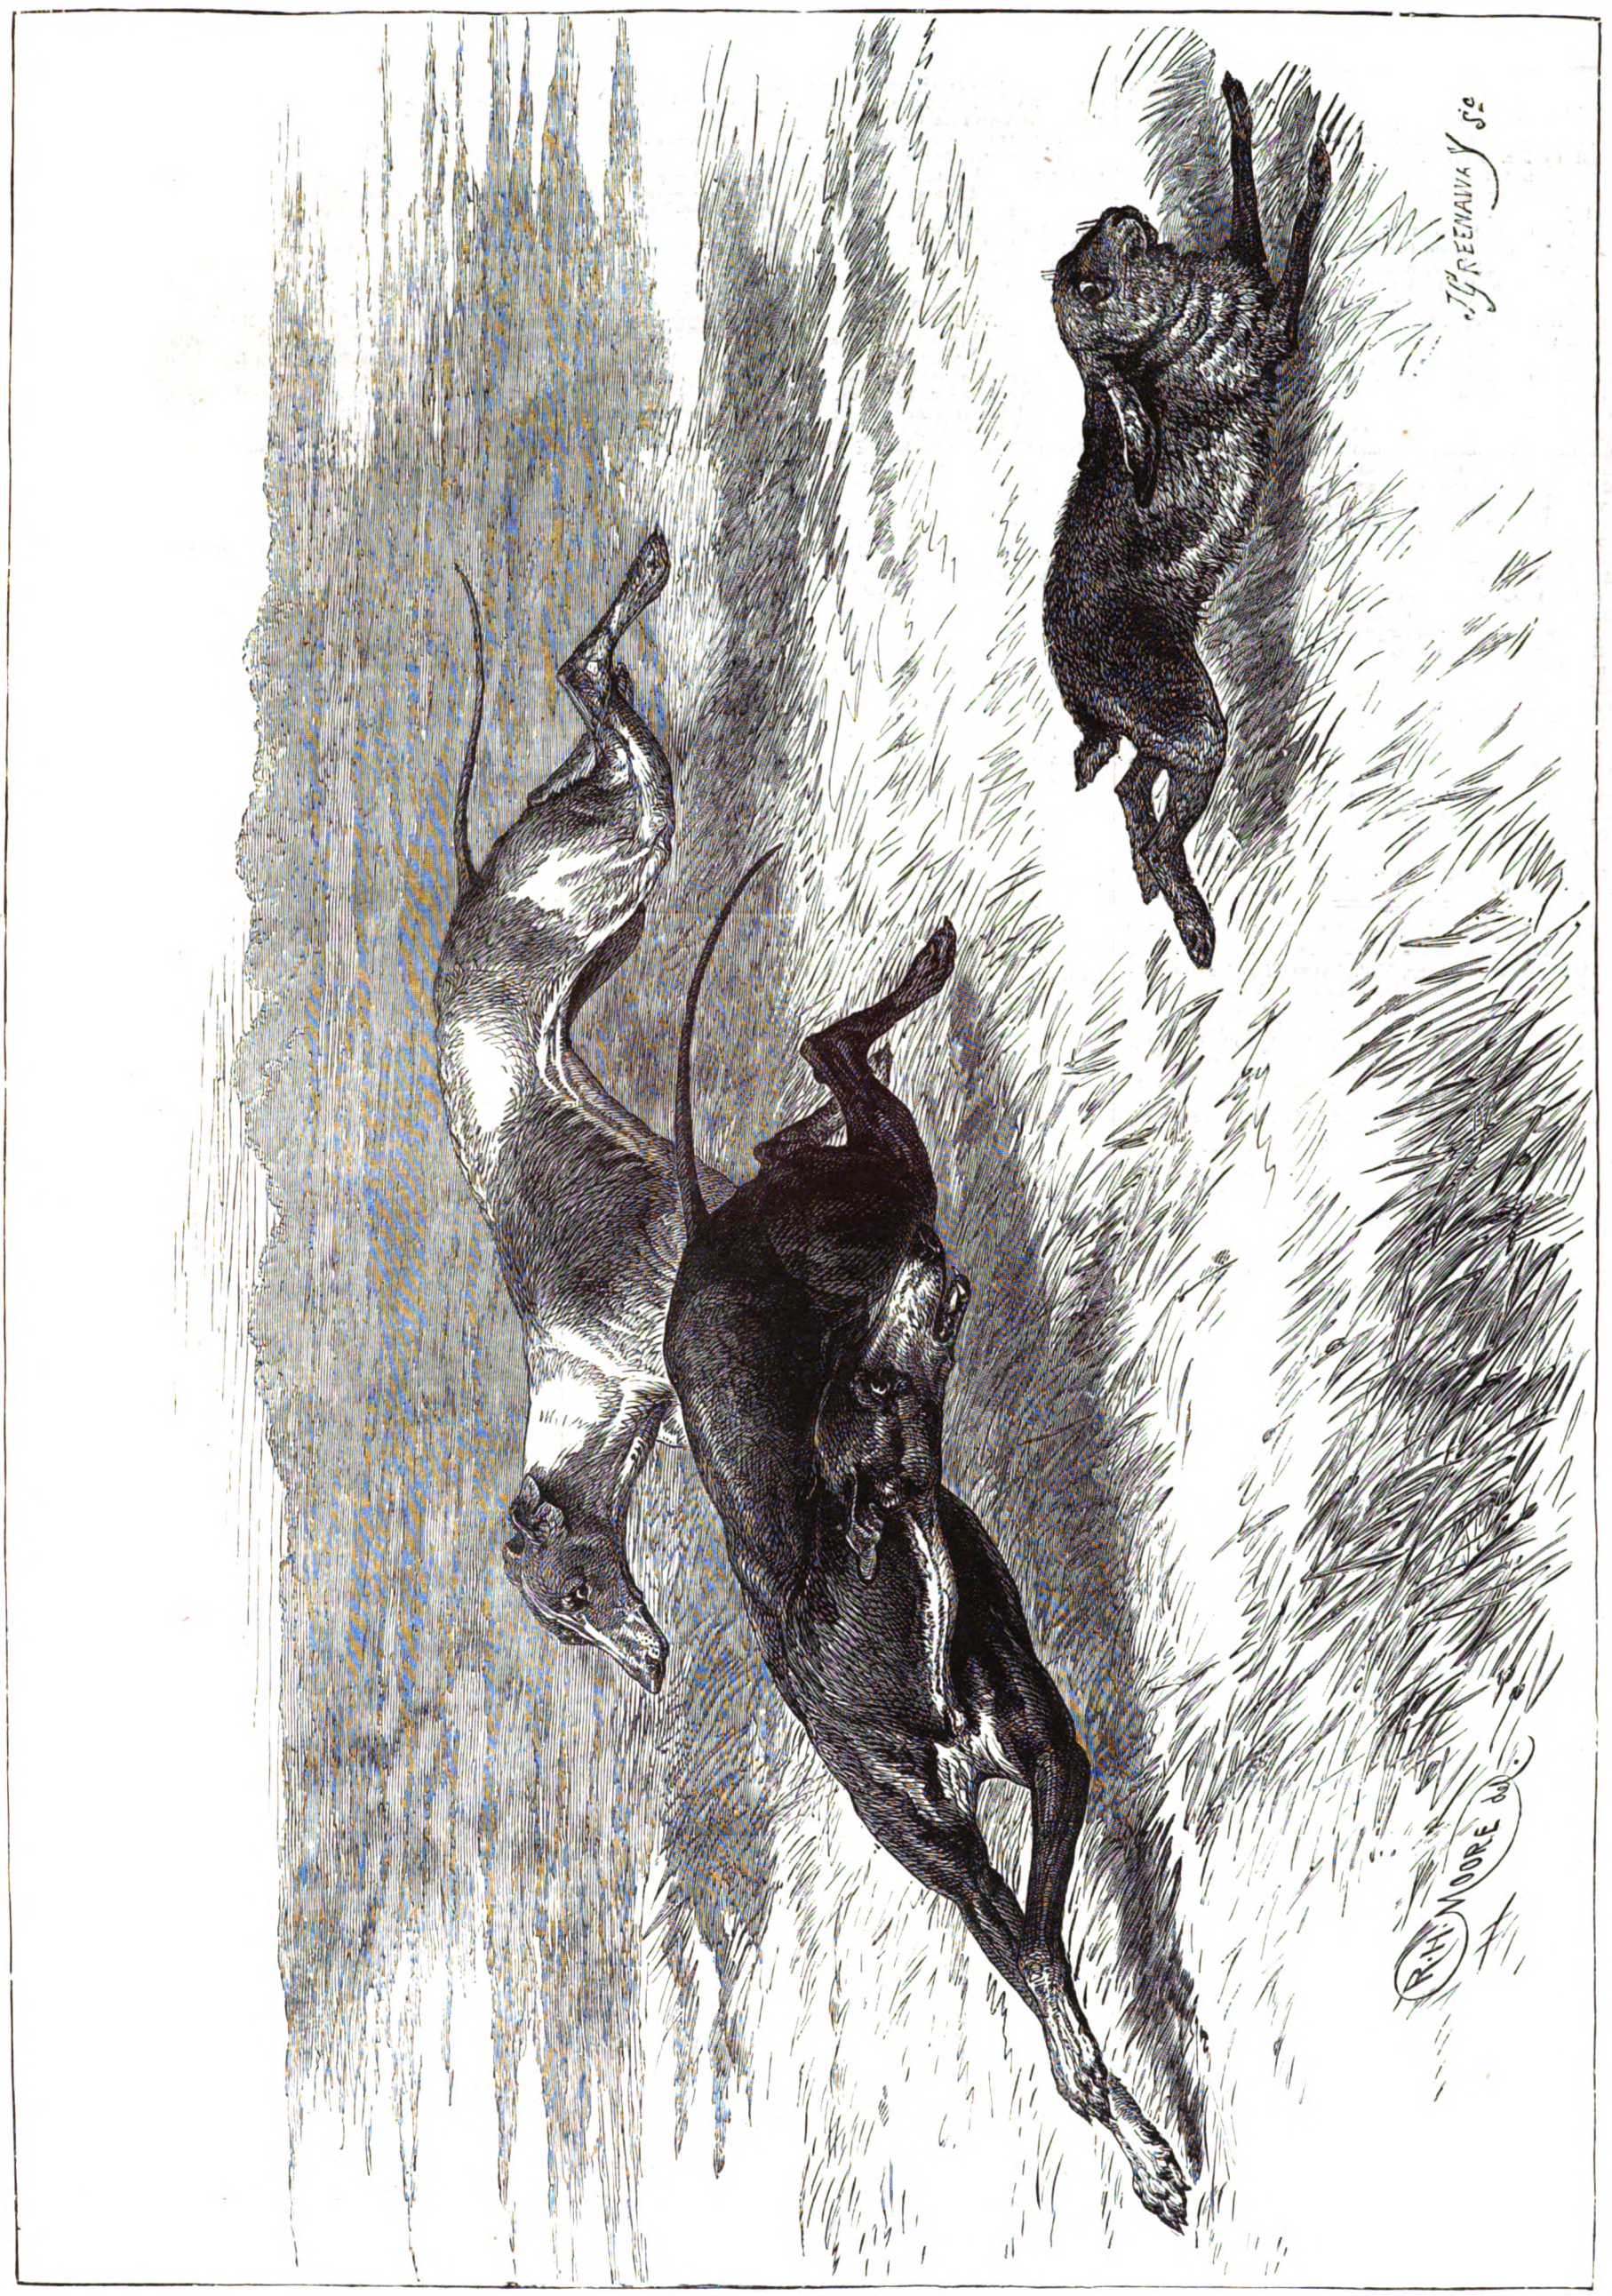
ON HER MAJESTY'S SERVICE IN IRELAND.



The famous "jaunting-car" plays an important part in the economy of the Irish postal department. On hundreds of miles of road, the work of transmission is carried on chiefly by the aid of that singular vehicle, which is the delight of the natives, and the terror of all strangers who trust their bodies to it for the first time. In the capacious "well"—a kind of oblong box which lies between the "seats" on either side—a handy receptacle for post-bags is found; while the machine itself, when behind a fast horse, can bowl at a highly respectable speed along a level road. The "mail-car" differs somewhat in shape from the ordinary "side-car;" its "well" being rather broader and deeper, but it is most easily recognised at a glance by the reddish hue with which it is daubed all over. We do not remember having ever seen an Irish mail-car of this kind which seemed to have been painted within the present century. The colour has a sickly hue, as of a red that had grown pale with the gathering griefs of accumulated years, and it imparts to the vehicle an air of having seen better days, which is not lessened by the self-asserting inscription which invariably appears on the back in obstrusive yellow letters—"Royal Mail and Day Car. From——to—— — miles."

Our Artists' sketch was taken at a village on the road between the city of Kilkenny and the town of Thurles, in county Tipperary. No railway communication had as yet been established between these two comparatively thriving towns, which are twenty-one Irish miles apart—a distance about equal to twenty-seven English miles. The mail-car traverses the road between Kilkenny and Thurles twice daily, carrying passengers as well as mails. Besides the driver, who is skilled in balancing himself securely on the little box in front, four people can be accommodated with seats on the vehicle, at the trifling rate of twopence each per mile. The driver, who acts as mail-guard, leaves a made-up bag at each rural post-office, and receives one in return, which he deposits in the "well" of his vehicle. When the car, as happens in many places, arrives at the office during ordinary bedtime, the postmaster, roused from his couch, comes to a front window, with a long crook in his hand. The incoming mail-bag is hooked on to the crook, hauled in through the window, and retained, while the outgoing one is left with the driver by a similar process.

For his duties the rural postmaster usually receives no greater remuneration than £4 a year, out of which sum he must provide cord and sealing-wax; but, being almost invariably a shopkeeper, he undertakes those duties willingly enough for sake of the connection which the mail business may bring around him; and when, as not unfrequently is the case, he happens to be a publican, the revenue secured in this way should be a source of satisfaction both to himself and to the Excise department. Many a strange scene is witnessed at his threshold. Beggars, for instance, lie in wait for the arrival of the mail-car; not in the hope of intelligence by post, but in the expectation of open-handed passengers. Woe to the unlucky stranger who returns a harsh or uncivil answer to their oily supplications! The interrupted prayer for his weal may be suddenly lengthened into something remote from a benediction, in this wise—"May the blessin' o' God folly you for ever an' ever—an' never overtake you;" or it may be supplemented by some ready sarcasm, such as—"Arrah, Judy, have you a copper at all to throw to that poor starved creature there on the car? He wants it worse than ourselves, God help him." Let the passenger be ever so stoical, those dirty but merry mendicants will make him feel well satisfied when the car is again in motion.



But the great "sensation scene" is produced by the arrival of "an American letther." It is well known that most of the Irish poor in the United States are mindful of their kindred in the "ould counthry," and frequently transmit donations of £10 or £12 to the loved ones they have left behind, very many millions having been thus passed through the post office during the last two decades. Every private epistle, besides, is sure to contain a selection of news that will be absorbingly interesting to the people of the locality from which the writer emigrated. "An American letther," therefore, excites widespread commotion. The news of its arrival spreads like wildfire, and by the time its owner comes to claim it an eager crowd will have gathered nigh the office door. Someone is pressed into service for the decipherment of the treasured scrawl—usually a child from the adjacent National School; and the people stand around in rapt attention, the silence being broken only by impulsive cries of joy or woe from a listener, to whom the reading may have announced the good fortune or disaster, perhaps the death, of an absent husband or lover, a brother or a son.

COURSING—THE FIRST TURN.

During the coursing season we very frequently read a sentence to this effect in the reports of the various meetings—"Mr. A.'s decisions, as usual, gave complete satisfaction, and B. was in great form with the slips." The importance of securing an able judge and an experienced slipper cannot possibly be over-estimated, for we have no hesitation in saying that Wilkinson's task, when a pair of awkward puppies are given into his charge, is quite as difficult as that undertaken by Mr. M'George when he has to get a field of two-year-olds off upon equal terms; while Judge Clark's post is a sinecure compared with that held by Mr. Hedley. In Manchester, Sheffield, and other northern towns, where the somewhat bastard sport of rabbit-coursing is practised, a very rough-and-ready style of judging is adopted. The "kill" counts one, and that is the only point that is scored, so that it is possible for one dog to do the whole of the work, while the other, by a piece of luck, secures the verdict. With greyhounds, however, matters are very differently arranged. The kill certainly counts one point; but far more value is attached to "speed to the hare," first turn, &c.; and as the judge often has to sum up these points while riding at full speed to keep in a good position with the dogs, it is wonderful how rarely his decisions are called in question. Occasionally the best and most experienced judge will make a mistake, but we never remember to have heard the slightest insinuation of unfair dealing. Many years ago an offer of £500 was made to the judge at one of our most important meetings if he would give the final course of a great stake to a certain dog. He entertained the proposal and dismissed it—with the stewards. The work of the slipper is of little less importance than that of the judge. It may seem a very simple matter to the uninitiated to pull a spring which sets free two greyhounds; but a little practical experience would soon show the fallacy of this idea. Many dogs are very troublesome in the slips, and, instead of straining forward with a steady even pull, one will be plunging about in all directions, while the other perhaps has become unsighted. Then the slipper has to exercise a considerable amount of discretion with regard to the course the hare is taking, and, if one dog is likely to be much favoured, he must wait for a fresh hare. In our Illustration, however, all the preliminary difficulties have been satisfactorily overcome. The dogs have got away upon even terms, and, after a grand race to the hare, in which the speed shown has been very equal, one has made a desperate effort, drawn out a little, and sent "puss" round, thus gaining the coveted "first turn." If the hare is a good one, the course is likely to extend for another mile, and, from this point, stamina and cleverness will be served rather than speed, and the scorer of the first point may not be found to have held his own, when the little flag goes up, proclaiming a victory for white collar or red.

Sir Evelyn Wood has been appointed to the command of the Belfast District, with the local rank of Brigadier-General.

Mr. W. Spencer Stanhope, M.P., has published some particulars respecting the Unfunded Debt which he has obtained from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. gentleman's figures show that the Unfunded Debt stood on March 1 this year at £25,870,100, being an increase of £21,390,500 over the sum at which Mr. Gladstone left it. The items of increase include the Suez Canal purchase, the amounts borrowed by local authorities, and five millions for "warlike expenditure." Mr. Stanhope asserts that the Funded Debt has been reduced, between 1874 and 1879, by £17,530,705.

Colonel Lovell, R.E., who, accompanied by Lieutenant Hussey, proceeded to British Columbia a few months ago, by order of the Imperial authorities, in order to examine and report upon the condition of the defences there, has now returned. He considers Esquimalt untenable in the event of an attack by hostile vessels, and recommends the erection of certain defensive works at Nanaimo, which is the coaling station of the British Navy in the North Pacific. Lieutenant-Colonel Strange, R.A., Dominion Inspector of Artillery, visited British Columbia at the same time on behalf of the Canadian Government; and the understanding is that, in the event of the Imperial Government erecting the fortifications and placing the necessary guns in position, the Dominion Government will undertake the maintenance of the defences, and will raise a corps of artillery to garrison them.

The King of Saxony has placed at the disposal of the Exhibition Commission of the Berlin International Fishery Exhibition an extra special prize, open to all nations, to consist of silver plate, for the best practical scheme for rendering harmless to fish in rivers and lakes the refuse from factories and sewage from towns falling into the same. Although the prize thus offered is intended for a complete solution of the question, partial solutions are not to be excluded from consideration by the jurors, who will also be instructed to decide as to the plan deemed second in order of merit. Such plan is to receive a prize of 600 marks from the Minister of Agriculture, if possessing advantages over the systems now in use. Proposals from British subjects (which may be in print or manuscript, and accompanied or not by drawings) must be delivered prior to March 1, 1880, to Mr. Edmund Johnson, commissaire délégué, at the London offices of the Exhibition, 1, Castle-street, Holborn. Apparatus and models intended to illustrate any of the plans so submitted will have to be forwarded subsequently to the Exhibition (which will be opened on April 20), it being requisite, however, to apply before Jan. 1 for the necessary space for the same in the British section.

Dr Charles Graham gave the first of the present series of Cantor lectures, at the Society of Arts, last Monday evening, on the subject of the Chemistry of Breadmaking. After some introductory remarks on the history of the subject, the lecturer proceeded to discuss the composition of the principal cereals, which he divided into the heat-giving—viz., the carbo-hydrates and fat, the muscle-forming, and the various mineral matters, all serving different purposes in building up the animal structure. He then proceeded to examine the chief chemical and physical properties of the organic constituents of the cereals, beginning with starch. He explained the structure of the different starches, and how the source from which each variety was obtained could be distinguished by the different shapes and sizes of the cells as seen by the microscope. He then showed the various tests for starch and the different reactions of starch and the sugars—maltose, cane sugar, fruit sugar, &c.—when treated with Fehling's liquid, alcohol, &c. In connection with this part of the subject, he explained how the different varieties of sugar were distinguished from one another by means of polarised light. He then explained and illustrated the preparation of dextrine, and gave an instance of its practical use in the glazing processes of the Vienna and Paris bakers, the glossy surface of whose bread was produced by the dextrine, resulting from the action of moist heat on starch. In conclusion, he announced that on Monday next would be continued the examination of starch and its hydration products. The course is to be continued on successive Monday evenings until Christmas.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

"Oberon" was given on Friday week, and came with almost the freshness of novelty, having been but intermittently heard for many years. The work was commissioned by Mr. Charles Kemble, and produced at Covent-Garden Theatre, under his lessecship, in 1826. It was originally a dialogue opera; the book, by Mr. Planché, having been based on Sotheby's translation of Wieland's poem. It is scarcely necessary to remind musical readers that Weber superintended the rehearsals, and died—in London—a few weeks after it was brought out. In spite of the intrinsic beauty of the music and the literary merit of the poetical part of the book, the opera never maintained a strong hold of the stage, from the want of strongly-marked contrasts in the music and the absence of dramatic and human interest in the action and the characters.

It was in 1860 that the Italian version of "Oberon" was produced—at the old opera house in the Haymarket—the translated dialogue adapted to recitative by Sir Julius (then Mr.) Benedict, and with interpolated pieces from Weber's "Euryanthe." But few performances of it took place at that period; and, after the burning of the former theatre (in 1867), it was unheard until 1870, when it was given at the Royal Italian Opera House during the temporary occupation of that establishment by Mr. Mapleson.

Special features in some of the Italian performances of "Oberon" were the fine singing of the late Mdlle. Titiens as Reiza and Madame Trebelli as Fatima. "Oberon" was given during Mr. Mapleson's last year's season at Her Majesty's Theatre, when Madame Pappenheim appeared as Reiza and Madame Trebelli again as Fatima; and these ladies sustained the same characters in last week's representation, when the first-named artist sang with much success, especially in the great declamatory scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," which was given with good dramatic perception of its varied phases of sentiment and passion. The impression here produced was manifested by long-continued applause. In other instances, too, as in the first finale, the duet with Sir Huon (introduced from "Euryanthe"), and the quartet, "Over the dark blue waters," Madame Pappenheim sang with genuine artistic power. As in former representations of the opera, Madame Trebelli's excellent delivery of the music of Fatima was an important feature. Her two songs, "A lonely Arab maid" and "O Araby, dear Araby," were both encored, as was the duet with Sherasmin, "On the banks of sweet Garonne." Signor Fancelli was the Sir Huon (as in 1870), and sang with as much effect as could be expected under the disadvantages of the adverse influence of the weather. His delivery of the scena, "O 'tis a glorious sight to see," was—from this cause—better in intention than in realisation. This piece was written by Weber specially for Braham in the earliest performances of "Oberon," the scena originally composed for Sir Huon having proved unsuitable to the singer. This latter, in the Italian version of the opera, has been transferred to the character of Oberon, which was filled on Friday, as in last year's performance, by Signor Carrion; Signor Frapolli, at first announced for the part, having been disabled from appearing by indisposition. Signor Carrion gave his scena with considerable effect. The lovely song for the Mermaid was sung by Mdlle. Stelzner, without making much effect; the music for Puck having been rendered with similar result by Mdlle. Barnardelli. Signor Pantaleoni was a very satisfactory Sherasmin, and the smaller parts of the Caliph and Babekan were assigned, respectively, to Mr. Pyatt and Signor Zoboli.

The orchestra was throughout highly efficient, which can scarcely be said of the chorus. Signor Li Calsi conducted with care and skill.

"Lohengrin" was to have been given on Tuesday; but, in consequence of the indisposition of Signor Fancelli, "Mignon" was substituted.

This (Saturday) evening the present series of performances is to close, a short supplemental season being announced to begin on Monday next.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

At last week's opening concert of Mr. John Boosey's fourteenth season (at St. James's Hall) a varied and popular selection of vocal pieces was rendered by Misses Mary Davies, Annie Butterworth, and Rose Stuart, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Hollins, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Maybrick. Mr. Hollins appeared in sudden replacement of Mr. Sims Reeves, who was absent on account of illness. The encores were numerous, these results having followed the delivery of Sterndale Bennett's "May Dew," by Miss M. Davies; of Blumenthal's new song, "The Wedding Day," and Cowen's "The Better Land," by Madame Sterling; of Sinclair's "The Mountain Maid," by Mr. Lloyd; "The Friar of Orders Grey," by Mr. Santley; Adams's new song, "The Midshipmite," by Mr. Maybrick, and Reichardt's "Love's Request," by Mr. Hollins.

There was also some very effective part-singing by the London Union (directed by Mr. F. Walker), who had to repeat Kücken's "The Young Musician."

An agreeable variety to the vocal performances was offered by the brilliant pianoforte playing of Madame Arabella Goddard, who gave, with great effect, Wehli's "Recollections of a Midsummer Night's Dream" and Liszt's transcription of Schumann's "Widmung." The duties of accompanist to the vocal music were efficiently fulfilled by Mr. Sidney Naylor and Mr. Henry Parker.

The second concert took place last Wednesday evening, with an attractive programme.

This week's Monday Popular Concert opened with Brahm's Sestet, for stringed instruments, in G major; which was given for the second time here. Again it left the impression of being over-prolonged and diffuse in treatment; it occupies nearly an hour in performance. The best portions are the "Adagio" and the "Scherzo." The work was finely played by Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Burnett, and Signori Piatti and Pezze. The concert introduced, for the first time, three pieces for violoncello and pianoforte composed by Mr. F. W. Davenport. They are cleverly written, but are not particularly striking, the best being that which is entitled "A Melody with Changes." The pieces were excellently rendered by Signor Piatti and Mdlle. Mehlig, the lady having previously played, with much success, Weber's Solo Sonata in C major. A special feature at this concert was the charming vocalisation of Miss Lillian Bailey, in a recitative and air from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and two lieder by Schubert and Mendelssohn. Haydn's melodious Pianoforte Trio in D major (No. 21) was given for the first time at these concerts. Sir J. Benedict accompanied the vocal music.

Haydn's "Creation" was performed on Thursday evening by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Barnby—the principal vocalists having been Mrs. Osgood, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli.

A Scotch Concert takes place at the Albert Hall this (Saturday) evening.

At the general meeting of the Philharmonic Society the following gentlemen were elected members:—Professor G. A. Macfarren, Mr. Charles Hallé, and Mr. John Hullah, LL.D.; and as associates—Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac.; Mr. G. Higgs, Mus. Bac.; Mr. Walter Fitton, Mr. G. W. Hammond, Mr. Arthur G. Thomas, Miss Clinton, and Miss M'Murdie. The eight concerts of the society will begin on Feb. 5 next.

The annual grand concert in aid of the funds of the Post Office Orphan Home will be given at St. James's Hall on Saturday evening, Dec. 13. Mesdames Marie Roze, Leibhart, and Frances Brooke, Miss de Fonblanque, Messrs. W. H. Cummings, Henry Guy, and several other well-known artistes have kindly promised their services. Sir Julius Benedict and Mr. Ganz will conduct.

At a meeting of the guarantors of the Leeds Musical Festival held last week a general committee of forty-five gentlemen was appointed to carry out the necessary arrangements for the festival to be held in the autumn of 1880. It was stated that the guarantee fund already amounted to £8805, and that it was expected to reach £14,000 before the list closed. Mr. Arthur Sullivan, the English composer, is to supply an original oratorio, the subject of the libretto being the Bible story of Saul and Jonathan; and Mr. J. F. Barnett, the composer of the "Ancient Mariner," will write a new secular cantata, selecting his subject from Longfellow's "Building of the Ship." Some foreign composers have also been communicated with, and are expected to supply works.

Sir Julius Benedict distributed the prizes and certificates gained by the successful students at the local centre of the Trinity College scheme at Wigan last week. The students number seventy, as against seventeen last year. Sir Julius Benedict complimented the centre on its improvement, and said that the movement was spreading all over England, and could not fail to have a most beneficial effect on the progress of music. He considered England one of the most musical nations of the world.

THEATRES.

"Just Like a Woman," a comedy in three acts, by Mr. A. W Dubourg, joint author of "New Men and Old Acres," has been produced at one of the Gaiety matinées. The piece, though new to London, has done previous duty in the provinces, and bears an accidental resemblance to the comedy "On Guard," with which some of our playgoing readers may be familiar. The story is somewhat flimsy and the characterisation weak. The dialogue, in portions, is smartly written; but, on the whole, there is too much conversation and at the same time too little action to render the piece thoroughly dramatic. The love interest, moreover, does not secure the sympathies of the audience. It is not necessary to give a synopsis of the plot. There are two stanch advocates of woman's rights in the persons of Mrs. Lyster, wife of Topham Lyster, M.P., and her daughter Aurora, the latter of whom forsakes her principles on receiving an offer of marriage. Ethel, the sister of Aurora, is engaged to one man, but secretly in love with another, to whom she is ultimately united. There is a great deal about electioneering. Throughout, the author is most successful in his comic business, some of the humorous characters being exceedingly well conceived. The piece was efficiently represented. Mrs. Chippendale enacted the part of Mrs. Lyster, the champion of "woman's rights," with great vivacity and energy. Miss Louise Willes was effective as Aurora, and Miss Measor made a successful début as the heroine, Ethel Lyster. The rôle of the hero was sustained by Mr. Charles Kelly. Mr. Arthur Wood as Potbury, and Mr. Kemble as Sowerby Sweetapple, a sort of political agent, were exceedingly amusing. The other characters were well portrayed. The comedy was received with favour, the author and actors being called for at the fall of the curtain.

At the Prince of Wales's Robertson's three-act comedy of "Ours," has been once more presented to the public. This is probably the last revival which will take place at this theatre during the present management. The piece has been too often expatiated upon to call for any especial criticism. It is one of the most popular and sympathetic works of a highly gifted writer, and on the first night a crowded and fashionable audience testified to its still unflagging popularity. Mrs. Bancroft resumes the character of Mary Netley, and invests it with the same amount of freshness and piquancy which originally characterised the performance. The parts of Blanche Haye and Lady Spendryn find able representatives in Miss Marian Terry and Miss Le Thiere. As Hugh Chalcot, Mr. Bancroft is seen to great advantage; and Mr. Forbes Robertson gives an admirable presentation of Sergeant Jones. Mr. Arthur Cecil as Prince Perovsky, Mr. Kemble as Sir Alexander, and Mr. Conway as Angus McAlister are all clever personations. The comedy can scarcely fail to attract good audiences until the popular managers secede to their new home at the Haymarket Theatre.

PANTOMIMES.

The early and exceedingly cold winter induces many eager expectants of the Christmas amusements to think of the pantomimes. Many, we find, are inclined to suggest improvements in the construction of these entertaining annuals. They think that the Introductions should be abridged and the Harlequinades extended. We confess that at the West-End theatres the former have ceased to be funny. They are far too elegant to excite more than a smile, whereas loud laughter is desiderated. We should prefer broad humour to refined wit. At the East-End the dialogue is altogether different. Neither rhythm nor rhyme is cared for; but the lines, containing any number of syllables, and disdaining all rules of quantity or accent, frequently amuse by their violation of all propriety and the sheer irregularities of their structure and syntax. The greater the ignorance shown by the writer the greater the merriment expressed by the audience. A serious complaint exists as to the want of novelty in the subjects. Notwithstanding the number of unused themes published in collections of Norwegian and Caledonian legends, our modern caterers repeat the old arguments, trusting for favour in the familiarity of the stories. The present stock, so far as announced, of subjects is remarkably barren of novelty. At Covent Garden "Sindbad the Sailor" is announced, at Drury-lane "Bluebeard," at the Gaiety "Gulliver," at New Sadler's Wells "The Forty Thieves," at the Surrey and Astley's "Aladdin," at the Standard "Bluebeard," at the Park and Marylebone "Cinderella," at the Crystal Palace "Jack the Giant Killer," and at the Alexandra "Little Jack Horner." A novel feature of this season's Christmas amusements will be Mr. D'Oyly Carte's "Children's Pinafore" at the Opéra Comique. A series of morning performances of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's popular opera "H.M.S. Pinafore" will be given, commencing December 16, all the characters being taken by children.

A revised edition of "An Art-Student in Munich" is announced by Messrs. De La Rue, of Bunhill-row. It will contain several new chapters, with further particulars of the Ammergau actors and some details of interest about the last "works and days" of Kaulbach, of whom the writer, Mrs. Howitt-Watts (best known by her maiden name, Anna Mary Howitt), was a pupil.

THE CHURCH.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.

Bennett, Charles, Vicar of Cambo, to be Vicar of St. John's, Barnsley.
Childs, H. Horatio; Vicar of Shippon, Berks.
Clarkson, John M.; Chaplain and Naval Instructor to H.M.S. Tenedos.
Dillon, J. A., Curate of Holy Trinity, Bournemouth; Association Secretary of the Colonial and Continental Church Society, North-Western District.
Dixon, William Francis; Curate of Panton-with-Wragby.
Dixon, W.; Chaplain to H.M.S. Indus.
Evans, Canon Howell, Vicar of Oswestry; Rural Dean of Oswestry.
Goodridge, H. P.; Chaplain to H.M.S. Northumberland.
Gregg, E. P., Senior Curate of Christ Church, Folkestone; Secretary of the Colonial and Continental Church Society, North-Eastern District.
Haynes, William Aquila; Curate of Burgeo, Newfoundland.
Hewitt, John; S.P.G. Missionary at Herring Neck, Newfoundland.
Laurence, P., Rector of South Ockendon; Rector of Walesby, Market Rasen.
McDermott, W.; Incumbent of St. John's, Johnstone, N.B.
Macdowdall, G. H. W.; Chaplain to H.M.S. Minotaur.
Nurse, Theodore Richard; Curate of King's Cove, Newfoundland.
Parker, William Sackville; Rector of Anstey, near Leicester.
Phillips, Sydney; Rector of Nuncham Courtenay, Oxon.
Prowde, Ralph; Vicar of Kilburn, near York.
Sullivan, Eugene; Chaplain to H.M.S. Penelope.
Woodd, Basil K; Vicar of St. John-the-Evangelist, Bilton, Harrogate.

A handsome three-light Munich window (from the studio of Messrs. Mayer and Co.), representing the "Widow's Mite," has been erected in Cheadle parish church by Mrs. Heath to the memory of her late husband.

On the 22nd inst., St. John's Church, Johnstone, N.B., erected principally at the expense of Mr. R. T. N. Speir, of Culdees, Perthshire, was consecrated by the Bishop of Glasgow. The church is a neat and substantial building, and the sittings, 400 in number, are all free and and unappropriated.

The church of Fenny Compton, near Leamington, Warwickshire, was reopened on the 18th inst., after extensive improvements. A new south aisle had been added by the former Rector, Dr. Heurtley, Margaret Professor at Oxford, who resigned the living in 1872; but a complete restoration was still wanted. The architect was Mr. T. Graham Jackson.

The Dean of Lichfield, preaching on Sunday afternoon in aid of the Incorporated National Society for the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church, said that last year the accommodation provided in elementary day schools of every kind was 3,942,000, out of which the Church of England alone provided 2,252,000.

A window in memory of Canon Davies, who was for thirty-one years Vicar, has been inserted in the north-eastern, or St. Edmund's Chapel, at Tewkesbury Abbey. The subjects are "Christ blessing little children," and "Christ the Good Shepherd." The canopies accord with the style of work in the adjacent chapels, and the window has been executed by Messrs. Heaton, Butler, and Bayne.

The nave of St. Helen's, Trecton, near Rotherham, the chancel of which was restored by the Rector, the Rev. Bernard Watkins, in 1866, has been partially renovated under the direction of Messrs. Hadfield, of Sheffield. The complete estimate was for no less than £1500, and for the present the works have been confined to that which was most pressing—the re-seating of the church. A new pulpit has, however, been given by the family of the late Mrs. Sorby as a memorial to her.

The parish Church of St. Mary, Ratcliffe-on-Trent, which has been nearly reconstructed by Messrs. Goddard and Paget, was reopened on the 6th inst. by the Bishop of Nottingham. The building has been lengthened 30 ft., and now measures 105 ft. from east to west. It will accommodate more than 700 worshippers, or nearly twice as many as before. Its reconstruction has cost £4500. There is a spire 106 ft. high. The bells dated from the time of James I., but were cracked and past service. Two of them have been recast. They are intended to form part of a peal of six.

The Bishop of Carlisle on Saturday last consecrated the four new Churches of St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. John, which have been erected at Barrow-in-Furness, at a cost of about £24,000—half of which was given by the Duke of Devonshire and a fourth by the Duke of Buccleuch. They were originally intended to be temporary structures; but on examination by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners they were found to be so substantial that they were accepted as permanent places of worship, and on Saturday they were legally transferred from the donors to the Commissioners. The Commissioners will now be able to give increased grants to the Incumbents.

The Vicar of Northoll, Middlesex, has been presented with a handsome silver salver, in which was engraved the following inscription:—"Presented to the Honourable and Reverend Douglas Hamilton Gordon, M.A., Canon of Salisbury, and Chaplain in Ordinary to her Majesty, on his resigning the living of Northoll, as a tribute of regard and esteem by his parishioners, and in recognition of his cordial relations with them, and his kind, heartfelt, and faithful parochial ministrations among them during the past nineteen years." The cottagers have presented Lady Ellen Hamilton Gordon with beautifully bound copies of the Bible and Book of Common Prayer, "in affectionate remembrance of her kindness and the deep interest taken by her Ladyship in the joys and sorrows of those and their families with whom she has been intimately connected during the space of twenty years." We understand that Mr. Gordon, in resigning the living, intends to devote himself wholly to his duties as Canon residentiary of Salisbury.

The sentence of suspension of the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie was early on Sunday morning affixed to the door of St. Alban's Church by an officer of the Court of Arches. The officer was served with a protest by the churchwardens against affixing to the church door the decree of "a tribunal wholly secular," and Lord Penzance's order was torn down by some unknown person shortly afterwards. A copy of the notice was also served on Mr. Mackonochie. The Rev. W. M. Sinclair, who had been licensed by the Bishop of London to act as Curate in Charge during the suspension, came to the church, accompanied by Mr. J. B. Lee, secretary to the Bishop, and was received in the vestry by Mr. Mackonochie, who read to him a statement declining to give up his charge, as he said, "I have not been suspended by any court which has the authority from God to deprive me of what He has given." Mr. Sinclair then retired, and Mr. Mackonochie officiated at the Communion service, with the ritual usually adopted at St. Alban's. Mr. Stanton preached in the morning and Mr. Mackonochie in the evening, but neither referred to the morning's proceedings.

The parish Church of St. Mary, Hope-under-Dinmore, Herefordshire, was reopened on the 18th inst. by the Bishop of Hereford, who preached in the morning; Archdeacon Lord Saye and Sele being the preacher in the afternoon. The present restoration comprises the entire rebuilding of the nave, the erection of chancel and transept arches; the piercing of a tower arch and west tower window, and placing the font (of thirteenth-century work) under the tower arch, and the building of a small arch from the transept into the chancel aisle, the corbels, columns, capitals, and centre rib of which have been erected of marble in memory of the late Rev. G. Arkwright. An open roof with oak timbers has been placed over the nave, and a large and handsome north porch has been built. The works have been under the superintendence of F. R. Kempson, of Hereford. Amongst the special offerings is a two-light window, by Messrs. Ward and Hughes, to the memory of the Vicar's father, the late Rev. W. H. Wyatt, Canon of Lincoln, Rector of Melton Ross, in that county, and for thirty-seven years Vicar of Sneinton, Nottingham.

The Bishop of London has addressed the following letter to all the beneficed clergy in his diocese:—"Fulham Palace, Nov. 24, 1879. My dear Sir,—I know how difficult in these times is the maintenance of our parochial and other charities, and how unwelcome is an additional appeal for aid; but it is only justice to call your attention to the position in which our diocese—not the poorest in England—stands with reference to the Incorporated Church Building Society. It appears that during the last year (1878) grants were made for churches in the London diocese to the amount of £1895, more than one eighth of the total sum granted to all the dioceses in England; while the total of the contributions we returned to the society from associations and sermons was only £148. It is obvious to plead that we have the Bishop of London's Fund to maintain; and the plea might perhaps be fairly admitted if we sought aid for church building from that fund only; but as long as the promoters of our new churches usually ask and accept grants from the old society as well, it clearly has an equitable claim on the benevolence of the Churchmen of London. I shall, therefore, be very glad if you are able by sermons, or in any other way, to interest your congregation and parishioners in behalf of this society, which has undoubtedly done admirable work in promoting the provision of churches and mission buildings throughout the land.—I am, dear Sir, faithfully yours, J. LONDON."

With reference to a paragraph in this paper of the 15th inst., copied from one of the daily journals, stating that "Clare-market Mission Chapel is again a centre of active religious work," the Rev. R. J. Simpson, late Rector of St. Clement Danes, writes to say that the Clare-market Mission Chapel has not ceased during the last ten years to be a "centre of active religious work." He states this, not so much on his own behalf as in justice to his colleagues who have in succession filled the post of Missionary Curate at Clare-market, and in justice especially to the Rev. Walter Lea, "who worked and resided in the district for nearly six years, who died at his post, and whose devoted and most successful labours were recognised and highly valued, not merely by his loving flock and Rector, but by his Bishop, and by such men as Mr. Gladstone and Lord Hatherley." — Mr. Fairbairn writes from Clare-market to the same purport. He says:—"My attention having been called to a paragraph stating that since the new Incumbent of St. Clement Danes has been there 'Clare-market Mission Chapel is again a centre of active religious work,' and as such a statement may mislead, I beg to say that this has been so to my knowledge during the past seven years, especially while the late Rev. W. Lea, Curate, laboured there, when a deep and lasting religious work was being carried on, he having worked faithfully and earnestly night and day until called up higher by Him whose he was and whom he served until his death. Having laboured in the district as Scripture-reader nearly eight years, I can testify that an earnest and zealous Christian work has during that time been carried on under the active supervision of the late as well as the present Rector of the parish."

GIPSY LIFE ROUND LONDON.

Our Illustration, from a Sketch taken by one of our Artists in the neighbourhood of Latimer-road, Notting-hill, which is not far from Wormwood-scrubbs, shows the habits of living still cherished by the vagabond parties of the singular gipsy folk, who are to be found as well in the outskirts of London, where there are many chances of picking up stray bits of irregular gain, as in more rural parts of the country. The figure of a gentleman, introduced into this sketch, who appears to be conversing with the gipsies in their waggon encampment, is that of Mr. George Smith, of Coalville, Leicester, the well-known benevolent promoter of social reforms, and legislative protection for the long-neglected class of people employed on canal barges, whose families, often living on board those vessels, are sadly in want of domestic comfort, and of education for the children.

At the recent Social Science Congress, at Manchester, Mr. George Smith read the following paper concerning the subject now in hand:—

"Owing to a superstitious regard and dislike the gipsies had towards the Census, and in their endeavour to evade being taken, no correct number has been arrived at, and it is only by guess-work and conjecture we can form any idea of the number of gipsies there are in this country. The Census puts the number at between 4000 and 5000. A gentleman who has lived and moved among them many years writes me to say that there cannot be less than 2000 in the neighbourhood of London, whose paradises are in the neighbourhood of Wormwood-scrubbs, Notting-hill Pottery, New Found Out, Kensal-green, Battersea, Dulwich-common, Lordship-lane, Mitcham-common, Barnes-common, Epping Forest, and like places. Of hawkers, auctioneers, showmen, and others who live in caravans with their families, there would be, at a rough calculation, not less than 2000 children; taking these things, along with others, and the number given in the Census, it may be fairly assumed that I am under the mark when I state that there are not less than 4000 gipsy men and women, and 10,000 to 15,000 gipsy and other children moving about the country outside the educational laws and the pale of civilisation.

"Some few gipsies, who have arrived at what they consider the highest state of a respectable and civilised life, reside in houses which, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, are in the lowest and most degraded part of the towns, among the scum and offscouring of all nations, and, like locusts, they leave a blight behind them wherever they have been. Others have their tents and vans, and there are many others who have tents only. A tent, as a rule, is about 7 ft. 6 in. wide, 16 ft. long, and 4 ft. 6 in. high at the top. They are covered with pieces of old cloth, sacking, &c., to keep the rain and snow out; the opening to allow the gipsies to go in and out of their tent is covered with a kind of coverlet. The fire by which they cook their meals is placed in a kind of tin bucket pierced with holes, and stands on the damp ground. Some of the smoke or sulphur arising from the sticks or coke finds its way through an opening at the top of the tent, about 2 ft. diameter. The other part of the smoke helps to keep their faces and hands the proper gipsy colour. Their beds consist of a layer of straw upon the damp ground, covered with a sack or sheet, as the case may be. An old soap-box or tea-chest serves as a chest of drawers, drawing-room table, and clothes-box. In these places children are born, live, and die. Men, women, grown-up sons and daughters lie huddled together in such a state as would shock the modesty of South African savages to whom we send missionaries to show them the blessings of Christianity. As in other cases where idleness and filth abound, what little washing they do is generally done on the Saturday afternoons; but this is a business they do not indulge in too often. They take their meals and do their washing squatting upon the ground, like tailors and Zulus. Lying, begging, thieving, cheating, and every other abomination that low cunning craft, backed by ignorance and idleness, can devise, they practise. In some instances these things are carried out to such a pitch as to render them more like imbeciles than human beings endowed with reason. Chair-mending, tinkering, and hawking are in many instances used only as a 'blind;' while the women and children go about the country begging and fortune-telling, bringing to their heathenish tents sufficient to keep the family. The poor women are the slaves and tools for the whole family, and can be seen very often with a child upon their backs, another in their arms, and a basket by their side. Upon the shoulders of the women rests the responsibility of providing for the herds of ditch-dwelling heathens. Many of the women enjoy their short pipes quite as much as the men.

"Judging from the conversations I have had with the gipsies in various parts of the country, not more than half living as men and wives are married. No form or ceremony has been gone through, not even 'jumping the broomstick,' as has been reported of them; and, taking the words of a respectable gipsy woman, 'they go together, take each other's words, and there is an end of it.' I am also assured by Levi Boswell, a real respectable gipsy, and a Mrs. Eastwood, a Christian woman and a gipsy, who preaches occasionally, that not half the gipsies who are living as men and wives are married. In the case of some of the adult gipsies living on the outskirts of London an improvement has taken place. There are some good among them, as with others. A gipsy in Wales has built himself a house, at the cost of £600. Considerable difficulty is experienced sometimes in finding them out, as many of the women go by two names; but in vain do I look for any improvement among the children. Owing to the Act relating to pedlars and hawkers prohibiting the granting of licenses for hawking to the youths of both sexes under seventeen, and the Education Acts not being sufficiently strong to lay hold of their dirty, idle, travelling tribes to educate them—except in rare cases—they are allowed to skulk about in ignorance and evil training, without being taught how to get an honest living. No ray of hope enters their breast; their highest ambition is to live and lull about so long as the food comes, no matter by whom or how it comes so that they get it. In many instances they live like pigs and die like dogs. The real old-fashioned gipsy has become lewd and demoralised—if such a thing could be—by allowing his sons and daughters to mix up with the scamps, vagabonds, 'rodneys,' and jail-birds who now and then settle among them as they are camping on the ditch banks. The consequence is our lanes are being infested with a lot of dirty, ignorant gipsies, who, with their tribes of squalid children, have been encouraged by servant girls and farmers, by supplying their wants with eggs, bacon, milk, and potatoes, the men helping themselves to game, to locate in the neighbourhood until they have received the tip from the farmer to pass on to his neighbours. Children born under such circumstances, unless taken hold of by the State, will turn out to be a class of most dangerous characters. Very much, up to the present, the wants of the women and children have been supplied through gulling the large-hearted and liberal-minded they have been brought in contact with, and the result has been that but few of the real gipsies have found their way into gaols. This is a redeeming feature in their character. Probably their offences may have been winked at by the farmers and others, who do not like the idea of having their stacks fired and property destroyed, and have given the gipsies a wide berth.

"Gipsies, as a rule, have very large families. Generally between eight and sixteen children are born in their tents. Owing to their exposure to the damp and cold ground they suffer much from chest and throat complaints. Large numbers of the children die young before they are 'broken in.' And it is a 'breaking in' in a tremendous sense, fraught with fearful consequences.

"Not 5 per cent of the gipsies, &c., travelling about the country in tents and vans can either read or write; and I have not found one gipsy but what thinks it would be a good thing if their tents and vans were registered, and the children compelled to go to school—in fact, many of them are anxious for such a thing to be brought about.

"The plan I would adopt to remedy this sad state of things is to apply the principles of the Canal-Boats Act of 1877 to all movable habitations—i.e., I would have all tents, shows, caravans, auctioneers' vans, and like places used as dwellings registered and numbered, and under proper sanitary arrangements and supervision of the sanitary inspectors and School Board officers in every town and village. With regard to the education of the children, when once the tent or van is registered and numbered, whether travelling as gipsies, auctioneers, &c., their children are mostly idle during the day; consequently, with a book similar to the half-time book, in which their names and attendance at school could be entered, it could be taken from place to place as they travel about, and be endorsed by the schoolmaster, showing that the child was attending school. The education obtained in this way would not be of the highest order; but through the kindness of the schoolmaster—for which extra trouble he should be compensated, as he ought to be under the Canal-Boats Act—and the vigilance of the School Board visitor, a plain, practical, and sound education could be imparted to and obtained by these poor little gipsy children and roadside arabs, who, if we do our duty, will be qualified to fill the places of those of our best artisans who are leaving the country to seek their fortunes abroad."

Colonel Stanley, Secretary of State for War, presided on Saturday night at a distribution of prizes at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, to the successful students in the science class examinations. It was stated that out of 358 students 79 had obtained Queen's prizes and 202 certificates.

The Gazette announces the appointment of the following officers to be Companions of the Bath:—Colonel Frederick Samuel Blyth, Colonel Thomas Gilbert Kennedy, Colonel Robert Bruce Chichester, Colonel John James Hood Gordon, Colonel Richard Preston, Colonel Henry Richard Legge Newdigate, Colonel William Stirling, Colonel Henry Moore, C.I.E., Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Gordon Rogers, Lieutenant-Colonel Augustus Arthur Currie, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Ralph Drury Kerr, Lieutenant-Colonel James Vere Hunt, Lieutenant-Colonel Francis Brownlow, Lieutenant-Colonel William Dalrymple Tompson, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Tyndall, Lieutenant-Colonel George Luck, Major John Withers McQueen, Major Frederick John Keen, Deputy Surgeon-General Alexander Smith, M.D.; Deputy Surgeon-General John Hendley.—Promotion has also been conferred on between sixty and seventy officers in recognition of their services during the late Afghan campaign.—The official announcement of the appointment of Captain Eyre Massey Shaw to be a Companion of the Bath, Civil Division, also appears in the Gazette.

SCULLING-MATCH FOR THE CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE WORLD ON THE PARAMATTA RIVER, SYDNEY, NEW SOUTH WALES.

THE LATE CONSUL AT ARICA.

The war now going on between Chili and Peru has again provoked serious anxiety for the safety of British private and public interests in the commercial ports of that western South American Coast. This seems a fitting occasion to present a brief memorial, with a portrait, of that most diligent, able, and energetic, public servant, the late Mr. George Hodges Nugent, her Majesty's Consul at Arica, who died on March 25, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was the second son of an old Peninsular officer, Commissary-General Nugent. In 1842 he went to South America, as temporary private secretary to Mr. Pitt Adams, then British Chargé-d'Affaires at Lima. He gained the approval and confidence of his chief, who induced him to remain in the country, and in 1846 appointed him Vice-Consul at Arica. That port was a principal station of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company's, then recently established, line of West Coast steamers, and was also the main source of the valuable supplies of nitrate of soda. Mr. Nugent, at this important post, soon gained considerable influence. In the revolutions which have been so frequent in the Peruvian Republic, Arica was often exposed to the attacks of contending factions. He was invariably treated by both parties with the greatest respect; he was able upon many occasions to mitigate the sufferings of the people and to prevent the destruction of life as well as property. For these successful efforts, and for the courage and promptitude with which he acted, Mr. Nugent twice received the thanks of his own Government, and once of the French Government. His own fortunes prospered, in the meantime, till, in 1868, the port of Arica was visited by a destructive earthquake and tidal wave, some Illustrations of which, it may be recollected, were given in this Journal. Mr. Nugent, among other sufferers by that enormous calamity, saw the results of his twenty-two years of industry swept away in half an hour. Through all the horrors of that day, which a thick darkness rendered more appalling, his presence of mind and coolness never failed. He greatly assisted the local authorities in maintaining order and providing relief for the people. When obliged to quit the town, he carried his wife and family off to the hills, and during the time there spent, though without shelter or food for many hours, he found means to write a short but graphic account of the calamity which had befallen Arica. These letters of his, by finding their way into English and American journals were esteemed masterpieces of simple descriptive narrative, and were afterwards translated into several languages. Mr. Nugent then found brief respite; but a violent outbreak of yellow fever consequent upon the upheaval by the earthquake of dead bodies from the burial-ground, and the stoppage of all drainage in the town, brought him once more to the front. He returned to his post to assist the medical officers, investigating the ravages of the pest, and, when they died in attendance on the sick, himself taking their place, watching the patients, administering medicines, finally burying the dead or reading the burial service. These unselfish and undaunted efforts in the cause of humanity won Mr. Nugent a host of friends at Arica. In a shorter time than could have been expected, he had begun to build up a second fortune, when, in May, 1876, a tremendous wave, preceded by an earthquake, again swept over the port and town, carrying with it once more the larger portion of his property and savings. Yet the indomitable pluck which had carried Mr. Nugent through so many trials did not even now forsake him. He made great efforts to retrieve his fortunes, and set on foot an extensive waterworks company for the supply of that town. But, his health failing at last, he was compelled to seek change of climate, and repaired, with his wife, a Spanish lady of Lima, by whom he had a large family, to Mollendo, where he died. Mr. Nugent was an accomplished man, an excellent linguist—being master of French, Spanish, and German—and a gentleman highly esteemed by all his acquaintance. He did much, in many ways, to improve the condition of the town, introducing gas, pure water, and an efficient system of drainage. The amount of good that is sometimes to be done by a public-spirited, active, and judicious British Consul is little comprehended by the generality of people at home.

The portrait is from a photograph by E. Courret, of Lima.

THE LATE MR. G. H. NUGENT, BRITISH CONSUL AT ARICA.

THE SCULLING CHAMPIONSHIP RACE AT SYDNEY.

Aquatic sports being the pride of men of English race all over the world, in Australia and North America as well as in the British Isles, our readers will please to remember that the sculling champion of all the world is Trickett, of New South Wales, who won that distinction from Sadler, in this country. But on Aug. 29, in that pretty creek of Sydney harbour which is called the Paramatta River, the champion Trickett had to contest his honours with Laycock, another Australian; of which important event we are furnished by Mr. L. Sedgefield, our Special Artist at Sydney, with an effective illustration. The race was rowed down the river and against the tide. The course was rather less than three miles and a quarter, from the Bathing-house to a beacon on the rocks called "The Brothers." Our view is taken from below, at the Rowing Club Shed, so as to include the Brothers Rocks and their Beacon, with some beautiful park-like scenery of the shores, and the piers of a new bridge in the distance. The intermediate places are Gladesville Wharf, Putney, and Kissing Point. Laycock, who had the choice of stations, took the south or near to shore place, and got first away, in his boat the Bessie, one of Swaddle and Winship's, imported expressly to beat the Champion. But after a quarter of a mile, Laycock being still half a length ahead, Trickett coolly put on a stronger stroke, went forward in a few seconds, and got a decided lead of one length. After the first mile this lead was increased to two lengths, and in passing Putney it was three. Laycock strove manfully to recover his chance, but hugged the south shore too much, seeking to avoid the tide, while Trickett made a more direct course. Off the Rowing Club shed the Champion rushed on ten lengths ahead, and won the race very easily indeed. The time was twenty-six minutes and a half. Trickett's next competitor is to be Hanlon, of Canada.

The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs on Saturday afternoon visited the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind at Upper Norwood, where higher education is given to the blind from all parts of the kingdom, and which is working most successfully. The Lord Mayor expressed his high opinion of the work that was being done by the college, and his desire to give what assistance might be in his power during his mayoralty. The programme of music comprised a solo on the organ by Master W. F. Schwier, a solo on the piano by Master A. Hollins, and a solo on the violin by Prince Alexander of Hesse; the vocalists being Mr. Wilmot, Miss A. Campbell, and Miss J. Dick. Several part-songs were also sung by the choir in a proficient manner.

POLITICAL.

Mr. Gladstone delivered battle in the heart of Midlothian on Tuesday; but a series of rattling rifle discharges, so to speak, preceded the cannon's opening roar, and may have diminished the effect of the big gun's prolonged diapason in Edinburgh. To quit imagery, it should be stated that Mr. Gladstone left Liverpool on Monday morning (accompanied by Mrs. and Miss Gladstone), and proceeded by train northwards from Edgehill station, receiving a popular welcome from dense crowds of people at Preston, at Carlisle (whereat addresses were received by him in the Townhall), at Hawick, Galashiels, returning thanks in pithy speeches at each place. Not in cheers alone did all these vociferous gatherings greet Mr. Gladstone. At Carlisle the right hon. gentleman was presented with the substantial gift of a suit in Border tweed cloth, the handiwork of a deputation from Langholm; whilst at Galashiels Mrs. Gladstone was presented by a lady (Mrs. Liddell) with a travelling plaid, subscribed for by the mill-women. The Ministry was made the target of some well-aimed shots in the course of this skirmishing advance to the supposititious stronghold of the Duke of Buccleuch; and the epithet "phantom voters" was hurled at those who "by legal chicanery" were enabled to indulge in the political pastime of "faggot-voting." The right hon. gentleman was accorded another hearty reception when the train glided into the Waverley Station, Edinburgh. There he received an address from the Midlothian Liberal Association; and particularly animated was the scene offered when, amid the enthusiastic demonstrations of the people lining the thoroughfare, Mr. Gladstone and party were driven in Lord Rosebery's barouche through Princes-street, the flashing lights from the brilliant shops and the Edinburgh and Royal hotels adding to the liveliness of the spectacle.

The picturesqueness of Mr. Gladstone's hearty reception was not exhausted, but was increased, when an address from the Provost of Queensferry having been duly acknowledged, the carriage entered Dalmeny Park, the beautiful seat of Mr. Gladstone's host, the Earl of Rosebery. Here countless torch-bearers formed an escort, and a flight of rockets signalised the arrival, whilst, to crown all, the Countess of Rosebery was in waiting to welcome Mr. Gladstone to Dalmeny Park. On Tuesday Mr. Gladstone began in earnest his attack on the "faggot votes"—presumably Scottish chevaux des frises—which Lord Dalkeith is alleged to have thrown out to defend his position. It has already been intimated that this preliminary assault, perhaps, suffered in effect from the expenditure of strength and energy on the previous day. But the Scots present in the Edinburgh Music Hall apparently did not find their patience overtaxed by the oration of close upon two hours' duration. Sir David Wedderburn, M.P., took the chair, and the audience (who could hardly be familiar with the House of Commons) did not seem to be in any way discouraged when Sir George Campbell, among other members of Parliament, followed the right hon. gentleman on to the platform. Much as a cat plays with a mouse before dispatching it, the Duke of Buccleuch was first of all patted on the back in the most friendly manner by Mr. Gladstone, who avowed that he had had the honour of "sitting as the colleague of the Duke of Buccleuch in the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel;" but this complimentary allusion did but make the scathing denunciation of the reported promotion of "faggot voting" by the Buccleuch party tell more forcibly. In passing, it was claimed that Sir Robert Peel would have been "found contending with us" had he lived. The Government were then censured by implication for not having followed the usual custom and dissolved Parliament at the close of the sixth Session. What influenced Ministers to break the rule? Fear of the national verdict; and the hope that within the next twelvemonth

There would be secured the chance of striking some new theatrical stroke; there would be the chance of sending up some new rocket into the sky—(laughter)—the chance of taking some measure which would carry misgiving and dismay to the hearts of the sober-minded portion of the nation—as I believe at this time the great majority of the nation—but which, appealing to pride and passion, would in this, as in every country, find some loud-voiced minority ready to echo back its ill-omened sounds, and again to disturb the world, to destroy confidence, to unsettle business and the employments of life, to hold out false promises of greatness, but really to alienate from this country the sympathies of the civilised world, and to prepare for us the day of misfortune and of dishonour.

With a caustic allusion to Lord Beaconsfield's declaration at the Guildhall that "peace may be maintained," the speaker went on to fear there were more Ministerial "projects in the air," Lords Derby and Carnarvon not being now in the Cabinet to restrain their colleagues. The well-worn themes of the eastward movements of the Fleet, the Anglo-Turkish Convention, Cyprus, the Afghan and Zulu Wars (Sir Bartle Frere being the scapegoat of the latter) were referred to; and then Mr. Gladstone excited some laughter by remarking that again the Fleet was to be sent to the Dardanelles, adding:—

It is just like a theatrical manager with his stock pieces. When he has exhausted them all he must begin them again (Loud laughter and cheers).

The more than thrice-told story of the Eastern Question was next entered upon to show that the action of the Liberal Party in opposing the Government was quite justifiable. Much interest was roused by a sentence which here dropped:—

I hope that the verdict of the country will give to Lord Granville and Lord Hartington the responsible charge of its affairs; but I must say I think them much to be pitied the day that charge is committed to their hands (Laughter).

Touching on finance, Mr. Gladstone repeated that he left a surplus of from five to six millions. The Army, so far from being weakened, was strengthened by the abolition of purchase and creation of a reserve by Lord Cardwell; and Lord Derby admitted our relations with Powers were satisfactory when he became Foreign Secretary. The British Empire, as it had been for years, Satisfied Mr. Pitt. Mr. Canning; it satisfied Sir Robert Peel; it satisfied Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, and the late Lord Derby; and why cannot it satisfy, I wish to know, Lord Beaconsfield and his colleagues.

Earnest deprecation of the assumption of fresh responsibilities in South Africa was followed by the assertion that in the East the Government were now doing what the Liberal Party had advocated for the last two years—viz., coercing the Porte. Finally, Mr. Gladstone ended a glowing peroration by saying, "God defend the right!"

Mr. Gladstone subsequently, in reply to the City of Edinburgh's address, entered into some interesting particulars concerning his personal associations with Edinburgh and Scotland.

At the Corn Exchange, Dalkeith, Mr. Gladstone gave on Wednesday, to an immense audience, the second of his election addresses. He began with a short summary of his previous attack upon the foreign policy of the Government, as a policy devoid of prudence, by involving this country in new and strange engagements in almost every part of the world. Turning to home matters, he cautioned the electors against expecting immediate benefit when the Liberals return to office, as they will succeed to an inheritance of financial confusion, and will have at first to deal with the perplexing consequences of the errors of the present Administration. Scotland, he contended, was inadequately represented in the House of Commons. He accepted the conclusion that the law of hypothec ought to be abolished. He saw no reason for objecting to the principle of local option in regard to the liquor laws. The disestablishment of the Church of Scotland was a question for the people to determine, and the friends of the Church must ask that it should not be condemned without having a fair trial. As to the land laws, he was heartily with the tenant in his struggle to obtain all possible freedom in his method of cultivation. The law of entail and settlement should be repealed. It was a strange anomaly that the counties should remain without representative institutions. He was friendly to granting large local prerogatives; and if Ireland, or any other part of the United Kingdom, was desirous and able to arrange the local portion of its affairs, it would relieve an over-weighted Parliament and accomplish a great national good.

On the same day Mrs Gladstone received presents from the ladies and operative women at Dalkeith. Mr. Gladstone, who subsequently spoke, addressed himself specially to women, whose influence, he said, ought to be brought to bear on the coming election, for the questions involved in the foreign policy of the Government were questions of humanity. Whilst commending the bravery of our soldiers in performing an ungrateful task, he condemned the Zulu and Afghan campaigns as unjustifiable.

The programme for the rest of the week was a heavy one, comprising a speech at West Calder on Thursday, the meeting of Liberal leaders of Midlothian at Dalmeny on Friday, and on Saturday a speech in the afternoon at the Corn Exchange, and an address in the evening to working men in the Waverley Market. Next week Mr. Gladstone promises, strength permitting, to deliver his rectorial address at Glasgow on Friday morning, and to deliver a political address the same day.

Political leaders of both parties pretty generally appear to have held their breath whilst Mr. Gladstone has occupied the arena. It should be mentioned, however, that the Duke of Argyll has answered the Marquis of Salisbury's letter to the Times; and that among the exceptions to the general rule of reticence may be named the Hon. A. F. Egerton and Mr. Hardcastle, who vigorously defended the Ministry at Prestwich on Saturday last; Mr. Jacob Bright, who, with Mr. H. Dunckley, as vigorously attacked the Government at Withington the same night; and Mr. Peter Rylands, who came up smiling, in company with Mr. Briggs, at the Heywood Reform Club on Saturday. Mr. Bourke, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the course of an address to his constituents on Wednesday night, referred at great length to the subject of India, vigorously defending the plans pursued by the Government. Mr. E. Stanhope addressed a political meeting the same evening at Grantham, and in the course of his speech replied to the criticisms of the Opposition on the policy of the Government.

With regard to the Irish agitation, that has now reached the province of the police authorities. Messrs. Davitt, Daly, and Killen, apprehended last week for the use of seditious language at rent meetings, have been committed for trial by the Sligo magistrates.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Though the flat-racing season of 1879 closed "mid ice and snow," yet, in another sense, it has been one of the warmest on record for backers, and they could well have dispensed with the whole of the Manchester programme, instead of merely giving up the last day. The Lancashire Cup on the Wednesday produced one of the best handicap fields of the season, as the starters included well-tried performers like Avontes (8 st. 11 lb.), La Merveille (8 st. 8 lb.), Melton (8 st. 7 lb.), Lord Clive (8 st. 2 lb.), Cradle (7 st. 9 lb.), and Reconciliation (7 st. 5 lb.). Robbie Burns (8 st. 31b.) had all the worst of the weights with everything in the race; but he held a good place throughout, and, creeping up gradually in the last quarter of a mile, won cleverly by a length. This was decidedly one of the smartest performances of the year, and, but for going amiss at Doncaster, "Robbie" must have beaten everything except Rayon d'Or in the Leger, while the great Frenchman himself would not have secured a verdict of "won in a canter by five lengths." The winner was not much fancied by the public generally, but he was a tremendous favourite compared with Mars (6 st. 10 lb.), the winner of the Manchester November Handicap, on the Friday. It may be remembered that the old horse was within an ace of beating Touchet for the Lincolnshire Handicap last March, and now, after working hard all the season with very little result, he landed a 25 to 1 chance, and upset no end of money intrusted to Adamite (6 st. 9 lb.), who was going very well and strongly at the finish, but could not get within a length of him. Belphœbe (8 st. 4 lb.) ran badly; and the course was half a mile too far for Sir Joseph (7 st. 12 lb.), who was the outsider of the party. Telescope and Hackthorpe were favourites for a weight-for-age cup over five furlongs; but once more the bookmakers had matters all their own way, as Luke beat them both on the two-year-old Fallow Deer, who was scarcely supported for a shilling. It was found impossible to race on Saturday, owing to the snow.

In spite of frightfully adverse weather and heavy falls of snow, the Kempton Park authorities persevered "to the bitter end," and, by dint of sweeping, bush-harrowing, &c., managed to bring off their programme in its entirety, though the course was really quite unfit for racing. Archer and Wood, after being reprimanded and suspended respectively at Manchester, journeyed to the suburban meeting, where both had some winning mounts, so that the latter's punishment became rather a farce. Avontes (8 st. 12 lb.), who has been a disappointing horse of late, won the Teddington Handicap, in which Advance (8 st. 11 lb.) also ran well; and we need not mention any other event, except the Kempton Park November Handicap, to which £500 was added. Ragman (7 st. 3 lb.), the Cambridgeshire failure, looked like winning until he was well inside the distance, where St. Augustine (6 st. 6 lb.) caught him and secured a two-lengths' verdict. Unfortunately, his jockey omitted to weigh in with the hood which the colt wore in the race, and he was disqualified by the stewards, who, however, granted a case for the consideration of the Jockey Club. Should their decision be upheld, Bute (7 st. 8 lb.) will become second, and Typhoon (7 st. 4 lb.), whom the judges fortunately placed fourth, third. St. Augustine will be remembered as a very smart youngster; and, after a comparatively unprofitable season, his disqualification is very hard luck for Sir W. Lethbridge.

The American Billiard Tournament at the Aquarium, which proved a grand success in the way of attendance, has resulted in the victory of W. Mitchell, the young Sheffielder. His play has been very remarkable, as he scarcely ever failed to score a hundred off the balls once in each game, which was the more noteworthy from the fact that he only had 380 to make in each heat. George Collins, who managed the affair exceeding well throughout, made the best break of the handicap, a splendid 255 (84 "spots"); while Joseph Bennett was in grand form, 244 and 191 (19 and 35 "spots") being his best runs during the tournament. Mitchell is by no means a taking player, being very deliberate, but he has plenty of nerve, and his exhibition against Joseph Bennett on Tuesday evening shows that he is a dangerous opponent for anyone. He received 200 points in an exhibition game of 1000 up, and won by no less than 511 points, making a very brilliant unfinished break of 259 (63 and 12 "spots"). The score at the finish of the tournament was—Mitchell, six games; J. Roberts, sen., five; J. Bennett and D. Richards, four each; G. Collins, three; and F. Bennett, G. Hunt, and J. Lloyd, two each; so that the veteran ex-champion, who was the only conqueror of Mitchell, takes the second prize.

The Oxford and Cambridge Boat-race will, in the ordinary course of events, take place on Saturday, March 20, being much sooner than usual, owing to the early fall of Easter, which regulates the fixture. The Oxford University Trial Eight-Oar Race is fixed for Saturday, Dec. 6, at Moulsford, on the Great Western line.

Many of the novelties introduced this season in the way of Christmas Cards exhibit a fertile fancy and a delicate taste. Mr. Herman Rothe, of King-street, Covent-garden, publishes many ingenious and appropriate designs, including cards, calendars, pictures, and nursery pictures. Last-century costumes, sporting scenes, and the flowers of the month are among the subjects treated. Mr. Arthur Ackerman, of Regent-street, agent for Messrs. Prang and Co., of Boston, Mass., has an amusing collection both of the American publishers and of his own. Of Mr. Hildesheimer's productions in this way we have already spoken in words of praise. Equalling the best of these are the specimens forwarded by Mr. William Luks, of Bedford-street, Covent-garden, of Christmas and New-Year's Cards, with two excellent photographic portraits of the Princess of Wales. Mr. F. D. Butler, of Great Portland-street, has issued two sets of Twelfth-Night Characters—the Shakspeare series and the Medley series—accompanied by instructions as to the mode of using them.

"THE LADIES' TREASURY, while much cheaper in price, contains many of those features of excellence which distinguish the higher-class fashion magazines. In addition to this, it is a perfect repository of useful information for the housewife, also of light and entertaining reading for everybody."—Wakefield Express.

"THE LADIES' TREASURY is, as usual, one of the most varied of the magazines, having 22 articles, besides all the fashion and needlework plates and woodcuts. A chapter on Grass, the Rose and Lily, and a sketch of St. Louis's Mother, Blanche of Castile, are among the most noteworthy items."—Church Times.

"THE LADIES' TREASURY still holds its own among the many Magazines of Fashion now in existence. In many respects it is unique. The Coloured Fashion-Plates which it contains are always of the most elegant design."—Folkestone Express.

"THE LADIES' TREASURY is in reality a household magazine. In these days, when education in domestic matters is so much insisted upon, we know of no magazine better calculated to help forward the work"—Preston Herald.

BUTTON-HOLE WORKER.

BUTTON-HOLE WORKER.

BUTTON-HOLE WORKE

BUTTON-HOLE WORKER.
BY ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.
Speed and Beauty. A Button-Hole a Minute. Sixty Button-Holes in an Hour.
For the Thickest Cloth or Finest Cambric.
It is impossible to convey by advertisement an idea of the unique and wonderful features of this ingenious appliance for cutting and working button-holes. It is so simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced needlewoman can without it. Every stitch is taken with most perfect mechanical accuracy. No pricking the fingers or straining the eyes, and by its use an imperfect and irregular worked button-hole is impossible. The speed and utility are marvellous. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies and Sempstresses who use them say they are worth their weight in gold. No work-basket is complete without one. Is used entirely independent of the sewing-machine, and will last as long as a thimble. A Worker and Button-Hole Cutter, neatly packed in box, sent on receipt of P.O.O. or stamps, 2s. 6d.

A. Defenders were compelled to leave this position by the fire from a bastion in their rear.
B. Defenders were driven from here by the fire of the enemy, who had gained the opposite corner; here were loopholes, made to answer the fire from the bastion.
C. The enemy occupied this part, and set fire to the building.
D. Here the defenders made their final stand. The enemy having dragged a gun into the narrow lane on the other side of the wall, Lieutenant Hamilton charged out here three times, and here at last he fell, after killing five men with his own hand.

RUINS OF THE BRITISH RESIDENCY AT CABUL.
FROM A SKETCH BY A MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.

THE RESIDENCY AT CABUL.

We are favoured, by two occasional correspondents who have accompanied the British army corps under the command of General Sir F. Roberts to Cabul, with Illustrations of the ruined buildings that were inhabited by Sir Louis Cavagnari, the late Resident Envoy there, and the other members of the Legation, and which were the scene of the ferocious attack upon them on Sept. 3, the desperate defence, and the final massacre of our gallant countrymen by the insurgent Afghan soldiery and city rabble. These views of the site of a terrible disaster and an enormous crime, the political consequences of which are likely to alter the future condition of Afghanistan, and the relations of our Indian Empire to the Mohammedan States of Central Asia, to a degree beyond our present calculation, will be regarded with a melancholy interest, on account of the lamented death of those esteemed public servants, employed in a peaceful diplomatic mission, slain by the cruel hands of lawless outrage. It will, however, be remembered with satisfaction that these gentlemen, Major Sir L. Cavagnari, Lieutenant Walter Pollock Hamilton, Mr. William Jenkyns, and Dr. Ambrose Kelly, with their small band of sixty faithful Punjaub Guides, made as good a fight for their lives as was ever displayed by men of any nation, and proved that Englishmen are not to be butchered like sheep, though it was a hopeless struggle when the Ameer Yakoob Khan, whether from cowardice or treachery, forbore any real effort for their assistance during the long hours of fierce conflict that day.

Our front-page Engraving, from a Sketch by Surgeon W. A. Simmons, shows the interior of the Residency buildings looking northwards, and the position where that little party of brave men, defending the Residency against five thousand armed barbarians and fanatical assassins, took refuge at the last hour of the protracted combat. The upper parapet, it will be seen, had been perforated with loopholes, hastily made by the besieged, for the purpose of firing through them upon the mob of assailants below. The walls, being constructed of dried mud or plaster laid over thin brickwork, are everywhere marked with bullet-holes, and so are the doors likewise. It was supposed that the dead body of Sir Louis Cavagnari might yet be discovered lying under the heaps of débris from the fallen walls of the building. To the left hand of this view appears a small turret rising outside, which is that of the Kala Feringhee, whence the Afghans were enabled to fire upon the roof of the Residency.

The view presented in our other Illustration, from a Sketch by a different hand, exhibits the whole range of positions which were occupied, at successive stages of the defence, by the besieged garrison, either within, or upon the roof and walls of the extensive buildings, and the inclosed courtyards between them. The Upper Bala Hissar fort, which commands the entire precinct and its neighbourhood, and indeed all the city of Cabul, is seen at two hundred yards' distance, on the rising ground to the left hand. This fort remaining actually under the orders of the Ameer, we should think it would have been feasible for him to have quickly dispersed the insurgents around the Residency, by commanding a few shot or shell to be thrown amongst them from its powerful batteries. But no measure of efficient coercion was either attempted or threatened by the unworthy ruler of Cabul, who had so recently been placed on the throne by virtue of the British alliance. The commission of inquiry, however, which has now finished its task of procuring and examining the evidence with regard to the events of Sept. 3, will soon report upon the conduct and presumed motives of Yakoub Khan. It is not, therefore, requisite here to anticipate the verdict; but no one can doubt that he failed to do what he might have done in several ways to save the lives of the British Envoy and his companions that day.

The spectator of this view of the different positions held by the defenders in the Residency premises must suppose himself to be standing upon the flat roof of the buildings, at one corner of the paved courtyard, in which the escort of Punjaub Guides had been accustomed to live. The rooms inhabited by Sir Louis Cavagnari, which are still intact, are situated directly beneath the angle of the roof, which is in the foreground of our View. The octagonal building, marked B, in the centre of the background, was surmounted by a lofty tower. The building consisted of small bricks, plastered with mud, the débris from which now lies heaped against the bottom of the walls. The whole place was entirely commanded by the enemy's fire, as is proved by innumerable bullet-marks, and by an occasional shot-mark from guns on the bastion above. The low cells, D, into which Lieutenant Hamilton, and the few last remaining of the defenders with him, managed to get for refuge, were bath-rooms; and these were fireproof, being wholly built of mud. Here they were partially screened against the fire that came from the point A, which the enemy had then gained, and latterly from the courtyard. But there was a gun, within eight yards of them, in the lane outside the wall, and a breach had been made in the wall, through which the enemy fired this gun into the chambers still held by Lieutenant Hamilton and the others. Hamilton then charged out upon the enemy, and was killed; Mr. Jenkyns was killed in another of these chambers, while Sir L. Cavagnari, as he lay wounded in the courtyard, had been crushed and buried under the falling ruins of the building when it was burned down. Dr. Kelly, who was attending on him, is believed to have perished in a similar manner. Such was the fate of our brave countrymen, so far as it can now be ascertained; and the accounts we had previously received become more intelligible by the aid of these correct Illustrations of the place and its ruins.

We have little or no important news this week, or indeed for several weeks past, concerning the progress of British intervention and military occupation in Afghanistan. The main body of General Roberts's forces, joined by those which advanced from Jellalabad, has settled for the winter in its cantonments of Sherpore, close to the city of Cabul. The separate command in the Khyber Valley has been terminated, and the troops along that line have no further duty than guarding the route of communications, which is continued by the Lataband Pass, instead of the Khoord Cabul or Jugdulluk, to the plain of Cabul. But General Baker's brigade has been operating in the Maidan district, against some hostile tribes and broken remnants of the late Afghan army. There was a movement last Monday, at which Sir F. Roberts was present, but the enemy, though in a strong fortified position, declined the engagement and fled, leaving the neighbouring villages to be burnt, the people having gone away. The telegraphic communication between Cabul and Peshawur is completed; and Sir Richard Temple is now proceeding rapidly with the construction of the railway towards the Bolan Pass. The Standard of Wednesday first published the telegrams of its correspondents at Cabul and Candahar dispatched on Tuesday, which marks a great improvement in the expeditious transmission of news. But the information just now coming to hand is both scanty and of slight interest. Sir F. Roberts has returned to Cabul to confer with General Bright about securing the lines of communication; and the chief object of those troops which still keep the field is to collect forage, chopped hay and the like, for the use of the British army. The cold is extreme in camp at Cabul; the troops are hutted, but lack warm clothing. Yakoub Khan is kept a close prisoner. The position of Ayoub Khan at Herat, besieged by his own soldiery, is considered very precarious. Most of the Afghan Sirdars have joined the British side.

THE DUDLEY GALLERY.

A higher level seems to be attained in this present exhibition of cabinet pictures in oil than we are accustomed to find at this gallery. Several painters of established reputation have contributed, some of them for the first time; and many younger less-known artists evince a command of the material resources of art which should be of fair promise. It is beyond question that the power of placing pigments on canvas with artistic effect adequate to the humble subjects and modest scale almost invariably chosen, has been much more widely attained in our school in recent years. But though such power should be but the means to higher aims and nobler ends, it is very rare indeed that the self-imposed limits are passed. It is not merely that in this as in other English exhibitions there are scarcely any attempts to deal with a poetical or historical theme, but it is evident that study is not directed for instance to the subtleties of facial expression, or anatomical truth in the figures, or style in treatment, or sentiment in landscape, which are the essential elements of every work of art as understood by the Old Masters and taught by them to their pupils. The unpleasant conclusion is that, with all our petty activity, our system of art-education only helps the student up the lowest rounds of the ladder. We may be sure that if a superior article were presented to the public the demand for it would arise.

The few attempts here to educe imaginative or historical interest are, it must be admitted, not very encouraging. Under the title "Rehearsing the Tableau" (445), Mr. G. F. Watts sends a small, unimportant study of a young lady, or feminine-looking youth, in Italian armour, which may be intended for a Sir Galahad or a reminiscence of Raphael's St. George. Above it is a sketch with some decorative feeling for "The Dream of Endymion," by W. C. Symons. And above it again—hung too high for fair examination—is a little picture, which seems to be poetically treated, called "The Dancers," by Sidney Starr. Mr. R. Macbeth's "Bacchante" (64) is ill-drawn, forced in action, and absurd as regards the introduction of the greyhounds; yet it is preferable to his prosaic "Lady Bountiful" (207). By Mr. Alma-Tadema there is a little picture of a nude Roman lady standing in the frigidarium or tepidarium cooling herself with a large sponge, after her hot and vapour bath in the caldarium, and turning towards a bronze amorino astride a triton (from whose mouth issues a douche), as though to whisper some confidence—as suggested by the title, "A Safe Confidante" (240). The work is, however, hardly worthy of the painter, either in conception or execution. At the head of the room is a poetically-suggestive picture by Mr. McWhirter, called "Old Rome," representing a view at night under the Arch of Titus with the moonlight falling under the coffered ceiling full on one of the reliefs commemorative of the conquest of Jerusalem, and the Coliseum dimly seen in the distance. The slightness of the execution helps the expression of the vague effect of moonlight. But most of the contributions from the Academic ranks are chiefly noteworthy for the insignificant or puerile nature of their subjects. Among the most acceptable are Mr. G. D. Leslie's small picture (66)—by-the-way, rather harder in effect and cruder in colour than usual—of the back-yard of an old manor-house with quaint red-brick walls and formal woodwork screen, and a pretty girl with her little sister watching chickens feeding; Mr. Yeames's group (93) of children at play in a glazed, tiled, and arcaded porch, which is nicely, indeed too nattily and cleanly wrought; and Mr. Briton Rivière's "Cave Canem" (51), a very capitally painted white bull pup planted on his haunches in a doorway, with his air of infantine impotence so cunningly dashed with a sort of truculent self-assertion, that, in conjunction with the title, the impression is irresistibly droll. Mr. P. R. Morris sends a picture of a boy regarding a number of turkeys strutting, spreading their tail-feathers, and gobbling, with the punning title, "The Condition of Turkey" (143), well painted enough, but hardly what the artist has led us to expect. It will suffice to mention Mr. Val Prinsep's bust (258) of a Lady, and Mr. Burgess's "Study of an Eastern Head" (297).

Among works by "rising artists" the following are specially commendable. Mr. Haywood Hardy's "Trial of Patience" (221), a little lady in a garden-chair restraining a dog from disturbing a cat that is sipping milk from a plate, and a couple of equestrian figures in Georgian costumes fording a stream. Mr. Bridgman, the very promising young American artist, has three pictures, admirably drawn and modelled, but smooth in texture—in this respect only too closely resembling the work of his master, Gérome, especially in "Egyptian Priest and Scribe" (274). Another picture of naked children playing half buried in soft sea-sand will be a general favourite. Mr. Brewtnall's "Spring" (26), a young lady with a background of blossoming trees, is artistic in colouring. An agreeable combination of rustic figures and landscape, with workman-like qualities, are presented in Mr. F. Morgan's "Gleaners" (122); and the same may be said—a sense of grace more than compensating for possibly less strength—of Miss Havers's (Mrs. Morgan's) "The Spring" and "In the Heat of the Day" (56), the last a pathetic picture of a mother carrying her tired child. Mr. Tissot (who may be regarded as naturalised among us) sends two pictures of choicer quality than he has been turning out of late for dealers. In one, called "The Warrior's Daughter" (191), we see an invalided old gentleman being wheeled in a Bath-chair, and a young lady walking by his side. In "Quiet" (243), the same young lady with nez-retroussé—the type to which the artist has been so constant since his advent to this country—reappears reading under the shadow of a tree. A little black in the shadows, as usual, and slightly monotonous in the greens, there is yet much exquisite painting in these pictures. Note in particular the head of the little girl who threatens to disturb the "quiet" of the last-named picture. Mr. F. Barnard's "Scene from Dickens's 'Battle of Life'" (158) contains two very pretty and well-painted female figures. Mr. Waterhouse's "Dolce far Niente" (13) has a happy harmony of blue and bluish-green in the draperies. Mr. C. N. Kennedy's portrait of a lady (222) seems to exaggerate the individuality, but the execution is excellent. Mr. Wynfield has expended much careful creditable painting on an ill-chosen subject in his garden scene (298) with formal rows of blazing "Tulips." Mr. F. W. W. Topham's "Pets" (285)—a lady feeding pigeons in an Italian court—is, we believe, a replica of a larger picture.

We must be content to name C. Calthrop's "Republican" (286), a lady arranging a tricolour favour; Van Haanen's "Siesta in a Church at Venice" (123), the painting testifying to the good fruits of training in the Antwerp school, but spoilt by the vulgarity of the yawning girl; G. Koberwein Terrell's "Nut-brown Maid" (82); F. S. Muschamp's "Tangled Skein" (223), brilliant and clever; G. C. Hindley's "Toper" (196), bold and artistic in touch; Mr. Hopkins's fox-hunting scene, "Who-whoop" (8); E. Hume's "Driftwood" (245), Schevening children carrying home baskets full of the same; J. C. Dollman's "Her Dog" (62)—a gentleman making advances to a surly brute of a Dutch pug in the absence of his mistress—hard in effect, but the story well told; and contributions by Laura Alma-Tadema, A. Hill, Walter S. Stacey, C. E. Perugini, Clement N. Swift, Charlotte A. Smith, H. King, Jessica Hayllar, and two foreign artists, Nos. 420 and 424. There are also small animal-pieces by Messrs. R. Ansdell, S. Cooper, and H. H. Couldery.

The landscapes comprise several works of mark, though this department appears to be less rich than heretofore. Coast scenes with lively seas, and, generally, with boats, abound. Foremost among these are Mr. Hemy's "A Fair Wind Out" (136)—a fishing-smack leaving Calais harbour, and a row-boat making for home (190). Hamilton Macallum's richly-coloured boat-load of cheery "Herring-Curers" (284), male and female; and Colin Hunter's "Naturalist," a Scotch laddie speculating on the growths and life among the rocks that fringe a sparkling sea. And besides these there are two spirited but slatey-hued studies of open sea by H. Moore. Although Mr. Hemy owes his art-education to Belgium, and Messrs. Macallum and Hunter belong to the Scotch schools, there is an approximation in the method by which all seek to express the brilliance, motion, and transparency of the sea. Too much reliance is placed in tricks of impasto wherewith to render sparkling lights. This is especially observable in the works of the Scotch painters; whilst Mr. Hemy, too conscious of the skill with which he can express the transparency of water in shadow, is apt to exaggerate the effect of the cast-shadow of his boats till it assumes the aspect of a patch. All these painters, however, possess a high degree of manipulative dexterity. Continued progress is observable in E. Waterlow's "Thames-side Farm" (94); it is broad, simple, and true, which is saying much. Mr. Frank Walton likewise continues to make good the ground he has lately won. Of his two landscapes, "In the Valley" (78) is, in particular, remarkable for its unconventional colouring, and the delicate pencilling of the trees. Despite a partiality for a dull and limited range of colour, there is rare sentiment and truth in Joseph Knight's two landscapes—"Mowers" (152), with a rainy sky, and "Morning Mists" (236), which is still finer in feeling. There is feeling, too, in the contributions of J. Aumonier, H. Goodwin, and Mark Fisher; in the "Distant View of Osborne" (118); and in A. Ditchfield's "View near Algiers" (317), which has something of classical severity. A little picture, "Porlock Harbour" (27), by G. E. Cook, strikes us as revealing a genuine artistic gift by the manner in which low tones of colour have been struck out in true harmonious relation to twilight effect. Very good also, in a more realistic or emphatic way, is "A Wet Day" (90), by Cyrus Johnson. There is strong brilliant and solid painting in Tom Lloyd's small picture of strayed calves among wheat-sheaves. Excellent, in its way, is J. O'Conner's view (180) of the Thames Embankment, with the Obelisk in the foreground and the floating ice of last winter in the river. We need not dwell on the productions of such popular painters as J. Syer, No. 19, which, though small, is in his best manner; R. Beavis, No. 116, a couple of Boulogne farm-horses in their picturesque harness gear; Frank Dillon, and C. J. Lewis. We must also be content to commend to the visitor the winter-piece (20) by T. F. Goodall; "Morning on the Thames" (325), by J. Finnie; "A Summer Afternoon from the Lagunes, Venice" (253), by Sir Henry Thompson; "A Railway Cutting" (106), by E. Buckman; and M. Fantin's beautiful group of "Roses" (148), which, however, he has surpassed on former occasions—the background being deficient in air, and the petals, though illusively true in colour, sparkling too much like gems, not presenting the soft lustre of true floral texture.

The great east window of the Church of St. John the Baptist, Glastonbury, is well known for its beauty and probably unique tracery, and was restored by Sir Gilbert Scott, some time before his death. The stained glass intended to complete the window is about to be inserted; and to fill its seven lights and the many compartments of its tracery a very extensive cycle of Scriptural illustration has been introduced. Included also is Joseph of Arimathea (who figures so conspicuously in the story of the early Christianity of Glastonbury and in the Arthurian romances), and six other personages of ancient note in connection with the town. The window, which is the gift of Miss Rocke, of Glastonbury, has been designed by Mr. Philip M. Westlake, of Gloucester-road; and the artist has executed his exceptional task with intelligent care and artistic skill. Owing to the necessarily small scale of the subjects and the judicious distribution of warm-toned white glass, the window recalls the mosaic character of some of the fine old glass. Mr. Westlake was a prize student of the Royal Academy a few years back; and we are glad to see some men of artistic training turning their attention to glass designing.

A denial has been made by the Italian Ministry of Public Instruction to the report that it was in contemplation to rebuild the west front of St. Mark's, Venice. The Minister's attention having, it is said, been drawn to the vandalisms which had been committed on the two sides of the Basilica, he ordered the Commission for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments to examine into the question and decide what should in future be done for the preservation of the church—not by the process of rebuilding, but by rational restorations or repairs where positively required. To this we may add a statement made by Roma Artistica that the Minister of Instruction has given orders to the Prefect of Venice to prevent the work of restoring the mosaic of the church from being proceeded with.

OBITUARY.

THE COUNTESS OF MONTIJO.

Doña Maria Manuela, Countess de Montijo, died at Madrid on the 22nd inst., aged about eighty-six. The Countess was born in Andalusia, the daughter of William Kirkpatrick, Consul at Malaga, and granddaughter of William Kirkpatrick, of Conheath, in Scotland, who claimed to be a descendant of the ancient family of Kirkpatrick of Closeburn. She was married to Cyprien, Count de Montijo and Miranda, Duke of Peneranda, Grandee of Spain of the First Class, and had two daughters. The elder married the Duke of Berwick and Alba, a descendant of the Marshal Duc de Berwick, son of our King James II., and the younger, Eugénie, Countess of Théba, is ex-Empress of the French.

ADMIRAL LORD G. PAULET.

Admiral Lord George Paulet, C.B., died on the 22nd inst., at his house at Marlborough-hill, in his seventy-sixth year. Lord George was a son of the late Marquis of Winchester, and entered the Navy in 1817. He served off the Portuguese coast during the Civil War in 1832-3, and he was subsequently appointed to administer the government of the Sandwich Islands. When hostilities broke out between England and Russia Lord George hoisted his flag in the Bellerophon and took part in the attack on Sebastopol. On the restoration of peace he was appointed an Aide-de-Camp to the Queen.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL CHESTER.

Charles Montagu Chester, Esq., of Chicheley Hall, Bucks, formerly Captain 90th Regiment, and late Lieutenant-Colonel commanding Bucks Rifle Volunteers, J.P. and D.L., died at his seat near Newport-Pagnel. He was eldest son of the Rev. William Chester, by the Hon. Elizabeth Wilson, his wife, daughter of Henry, Lord Berners, and was grandson of Charles Bagot (brother of William, first Lord Bagot), who assumed the surname and arms of Chester in compliance with the will of his first cousin, Sir Charles Bagot Chester, Bart., of Chicheley. Colonel Chester was born Jan. 18, 1815, and succeeded to his estates at the death of his cousin, the Rev. A. Chester, in 1858. He married, Sept. 7, 1843, Maria, only daughter of Major Sandham, R.A., of Rowdell, Sussex, by whom he leaves issue.

MR. MARK NAPIER.

Mark Napier, Esq., Sheriff of Dumfriesshire and Galloway, died on the 22nd inst. at his residence in Ainslie-place, Edinburgh. He was born July 24, 1798, the eldest son of Francis Napier, and grandson of Major-General the Hon. Mark Napier, son of Francis, Lord Napier. He married, Dec. 29, 1842, his cousin, Charlotte,, daughter of Alexander Ogilvy, Esq., and widow of W. D. Macfarlane, Esq., by whom he leaves issue. Mr. Mark Napier was called to the Scotch Bar in 1820, and was appointed Sheriff in 1844. His historical works, "Memoirs of John Napier of Merchistoun," "The Life and Times of Montrose," "Memorials and Letters of John Grahame of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee," are well known.

COLONEL GRIMSTON.

Marmaduke Jerard Grimston, Esq., of Grimston Garth and Kilnwick, in the county of York, J.P. and D.L., Colonel of the Yorkshire Artillery Militia, died on the 14th inst. He was born Nov. 27, 1826, the eldest son of Colonel Charles Grimston, of Grimston Garth and Kilnwick, by Jane, his wife, daughter of the Very Rev. Thomas Trench, Dean of Kildare; and represented the very ancient family of Grimston, of Grimston, of which the Earl of Verulam is descended through a junior branch. Colonel Grimston was educated at Harrow, and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he took the degree of LL.B., 1848. He married, July 3, 1856, Florence Victoria, youngest daughter of Colonel Hardress Robert Saunderson, by Lady Maria, his wife, daughter of John, last Earl of Carhampton, and leaves two daughters.

MR. SERJEANT COX.

Mr. Serjeant Edward William Cox died suddenly on the 24th inst. He had attended a Penny Reading at Mill-hill, at which he had read a paper, and on returning home went into his library. A little time afterwards one of his daughters found him dead in his chair. On Saturday he spent part of the day shooting with his nephew, Mr. Horace Cox, and on Monday he took his seat as usual in the second court at the Middlesex Sessions. Mr. Cox was in his seventieth year, having been born in 1809. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1843, and raised to the degree of a Serjeant-at-Law in 1868 He was appointed Recorder of Portsmouth in the same year, and in 1870 Deputy-Assistant Judge of Middlesex. He was for many years editor of the Law Times, and was the author of one or two legal treatises, and of a book entitled "What am I?" a popular introduction to mental philosophy and psychology.

MR. DELANE.

John Thaddeus Delane, for many years the able editor of the most influential of all newspapers, the Times, died, at his residence at Ascot Heath, on the 22nd inst. He was son of Mr. William F. A. Delane, financial manager of the same newspaper, an Irishman by birth, and one of the family of Delaney of the Queen's County, in Ireland. He was educated at the University of Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1839, and was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1847. In 1839 he became assistant-editor of the Times, then conducted by Mr. Barnes, and at that gentleman's death, in 1841, succeeded to the editorship, which he held until three or four years ago. All the London daily newspapers have borne honourable testimony (as honourable to themselves as to the subject of their eulogy) to Mr. Delane's worth, and the value and importance of his services. A memoir of the deceased, which appeared in the Times, states that immediately on leaving Oxford, indeed before taking his degree, Mr. Delane was qualifying himself for almost any profession he might finally decide on, under good direction, with a view to the better discharge of the post eventually assigned to him. He walked the London hospitals for several terms, and, having a natural taste for the art of medicine and for operative surgery, he made more real progress than many who have no other aim than the exercise of the medical profession. He kept his terms at the Middle Temple, where he was called to the Bar. He reported both on circuit and at the House of Commons, where for two years he took his turn in the gallery. There was no necessary training which he did not undergo with as much spirit as if his career was to begin and end there—an example to those who imagine that important positions are to be jumped into or had for the asking, and that luck is the arbiter of eminence. He never was a writer; he never even attempted to write anything except what he wrote much better than most writers could do—reports and letters. These he had to do, and he did them well. Mr. Delane had in a remarkable degree several qualities which are indispensable to success in all business of importance. He was capable of long application and concentrated attention. He could always seize on the main point at issue, and lay his hand on that upon which all the rest depended. It seemed a kind of intuition that enabled him to foresee at once the impending fate of a cause or the result of a campaign; but it was a practical and methodical power. He could always at a moment's call give a succinct epitome, in terse, telling English, of any speech or debate, any book, any correspondence he had read or listened to. He had the instincts of family affection almost to excess. His one idea of dignified happiness was that of a country gentleman. For many years his delight was to go down on the Saturday and bury himself for a few hours in a rather dull cottage in a corner of his native parish. Some twenty years since he bought one or two pieces of barren heath near Ascot that an enthusiastic free-trader had bequeathed to Mr. Cobden. Here he eventually built a mansion and reclaimed the surrounding sands, and here he ended his life.

The deaths have also been announced of—

John Moreton, Esq., J.P., on the 19th inst., at Moseley Court, Bushbury, near Wolverhampton, aged sixty-seven.

General John Hobson, Bombay Staff Corps, on the 16th inst., at Gloucester-terrace, Hyde Park.

Mary Travis, on the 12th inst., at Cottingham, Yorkshire, aged one hundred years and six weeks.

Mr. William Frederick Harrison, J.P., Chairman of the Second Court at the Surrey Sessions, on the 21st inst.

Major-General Arthur Hall, late 5th Bengal Light Cavalry and 21st Hussars, on the 13th inst., at St. George's Manor, Guernsey, aged sixty-eight.

The Rev. James Farquhar, M.A., Rector of Llanthewy Skirrid, Abergavenny, Chairman of the Abergavenny Magistrates, on the 16th inst., at his Rectory, aged sixty-seven.

Mrs. Charles Dickens, widow of Charles Dickens, the great novelist, and daughter of Mr. Hogarth, on the 22nd inst., at 70, Gloucester-terrace, Regent's Park, in her sixty-fifth year.

Captain Spencer Perceval Robbins, for thirty-five years one of the Queen's Foreign Service Messengers. He was formerly in the Austrian service.

Fanny Hannah, Lady Parkes, wife of Sir Harry Smith Parkes, K.C.B., H.B.M. Minister at Japan, on the 12th inst., at 50, Holland-road, Kensington. She was daughter of Thomas Plumer, Esq., and was married in 1856.

Louisa Hannah, Lady Shaw, widow of Sir Charles Shaw, Knt. (who died 1871), and only daughter of the late Major Martin Curry, 67th Regiment, on the 14th inst., at Wurzburg, Bavaria. She was married in 1841.

George Ensor, Esq., of Ardress, Loughgall, in the county of Armagh, J.P., on the 14th inst., aged seventy. He was descended from a younger son of Job Ensor, Esq., from whose eldest son is derived the family of Ensor of Rollesby Hall, Norfolk.

The Rev. John Bedford, a distinguished Wesleyan minister, at his residence, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, near Manchester, on the 20th inst., in his sixtieth year. He was an ex-President of the Conference, and was for many years a secretary of the Wesleyan Chapel-Building Committee.

Henry Crawshay, Esq., of Oatlands Park, in the county of Gloucester, on the 23rd inst., in his sixty-seventh year. He was one of the well-known ironmasters who have made the name of Crawshay so universally known, and was son of William Crawshay, Esq., of Cyfarthfa Castle, in the county of Glamorgan, by Elizabeth, his wife, daughter of Francis Homfray, Esq., of The Hyde, in the county of Stafford.

Reginald Philip Vaillant, Lieutenant 100th (Prince of Wales's) Royal Canadians, eldest son of the late Major Albert Vaillant, H.E.I.C.S., of Meadowleigh, Weybridge, Surrey, by Gulia Isabella, his wife, daughter of Colonel Maceroni, A.D.C. to Murat, King of Naples, on the 19th ult., at Sialkôt, Punjaub, aged twenty-four. The family from which he descended was established in London by Paul and Francis Vaillant, who fled from France at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

The Rev. Robert Wilkes, M.A., formerly Rector of Wenden Lofts, and Vicar of Elmdon, Essex, on the 18th inst., at his seat, Lofts Hall, Saffron Walden, aged sixty-one. He was only son of the late Rev. Robert Fiske, Rector of Wenden Lofts and Vicar of Elmdon, and assumed the name of Wilkes on succeeding, in 1858, to the estates of his cousin, John Wilkes, Esq., of Lofts Hall. He married, 1842, Emily Lettice, eldest daughter of the Rev. Robert Roberts, Vicar of Haverhill, Suffolk, and leaves, with other issue, a son, John Wilkes, Esq., Barrister.

Mr. John Remington Mills, formerly M.P. for Wycombe, at Tunbridge Wells, on the 22nd inst., aged eighty-two. Mr. Mills was a well-known member of the Congregationalist body, and his liberality to its religious and benevolent institutions led to his being appointed treasurer to several of them. Mr. Mills was for some years member of Parliament for the borough of Wycombe, and was on two occasions the Liberal candidate for Leeds, losing the seat at his second attempt by two votes. He was also an unsuccessful candidate for Finsbury in 1861.

In the obituary notice last week of the Baroness Braye, the second of her Ladyship's elder sisters should have been styled the Hon. Anne Richardson (instead of Arnold), she having married, secondly, in 1847, the Rev. Henry Kemp Richardson, Rector of Leire, Leicestershire, and Rural Dean.

The sixth annual Fancy Dress Polo and United Counties' Hunt Ball took place at the Royal Pavilion, Brighton, on Wednesday, under distinguished patronage.

Remissions of rent have been made as follows:—The Earl of Ilchester has announced his intention to deduct 10 per cent from the rents of his Wiltshire tenants during the current year. Mr. Wingfield Digby, of Sherborne Castle, and neighbouring landlords have made similar announcements. Captain William Duberly, Gaynes Hall, St. Neot's, has resolved to return to his tenantry in Huntingdonshire 20 per cent upon the half year's rent due last month. Mr. John C. Scott, J.P., has made an abatement of 10 per cent to the tenants on his estate at Lack, West Killinhill. Colonel T. W. Roberts, of Cranbrook, High Sheriff of Kent, has allowed the tenants on his Glassenbury estate a reduction of 20 per cent on their rents. The Rev. R. B. Hugessen, of Mersham Rectory, Kent, has allowed the tithe-payers an abatement of 10 per cent on the half year's tithes. Mr. J. Corbett, M.P., has announced to the tenants on his Ynys-y-Maengwyn estate, Merionethshire, that he will make them the same remission as he had promised to his tenants in Worcestershire—at the rate of 20 per cent on the rents paid up for the half year ending Michaelmas last. Mr. Leonard Morrogh, of Dublin, the master of the Ward Union hounds, has given his tenants on the Ballinacoulty property, in the county of Waterford, a reduction of 20 per cent on last March rents.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Mr. Robert Henry Allan, J.P., D.L., late of Blackwell Hall and Blackwell Grange, in the County of Durham, who died on the 28th ult., has been proved in the Durham District Registry by his widow, and Major-General Sir Henry Marshman Havelock, Bart., M.P., Arthur Lucas, and Edward Hutchinson, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £120,000. The testator directs his executors to provide services of communion plate of solid silver, embossed, and of the best quality and design, with a handsome oak chest or safe, for the parish churches (eighteen in number) where his estates are situate or where he has resided. All his pictures, manuscripts, illustrated works, books, and plate are to be preserved as heirlooms at Blackwell Hall; and the family portraits and oil-paintings at Blackwell Grange are to be preserved as heirlooms with that mansion. He gives to his widow an immediate pecuniary legacy and the income from the sum of £40,000 Reduced Bank Annuities during her widowhood, and a life interest in the Blackwell Hall estate. He gives pecuniary legacies to his brother-in-law, Mr. E. H. Maling, to his nephews and niece, Mr. Edward Allan Maling, Mr. Neville Lambton Burne and Mrs. Joanna Maria Gray; to his cousin, Mr. Henry Roberts Allan Johnson; to his friend Mr. Longstaffe, "the Historian of Darlington;" to his friend Sir John Bernard Burke and to Lady Alice Havelock: also a legacy of £500 to the Darlington Hospital, and handsome legacies to his outdoor and domestic servants, and to his former servants William Jamieson and John Robinson. All legacies to be paid free of legacy duty. He devises to his brother, Mr. George Thomas Allan, a life interest in his Girsby estate; and to his cousin, Sir Henry Marshman Havelock, M.P. for Sunderland, a life interest in his Newton Grange estate, also a life interest in his Blackwell Hall estate, after Mrs. Allan's death, and a life interest in the Blackwell Grange estates, subject to the interest of Mr. George Thomas Allan therein. He devises his Barton estates and residuary real estate to his trustees, Sir Henry Marshman Havelock, Mr. Arthur Lucas, and Mr. Edward Hutchinson, upon trust, to accumulate the income for twenty-one years, and to invest the accumulations in the purchase of landed estates in the county of Durham and the North Riding of the county of York; and, subject to these provisions, the whole of the testator's real estate and accumulations is entailed upon Major-General Sir Henry Havelock and his sons, with the remainder, in default of male issue, to the sons of the late Joshua Havelock, who was a younger son of the illustrious soldier Sir Henry Havelock, with an ultimate remainder to the right heirs of the late Colonel William Havelock, a brother of the late Sir Henry Havelock, and who was killed in the engagement at Ramnuggur during the Sikh war in 1848. The residue of the testator's personalty is to be laid out in land, and settled in the same manner as his residuary real estate; and all persons succeeding to the estates are to assume the name and arms of Allan. By codicils to the will the executors are directed to apply the sum of £300 towards providing a peal of bells for Trinity Church, Darlington, and to furnish Mr. Longstaffe with a sum of £1000 to enable him to complete Mr. Surtees' "History of Durham." The testator has also provided for the distribution of doles amongst the poor at Darlington, Blackwell, and Barton.

The will (dated Aug. 7, 1879) with two codicils (dated Aug. 8 and 21 following) of the Right Hon. Sir Richard Torin Kindersley, P.C., formerly one of the Vice-Chancellors of the High Court of Chancery, who died at his residence, Clyffe, near Dorchester, on the 22nd ult., was proved on the 15th inst. by Edward Leigh Kindersley, the son, and William Park Dickins, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £70,000. The testator leaves £30,000 in the Government funds upon trust for the widow and children of his deceased son, the Rev. Richard Cockburn Kindersley; £9000 to his daughter, Mrs. Wilson; £4000 to his son-in-law, the Hon. William Byron, the two latter in addition to the sums settled on their respective marriages; an annuity of £100 for life to his sister, Miss Caroline Kindersley, and other legacies. The residue of his property he gives to his said son, Edward Leigh Kindersley.

The will (dated Sept. 20, 1879) of Mr. James Hemingway, late of Macclesfield, Cheshire, contractor, who died on Sept. 22 last, was proved on the 5th inst. by James Willans and William McGregor, the acting executors, the personal estate being sworn under £80,000. The testator gives to his wife, Mrs. Mary Hemingway, his household furniture and effects and £700 per annum for life; to his executors, £500 each; to his son, Charles Robert Hemingway, £500; to Martha Pearson and Elizabeth Read, both of Cardiff, and to Eliza Bowen and Ruth Nunney, then respectively in his service, life annuities of £30 each; and the residue of his real and personal estate to all his children in equal shares.

The will (dated June 21, 1875) with four codicils (dated Aug. 6 and Sept. 16, 1877, and Jan. 26 and June 8, 1878) of Mr. Alfred Keyser, late of the Cross of the Oak, Berkhampstead, Herts, who died on the 14th ult., at No. 25, Adelaide-crescent, Brighton, was proved on the 13th inst. by Charles Keyser, the brother, William Williams, and Frederick Charles Keyser, the son, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £70,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife, Mrs. Ellen Keyser, £1000, all his chattels personal and movable effects, except money and securities for money, and £500 per annum for life, in addition to the income secured to her by settlement; to his son-in-law, Lord William Brook Phipps, £500; provision is also made for his son, Walter William Keyser, and a special annuity given to his daughter, Emily Mary, on the death or second marriage of her mother. The residue of his real and personal property is to be held upon trust for all his children, except his said son Walter William.

The will (dated Sept. 28, 1875) with three codicils (dated March 7 and July, 1878, and May 22, 1879) of Mrs. Caroline Batty, late of Neville Lodge, No. 34, Grove-end-road, St. John's-wood, who died on Sept. 1 last, was proved on the 18th inst. by Robert Fillingham and William Henry Withall, the acting executors, the personal estate being sworn under £60,000. The testatrix, among other legacies, bequeaths £1000 each to the City Orthopædic Hospital, Hatton-garden; St. Mary's Hospital, Cambridge-place, Paddington; the Convalescent Hospital for East London, at present established at Snaresbrook; the Charing-cross Hospital, West Strand; the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton; the Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood; St. Luke's Hospital for Lunatics, Old-street road; the Middlesex Hospital, Goodge-street, Tottenham-court-road; the London Hospital, Whitechapel-road; the Convalescent Hospital, Walton-on-Thames; the British Orphan Asylum, Slough, Bucks; the Soldiers' Daughters' Home, Hampstead; the Dudley Stuart House of Refuge, Market-street, Paddington; the Field-lane Night Refuge; the Female Orphan Home, Stanmore; the Metropolitan Free Hospital, Devonshire-square, Bishopsgate; the Cancer Hospital, Brompton; the Cripples' Home, Kensington; the City of London Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Victoria Park; the Houseless Poor Asylum, Playhouse-yard, City; the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Putney; the National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic, Queen-square Bloomsbury, and St. John's Foundation School for the Education of the Sons of Poor Clergymen; £500 each to the Queen Charlotte Lying-In Hospital; the Lying-In Hospital, York-road, Lambeth; the National Hospital for Consumption at Ventnor; the Royal Medical College, Epsom; and the Charity Organisation Society, Buckingham-street, Adelphi; £500 upon trust for Joseph Bell, and if any part of this sum is left at his decease it is to go to the City of London Truss Society; and £1000 upon trust for her brother, Philip Oliver, for life; at his decease £500, part thereof, is to go to the London City Mission Seaside House, Ventnor, Isle of Wight, and the other £500 to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum for the Children of the Poor, Old Kent-road. The residue of her property she leaves to the Church Pastoral Aid Society.

The will (dated July 24, 1841) with three codicils (dated Aug. 29, 1850; Oct. 15, 1861; and Sept. 8, 1866) of Mr. Thomas Burgoyne, late of Stratford-place, St. Marylebone, who died on the 12th ult., at Trevereux, near Limpsfield, Surrey, was proved on the 12th inst., by Robert Milnes, the sole executor, the personal estate being sworn under £45,000. The testator leaves any estate or interest he may be entitled to under his father's will to his brother John Charles Burgoyne. The remainder of his property goes to his children.

The will (dated Jan. 26, 1876) of Mr. Robert Algernon Smith-Dorrien, late of Hareafoot, Great Berkhamstead, Herts, who died on the 8th ult., was proved on the 10th inst. by Mrs. Mary Ann Smith-Dorrien, the widow, the sole executrix, the personal estate being sworn under £35,000. The testator gives all his real and personal estate to his wife.

The will (dated Jan. 5, 1878) of Mr. Henry Ellis, late of Leamington, shipowner, who died on May 21 last, was proved on the 15th ult. by Edward Davies and Thomas Wolfeostan, the surviving executors, the personal estate being sworn under £35,000. The testator gives annuities to his brothers and sister; and, after making provision for his other children, leaves the remainder of his property to his sons, Henry Richard Pincombe and Charles.

The will (dated May 24, 1875) of Mr. Richard John Coltman, late of the Prebendal Thame, Oxford, licensed victualler, who died on the 6th ult., was proved on the 12th inst. by William Robert Brooks and Henry Prockter, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £30,000. With the exception of the bequest of nineteen guineas to each of his executors, the only persons interested under the will are testator's wife and children. The deceased owned several public-houses at Bethnal-green, Hackney-wick, Hornsey-rise, and Stepney.

The will (dated Feb. 10, 1877) of Mrs. Jane Galt or Black, late of No. 2, George-square, Edinburgh, who died on Aug. 13 last, at Maudsley Cottage, Eskbank, was proved on Sept. 13, 1879, in Edinburgh, by her sons, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £10,000. The testatrix bequeaths leagacies of £100 to two of her nieces and a grand-nephew, a donation to the Medical Benevolent Fund, and an annuity to her housekeeper. The residue of the estate, real and personal, divided between her said sons.

The offices of the County Courts will be closed on Dec. 26, 27, and 29.

Mr. C. T. Newton, C.B., at the close of his second lecture on "Greek Art," which was delivered last Saturday evening at the College for Men and Women, Queen-square, Bloomsbury, referred again to the fact that in the cellars of the British Museum there lay buried some original works of the Grecian sculptors which formed part of the Townley collection, for which the nation paid £25,000 in the early part of this century. He wished to state that the trustees of the Museum were in no way to blame in the matter. The trustees were not responsible for the present state of chaos in connection with various collections; in point of fact, for the last twenty-five years they had never ceased from time to time to address memorials to successive Governments pointing out the crowded state of the Museum. Anybody who wishes to satisfy himself upon this point had only to turn to the official records, where they would find that the burden of the song of the trustees had been, "Give us more space;" but that space had not been provided. It was not for him to say whether the House of Commons thought it a matter worth pressing upon the Government or whether the fault lay with the British public; but if the public cried out long enough and loud enough a remedy would be found for the crowded state of some of the collections. So long as the public showed indifference in the matter the Government would stave off the expenditure to a "more convenient season."

The annual meeting of the Council of the Hospital Sunday Fund was held on Monday at the Mansion House. Sir Francis Lycett presided, in the unavoidable absence of the Lord Mayor. The Council in their report stated that the seventh year of the operation of the fund had realised £26,501 as compared with £24,904 in 1878, notwithstanding the unusual financial depression of the times and a very wet Hospital Sunday. The number of contributing congregations had also exceeded that of the previous year. The committee of distribution recommended a sum of £22,804 to eighty-one hospitals, and £2157 to forty-six dispensaries. One per cent of the gross receipts, £260, had been set aside for the purchase of surgical appliances. The report was adopted unanimously. The committee of the Middlesex Hospital applied that those patients who came to that institution with orders for surgical appliances from the fund should be made to pass under the ordinary rule by which out-patients were to present themselves with letters from governors. They also suggested that the fund should furnish them with surgical appliance tickets for presentation to suitable out-patients applying to them. The Council determined that they could not alter the existing arrangements for twelve months at least. The annual meeting of constituents was fixed for the middle of December.

A number of objects from Zululand, lent by her Majesty, have been placed for public view at the South Kensington Museum. Some of them illustrate local customs, such as the head-ring worn by married Zulu men. Some are parts of the personal adornments, such as the combs, snuff-bottles, &c.; and there is also a necklace as worn by Kaffirs, while the scanty toilet requirements are represented by a body-scraper. The only commercial illustrations are a wicker basket for carrying fruit and a pair of wicker spoons for straining beer. The basket was taken at Upoco in June. A wooden pipe from Pondoland and some Kaffir snuff differ little from similar British comforts in appearance. From Secocoeni's country there is a signal whistle. The collection is small, but has an interest of its own at the present time. Another addition to the museum, made on Friday last, is a collection of ancient pottery and metal objects from the Indian graves of the United States of Columbia, South America, lent by Mr. Percy Brandon. They are placed near the Schliemann collection, and the juxtaposition brings out strongly the similarity of form in the cinerary urns. The gold ornaments consist of hair-pins of modern, as they were also of Roman, type, and other pins apparently for ornament. There are also what seem to be nose-rings. Among the pottery are figures of squat shape and unpleasing faces, supposed to represent deities. No dates are assigned to any of the objects.

THE CAPTIVITY OF CETEWAYO: THE EX-KING APPRECIATES THE HIGHLAND BAGPIPES.

THE CAPTIVE KING CETEWAYO.

The deposed King of Zululand continues to reside in the Castle at Capetown, where he is for the present kept in custody, till her Majesty's Government shall have sent out definitive instructions regarding him; and he is gradually becoming acquainted with many British and Colonial fashions or habits of life. Though, before leaving his native country he saw perhaps more than he liked of some of our military corps, it was but lately, at Capetown, that he was personally introduced to the gallant 91st Regiment, Princess Louise's Argyllshire Highlanders, who had nevertheless done good service in the war. An officer of that regiment, Lieutenant H. A. Schank, Instructor of Musketry, who had the opportunity of visiting King Cetewayo at the Castle, on the 21st ult., invited him to hear the martial music of the Highland pipers, with which the Zulu monarch was very much pleased, taking off his Kilmarnock cap and waving it as an applauding salute, while expressing, in his native language, thanks and approval of the treat they afforded to his ears. We are indebted to Lieutenant Schank for a Sketch of this interesting scene. There used to be a piper in the Transvaal, who was temporarily attached to the suite of "The Gunn of Gunn," in the days of the Lydenburg Company of Volunteers; and of whose performances an amusing story is told by Dr. Rowland Atcherley in his "Trip to Boerland." But that musician, if he ever crossed the Zulu frontier, had no opportunity of proving his skill in the Royal presence of Cetewayo; and it never occurred to Sir Bartle Frere, probably, to try the effect of such a "concord of sweet sounds," by way of conciliating the formidable potentate with whom we have taken so much trouble in our recent most costly war.

COLLISION WITH AN ICEBERG.

The fine new iron screw steam-ship Arizona, belonging to the Guion Line, on her way from New York to Liverpool, on Friday, the 7th inst., had a perilous encounter with an iceberg, three hundred miles east of St. John's, Newfoundland. There were 149 passengers, amongst whom was one of the owners, Mr. S. B. Guion. Some had retired to their berths for the night, while others were enjoying themselves in different ways. Suddenly, without a moment's warning, there was a fearful crash, and the ship was felt to shiver from stem to stern. All were in consternation, and it was believed that the ship was sinking fast. Happily, it soon proved that the damage was not such as to cause immediate danger to their lives. The ship, which is of 5600 tons register, built on the most approved principles, has seven water-tight compartments. The water that came in was confined to the fore compartment; so the steamer was able to make for St. John's, arriving there on the Sunday morning. It was found, by further examination, that about 25 ft., more or less, of her bows had been smashed by the collision. She lay for repairs at the wharf of the Hon. Ambrose Shea, St. John's. Mr. Guion at once telegraphed to New York for another steamer to convey the passengers to Liverpool. They were taken by the Allan steam-ship Caspian on the 13th inst., and were brought to Liverpool, arriving last Saturday. Their testimony is highly in favour of the conduct of Captain Jones, of the Arizona, and his officers. From the statement made it appears that the second officer was in charge of the watch at the time of the accident, the captain having left the deck a few minutes before. The wind was north, the sea calm, and the sky rather cloudy, while the ship was steaming at the rate of fifteen knots an hour. Suddenly there was a violent shock and recoil, and the passengers excitedly rushed on deck to ascertain the cause. It was found to have been through collision with a huge iceberg with a base of about 500 feet, and rising to a considerable height. The shouts of the passengers and the noise of the lumps of ice falling on the steamer's deck were very distracting, but the captain was equal to the occasion. After extricating the ship from the neighbourhood of the iceberg he soon got the deck cleared of the ice with which it was strewn, and the passengers calmed down when they saw there was no longer any danger of the pinnacles of ice toppling over on to the ship. Prompt measures were adopted to ascertain the extent of the damage sustained by the Arizona. It was discovered that she had been struck in the fore peak, but the bulkhead was intact. Pieces of iron from the bow were scattered about. No more serious casualty occurred among either cabin or steerage passengers than being thrown down by the violence of the collision.

Our Illustration, showing the smashed condition of the stem and bows of the Arizona, as she lay at the repairing-wharf, is from a photograph by Mr. G. A. Pitts, of St. John's, Newfoundland.

COSTUME BALL AT COLNEY HATCH ASYLUM.

The Committee of Visitors of the Middlesex County Lunatic Asylum, Colney Hatch, gave a ball at the institution last week, inviting a large number of their friends to attend in costume for the amusement of the patients. As a spectacle the entertainment was all that could be desired. The costumes were varied in character and generally bright in colour, and some of the patients had, from common and inexpensive materials, made fancy dresses of extraordinary design. Several of the male attendants, as negro serenaders and clowns, afforded great amusement by their duties to those of the patients who, not being allowed to go on the floor to dance, were seated in the lower gallery at the end of the great hall in which the entertainment was given. There are at present about 2200 patients in the asylum, and of these nearly 600 were present in the room, about 130 males and 110 females being in costume. The visitors numbered over 200, and among those present were Sir W. H. Wyatt, Sir James Tyler, Mr. Sedgwick, chairman of the Leavesden Asylum, many of the Committee of Visitors, Dr. E. Sheppard and Mr. W. G. Marsall, the resident medical superintendents respectively of the male and female departments of the asylum, and Mr. J. S. Skaife, clerk to the Committee of Visitors. The medical superintendents find that such entertainments have a very beneficial effect upon certain classes of the patients, the excitement of preparation for weeks before the event affording them much harmless diversion. The chaplain, the Rev. H. Hawkins, is trying to form an association for the after care of convalescents, of whom many on leaving such institutions suffer great hardships from the difficulty of obtaining employment, and the impossibility in too many cases of finding the comfort, the sanitary conditions, and the freedom from anxiety which are essential to health and usefulness. During the evening, between the dances, there was some singing by a few of the female attendants and patients, who had been helped by Miss Wyatt to learn several pretty choral pieces. The dance music was played by Mr. Eaton's band. Mr. G. Blake, the steward, had decorated the ball-room and supper-room very tastefully with flags, festoons of coloured cloth, and flowers.

CANADA.—PREPARATIONS FOR WINTER.

The seductive balminess of the Indian summer has utterly collapsed; the pleasing illusion, whereby men have been beguiled by its "dreamy and magical light" into a feeling of false security, has been suddenly and rudely dispelled by blast of wind and rain and sleet and leaden skies. The forests, which last week were blushing in all their wealth of crimson glory, are now shivering in naked misery as they bend before the pitiless gale. All too suddenly comes this transition from the most delightful phase of the changing year to the rawest and most unpleasant. The dry exhilarating air of the actual winter is enjoyable enough, but this weather that follows the Indian summer is execrable. It is, however, useful in its way. We know it will soon be succeeded by the snow-storms and biting north winds that usher in the real winter, and we make our preparations accordingly.

The windows are amongst the first things attended to. Duplicate sashes are brought from their summer resting-places, and fitted tightly behind those that have done duty through the summer—the second windows being generally put in so as to be flush with the outer walls of the house. And capital things these double windows are, the dry inclosed air being a barrier that even the great Canadian frosts do not very easily penetrate. By-the-way, it seems strange that these comfortable windows, which are common enough on the Continent, as well as in America, are so rarely seen in England. With double windows we should cease to complain of draughty rooms, and the din and uproar of the streets would be excluded. A pretty effect can be made by utilising the space between the windows as a miniature greenhouse.

But the grand feature in the preparations for a Canadian winter is the "fixing" of the stoves and stove-piping. Fire-places, as in England, are scarcely any use at all in the Dominion. They cannot afford out there to let the heat rush headlong up the dark straight shaft of a chimney away into the hungry air outside. Not until it has worked its way through tortuous lengths of stove-piping—traversing the length and breadth and depth of their houses—do they reluctantly part with the heat sent forth from their wood and coal fires. But the "fixing" of this stove-piping, what work it is! Thrice happy he who at this stage of the winter preparations can escape taking a share in the putting up of these unsightly but useful things. The writer's circumstances while in Canada were unhappily not such that he could leave this work to others; for "helps" of the gentler sex turn with ineffable scorn from this part of the domestic economy, and men-servants he had none. First of all, the stove has to be brought from the lumber-room and put in its allotted place. Then commences the task of jointing together a number of stove-pipes—each pipe, which is made of sheet-iron, or tin, being about two feet and a half long, with a diameter of about seven inches. The first length is soon adjusted in its place—a miniature chimney rising from the back of the stove. The second and perhaps the third are fixed without many expletives of wrath. But henceforth the work requires the patience of a Job. In taking the innumerable bits of piping to pieces in the spring of the year, they invariably get more or less dented at the ends; and as each of these bits must fit exactly into another, so that no smoke escape into the rooms, the labour may perhaps be dimly imagined. Having reached a yard or more of the ceiling—according to the height of the room—the piping breaks off at right-angles and runs parallel with the ceiling until it pierces the wall and enters another room. But too often, before one room's piping has been completed, the whole comes to the ground, to the dismay of the lady of the house—especially if it be in a drawing-room—and some mild language, or otherwise, on the part of her unhappy husband.

In houses where there is a stove to every room the work is somewhat simplified, but where this cannot be afforded the task of carrying the piping from room to room is truly appalling. At the end of the day's labour—probably uncompleted—it is small wonder if the wife be found in tears, the bread-winner at the nearest whisky-tavern, the children crouching in some out-of-the-way corner, and the dog in another with his tail between his legs.

Coal stoves are becoming prevalent in the towns, but wood is still the fuel used in the country; and even in towns wood is the favourite for hall stoves. An Englishman does not readily part with his prejudices; and loving, as he does, to see his hearths aglow with blazing fires, he takes anything but kindly to the black iron boxes that hide nearly all the fire-light from view; consequently, in many an emigrant's home may be seen, in addition to the American one, the familiar English fireplace. But, cheery and heart-warming though our English fires undoubtedly are, they are of scarcely any use in Canada, except where there are great open hearths capable of accommodating blocks of timber like the yule-logs they used to have in Merrie England. Aye, and should there be any of the spirits of our forefathers haunting our Western colony, there's many and many a farmhouse in the older settlements, from whose great open hearths is sent forth such a ruddy glow as must gladden even their ghostly Saxon hearts.

When the windows and stoves have been attended to, little remains for townsfolk in the way of winter preparations beyond a general furbishing of sleighs and cutters, and the shaking-out and re-lining of buffalo robes and bear skins. Far otherwise is it with the farmer, who, do what he will, generally finds something left undone when the frost comes and holds the country in its iron grip.

Now is the time of all others when laggards in farming grumble their hardest. The "cold snap" steals insidiously upon them, and arrests the "Fall" ploughing before they have got through half their task, or perhaps before their root-cellars and "pits" have been banked with earth, or even the roots are out of the ground; or before the re-staking of the troublesome snake-fences has been commenced. Very bitterly do they complain of the inexorable climate, as they gaze ruefully at their unstored roots and unstaked fences, their unploughed acres, their unprepared stables and cattle-sheds, their unhusked corn, and other things left undone which ought to have been done. But it must not be thought from the above that the yeomen of the Dominion are more apt to be backward in their work than farmers elsewhere. Canada is not a country to encourage drones. And of those who are caught napping when the frost comes stealing stealthily over the land, this at least must be said in their favour: their thoughts instantly turn to the dumb creatures under their care, even to the exclusion for the time being of the comfort of their own homes. In all the stables and cattle-sheds upright posts with boards nailed across are placed so as to form double walls as it were, the space between being tightly packed with hay and straw, the doors are made snug, and everything arranged so that both horses and cattle may feel comfortable in spite of the intense frosts that are at hand. The sheep are rarely brought into their winter quarters until the beginning of December, by which time the ground in most parts of Ontario has become so deeply embedded in snow that not even these persistent foragers can any longer find their way to a blade of grass. In the Lower Province, where the winter sets in earlier, the sheep are brought into their sheds in November.

BIRMINGHAM CATTLE AND POULTRY SHOW.

The entries of cattle are exceedingly large this year. Sheep and pigs are a fair show; and the roots, contrary to general expectation, form the largest collection ever seen in Bingley Hall. £2700 is the amount of prizes given for meritorious specimens in almost every branch of agriculture, including the too-much-neglected one, poultry, which is here seen in perfection. Turkey cocks are found weighing close on 40 lb. each; geese, 50 lb. the pair; ducks, over 20 lb. the couple; fowls, up to 12 lb. each.

Satisfactory arrangements have been made with the railway companies as to excursion-trains from all parts.

The judging commences to-day (Saturday), when the charge for admission is 10s., except to life members, who have free admission to the whole show, in addition to other privileges.

Next Monday, Dec. 1 (the admission being by subscribers' tickets or payment of 5s.), is considered the ladies' day, when the élite of the midland counties are present in large numbers; for Tuesday and Wednesday (1s. days) numerous excursion-trains are announced; and on Wednesday and Thursday the working classes and children are admitted at the reduced rate of sixpence, after five p.m.

The Prince of Wales, a large exhibitor at the Norfolk Fat Cattle Show, took the first prize in the shorthorn heifer class, the first prize in the red-polled steer class, and the first prize in the Southdown wether class. Mr. Robert Wortley, of Suffield, Aylsham, took the £100 champion prize with a Hereford. Mr. Colman, M.P., took four first prizes in the cattle classes and also prizes in the Southdown classes. The show was a good one.

The food imports at Liverpool last week from the United States were remarkable for the smallness of the live-stock supply, which amounted only to 200 cattle, not a single head of sheep or pigs having arrived. Fresh meat arrivals, on the other hand, were much in excess of the previous week, when, however, the quantity was much below the weekly average. Five steamers arrived last week, having on board collectively 4804 quarters of beef, 568 carcasses of mutton, and fifty pigs. All of these vessels were from the United States.

ASTRONOMICAL OCCURRENCES IN DECEMBER.

(From the "Illustrated London Almanack.")

The Moon is near Venus on the morning of the 10th, near Mercury on the 13th. She is near Jupiter during the evening hours of the 18th, she is near Saturn during the evening hours of the 21st, and near Mars, being west of the planet, during the evening hours of the 23rd and early morning hours of the 24th, and east of the planet during the evening hours of the same day. She is nearest the Earth on the 12th, and at her greatest distance on the 25th. Her phases or times of change are:—

Last Quarter	on the 6th	at 43	minutes	after	7h.	in the afternoon.
New Moon	,, 13th	,, 4	,,		11	,, morning.
First Quarter	,, 20th	,, 16	,,		11	,, morning.
Full Moon	,, 28th	,, 16	,,		4	,, morning.

The third Eclipse of the year is a very small one of the Moon on Dec. 28, visible from England. The beginning of the eclipse is at 3h. 37m. p.m. The time of the Moon rising on this day is 3h. 47m. p.m., ten minutes after the eclipse has begun. The middle of the eclipse will be at 4h. 26m. p.m., and it will end at a quarter past five o'clock. At the time of the greatest phase, or at the middle of the eclipse, only one sixth part of the Moon's diameter will be obscured.

Mercury is badly situated for observation at the beginning of the month. He sets on the 2nd at 4h. 45m., and on the 11th nearly with the Sun. He rises on the 12th at 7h. 22m. a.m., on the 17th at 6h. 34m. a.m., or one hour and a half before the Sun; on the 22nd at 6h. 13m a.m., or 1h. 53m. before the Sun; on the 27th he rises 1h. 57m. before sunrise, and on the last day he rises at 6h. 14m. a.m. He is in his ascending node on the 5th, at his least distance from the Sun on the 10th, in inferior conjunction with the Sun on the same day, near the Moon on the 13th, stationary among the stars on the 20th, and at his greatest western elongation (22 deg. 30 min.) on the 30th.

Venus is a morning star, rising on the 7th at 3h. 26m. a.m.; on the 17th at 3h. 45m. a.m., on the 27th at 4h. 7m. a.m.; and on the last day of the year at 4h. 15m. a.m. She is at her greatest western elongation (46 deg. 47 min.) on the 4th, near the Moon on the 10th, and at her least distance from the Sun on the 13th.

Mars is visible till the morning hours, setting on the 8th at 5h. 13m. a.m., on the 18th at 4h. 31m. a.m., on the 28th at 3h. 56m. a.m., and on the last day at 3h. 49m. a.m. He is stationary among the stars on the 16th, and near the Moon on the 24th. He is due south on the 1st at 10h. 5m. p.m., on the 15th at 9h. 4m. p.m., and on the last day of the yeaat 8h. 7m. p.m.

Jupiter is an evening star, setting on the 7th at 10h. 35m. p.m., on the 17th at 10h. 4m. p.m., on the 27th at 9h. 33m. p.m., and on the last day of the year at 9h. 21m. p.m. He is near the Moon on the 18th. He is due south on the 1st at 5h. 47m. p.m., on the 15th at 4h. 59m. p.m., and on the last day of the year at 4h. 5m. p.m.

Saturn is an evening star, setting on the 8th at 1h. 42m. a.m., on the 18th at 1h. 3m, a.m., on the 28th at 0h. 25m. a.m., and on the last day at 0h. 14m. a.m., and is visible from sunset till these times. He is stationary among the stars on the 13th, near the Moon the 21st, and in quadrature with the Sun on the last day of the year. He is due south on the 1st at 7h. 56m. p.m.; on the 15th at 7h. 1m. p.m.; and on the last day of the year at 6h. 59m. p.m.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

J S (Middlesboro').—Your first question was answered last week. The names of the editors appear upon the titlepage of the publication mentioned.

L H B (Bermondsey).—Thanks for your note. We shall be obliged for an early report next time. Your letter is dated ten days after the event.

H J C A (Cornhill).—Many thanks for the tourney problem. We will endeavour to to find space for it.

M H C (Twyford).—After 1. R to K 5th, if Black play 1. P to B 5th, White continues with 2. Kt to B 2nd, &c.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

THE MATCH BY CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

It has always been the fashion to speak of Correspondence Chess as a very dull entertainment for those engaged in it, and of the record of games so played as destitute of interest for the general reader. In nine cases out of ten, the reproach is not altogether undeserved, but the famous match between London and Edinburgh, which led to the revival of an old opening, since known as the Scotch Gambit, is a notable exception, and to this we may now add the match between England and America. This match was begun two years ago, and its progress has been marked by several noteworthy incidents. Some months ago, Mr. Frech, of Washington closed one of the games he was conducting with the announcement of a forced win in the extraordinary number of forty-three moves; a few weeks later Mrs. Gilbert, of Hartford, Connecticut, opposed to Mr. Gossip, one of the strongest of the English team, announced a mate in thirty-five moves, and has since then informed her adversary that in the second game between them he would be mated, against the best play, in twenty-one moves! Mrs. Gilbert has more than once before displayed a very remarkable aptitude for chess analysis, but her last exploits are unparalleled in the history of chess by correspondence. We give one of the Games below, for which we are indebted to the courtesy of the Hartford Times.

WHITE (Mrs. Gilbert).	BLACK (Mr Gossip).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to Kt 5th	P to Q R 3rd
4. B to R 4th	Kt to K B 3rd
5. Castles	Kt takes P
6. R to K sq	Kt to Q B 4th
7. B takes Kt	Q P takes B
8. Kt takes P	B to K 2nd
9. P to Q 4th	Kt to K 3rd
9. Kt to Q 2nd seems preferable.
10. B to K 3rd	Castles
11 Kt to Q B 3rd	P to K B 3rd
12. Kt to Q 3rd	P to K B 4th
13. Kt to K 2nd	B to Q 3rd
14. P to K B 4th	P to Q Kt 4th
The attempt to develop the Bishop on this side falls against the correct play of his adversary. Perhaps a safer line of play here would have been 14. P to K Kt 3rd, followed by 15. Kt to Kt 2nd.
15. R to Q B sq	B to Q Kt 2nd
16. P to Q B 4th	P takes B P
17. Kt to Q B 5th
Very well conceived. Whether the Knight is captured or not, the adverse Bishop is imprisoned for the time.
17.	B to Q B sq
18. R takes P	R to Kt sq
19. P to Q Kt 3rd	Q to K B 3rd
20. Q to Q 3rd	Q to Kt 3rd

22. P takes Kt	B to K 2nd
23. Kt to Q 4th	K to R sq
24. Q to B 2nd	B to R 5th
25. B to B 2nd	B takes B
26. Q takes B	R to K sq
27. Kt to K B 3rd	B to Kt 2nd
The movements of this unfortunate piece appear exceedingly weak and purposeless.

WHITE (Mrs. Gilbert).	BLACK (Mr. Gossip).
There is, however, no other way of bringing the Q R into the game.
28. Kt to K 5th	Q to K 3rd
29. R to Q B 4th	Q R to Q sq
30. R to B 3rd	Q to B 3rd
31. Q R to K 3rd	R to K B sq
He has nothing better to do. White threatened to win the Rook by 32. Kt to Kt 6th (ch), &c.
32. Q to K 2nd	R to Q 5th
33. Q to R 5th
The winning move.
33.	P to Kt 3rd
34. Q to R 6th	Q R to Q sq
35. R to R 3rd	Q to Kt 2nd
At this point White announced mate in twenty-one moves, as follows:—
36. Kt tks Kt P (ch)	K to Kt sq
37. Q takes Q (ch)	K takes Q
38. Kt takes R	R takes Kt
39. R to K 7th (ch)	R to B 2nd
40. R takes R P (ch)	K takes R
41. R takes R (ch)	K to Kt 3rd
42. R takes P	B to R sq
43. R to Q R 7th	B to Kt 2nd
44. R takes B	K to B 3rd
45. P to K R 4th	K to Kt 3rd
46. R to Q B 7th	K to B 3rd
47. R takes P (ch)	K to K 2nd
48. P to R 5th	K to Q 2nd
49. R to Kt 6th	K to K 2nd
50. P to B 6th	P to R 4th
51. P to B 7th	K to Q 2nd
52. P to R 6th	K takes P
53. P to R 7th	P to R 5th
54. P to R 8th (Queens)	P takes P
55. Q to R 7th (ch)	K to B sq
56. R mates.

A match between the Chess Clubs of Bermondsey and the Railway Clearing House was played at the rooms of the latter on Monday last. There were twelve players on each side, and Bermondsey won by eight points to four. This club was also successful in a match when opposed to the North London Club a few weeks ago, but by the narrow majority of a unit.

FAIRY-MUSHROOMS AND FAIRY-RINGS.

Fairy-mushrooms in fairy-rings are what we meet with when in the country at this time of the year, the latter being those bright green circles which then show so vividly on lawns, and meadows, and on turfed hill-sides, and the former, agarics that grow there; the term "fairy" being given them from their place of growth, as the making of "midnight" mushrooms, as Shakspeare called them, was thought to be the pastime of that elfin tribe who were accustomed to hold their revels within those rings—"those green, sour ringlets whereof the ewe not bites"—and then to "creep into acorn-cups and hide them there." Formerly the term for fairy-rings was "fairy-orbs," as we see where the chief of the group tells her office to Puck—"and I serve the fairy queen, to dew her orbs upon the green;" that was, after they had been parched by the pressure of the fairy feet. Thus Titania says to Oberon, alluding to her elves, "if you will patiently dance in our round, and see our moonlight revels, go with us"—those revels that commenced after midnight—"the iron tongue of midnight hath told twelve; 'tis almost fairy time"—and lasted till dawn—"now until the break of day, through this house each fairy stray"—the time being occupied with songs and dances—"and this ditty after me, sing and dance it trippingly."

This notion as to the cause of the rings being the dancing of the fairies was held by Drayton, too, who says, "they in their courses make that round, in meadows called the fairy ground;" and Aubrey also alludes to them as "greene circles made by sprites on grasse," who had been "dancing rounde and rounde." So, too, Barnes, in his "Dorset Poems," where he speaks of the little fairies that come by moonlight, when no other feet "do tread the dewy grass but theirs, and meet and dance away together in a ring." In Wales, too, the same notion is prevalent, and it is to be found also in Sweden and Belgium, where they call these rings "elf-dances."

Few subjects, indeed, have afforded more material for discussion than have those same fairy-rings, and in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1790-1 many theories were advanced respecting them. Thus, Priestly advocated electricity, an opinion that others then held and which some still credit, and Leybourne joined him, in ascribing to the "sulphurous lightning's dreadful glare" the circles "which the vulgar style the rings of fairies;" and this theory was warmly maintained by Mr. Jessop in the Philosophical Transactions, he being influenced by the testimony of a friend, who, "walking abroad in a storm of thunder and lightning, observed a round circle, of about four or five yards' diameter, whose rim was a foot broad, newly burnt bare, as appeared from the colour and brittleness of the grass-roots." Darwin, too, took up this vein, and he thus expressed it in his "Botanic Garden:" "so from the clouds the playful lightning wings, rives the firm oaks, or prints the fairy-rings."

Following this fancy of celestial fire came that of a terrestrial one, or bonfire, as also another theory—the underground workings of mole-crickets and moles, as was urged by Mr. Lees in his long and elaborate paper in the Transactions of the Woolhope Club. This theory had, however, been previously broached in the Gentleman's Magazine, as well as by Mr. Pennant, and as there is quite as much to be said for it as against it, we will here epitomise Mr. Lee's opinion. He says the mole, by its burrowing, causes the grass to wither, and that the sporules of agarics "that are floating in the air" rest then on its dry surface, grow into spawn, and enlarge into fungi, which, dying in their turn, the ground is thus fertilised, and the grass thereby stimulated "to a greener and ranker growth." Molehills, which the mole throws up in his travels, must not here be confounded with the great molehill in which he lives, and which is of very large size, and circular.

But whether the theory of Mr. Lees be the right one or no, Professor Buckman, who says that "anything which may tend to kill a given area of grass may be the beginning of a fairy-ring," is with him in one sense, and so is Withering in another, as he states, as his opinion, that he is satisfied "the verdant circles called fairy-rings are caused by the growth of fairy-mushrooms," and that "when the ring is brown and bare the spawn of the fungus will be found under the soil, but when the grass has grown green and rank the spawn will have disappeared." Dr. Wollaston, in a paper read before the Royal Society in 1807, maintained this theory, though doubting Withering's statement as to the non-existence of spawn beneath the rings, and it would seem with some show of reason, for White, of Selborne, found that fairy-rings appeared on the green turf which he brought from the downs for his garden, and he says "the cause, occasion—call it what you will—of fairy-rings subsists in the turf and is conveyable with it: the seeds are in the turf." We ourselves, too, know of an instance where, in an attempt to get rid of those rings on a lawn by digging deeply, spawn was found at the depth of eighteen inches, and the fungi, in spite of all precautions, soon showed again, and the rings, too, with them.

It has been asserted that fungi, like orchids, are "travellers," and it is thus that the ring enlarges; but the statement refutes itself, as, while fungi scatter their spores all round, the movement of orchids is in one direction, and due to a root, which grows beside the old one, or—as is the case of that quickest traveller, the rare musk-orchis—springs from a fibre, which lengthens out from the parent plant. They thus keep growing further on, and change their place each year. The most reasonable theory, however, next to that of electricity, is that of the Rev. M. J. Berkely, who affirms that the starting-point is a fungus "whose growth unfits the soil beneath for its reproduction;" therefore, as it is only that portion of the spawn that falls "outside" the ring which is capable of being vitalised, "the ring each year grows wider till some cause intervenes to destroy the spawn."

Now, within and upon those fairy-rings grow certain fungi which are called "fairy-mushrooms," from their place of growth—the "St. George's," the "Horse," and "Champignon"—and each is edible. In England the St. George's mushroom is usually sold at the Italian warehouses, under the name of "Funghi" or "Funghi di Genoa," and in Italy a basket of early ones is the most welcome present. In Rome and Switzerland it fetches, when fresh, 15d. per lb.; but when dried 15s. per lb. is obtained for it in France and Italy. It is a mushroom that grows to an enormous size, and hence it divides, with the Horse variety, the usual honours in provincial papers. The latter kind makes good ketchup, and at Covent-garden it is chosen for it. Though it is edible when fresh, when stale it is risky. The Champignon, which is known in Scotland as "Scotch bonnet," is a smaller species, and it is used in the preparation of à-la-mode beef; and as it grows invariably in "fairy-rings," it is considered to be of all its tribe the one special "fairy mushroom."

Mushrooms, we may add, are late this year, but not so those fungi which are so very like them; and hence the casualties that have occurred "from supposed mush ooms" in London and the provinces, and the deaths from the same cause that have happened elsewhere. Besides fairy-mushrooms and fairy-rings, we meet in the autumn and winter months with those beautiful fungi called "fairy-cups," which brighten the background of our woods and lanes; and, as they are scarlet within and snow-white outside, it is no wonder they seem fitted for fairy-elves "wherefrom to sip the dew."

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT.
ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT (Trade Mark "Anti-fat," registered) is the celebrated REMEDY for CORPULENCY. It is purely vegetable and perfectly harmless. No particular change of diet required. Will reduce a fat person from 2 lb. to 5 lb. a week. It acts upon the food in the stomach, preventing its conversion into fat.

THOMAS FAIRBANK, M.D., of Windsor, Surgeon to her Majesty the Queen, referring to Anti-Fat in the "British Medical Journal" of June 7, 1879, says:—
"I gave some of this extract (Fucus Vesiculosus) to a very corpulent lady who in three months lost three stones in weight without any change of diet. Since then I have frequently given it for reducing weight, depending on the accumulation of adipose tissue, and have never found it fail. I may state that a patient who has been lately taking it as an anti-fat, and who always suffered very much from rheumatic pains about the body, has been entirely free from such trouble while she has been taking the extract, a fact which she quite independently noted."

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT, sold by Wholesale and Retail Chemists, everywhere. Price 6s. 6d. per Bottle. Send stamp for pamphlet, entitled "How to get Lean without Starvation."—BOTANIC MEDICINE COMPANY, Sole Proprietors, Great Russell-street Buildings, Great Russell-street, London, W.C.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.
Happy Days! There is something of regret and gloom in the first appearance of grey hairs; our prospects are often blighted by their premature appearance. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER happily affords a safe and sure means for restoring hem again to the freshness and beauty of youth. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER is no new low-priced article.

It is the old-established standard and reliable article known and spoken most highly of in every civilised country. Every good thing for the hair that the most scientific men of the Old and New World can suggest are combined in Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. It requires only a few applications to restore grey hair to its youthful colour and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. Dandriff is quickly and permanently removed. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.
There are two special qualities which determine and fix the superiority and excellence of Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER:—First—Its prompt, quick action, and the new growth, life, and vigour that it is sure to give to the hair, never failing by a few applications TO RESTORE GREY OR WHITE HAIR TO ITS YOUTHFUL COLOUR, imparting to the hair a delightful aroma, fresh, delicate, and unchangeable in any climate. Second—Its easy application without any previous preparation of the hair; without that sticky and disagreeable sulphur odour found and complained of in other preparations. It never stains the skin or linen. It retains the hair in any desired position, and is cooling and cleansing to the scalp.

FLORAL BELL, FRAGRANT ELIXIR OR LIQUID DENTIFRICE.
The admiration of the world, "THE FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE." Language fails to give expression to the beauty or the utility of a beautiful set of white teeth. With no other charm the possessor may well feel proud. Dentists, chemists, and physicians all recommend and use the FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is truly unequalled for cleansing, preserving, and beautifying the teeth, giving them a pearl-like whiteness and hardening the gums. It removes all tartar hardens the enamel, arrests decay, and imparts to the breath at all times a most delightful fragrance.
A few drops on the brush night and morning is all sufficient. Tooth pastes and powders are discarded after a trial of FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is purely vegetable, which may account for the absence of froth in your mouth during its use. A chemical that produces froth may be necessary in soap to cleanse the skin, but all chemicals are certain destruction to the teeth. The enormous and constantly increasing sale for this article enables the proprietor to offer it at the very low price of Two Shillings and Sixpence in large Bottles. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Wholesale Dépôt, 114 and 116, Southampton-row, London.

"AND TEETH LIKE BOWS OF PEARLS."
JEWSBURY and BROWN'S Exquisite Compound and Specialité, the
ORIENTAL TOOTH-PASTE.
The celebrated original and only genuine Oriental Tooth-Paste is signed "JEWSBURY and BROWN, Manchester. Established 50 years." PEARLY WHITE and SOUND TEETH, a healthy action of the gums, producing that firmness and rosy brightness of colour so essential to beauty, and fragrant breath, are all insured by the use of this most perfect Dentifrice. Pots, 1s. 6d.; double, 2s. 6d. All Perfumers and Chemists.

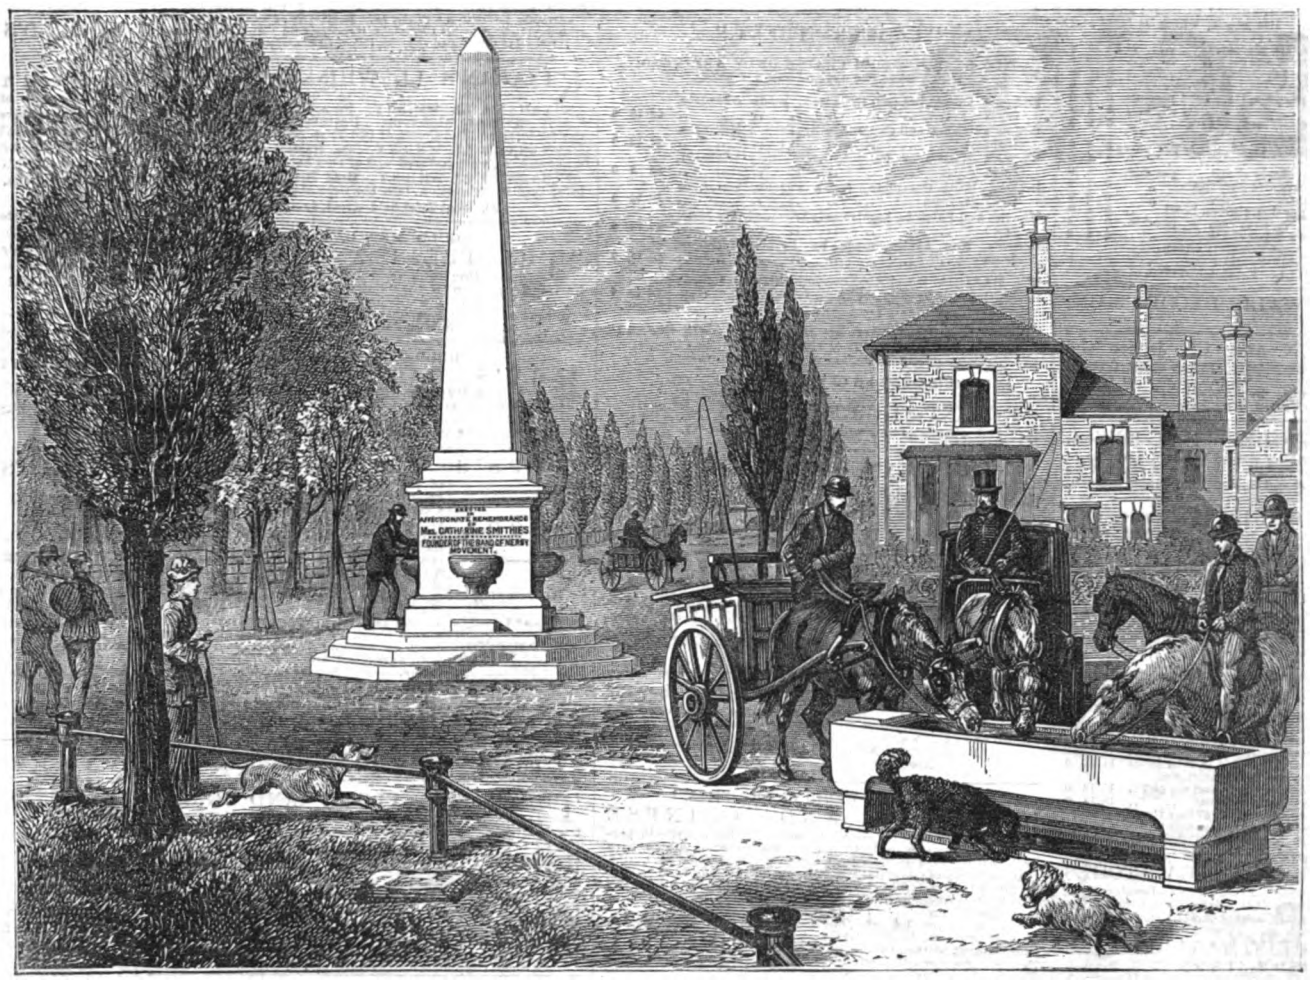
SOZODONT.—The Peerless liquid Dentifrice. Its use imparts the most fragrant breath; it beautifies, cleanses, and preserves the teeth in a surprising manner. It gives a delightfully fresh taste and feeling to the mouth, removing all Tartar and Scurf from the Teeth, completely arresting the progress of decay, and whitening such parts as have already become black by decay or neglect. Impure Breath caused by Bad Teeth, Tobacco, Spirits, or Catarrh, is neutralised by Sozodont. The price of the Fragrant Sozodont is 2s. 6d., put up in large bottles, fitted with patent sprinklers for applying the liquid to the tooth-brush. Each bottle is inclosed in a handsome toilet box. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers, and by JOHN M. RICHARDS, Great Russell-street, London. Observe the Name SOZODONT on the label, box, and bottle.

BREIDENBACH'S PHLOMIS (Sweet Scented). Beautifully fragrant and lasting. 2s. 6d. to 40s. Bottle. BREIDENBACH'S MACASSARINE, invaluable for preserving the growth of the Hair. 1s., 2s. 6d., 5s. Bottle. Of all Chemists and the Makers, 157a, New Bond-street.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath. Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Florline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants It is perfectly harmless, and delicious as sherry. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London. Retailed everywhere.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR. If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots where the glands are not decayed. Ask any Chemist for "The Mexican Hair Renewer," price 3s. 6d. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

ORGANIC FACTS.—The decay of the Teeth arises from early neglect and the use of tooth pastes, washes, and powders which, containing mineral and other deliterious acids, ultimately ruin the enamel. ROWLANDS' ODONTO, being free from injurious elements, is the best dentifrice that can be obtained, as it produces a pearl-like whiteness of the teeth, healthy gums, and fragrant breath; to smokers it is invaluable, as it removes the unpleasant effects of tobacco smoke on the breath. Ask any Chemist for Rowlands'.



TAMAR INDIEN.—Owing to the marked success of this fruit-lozenge—so agreeable to take and universally prescribed by the Faculty for Constipation, &c.—Base Imitations are being foisted on the public. The genuine preparations bear the title "Tamar Indien." Price 2s. 6d. per Box. E. GRILLON, Wool Exchange, E.C.; and all Chemists.

KEATING'S COUGH LOZENGES CURE COUGHS, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS. Medical testimony states that no other medicine is so effectual in the cure of these dangerous maladies. One lozenge alone gives ease. They obtain no opium nor any violent drug. Sold by all Chemists, in Tins, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d.

HOOPING COUGH.
ROCHE'S HERBAL EMBROCATION.
THE celebrated effectual Cure without internal medicine. Sole Wholesale Agents, W. EDWARDS and SON, 157, Queen Victoria-street (formerly of 67, St. Paul's-churchyard), London, whose names are engraved on the Government stamp.
Sold by most Chemists. Price 4s. per Bottle.

BLAIR'S GOUT PILLS.
The best English Remedy for Gout an Rheumatism. Sure, safe, and effectual. No restraint of diet required during their use, and are certain to prevent the disease attacking any vital part. Sold by all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per Box.

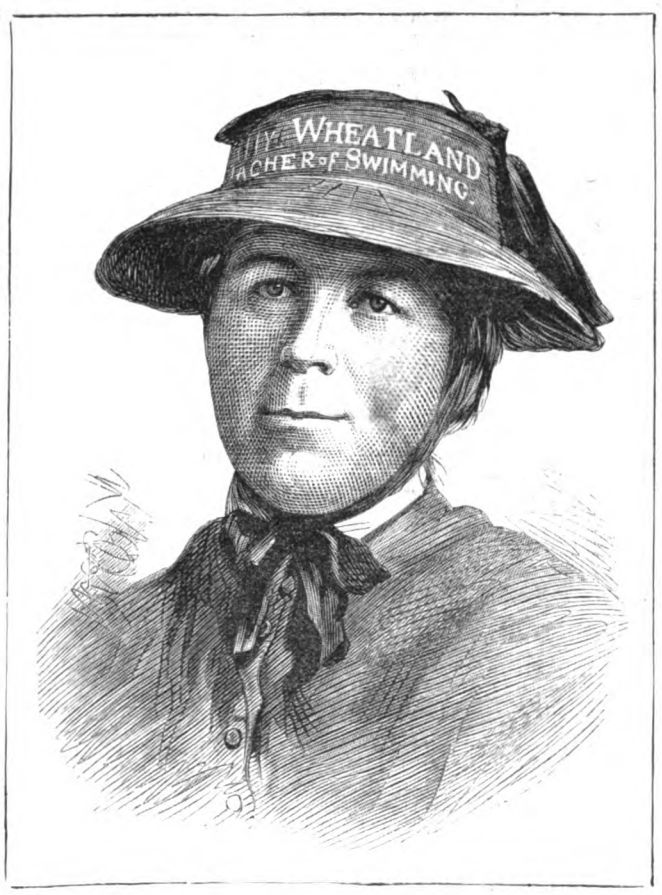
NEW DRINKING-FOUNTAIN AT WOOD-GREEN, OPENED BY BARONESS BURDETT-COUTTS.

WOOD-GREEN MEMORIAL FOUNTAIN.



On Tuesday afternoon Lady Burdett-Coutts formally opened to the use of the public a drinking-fountain erected at Wood-green by the relatives and friends of the late Mrs. Catharine Smithies, of Earlham-grove, as a memorial of the respect entertained for the deceased lady on account of her Christian virtues and of the many works of benevolence to which she had during a long life devoted herself. The fountain, in the form of an obelisk, reared at a cost of £800, is of noble and simple design. At the base are four carved stone basins, into which will flow constant streams of water. On the principal face of the square block forming the base is an appropriate inscription, in gilt letters, setting forth that the fountain has been erected in affectionate remembrance of Mrs. Smithies, as founder of the "Bands of Mercy" movement. A massive monolith of Cornish granite, 21 ft. high, surmounts this block. At a little distance are placed conspicuous drinking-troughs for cattle and dogs.

A large number of friends of Mr. T. B. Smithies, son of the lady above named, assembled at his residence at Earlham-grove, Wood-green, and thence to a tent adjacent to the fountain. The proceedings were opened with prayers read by the Rev. W. M. Sinclair, chaplain to the Bishop of London. Mr. John Lee, secretary to the Metropolitan Drinking Fountain and Cattle Trough Association, and Mr. S. Gurney, treasurer, were officially present, as well as Mr. John Colam, secretary to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The Rev. A. R. Abbott, chairman of the Local Board of Health, accepted the gift of the fountain on behalf of that body, as representing the district. Lady Burdett-Coutts, who was introduced by Mr. Smithies and by the Rev. Mr. Thomas, Vicar of Wood-green, made an interesting brief speech, and bore witness to the services rendered by Mrs. Smithies to the cause of humanity. Kindness to animals, which is the special aim of those associations of children styled the "Bands of Mercy," was dwelt upon by her Ladyship, with feeling eloquence, as a moral and Christian duty. She concluded by drinking a cup of the water of this fountain, and declaring it henceforth given to the public use.

THE GRACE DARLING OF BERSTED.

The seacoast Sussex village of Bersted, adjacent to Bognor, is justly proud of Mrs. Wheatland, a brave and strong middle-aged matron, the mother of a large family, who has saved thirteen lives, in the past twenty years, by swimming out to the rescue of drowning bathers. Her exploits are, indeed, far more remarkable than that of Colonel J. W. Fry, at Boulogne, on Sept. 24 of this year, for which his portrait appeared in our last publication; and we readily accede, with thanks, to the proposal of her parish clergyman, the Rev. W. B. Philpot, Vicar of Bersted, that Mary Wheatland's honest face should also be presented to the readers of this Journal. Its likeness is copied from a photograph by Mr. W. P. Marsh, of Bognor. The Royal Humane Society has recently awarded its honorary testimonial, on vellum, to this modest heroine in humble life.

The Bersted Parish Magazine, a nice little monthly halfpenny paper which has, of course, but a limited circulation, gives an interesting memoir of brave Mary Wheatland. She earns her livelihood as a bathing attendant. She has, we are sorry to learn, had serious family troubles, but has brought up six children by her own care and industry. The eldest is a young sailor; two daughters are in household service. Another girl, Emmie, is mentioned in this account; and the youngest, Nelly, runs errands and dries towels. "Now let us see," continues the Vicar in his parish magazine, "what our Mary Wheatland has done. The other day, September, 1879, the quick eye and the strong hand of a visitor chanced to catch M. W. at the moment when she was being drowned in the wild grasp of a helpless gentleman, whom she had swum with to a groyne, and whom she was holding up at all hazard till perchance rescue should come. We had certainly before heard of such daring acts of mercy done by our Grace Darling of Bersted; but as proper attention had not been drawn to them, I met her and asked her to let Emmie go home on the bathing-horse and to come into my parish-room and give me a little account of herself. She was somewhat shy and reserved in speaking of her own doings, having a loyal sense that she was an unprofitable servant, doing only what it was her duty to do. She holds the saving of life to be as much the work of a bathing-woman as the rinsing of a bathing-dress. But when encouraged, she struck off by narrating how, twenty years ago, she brought in (No. 1) the heavy wife of a London brewer, whose soul was drifting into eternity and her body across the Channel. No. 2 was a nurse. A bathing-man had gone in after her, but finding the salt water not to his taste, he beat a hasty retreat. M. W. dashed in after her and brought her back to her native land. No. 3 was a little foreign lady, whose cries she could interpret better than any of her articulate invocations as she floated off towards her Continental home. It was a strong sea and a ground-swell. She swam round her, caught her by her dress, and paddled home with her foreign prize in tow. M. W. being then but an assistant, the owner of the machines told mam'selle she needn't give her nothing—a piece of English which mam'selle understood and acted upon. Recompense is the last thing which M. W. thinks of when she saves anybody. No. 4 was a young lady who was 'very good' to her, and used often to bring her hot coffee. No. 5 was a lady of whom she remembered nothing particular except the trivial incident of having snatched her, at her own risk, from a watery grave. No. 6 was a gentleman whose 'heart came over queer.' He had turned round to swim back, but knew no more till, thanks to Mary Wheatland, he found himself comfortably reposing in his own bed, instead of that of the ocean. As this was not long ago, since my coming to be M. W.'s pastor, I remember the pleasure with which we all heard that she had received £20 from the gentleman, who kindly added that he 'did not miss it.' No. 7 was the case which has led to this extraordinary revelation of heroism. I said to her,—'Now, Mary, we have counted seven. Is that all? tell me the truth.' I saw there was something behind on which she was unwilling to be explicit. 'Well, Sir,' she said, 'I don't want it to be spoke of, for fear the lady come to know, for I wasn't to tell. It was five year ago.' 'Never mind,' I said, 'you may tell it now, I should think.' I'll be very cautious.' So it came out that one fine morning she had a splendid haul of no less than six sportive young nymphs. They had all played away, against orders, out of their depth, and were all drowning in a batch. She swam to seaward of them and brought them in one after another, as their garments, heavy with drink, pulled the poor wretches down to sandy death. 'Pray,' she said, 'don't say anything about it, for they were very good to me; they gave me £2 towards back rent, and sent me a bit of beef at Christmas.'

MARY WHEATLAND, THE GRACE DARLING OF BERSTED, NEAR BOGNOR, SUSSEX.

"So here are no less than thirteen lives which our good, strong Mary Wheatland has saved. How many more there may have been 'goodness knows;' for she looks on life-saving as part of her regular business—and she found it hard to tax her memory even with these examples. Thus her splendid conscience is hung with immortal but immaterial medals. She has never sought any from the Humane Society, nor does she seem to think she has done anything meritorious or worthy of human distinction.

"I said I should mention Emmie again, for she is growing up with her mother's machines and her mother's instincts. For example, she saw the other day a man in the sea. Two men who were watching him said he was merely disporting himself. But Emmie knew better the signals of distress as he floundered about with his sinking hands; and she resolutely insisted on their going in after him. They were just in time to save him. They got a 'splendid shilling' between them; but Emmie, when she saw him saved, went back to help her mother in wringing her towels. Such are some of the annals of our summer seaside!"

The Vicar adds, with respect to Mrs. Wheatland's general character, that she is a woman of the highest principle, who has long struggled against domestic difficulty, "keeping her own head up," and that she is a regular attendant and communicant at the parish church. He invites contributions to a fund which is to be raised for he benefit and that of her children. The names or Colonel Teesdale, C.B., V.C., and Mr. W. Kershaw Davies, churchwardens, also Captain Drake, R.N., and Commander Keats, R.N., all residents in the parish, or at Bognor, are associated with that of the Rev. W. J. Philpot in this appeal to the public on her behalf. The gentleman who came to her assistance, the other day, when she almost lost her own life in trying to save that of an imperilled bather, was Mr. W. A. Thackeray; he wrote an account of this adventure, which he sent to the Times, but without his own name; and it has since been ascertained and revealed by the Vicar of Bersted

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1879.

An unusually early foretaste of severe wintry weather—piercing northerly winds, keen frosts at night, heavy snows, and day temperature considerably below the average level—compels us to look forward with not a little uneasiness to the meteorological characteristics of the next two or three months. Prophets of the weather foretell, with their customary confidence, what is called "an old-fashioned winter." They may be right—which, by-the-by, they seldom are—but, if it should turn out that there is a close correspondence between their predictions and the actual facts of the case, we must make up our minds to deep and wide-spread suffering. The youth of the well-to-do may, so far as their own personal experience is concerned, rejoice in the bracing up of their nervous system and in the active exercises and sports which a long spell of wintry weather brings with it, at least to them. The aged, even of the classes who can take refuge in cosy homes, will find some difficulty, with all the aids they can bring to bear in their favour, in resisting the onslaught of a foe which it is impossible wholly to evade. But the poor—men, women, and children, old and young, scantily attired, poorly fed, with little or no fuel, and with but the barest shelter from the biting blasts—how are they to face the all-pervading, all-persistent enemy to their comfort? That they will do it we know, though few of us may know how they will do it, save that we are fully aware it cannot be done but at terrible loss, both physical and moral, to their well-being. It is this which makes a hard winter in this country so trying a calamity. We are never prepared for it. Our seasons are too capricious to allow of our thoroughly adapting indoor arrangements to outdoor extremes. We may be standing now, for aught we can tell, upon the very verge of discomforts which may seriously affect us, even after we have passed beyond it to more genial times. It were better for us, however, not to permit ourselves to go half way towards meeting a trial which, after all, may fail to present itself. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

The week's news place before us several matters for reflection. The death of Mr. Roebuck, M.P., and of M. Michel Chevalier, the great French economist, leaves a felt vacancy in the political world. Arthur Roebuck, late Member for Sheffield, was the architect of his own eminent position, and that was sui generis. He was a House of Commons celebrity, admired by all parties, whilst from all he stood apart. In debate he was an athlete, and he dealt his blows, which no one liked to encounter, pretty impartially to all who came in his way. He spared no susceptibility; he had no pity; but he nevertheless did good service to his country, which none but himself was at once qualified and prepared to do. And what he did in this way he did well, generally hitting the right nail upon the head, and sometimes emphatically enunciating truths which most men were thinking about, but which none could be found to express. The Legislature always stands in need of such a man—one who holds himself aloof from party and who is not ashamed or afraid to talk of things as they are. Mr. Roebuck's self-reliance was wonderful; in some cases it approached even to the grotesque. But his love of his country was sincere. His courage was invincible; his integrity transparent to all. His style of speaking was incisive, penetrating, and effective. And now his place is vacant, and "will know him no more." But the remembrance of him will long survive in the Chamber in which his chief services were rendered.

Another political personage whom we are bound to notice this week—one differing in very many respects, in most perhaps, from Arthur Roebuck—claims towards himself that tribute of respect which in Great Britain is always paid to first-rate statesmen—we mean, of course, William Ewart Gladstone. We shall say nothing of the policy which he represents. We look at him in no party light. We say nothing, good or bad, of his errand to Midlothian. We endeavour to mark his progress in Scotland, simply as that of one whose mental and moral features command admiring notice. His labours during the past week seem to be those of a young man rejoicing in his youth, rather than of a man on the very brink of threescore years and ten. His fund of information seems inexhaustible. His power of using it, whether for statement, illustration, or comment, almost unprecedented. The sincerity and fervour of his mind throw a special charm over his oratorical effusions. His exactness in details, and his comprehensiveness of general views make the outpourings of his eloquence highly instructive to such as choose to listen to them. That he has stirred Scotland during the past week, as few men have ever done before, is indisputable. His journeys from place to place have resembled a Royal progress. The popularity which has marked his course may, or may not, indicate a prevalent sympathy with the political principles which he advocates; but whether this be, or be not, the case, his reception in the North is a striking phenomenon, and will, doubtless, have its effect upon public opinion on the Continent. How far it may influence the next General Election we must leave the event itself to tell. But it may be remembered that no one can foresee what may occur between this and then, nor how much of present excitement may be either diverted or evaporated, before the will of the electorate shall be constitutionally expressed.

Thus far respecting Home topics. The School Board elections, the Irish prosecutions, the death of Mr. Delane, late editor of the Times, and other home matters of unquestioned interest, must needs give place to a few words on the Royal Marriage in Spain. On Saturday last King Alfonso's second wedding was celebrated. His marriage to the Archduchess Marie Christine of Austria is, as far as we know, or as the public has been led to believe, if not one of ardent affection, unobjectionable. What influence it may have upon Spanish politics it is not easy to forecast. Royal matrimonial alliances are not often followed by the results commonly expected of them. One may be incompetent to detect immediately their traces on the social or political state of the country in which they may chance to occur. But there can be no doubt that, directly or indirectly, they touch, at some point or other, popular interests. Europe can afford in the present instance to look on the event with something like cordial sympathy, for Spain is now out of the range of those States, combination with which might affect, to some extent, what is called "the balance of power." Geographically, politically, and morally, it stands alone; and if its advantages are properly used it may yet develop immense resources. That it may do so is the common wish of neighbouring States; and that the present marriage may conduce to this, and as well to the happiness of Alfonso and Christine, is the feeling with which our fellow-countrymen will, no doubt, regard the stately ceremonial at Madrid.

THE COURT.

The Queen gave an audience to the Earl of Beaconsfield at Windsor Castle on the day her Majesty returned from the Highlands. Princess Christian visited the Queen and Princess Louise of Lorne arrived at the castle the next day. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had an audience of her Majesty. His Excellency the Russian Ambassador was introduced by the Marquis of Salisbury, and presented his letters of recall. The Earl of Dufferin (her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg), Count Schouvaloff, and the Marquis of Salisbury arrived at the castle yesterday week. The Queen's dinner party included Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Louise of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, Lady Abercromby, Lady Sophia Macnamara, the Earl of Dufferin, Count Schouvaloff, the Marquis of Salisbury, Viscount Hawarden, and Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Ponsonby. Her Majesty held a Council on Saturday last, at which were present the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the Right Hon. R. A. Cross, and Lord John Manners. Mr. Charles Lennox Peel, Clerk of the Council, was in attendance. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon had an audience of her Majesty. The Queen held a private investiture of the Order of the Thistle. Previous to this the Earl of Fife delivered up to her Majesty the badge and ribbon of the Order of the Thistle worn by his late father. The Earl of Seafield was introduced, knighted, and afterwards invested by the Queen with the badge and ribbon of the Order of the Thistle. The Duke of Montrose was likewise introduced and knighted, and invested with the badge and ribbon of the Order of the Thistle, the Right Hon. R. A. Cross being present as Secretary of State, and Major Richardson as Secretary to the Order. The Lord, Groom, and Equerry in Waiting were in attendance. On Sunday Princess Louise of Lorne and Princess Beatrice attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. Thomas James Rowsell officiated. Princess Louise of Lorne left the castle on Monday. The Queen has suffered for several days from a severe cold, which has prevented her Majesty taking her usual out-of-door exercise; but the lastest intelligence announces the Queen to be recovering. Princess Beatrice has had some skating.

The Queen has appointed the Hon. William Stuart, C.B., her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the King of the Netherlands, to be also her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Majesty in his capacity of Grand Duke of Luxemburg.

The Queen has appointed Rear-Admiral Francis William Sullivan, C.B., C.M.G., to be Knight Commander of the Bath. Her Majesty has also made twenty-six appointments of officers to be Companions of the Bath. The Queen has conferred the Victoria Cross upon Corporal Schiess, of the Natal Native Contingent, for conspicuous gallantry in the defence of Rorke's Drift Post on the night of Jan. 22, 1879.

Lady Abercromby, the Hon. Caroline Cavendish, and the Hon. Evelyn Paget have succeeded the Countess of Erroll, the Hon. Frances Drummond, and the Hon. Ethel Cadogan as Lady and Maids of Honour in Waiting. The Hon. Horatia Stopford has arrived at the castle. Lord Elphinstone and Colonel the Hon. C. Lindsay have succeeded Viscount Hawarden and Mr. Cameron of Lochiel as Lord and Groom in Waiting; and Colonel du Plat and Colonel J. C. M'Neill have succeeded Major-General L. Gardiner and Colonel the Hon. H. Byng as Equerries in Waiting to the Queen.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales returned to Sandringham House on Saturday last after passing the week with Lord Hastings at Melton Constable. On Sunday the Prince and Princess and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales attended Divine service at St. Mary Magdalene's Church. The Rev. F. Hervey and the Rev. Henry Smith, of Castle Rising, officiated. Monday was the thirty-fifth anniversary of the birthday of the Princess. The auspicious event was celebrated with the usual festivities at Sandringham. Prince Ferdinand of Glucksburg, Prince Louis of Battenberg, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, were among the guests staying in the house. The Prince, with his visitors, passed the morning shooting. In the afternoon the children of the schools of Sandringham, West Newton, Wolferton, and Dersingham were entertained in honour of the Royal birthday. The Prince and Princess, who take great interest in the education of the children of the poor on the Royal estate, with a large party, visited the room where the children were partaking of tea. The day was observed with due honours at Norwich and at various towns in Norfolk, and also at Windsor and in the metropolis. The Prince and party have had fair sport in the Royal preserves. The Prince has consented to become the patron of the Society for the Acclimatisation of Fish in Norfolk and Suffolk, and has sent a donation of £10.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales, on board the Bacchante, left Madeira on the 25th ult.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh gave the servants a ball at Eastwell on the 25th ult. The Ashford band was in attendance. Their Royal and Imperial Highnesses, with their guests, were present during a portion of the evening.

Princess Louise of Lorne is expected to return to Canada by the Allan mail line steamer Sarmatian on Jan. 22 next.

The Duke of Connaught, having through the Provincial Grand Master of Freemasons of the county, General Brownrigg, signified his consent to become an honorary member of the Weyside Lodge, No. 1395, Woking, has been duly elected a member of that lodge.

Prince Leopold, who arrived in Paris on Sunday, was present on Monday during a portion of the sitting of the Chamber of Deputies. He was received on entering the Palais Bourbon by the Questors, and was conducted by them to the President's tribune.

The Duchess of Teck and the Duchess of Connaught attended a morning concert given at the Star and Garter Hotel, Richmond-hill, yesterday week, in aid of the funds of the Richmond Hospital. The proceeds of the concert exceed £70.

The Duke de Chartres has arrived at Claridge's Hotel from Chantilly.

Don Carlos entertained Sir R. Bateson Harvey, M.P., Mr. Coleman, High Sheriff of Bucks, and a party at dinner on Saturday last at Brown's Hotel.

His Excellency Count Schouvaloff took his departure from the Russian Embassy, Chesham-place, on Saturday last for Cannes, to pay his respects to the Empress of Russia. His Excellency the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador and Countess Karolyi returned to the Austrian Embassy, Belgrave-square, on Saturday last from Melbury House, Dorset. The Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe arrived a few days since on a visit to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Duchess of Marlborough at the Viceregal Lodge, Dublin, from Floors Castle, Kelso. The Marchioness of Londonderry and Lord Herbert Vane-Tempest have left Plâs Machynlleth to join the Marquis at Mount Stewart. The Earl and Countess of Dudley have arrived at Dudley House, Park-lane, from Brighton. Earl and Countess Spencer have left Spencer House, St. James's, for Paris on their way to Marseilles and Africa. The Earl and Countess of Sefton have arrived at Normanton Park on a visit to Lord and Lady Aveland from Croxteth Park. The Countess of Harrington and the Ladies Fanny and Blanche Stanhope have arrived at Elvaston Castle, Derby. The Earl of Mountcharles, who arrived from Gibraltar early in the week, has joined the Marquis and Marchioness Conyngham at Slane Castle, county Meath.

Viscount and Viscountess Downe have arrived at Danby Lodge, Whitby. The Viscount has purchased the remainder of the lease of the late Dowager Lady Carington's residence in Berkeley-square. Lady George Gordon Lennox gave amateur theatrical performances at 54, Grosvenor-street, on Monday and Tuesday, in aid of the distress in Kent. The entertainments consisted of "Sweethearts," "My Uncle's Will," and a recitation by the Hon. Lady Sebright.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The marriage of Captain F. Herbert (late 9th Lancers), second son of Mr. William Herbert, of Clytha, with Mdlle. La Baronne Cécile d'Anethan, eldest daughter of the late Baron Auguste d'Anethan, was solemnised in Brussels on the 29th ult. The ceremony was performed by Monseigneur Vanutelli, Papal Nuncio, in the private chapel of the Episcopal Palace. His Excellency Sir Savile Lumley, British Minister in Brussels, gave a dinner and ball in honour of the bride and bridegroom on the previous Thursday. After the wedding breakfast, which was numerously attended, the bride and bridegroom left for the south of France.

Lieutenant William Christopher James, Royal Scots Greys, only son of the Right Hon. Lord Justice James, was married yesterday week to Miss Effie Gray Millais, eldest daughter of Mr. J. Everett Millais, R.A., at St. Peter's Church, Cranley-gardens. The service was choral. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of York, assisted by the Hon. and Rev. Francis E. C. Byng, M.A. In the afternoon Lieutenant and Mrs. James left town for Cliveden, which the Duke and Duchess of Westminster had placed at their disposal.

Marriages are arranged between Lord Hastings and the Hon. Elizabeth Harbord, third daughter of Lord Suffield; and between Mdlle. de Tuyll, sister of the Baroness van Brienen, and Count Henry Lützow, Attaché to the Austrian Legation at the Hague.

POLITICAL.

To the reader who may have experienced some amazement at contemplating for so many successive mornings the columns upon columns devoted to Mr. Gladstone's speeches in Midlothian nothing better could have been wished than that he or she should have had the pleasure of hearing the right hon. gentleman deliver with fervid eloquence his series of political addresses. At a ripe age when most men seek repose, Mr Gladstone has thrown himself into this electioneering contest with all the vigour and earnestness of youth, tempered by the statesman's wisdom. His deliverances in Edinburgh, Dalkeith, and West Calder were marked by undiminished energy, and more than usual felicity of imagery. His comparison, for example, of the fussy "Imperialism" of her Majesty's Ministers with the action of the Liliputians to Gulliver excited the laughter of some three thousand listeners at Dalkeith; and their cheers gave emphasis to the assertion that England was being tied down in the same manner by all sorts of dangerous covenants. There was a ca'-me-ca'-thee, albeit legitimate, ring about Mr. Gladstone's subsequent affirmations—that Scotland deserved a larger share of Parliamentary representation, that he favoured the abolition of hypothec. In accord with not a few was he also when he plumped for "local option" in the regulation of licenses for the liquor trade. Mr. Gladstone would leave it to Time to deal with the Established Church. But, with regard to the land question, he would free tenants from their "fetters," and do away with the laws of settlement and entail. As for the bugbear of Home Rule, he looked for the settlement of that vexed question to the institution of a form of "County Government" applicable to the whole kingdom, which would at once satisfy local needs and relieve Parliament of the necessity of legislating on many domestic affairs. Ere he could depart from Dalkeith, Mr. Gladstone was compelled to address a meeting of ladies; and to them he made a special speech, which deserves to rank among classic models of the loftiest school of oratory. The right hon. gentleman, at West Calder the next day, pointed the moral of his remarks on the land problem by dilating on diverse branches of the question—by showing that agricultural distress had been greater in the easternmost States of America than it had been in the United Kingdom; by expressing the hope that he might take part in the liberation of tenants from the restraints of unjust law and custom; by demonstrating that in France, where peasant proprietorship is widespread, the value of land had latterly increased far more rapidly than it had in England; and by demolishing the ghost of "protection," revived by Mr. Chaplin under the specious guise of "reciprocity." Later, freshness was even bestowed on the consideration of the foreign policy of the Government; and the rich and varied rhetoric of Mr. Gladstone gave comparative newness to another denunciation of the Ministry's dealing with the Eastern Question, and to an epigrammatic exposure of the real meaning of the Earl of Beaconsfield's Guildhall phrase:—

> But what did the two words "Liberty and Empire" mean in the Roman mouth? They meant simply this: liberty for ourselves, empire over the rest of mankind (Cheers).

Drawing-room conversation with the Liberal magnates of Midlothian at Dalmeny usurped the place of platform oratory on the Friday. On Saturday last, Mr. Gladstone made a second visit to Edinburgh, in company with Mrs. and Miss Gladstone and the Earl and Countess of Rosebery, and Edinburgh again accorded to the ex-Premier a reception such as is ordinarily reserved for Royal personages. Mr. Gladstone's host, Lord Rosebery, presided over the great meeting in the Corn Exchange, and in his introductory speech, a model of brevity, touched a responsive chord when he referred to Mr. Gladstone's having "passed through one long series of well-ordered triumphs from his home in Wales to the Metropolis of Scotland." It was then the privilege of the large auditory to hear from the acknowledged master of finance a superbly clear exposition of the extravagant way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has increased the expenditure of the country by many millions. Mr. Gladstone was loudly cheered when he roundly said that the eight millions by which the Government had swollen the Budget would have been far better employed had they been flung into the sea. An endeavour to render Mr. Gladstone's sonorous periods audible by means of the telephone in a neighbouring hall was only partially successful. Bringing his Edinburgh campaign to a close by an address on Saturday evening to a vast gathering of working men, who filled the Waverley Market (at which assemblage further addresses were handed to the right hon. gentleman), Mr. Gladstone eloquently summed up his protest against the Eastern policy of the Government by stating how it had alienated the Christian populations lately emancipated from the thraldom of the Porte, and by repeating that the support of the freedom of these enfranchised peoples was the one course for England to adopt.

If Mr. Gladstone looked forward to a few days' repose on his leaving Dalmeny Park last Monday to be the guest of Lord and Lady Breadalbane at Taymouth Castle, he was speedily awakened from his day-dream. A brief speech was drawn from him at Dunfermline, and was paid for in kind, sets of table-linen being the gifts. At Perth Mr. Gladstone received the freedom of the burgh, and the right hon. gentleman's reply contained a notable eulogium of the great ability and political integrity of Mr. Roebuck, whose death he had read of with deep regret that morning. This address was delivered in the City Hall. On returning to the station, Mr. Gladstone found an assemblage of about eight thousand persons, and had to receive a fresh sheaf of addresses, and make yet another speech. There was a further welcome at Dunkeld, another at Aberfeldy, where the illustrious traveller's eloquence was again tapped; and even under the hospitable roof of Taymouth Castle, on the morrow, Mr. Gladstone was called upon to speak, and gave sound advice through the Killin and Breadalbane Liberal Association to Liberals generally. There remained the Glasgow visit, the programme for which was a torchlight reception on Thursday night, delivery of the Rectorial address on Friday morning, and of the political speech in the evening. Mr. Gladstone having arranged to return south on Saturday, the Liberals of Chester (whom Mr. Dodson, M.P., addressed on Monday) have resolved to accord him a hearty welcome-home to-day.

When are Ministers to reply to Mr. Gladstone? Unless an opportunity be created before, it seems that the answers may be postponed till the 18th inst., when Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Cranbrook will, it is said, address a Conservative gathering at Leeds.

Political utterances generally have been so dwarfed by the colossal speeches of the Liberal candidate for Midlothian that we need do no more than mention that on Sunday Mr. O'Connor Power, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, and others addressed a large meeting in Hyde Park in opposition to the arrest of Messrs. Davitt, Daley, and Killen in Ireland; and that Mr. Parnell spoke to the same effect on Saturday in Liverpool.

GENERAL SIR F. ROBERTS READING A PROCLAMATION TO THE CITY OF CABUL.—SEE PAGE 532.

THE OCCUPATION OF CABUL.

The deposed Ameer Yakoob Khan has been sent away from Cabul by the British Government, to be detained as a State prisoner in India, though nominally a guest or hostage. There is no other important news.

Our Correspondents at the head-quarters of General Sir F. Roberts, at the capital city of Afghanistan, have furnished us with sketches of the ceremony of his reading his proclamation to the inhabitants of Cabul, on Oct. 12, at the Divan-i-am, or pavilion in the Ameer's gardens, below the Bala Hissar. At eleven in the morning the whole field force was paraded, lining both sides of the broad road leading to the Bala Hissar. Next to the gateway the 67th Foot were stationed. Then, in the following order, were the Horse Artillery, the 72nd and 92nd Highlanders, the Field Artillery, Gatlings, and Sappers, the 5th Punjaub Infantry, the Mountain Battery, the 23rd Punjaub Pioneers, the 28th Native Infantry, the 9th Lancers, 5th Punjaub Cavalry, 12th Punjaub Cavalry, and the 14th Lancers, forming an imposing double line.

At noon General Roberts, accompanied by the whole of his staff and by all the native chiefs and a cavalry escort, left the camp and moved slowly down the road through the lines of troops. The bands and trumpets played, and the troops gave the general salute. As the procession neared the Bala Hissar the artillery commenced a salute of thirty-one guns, which was not concluded before the head of the procession rode through the gateway into the Bala Hissar. Conducted by numerous Sirdars, including the Ameer's nephew and son and Padsha Khan, the Ghilzai chief, the procession arrived at the Ameer's garden. The walled fort on the hill above, shown in our view of the scene, is the Khala Feringhee, from which, on Sept. 3, the insurgent soldiery fired down upon the British Residency.

General Roberts entered the palace, attended by his staff, and in a few minutes appeared at a window overlooking the garden, where a large number of people were assembled by order of the Ameer. Yakoob Khan himself was ill, and pleaded this excuse for not attending at the ceremony. General Roberts then addressed the multitude, pausing between each sentence, which was then translated to the crowd—first in Cabulese, then in Persian—by the Sirdars.

"People of Cabul,—Early in October I issued a proclamation to you, telling you that the British army was advancing to occupy Cabul, and warning you that anyone opposing the advance of the army would be treated as a rebel against the authority of the Ameer. In spite of this warning, the progress of the army has been persistently opposed by the people of Afghanistan, especially of Cabul. In return, it would not be beyond the demands of justice that Cabul should be levelled to the ground. The great British Government, however, tempering mercy with pity, decrees that Cabul shall be spared. It is necessary, however, that a severe punishment should be inflicted. It has been decided that the buildings of the Bala Hissar, and of the city, interfering with the proper military occupation, shall be destroyed. A heavy fine, the amount of which will be fixed later on, will be levied on the citizens. A military Governor will be appointed over the city and a radius of ten miles around it. This district will be placed under martial law, and all within it are required to give up their arms. Anyone found bearing arms within this district within one week of the present time will be punished with death. All persons having in their possession property belonging to the late Embassy are required to bring it in immediately, under the severest penalties. A reward of fifty rupees will be paid for the denunciation and conviction of anyone concerned in the late cowardly massacre, which has left a lasting blot upon the Afghan name. For a subaltern officer or captain seventy-five rupees will be paid. For a field officer 125 rupees will be paid. For each English rifle delivered up three rupees will be paid. The native troops will march through the city to-morrow, and the Sirdars are ordered to attend."

After the speech the General and his staff entered the camp, and the troops marched back to their quarters. The 5th Ghoorkas and the 67th were to occupy the Bala Hissar.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Chambers met in Paris on Thursday week, for the first time since Sept. 4, 1870. In the Senate no business of importance was transacted. In the Chamber M. Gambetta congratulated the deputies on the vote which had restored to Paris her legal title of the capital of France. The Government was now installed, he said, in the only place from which the country could be governed with authority. M. Gambetta urged the members to avoid needless and angry discussions, and to direct all their efforts to the supreme end—the grandeur of the country and the consolidation of the Republic. M. Haentjens, a Bonapartist, brought forward an interpellation demanding measures to relieve distress arising from the dearness of bread and wine; and, after a discussion, the motion was negatived by a large majority, and the Chamber adjourned until Saturday. On that day M. Naquet's proposal for the introduction of a law of divorce was placed on the order of the day, and the House adjourned without transacting any business of importance. There was a long discussion last Monday upon a motion of a Radical deputy, M. Maigne, in favour of abrogating the law which prohibits work on Sundays. M. Keller, of the Right, spoke against Sunday work, and advocated an extension of the law; but M. Maigne's motion was adopted by 335 votes against 102. A motion of M. Devaux, of the Left, for the suppression of the post of Military Chaplain was likewise agreed to, as was also a proposal made by MM. Louis Blanc, Brisson, and others, in favour of modifying the standing order which authorises the exclusion of a deputy from the sittings of the House for thirty days. Prince Leopold (who arrived in Paris on Saturday last from Darmstadt) was present during the sitting, and occupied M. Gambetta's box.

In Tuesday's sitting of the Chamber, M. Baudry d'Asson, a Legitimist, withdrew a question he had given notice of, which had been looked forward to as likely to afford the Ministers an opportunity of explaining their policy. M. Waddington thereupon complained of the custom which had been introduced of giving notice of a question and afterwards withdrawing it. The Ministry was said to be in extremity, but it was not at private conventions, but openly from the tribune, that questions relating to it ought to be brought forward. It was for the House to proclaim whether the Ministers did or did not possess its confidence. If they did not they were ready to retire.

The Bureaux of the Left in the Chamber, at a joint sitting last Monday, agreed upon the following points as part of their political programme:—Liberty of meeting and association, excluding only from the latter privilege congregations not authorised by the State; liberty of the press; gratuitous, secular, and compulsory education. An animated discussion then took place upon the subject of the plenary amnesty, and it was finally decided that the question should be submitted, by specially appointed delegates, to the respective groups, and afterwards brought up again before a joint sitting of the Bureaux.

Tuesday's papers announce that the Ministers, at a Cabinet Council held the previous day at the residence of M. Waddington, resolved to demand a vote of confidence from the Chamber immediately.

The first prize of 15,000f. for the best design for a memorial of the defence of Paris, to be erected at Courbevoie, has been awarded to M. Barrias.

M. Michel Chevalier, the eminent French political economist, died in Paris on Saturday, at the age of seventy-three.

The death is announced of the Comtesse d'Andigné, widow of the Vendean General, at the age of eighty-two. She studied painting under Robert Lefèvre, and was an accomplished amateur.

Theodore Morawski, the last of the statesmen who took part in the Polish revolution of 1830-1, died in Paris on the 21st ult., at the age of eighty-three. He was Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Polish National Government, and author of a history of Poland.

SPAIN.

The marriage of the King and the Archduchess Marie Christine of Austria was celebrated on Saturday last in the Atocha Church, Madrid. The weather was finer than it had been for some days previously, and the wedding was celebrated with great pomp and ceremony. The streets were decorated with flags, and tapestry was hung from many of the balconies. In the church were assembled deputations from the Cortes, the Senate, the Army and Navy, and the Courts of Justice, as well as the special Envoys and a large number of ladies. After the ceremony, which was very short, the King and Queen drove to the palace and witnessed the march past of the troops. At night crowds thronged the streets to see the illuminations. There was a State reception at the palace on Sunday, which was very numerously attended. Afterwards the Queen-mother, who has been well received at Madrid, was visited in her apartments by nearly all attending. A Commission of the Senate paid their respects, a proceeding which, however, the Congress, on the motion of Señor Ayala, the President, did not observe. The Opera-House at night presented a splendid spectacle, being, indeed, a blaze of magnificent toilettes and uniforms. All the Royal family were present. The first bull-fight at Madrid on Monday in honour of the Royal marriage, despite a piercingly cold wind, attracted thousands of people, who, the day being a fine one, crowded the route of the Royal procession. A Standard telegram says that the boxes were filled with ladies, and the Ambassadors and Envoys Extraordinary were present with their staffs. King Alfonso and Queen Christine were greeted with enthusiastic cheers, and Queen Isabella also had a hearty reception. The toreros killed eight bulls, but not without many exciting incidents. One bull jumped the barrier, knocking down several persons and tossing a gendarme. Two other animals also injured two of the attendants. The telegram says that the people expressed much satisfaction to see the Queen remain throughout the entire performance, as well as the Austrian Duke. A banquet was given on Tuesday at the Royal Palace to all the diplomatic representatives of foreign Powers in Madrid. The second bull-fight took place on Tuesday, and was attended again by the Royal family. No accident happened, but eight bulls and several horses were killed in the usual style. Lord and Lady Napier absented themselves from both bull-fights. The wedding festivities closed in the evening with a banquet in the Hall of Columns at the Palace, where the King entertained 130 guests, including the Royal family and the representatives of the European Monarchs, to whom the King and Queen expressed much satisfaction at the congratulatory telegrams they had received from their Sovereigns. We learn from the Standard's correspondent at Madrid that after the banquet a general reception took place, and 1000 persons were present by Royal command. A military display by torchlight which was to have taken place at night was prevented by a heavy snowfall.

Fresh floods were reported on Saturday last to have occurred on the banks of the Guadalquivir.

A Madrid telegram says that vineyards in Malaga covering an area of 29,660 hectares have been attacked by the phylloxera vastatrix. The pest is increasing in the provinces of Gerona and Catalonia.

Kublins, Parcho, and Limouz, the Cuban insurgent leaders, are reported to have surrendered to the Spanish authorities.

ITALY.

Signor Cairoli on Thursday week presented the new Ministry to the Chamber, and made a statement of the questions with which they have undertaken to deal. A cold reception was given to the Ministry, and leave was subsequently asked to interpellate the Government relative to the late Ministerial crisis. The Chamber yesterday week adopted the convention for the purchase of the Roman Railways by the Government. Signor Sella subsequently introduced an interpellation of which he had given notice with reference to the recent Ministerial crisis. Signor Cairoli replied, and stated that the difference which arose between the members of the last Cabinet concerned the course to be pursued in regard to the grist tax question; and he defended the combination he had entered into with Signor Depretis for the formation of the present Ministry. Signor Sella said he was not satisfied with the Ministerial explanations. Signor Grimaldi, the late Minister of Finance, said he was ready to defend his own responsibility before the Chamber and the country, and he awaited the approaching discussion of the finances without apprehension. He respected the opinions of all, but arithmetic was not a question of opinion. On Monday the Minister of Public Works laid on the table a convention with the Eastern Telegraph Company for laying a cable between Sicily and the Lipari Islands. Signori Spantigatti and Tajani were on Tuesday elected vice-presidents of the Chamber of Deputies.

BELGIUM.

The Budget which was brought into the Second Chamber, at Brussels, on the 27th ult., estimates the expenditure at 276,375,086f., and the revenue at 273,490,060. A conversion of Rentes will reduce the expenditure by 2,351,110f., but this will still leave a deficit of 553,916f.

HOLLAND.

In Tuesday's sitting of the Second Chamber the Estimates of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs were adopted. In the course of the debate the Foreign Minister, Baron van Lynden, made a speech in which he expressed a hope that the Treaty of Extradition with the United States of America would soon be concluded. He proceeded to defend the commercial policy of the Government, and maintained that the favourable position occupied by the Netherlands afforded a guarantee that foreign Powers would always have to take Dutch interests into their consideration. The establishment created by Baron Overbeck in the north of Borneo had no political character. The Government vigilantly followed the progress of this question, and was now convinced that England would do nothing which would give the Netherlands any cause to complain of a line of action contrary to the spirit of the Treaty of 1824.

GERMANY.

The King and Queen of Denmark arrived at Berlin early yesterday week, and were received by the German Crown Prince, who drove with them to the palace, where a suite of apartments had been prepared for their reception. Their Danish Majesties were visited shortly after their arrival by the Emperor and Empress of Germany, and were also waited upon by the principal members of the Royal family. In the evening the King and Queen dined at the palace with the Emperor and a brilliant company. They subsequently went to the opera to hear Madame Adelina Patti sing in "Lucia di Lammermoor," and were accompanied on their return by the Emperor and Empress, who took tea with them as their guests. The Princes and Archdukes who had attended the opera with them also followed them back to the palace. The King and Queen left Berlin last Saturday morning for Copenhagen. They were accompanied to the railway station by the Emperor and Empress and the Crown Prince of Germany. There have been, as usual, many rumours respecting this visit; but it is also affirmed that it had no political significance whatever.

The Empress, imitating the example of his Majesty, has contributed a handsome sum in aid of the sufferers by famine and hard times in Silesia.

Last Saturday Prince Friedrich Karl, who was familiarly known as the "Red Prince" in the Franco-German war, and who is still better known in this country as the father of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught, celebrated his silver wedding with the Princess Friedrich Karl, who, like the Prince her husband, continues to enjoy excellent health. Almost all the members of the Prussian Royal family, including the Crown Prince, took part in the festivities.

Prince Gortschakoff had an audience of the Emperor William on Sunday. Prince Gortschakoff also called upon the Empress and the Crown Prince, the Crown Prince returning the visit of the Russian Chancellor in the afternoon. On Monday evening Prince Gortschakoff left Berlin. Count Hatzfeld, the German Ambassador at Constantinople, had an audience of the Emperor on Sunday.

Prince Bismarck has published a letter to those who have offered him advice in consequence of the rumours that had been circulated as to his state of health, the largest number of his correspondents being persons in England. He is still too unwell to answer each by letter, but he offers them publicly his heartiest thanks.

A bill concerning Alsace-Lorraine was submitted yesterday week to the Federal Council proposing the issue of a 4½ per cent loan, not exceeding the amount of 24,380,000 marks, to be devoted principally to the construction of railways, canals, roads, and works for the protection of the country against inundations of the Rhine.

In the Lower House of the Prussian Diet on Tuesday, the Minister of the Interior, in reply to a question, said that the continuance of the minor state of siege in Berlin and its vicinity was unavoidable, as the secret Social-Democratic agitation had increased, and the old connection with the agitators in foreign countries was maintained.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Count Zichy's resignation as Austrian Ambassador at Constantinople has been accepted, and the Grand Cross of St. Stephen has been conferred upon him by the Emperor.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath on Monday began the debate on the Army Bill. Thirty-three members inscribed their names on the list of speakers.

Resolutions proposing a great reduction of the strength of the army in time of peace, and of the duration of the operation of the Army Law, were passed by large majorities at the sitting of the Liberal Club at Vienna on Wednesday night, the effect of which opposition will be that the Government Army Bill in its present form cannot pass the Lower House, as it will fail to obtain the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution.

The Hungarian Parliament has definitively voted the Bill by which Bosnia will be included in the Austro-Hungarian frontier line. On Monday the Lower House passed a bill giving authority to the Government for the provisional exercise of the Budget for a period of three months.

The Upper House of the Hungarian Diet on Tuesday agreed to the prolongation of the existing army law for a period of ten years after rejecting an amendment proposing to extend its operation for two years only.

The Emperor-King, exercising the right of pardon, has remitted the remainder of the imprisonment imposed upon M. Miletics, who was sentenced to five years' incarceration for high treason. His Majesty has at the same time ordered the stoppage of the criminal prosecutions instituted against Hungarian subjects for participation in the Servo-Turkish war. Thirty-three persons benefit by this act of clemency.

RUSSIA.

The Emperor left Livadia last Saturday afternoon and arrived at Simferopol at eleven o'clock the same evening. His Majesty continued his journey at midnight on the Ostrovo-Simferopol Railway for Moscow, where he arrived at nine on Monday evening. An attempt was made to blow up the train in which the Czar was travelling. Closely following the one by which he travelled was another conveying his luggage. When this arrived about three versts from Moscow Station a mine was fired from an adjacent house. The explosion blew one of the vans to pieces, threw seven other vehicles off the line, and made in the permanent way a gap sixteen feet long, eighteen feet wide, and nearly five feet deep. It was afterwards discovered that a tunnel had been dug under the permanent way from an adjoining house, and that a mine had been laid there, and connected with a battery. As soon as possible search was made for the perpetrators of this outrage, but the house from which the mine was fired was found to be empty. His Majesty referred to this event when he received, on Tuesday morning, a deputation from the authorities of Moscow, who waited upon him at the Kremlin to congratulate him on his arrival in that city. The Emperor said he had placed himself in the hands of Providence, but sedition must be extirpated, and he appealed to all right-minded people to aid in the eradication of that evil. He also urged parents to bring up their children so that they might become useful men, and not miscreants. There were great rejoicings in St. Petersburg at the Czar's escape, and a service held in the Russian chapel at Paris was attended by the Grand Duke Nicholas.

The Empress of Russia is confined to her bed at Cannes, and Dr. Alycheffsky is in constant attendance on her Majesty.

After receiving a third warning from the Minister of the Interior for an article appearing in its feuilleton, the publication of the Golos has been prohibited for a period of five months.

The court-martial at St. Petersburg sentenced Léon Mirsky to be hanged for shooting at the chief of the gendarmes, and several other offences; Juri Tarkhoff was condemned to hard labour for thirteen years; and six other prisoners were acquitted. The sentence of death upon Léon Mirsky has, however, been commuted to hard labour in the mines for an indefinite period.

remonstrated against the projected concession to a French company for the construction of the quays at Constantinople, whereby the company would obtain the right of levying a tonnage duty of 4f. upon vessels entering the port. In compliance with a request of Sir Henry Layard, the Sultan will appoint Christians Governors of the provinces of Erzeroum and Zeitoun, and has ordered a complete amnesty to be accorded to the participants in the disturbances in the latter province. The Porte has, at Sir Henry's request, withdrawn the order given to Midhat Pasha to send a military expedition against the Druses in the Lebanon. Baker Pasha, after having a parting audience with the Sultan, left last Saturday for Alexandretta, whence he proceeds to Aleppo. According to a telegram from Constantinople, Lord Salisbury has informed the Porte that he is satisfied it sincerely desires to carry out reforms and follow no policy adverse to British interests in the East.

The Turkish Council of Ministers has, it is announced, resolved to endeavour to bring about a distinct understanding with Greece, and to avoid any appeal to the Powers.

In principle the proposal of the Vatican for the diplomatic representation of the Holy See at Constantinople has been adopted by the Porte, the only point still under discussion being the manner in which the Papal representative would exercise his jurisdiction over the various Catholic communities in Turkey.

SERVIA.

After a frequently adjourned debate M. Ristics has finally obtained a triumphant vote upon the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne; 113 out of 148 members voted in favour of the Government draught.

ROUMANIA.

At the opening of the regular Session of the Roumanian Legislature on Thursday week a long message from Prince Charles was read recommending several important measures. M. Rosetti has been re-elected President of the Chamber of Deputies, and MM. Kitzu Sihleanu and Giani Fleva have been chosen as Vice-Presidents.

M. Georgieff has presented his credentials to Prince Charles as Bulgarian Diplomatic Agent in Roumania.

The Senate completed its organisation on Monday, Prince Demetrius Ghika being elected President.

BULGARIA.

The Assembly has presented an address to Prince Alexander. It first thanks the "Czar Liberator" for their independence, and then accuses the Cabinet of being the cause of the internal disorder and want of prosperity of the Principality.

Mr. Palgrave, the British Political Agent in Bulgaria, has left Sofia for Constantinople.

EGYPT.

The Standard correspondent at Cairo telegraphs on authority that complete accord exists between the Khedive, the Egyptian Government, and the European Controllers, the former having at a meeting held on Monday adopted certain conclusions at which the Controllers had arrived concerning the treatment of the Floating Debt.

Nubar Pacha reached Alexandria on Thursday week.

The Egyptian troops which are leaving for Massowah were inspected by the Khedive, who advised the officers to be careful of the treatment of their men.

Further news has been received from Gordon Pasha, who requests that no fears may be entertained as to his personal safety. He is to be conducted back to Egypt, and he hopes that King John has come to the idea of a perfect alliance.

AMERICA.

The new Session of the United States Congress began on Monday by the reading of the President's Message.

President Hayes states that the resumption of specie payments has been followed by a great revival of business in favour of America. He recommends the abolition of "legal tender paper money," the policy of the United States having always been to avoid a national debt. The Message earnestly desires that Civil service reform may be brought about; says that the Panama Canal scheme is in a fair way of being brought to a successful issue: and, with respect to the Canadian fisheries question, says that the British Government has under consideration the demand for 105,305 dols. damages in the Fortune Bay case, and that an early reply is anticipated. Upon the completion of the necessary preliminary examination, the subject of the participation of the United States in provincial fisheries, as regulated by treaty, will be immediately brought to the attention of the British Government with a view to the early and permanent settlement of the whole question, which was only temporarily adjusted by the Treaty of Washington.

Mr. Secretary Sherman's report on the finances of the United States has also been published. He insists on the necessity of economy, deprecates any change in the tobacco or spirit duties, and advises, in the event of an increase of the appropriations, a moderate duty on tea and coffee and a tax on the manufacturers of opium.

A resolution was introduced in both Houses on Tuesday in favour of granting the protection of the American Government to the Nicaragua Canal Company. In the Senate General Burnside spoke in favour of the motion introduced by him during the last Session reaffirming the Monroe doctrine in connection with the Darien Canal Scheme. In the House of Representatives a resolution to the effect that no change should be made during the present Session in the currency laws was proposed and referred to the proper Committee.

Yesterday week, being Thanksgiving Day in the United States, was observed as a general holiday.

The usual monthly return of the Secretary of the Treasury shows the public debt of the States to have decreased during November by 800,000 dols. The cash in the Treasury amounts to 267,218,000 dols.

The President has nominated Mr. George W. M'Creary, Secretary of War, as a Circuit Judge in Iowa; Mr. Alexander Ramsey being appointed to succeed him as Secretary of War.

Mr. Clare Sewell Read, M.P., and Mr. Albert Pell, M.P., after a tour throughout the Western agricultural regions to Manitoba, Dakotah, Nebraska, Kansas, Kentucky, also south-west to Texas, returned to Philadelphia last week. A Times telegram states that they have thoroughly examined the system of cultivation, transportation, and ocean shipment of provisions and grain, having travelled on an average 120 miles every day since their arrival, besides making minute investigations. They go next to Baltimore, Washington, and New York, and sail for England on Dec. 10.

CANADA.

The Times announces that the Canadian Government has resolved to add to the Ottawa Cabinet another member, who shall reside in London. The gentleman who has been selected to fill this position is Sir A. T. Galt, K.C.M.G. He is a son of the well-known Scotch novelist, John Galt, and has already taken a distinguished part in Canadian public affairs.

The New York papers publish a despatch from Montreal, which states that the Imperial Government is reported to be establishing a reserve of 10,000 men in Canada, composed of militia of the Dominion, for active service at home or abroad if required.

The Opera House in Toronto has been destroyed by fire.

Orders have been issued that neat cattle from Europe, on entering Quebec, Halifax, or St. John's, shall be subjected to ninety days' quarantine.

We learn from Winnipeg that the Manitoba Legislative Assembly has been dissolved by the Lieutenant-Governor. The new elections are fixed for Dec. 10.

SOUTHERN AFRICA.

Some further details are published of the news from the Cape brought by the steamer German, which arrived at Plymouth on Monday with advices to Nov. 11. Sir Bartle Frere had received a deputation, who desired that a convention should be summoned to discuss the position of the Transvaal, and that if the convention decided against British rule, the independence of the country should be restored. His Excellency, however, said the law must be obeyed. At the opening of the Legislative Council at Cape Town it was stated that the financial position of the colony was unsatisfactory, but no explicit statement was made as to the expenses of the Zulu war.

The uniform of the late Prince Imperial is stated in a Reuter's telegram to have been found at a kraal near Ulundi, the whole front of it having been pierced by assegais. The Zulu who actually inflicted the death-wound is said to have been Abango, who was subsequently killed at Ulundi.

The Gazette announces that the Queen has directed Letters Patent to be passed under the Great Seal for providing an Executive Council and a Legislative Assembly for the Transvaal province and territory.

INDIA.

The Cabul correspondent of the Standard telegraphs that General Baker has burned twelve Afghan villages as a punishment for an attempt at treachery. The Ameer is proceeding under escort to Peshawur, and his journey has been taken suddenly, and in secret, to prevent any attempt at rescue being made by the tribes along the road. The people of Cabul appear to be utterly indifferent about him.

The Calcutta correspondent of the Times says that the Indian press and public continue to express much dissatisfaction with Sir John Strachey's new License Tax Bill. It is generally considered as merely an income-tax under another name.

The Standard understands that the Government of India has, on the recommendation of General Sir Francis Roberts, confirmed the appointment of Major-General Hills, V.C., C.B., as Military Governor and Commandant of the City of Cabul; and that it is the intention of the Government to mark the occasion of the success at Cabul by the distribution of honours to those native princes who have given evidence of their loyalty to the Queen and Empress of India.

At the request of the Government of the Cape Colony and the trustees of the South African Library at Cape Town, Sir Bartle Frere has desired Professor Max Müller and Professor Sayce to select a qualified successor to the late Dr. Bleek, to continue his labours as colonial philologist and as custodian of the valuable library presented to the colony by Sir George Grey. The salary will be £500 a year, of which £300 will be contributed by the Government and £200 by the committee of the South African Public Library. Applications and testimonials only may be sent to Professor Max Müller, Oxford.

The University of Göttingen has received a splendid herbarium, which was left to it by Dr. Grisebach, the director of the Göttingen Botanical Gardens. It includes more than 40,000 species belonging to all parts of the earth, and has for many years been known as the most important private collection in existence. The German papers say that Dr. Grisebach was allowed to share every year in the distribution of plants "which is made annually with incomparable liberality by the London museums." He received more than 5000 East Indian plants when the herbaria of the East India Company were given away to distinguished botanists. After his death an attempt was made to secure the collection for Paris, but its acceptance by the Göttingen University has been sanctioned by the King of Prussia.

The Geographical Notes published by the Royal Geographical Society state that a geographical society has recently been established at Tokio (Yedo), Japan, under the title of the Tokio Geographical Society. His Imperial Highness Kita Shirakawa-no-Miya has been elected its first president. Professor Nordenskjold, the Swedish explorer, and the officers of the Vega were entertained at a banquet on Sept. 15 by this society, the Japan branch of the Asiatic Society, and the German Asiatic Society, the chair being taken by his Imperial Highness. On Sept. 17 Professor Nordenskjold and his party were received in audience by his Majesty the Mikado, who personally congratulated the chief of the Swedish expedition on the fact of his having arrived in Japan by a route which had never been traversed before.

Lord Wrottesley, Lord Lieutenant of Staffordshire, opened a coffee-house at Burslem on Monday.

The new Royal warrant relating to the Army Medical Department, which has long been expected, was issued from the War Office on Monday night.

The Government have granted the request of the Accrington Town Council for the appointment of a commission of the peace for the borough.

A correspondent of the City Press writes:—"I was interested in the account you gave respecting the distribution of the remains of the Guildhall banquet to the poor. Some of your readers may like to hear what I was told on the authority of one of the distributing committee, that a man who had been most bountifully supplied with beef opened his arms and demanded, ''Aint yer got no poultry?' I am happy to think that recipients of this class are not plentiful, and that most of the poor were very grateful for the benefits conferred."

Earl Howe has informed the tenants on his Leicestershire estates that he will reduce his rents 6s. per acre from Lady Day last, and intends to continue the reduction for two years.—Sir George Chetwynd, Bart., has intimated to the tenants on his Warwickshire and Leicestershire estates his intention of again remitting ten per cent on their half-year's rents, in consideration of the continued depression in agriculture. He has also deferred the Michaelmas rent until the end of January, in the hope of their being able to obtain improved prices for stock and produce.

The whole of the plans for private bills to be proceeded with in the ensuing Session were deposited last Saturday night in the Private Bill Office of the House of Commons. Last year's total reached 238, but this year the number has come down to 213, although there are six more railway bills than last year, and this will probably make the actual work of the ensuing Session equal to its predecessor. There are plans for 72 railways, 22 tramways, 49 miscellaneous, and 70 provisional orders this year; as compared with plans for 66 railways, 30 tramways, 66 miscellaneous, and 76 provisional orders last year.

THE CHURCH.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.

The Goldsmiths' Company have voted £50 towards the erection of the new Church of St. Peter, Upper Holloway.

The presentation of the testimonial to the Rev. R. J. Simpson, subscribed for by his late parishioners at St. Clement Danes, took place at Clement's-inn Hall on Thursday evening.

On Monday the Bishop of Guildford preached at Holy Trinity, Penge, where a new organ, built by Mr. Jones, of Fulham, and reredos, the gift of Mr. Spencer Phillips, were inaugurated.

St. Matthew's, Rastrick, after alterations which have cost about £1000, was reopened last Saturday, when the Bishop of Ripon confirmed eighty-eight candidates. No confirmation had before been held in the church, and it was nineteen years since the last visit of the Bishop.

The Archbishop of York on Monday afternoon consecrated a new church at Egton, near Whitby. The church, which has cost over £5000, is the gift of Messrs. Foster Brothers, of Halifax, Bradford, and Whitby, and the style of architecture is a mixture of the Tudor and Norman.

On Tuesday the ceremony of the installation of the new Dean of Worcester, the Venerable Lord Alwyne Compton, vice the late Hon. and Very Rev. Grantham Munton Yorke, took place at the cathedral. The ceremony was a very impressive one, and was witnessed by a large number of the clergy.

The company appointed to revise the authorised version of the Old Testament completed their sixtieth session yesterday week in the Jerusalem Chamber. The second revision of the historical books was continued nearly to the end of the Second Book of Samuel.

St. Paul's, Colchester, which was built ten years ago to serve a district in the parish of Lexden, has been enlarged by the addition of a new south aisle, a choir vestry, and porch, and has otherwise been improved, at a cost of £1000. It was reopened on Thursday week by the Bishop of St. Albans.

At a meeting of the committee of the Tewkesbury Abbey Restoration Fund, Mr. C. M. Moore, the honorary treasurer, reported that of a total sum promised of £10,637 the greater part had been received, and that only £27 had had to be written off as irrecoverable. The receipts at the reopening had amounted to £800. The balance in hand was only £360, whereas £5000 was required to complete the restoration

A new church at Milland, Sussex, has been opened by the Bishop of Chichester. The style adopted is of the Early Decorated type, or rather that of the period of transition from Early to Decorated Pointed Architecture. The architect is Mr. William C. Street, of Westminster, and the builder is Mr. Pink of Godalming. The total cost, including the tower being built, is estimated at £4000.

A large meeting of the parishioners of Christ Church, Shieldfield, was held last week in the Church Institute, Newcastle, to present the Rev. T. Aldridge Thorne, on his resigning the curacy of Christ Church, which he has held for upwards of two years, for the curacy of St. John's, Greenside, Ryton-on-Tyne, with an illuminated address and a valuable gold watch, as a token of their esteem and appreciation of his services. The chair was occupied by Dr. A. Wilson.

St. Mary's, Hardwick, Bicester, was reopened on Wednesday week by the Bishop of Oxford, after having been restored from plans by the late Sir Gilbert Scott, at the sole expense of Lord Effingham. The walls of the nave have been rebuilt, a new south aisle has been added, and a new altar, font, lectern, pulpit, choir-stalls, and open oak benches have been provided. A west window, by Clayton and Bell, adds considerably to the effect of the interior.

Mr. Mackonochie officiated at the celebration of the Holy Communion at St. Alban's, Holborn, on Sunday morning, and preached at the evening service. No reference was made at either of the services to the judgment of Lord Penzance. A petition to the Bishop of London has been signed by 1124 parishioners of St. Alban's, protesting against the continued interference of a non-resident parishioner with Mr. Mackonochie in the performance of Divine services in the parish church, and asking the Bishop to use his influence to stay the proceedings now being taken against Mr. Mackonochie.

Mr. Walter, M.P., read a most able paper on Reading and Preaching in the St. Paul's Chapter-house on Tuesday. Having referred to the defective elocution of most of the clergymen of the Church of England, and said we should endeavour "to get rid of gabbling and sing-song," he inferred that much of this monotonous delivery was due to the fact that the clergy were a privileged class, never meeting with hostile criticism. He recommended preachers to speak instead of reading their sermons, and suggested the establishment of a special order of eloquent ecclesiastics.

Three gifts, consisting of silver candelabra, subscribed for by all classes of the congregation of St. Margaret's, Westminster, silver candlesticks from the Sunday-school teachers, and a china inkstand from the children of the day and Sunday schools, were presented last week to Mr. Montgomery, in the Infant School-room, on the occasion of his leaving the parish of St. Margaret's for the vicarage of St. Mark's, Kennington. After a few remarks from the Rector, Canon Farrar, Mr. J. G. Talbot, M.P., and Mr. Stewart Helder, the presentation was made by Canon Farrar, in the presence of several friends.

A meeting of the board of management of the Bishop of London's Fund was held last week, the Bishop of London in the chair. The report of the Executive Committee stated that since the last meeting, in July, contributions had been received to the amount of £4921 14s. 6d., which left £1564 available for living agents and £4150 for material objects. Out of the latter sum grants have been made—for clergymen's residences, £325; for mission buildings, £1770; and for churches, £1125; leaving a balance of £829. The total amount of new money received this year is £15,295, while that at the same period last year was £17,594, showing a falling off of £2299.

On the 27th ult., the church of Little Linford, near Newport Pagnell, in Buckinghamshire, was reopened after a partial restoration and an enlargement, by a rebuilding of the north aisle, which had long ago disappeared, the only evidence of its existence being the piers and arches of Decorated character, which had remained embedded in the north wall. It is in contemplation to carry onwards the good work, and to restore the chancel, which retains many of its Early English features. For the substantial work already accomplished the parish is indebted to Mr. Arthur Knapp, a near relative of the present lord of the manor and patron of the living, Mr. Matthew Knapp, who has taken a warm interest in the undertaking.

ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

One of the most acceptable volumes that we have received from publishers at this season is a complete collection of all the verse writings of the late Mr. Thackeray, with a good number of illustrations. Ballads, by William Makepeace Thackeray, is the title which Messrs. Smith and Elder have given it. But here we find many pleasant little pieces, such as the free version of Horace's "Persicos, odi," to which that designation may be grudged. A wholesome, kindly, practical wisdom, strongly tinged with humorous sadness—for the genuine feeling of humour is far from shallow mirth—and with a great deal of patience and forbearance towards human stupidity, pervades these artless compositions. Their quality is, however, too generally appreciated that it should be needful to dwell upon any of them, with reference to this presentation of the whole series for a Christmas gift. As Thackeray hated all mischievous shams, imperial and military renown, of the Napoleonic sort—and we can judge what he would have thought of the recent Beaconsfield policy—come in for his most scathing scorn. "The Chronicle of the Drum," which is the longest of these poems, if they may be called poetry, should be dedicated to the Peace Society, who are sadly in want of the aid of satirists to help their monotonous preachers of a good cause. Thackeray, who admired Béranger's lyrics, and sometimes borrowed their charming tone and manner, would never join that exquisite French songster in praising the glories of war. His mind was superior likewise to the vain pride of nationality, and this most English of our writers cared for neither the mane nor the tail of the British Lion. But his drolleries of Policeman X, and those comical Irish caricatures, which are here styled the "Lyra Hibernica," and such outpourings of thoughtful tenderness as "The Cane-bottomed Chair," and many graceful droppings of pensive melody, though seldom perfect in metrical form, have been taken to heart by a multitude of his countrymen. Their reappearance in this handsome volume, with the small drawings by Mr. Du Maurier, Mrs. (Elizabeth Thompson) Butler, and other clever artists, is a welcome new memorial of one of our best literary friends.

Reminiscences of older date, going back to a past generation, are revived by the next richly-bound volume, which comes from Messrs. Longmans. It is no other than Thomas Moore's Lalla Rookh, an Oriental Romance. Could it be expected that the Beaconsfield policy aforesaid, with its Asiatic mysteries and conquests of Afghanistan, would bring Oriental romancing into vogue once more, at this time of day? It is questionable, we think, whether the laboured artifice of Moore's poetry, or the more powerful genius of Byron, can avail just now to overcome our present merited disgust for Islam and the incorrigible vices of the Eastern world. It is as hard to believe in "Lalla Rookh" as in "Tancred," after the hideous exhibition of hopeless Asiatic barbarisms in the last four years. Moore's literary talents were nevertheless considerable, and were somewhat akin to those of Benjamin Disraeli as a novelist—a faculty of neat construction and one of skilful veneering, with a gay surface glitter as of buhl or marquetry, fit for drawing-room furniture. This is not in the English taste, and the popularity of such works cannot endure long; but "Lalla Rookh" is the sort of thing to give to a young lady who will not even pretend to read it. She will say, of course, that Mokanna, the Veiled Prophet, is very horrid; and that the Peri, who waited at the Gates of Paradise, is a poor lovely dear. But the Illustrations, designed by Mr. John Tenniel, will help her so far as that without perusing many verses, which few young ladies of our time will do, except those who cherish a sympathy with hymn-books. Their grandmothers, half a century ago, were never tired of reading poetry, and learnt many pages by heart. If it had not been so there would have been no writings in verse by Walter Scott, Byron, or Moore. Neither of those distinguished authors cared to write poems that would not sell.

To go back immeasurably farther—even to what is, perhaps, the most ancient of books now extant, for it may be older than the Pentateuch—one of the sublimest, deepest, essentially truest of religious poems, apart from its canonical rank in the Bible, is the Book of Job. The Zend-Avesta and the Vedas, and other primitive Scriptures and mythological or theosophic legends, may ill compare with this most touching exposition of pregnant sacred wisdom, applicable to the condition of frail suffering humanity in all ages, setting forth the need and the grounds of Divine consolation. It is not Judaism, but the original patriarchal tradition of the simple faith in God, that is expressed in these dialogues between the mourner and his well-meaning "comforters," accompanied by the short narrative passages, which give a dramatic embodiment and motive to their converse with each other. Messrs. James Nisbet and Co. have published a volume of elegant outward aspect, containing the text of the authorised version, printed for the most part as blank verse, with a judicious introductory account of its subject and high argument, and with an appendix of useful notes, including the citation of numerous instances where the ideas of Job have suggested to later poets the most valuable reflections. Sir John Gilbert, R.A., furnishes about fifty designs, engraved by Messrs. Dalziel, Whymper, and W. L. Thomas, illustrative of Eastern habits and customs, which have probably not much altered since the time of the afflicted man of Uz. This would be a very appropriate gift-book to any person of mature age who has recently experienced bereavement or other serious misfortune.

The new volume of Picturesque Europe, a splendid work of descriptive topography, with very fine illustrations in wood-engraving and steel plates, which is being produced by the enterprise of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, is worthy of its two predecessors. They were devoted, as may be remembered from our past notices, to Great Britain and Ireland. The third volume presents much famous and attractive Continental scenery and its historical associations. It treats, in the following order, of Sweden, the Tyrol, and Gibraltar; Dresden and the Elbe above that city toward Bohemia, called "the Saxon Switzerland;" next, the eastern portion of the true Alpine Switzerland; then, Constantinople: next to that, Belgium; again, the High Alps; then, away to Granada and the east coast of Spain; away in the opposite direction to Russia; back again to the Jura; off again to Athens; then to Holland; finally, to the Danube. The foregoing enumeration runs about so capriciously, up and down, far and near, to and fro, there and back again, that the whole map of Europe is repeatedly crossed and recrossed with an utter disregard of methodical comprehension of different regions of the Continent, bearing any physical or political relations to one another. But the seeming medley all these foreign countries, which has no doubt been rendered necessary by the exigencies of literary or artistic production, will not much disturb the reader, who is likely to peruse no more at one sitting than may serve to give a little interesting knowledge concerning one or two of the principal places depicted in the beautiful engravings. The writers of description are Messrs. Arthur Griffiths, G. Adam Smith, Rev. T. G. Bonney, Percy Fitzgerald, W. R. S. Ralston, W. Mattieu Williams, and G. F. Browne, who have done their tasks, no doubt, with an accurate mastery of the allotted subjects. There are thirteen steel plates, from designs by Messrs. Birket Foster, Carl Werner, E. George, L. J. Wood, Harry Fenn, W. Simpson, E. Compton, G. C. Kilburne, J. D. Woodward, and S. Hodson. The engravings on wood, aided by the finest paper and printing, are admirably effective specimens of this art. They are drawn by some of the artists just named, and by Messrs. P. Skelton, R. P. Leitch, W. H. J. Boot, C. J. Staniland, Herbert, and Senior. On the whole, "Picturesque Europe" is the greatest achievement of English publishers in the way of illustrations of this class, representing select views of many attractive places in our quarter of the world. It wants unity and completeness, as well as method, in the treatment of its general subject, as though no competent editor had been employed for its arrangement and direction. But the execution of details has been accomplished, so far, in a highly successful manner.

Another work of the same character, likewise prepared and published by Messrs. Cassell, is comprised in one volume—"Our Own Country—Descriptive, Historical, Pictorial." It contains sufficient concise accounts of Stonehenge and Salisbury Plain, Leeds and its woollen trade, the Cinque Ports of the Kent and Sussex shore, Dunfermline, with its ancient Abbey and Palace, the river Plym in south-west Devonshire, Crowland Abbey in the Fens, Ludlow Castle, the Land's End of Cornwall, the Midland battle-fields of Edgehill and Naseby, the Clyde above Dumbarton, "Burghley House by Stamford town," the Weald of Kent, the Dee of North Wales and Cheshire, Woburn in Bedfordshire, Dublin City, Scarborough and Whitby, Bristol, Liverpool, and the Lakes of Cumberland. Here, again, there is no attempt at a topographical order in the arrangement of the subjects. It has been considered preferable, as is remarked in the preface, to allow a more varied distribution of them. A large number of wood-engravings are intermixed with the text, and help to make up a pleasant and instructive book for leisure quarter-hours at the drawing-room table, when morning callers are waiting for the lady of the house, or when the ladies are waiting for the gentlemen after dinner.

A work of considerable merit and value in the department of critical history of the fine arts has been translated by Mr. A. H. Keane from the Dohme series, which comprises, on the whole, biographies of all eminent artists, mediæval and modern, of every nation in Europe. The portion which is now presented to the English public, by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, in a handsome quarto volume, adorned with a great abundance of German wood engravings, consists of The Early Teutonic, Italian, and French Painters. It may be well to explain that the Teutonic include German, Dutch, and Flemish. Among the German artists, the "Minster-builders" or church architects of the middle ages have been allowed to find their place. Albert Dürer, of course, occupies a conspicuous position. The Flemish and Dutch artists here treated of are the brothers Van Eyck, Lucas van Leyden, Quintin Matsys, and Gerard Terburgh. The list of early Italian masters begins with Masaccio, and comprises Filippo Lippi, Botticelli, Ghirlandajo, Andrea Mantegna, Fra Bartolommeo, Andrea del Sarto, Luca Signorelli, and one or two others. The French list is confined to Poussin, Lebrun, Mignard, and Claude of Lorraine. These eminent painters are discussed by such able writers as Messrs. Woltmann, C. A. Regnet, Vischer, Adolf Rosenberg, Hermann Lücke, and others in good repute. The work has already gained high approval in Germany.

A very delightful subject, that of The Famous Parks and Gardens of the World, historically reviewed in the order of time, if not from that of Eden, from the "hanging gardens" of Babylon, and that of Alcinous in Homer's "Odyssey," down to ours at Kew, makes one of the most attractive illustrated books. It is published by Messrs. T. Nelson and Sons, of Edinburgh. The art of making ornamental pleasure-gardens being one of such great antiquity, and of equal dignity and ingenuity, it is worth while to study the changes introduced from one age to another, or in different countries and climates, by taste and fashion, by varying domestic habits or convenience, and by differences of climate, soil, and horticultural science. It is only needful to mention the Persians, Greeks, and Romans, the Chinese, the Arabs and Moors at the Alhambra, the Italians and French, with their Renaissance and Louis XIV. styles, the English Elizabethan, Jacobean, French, Dutch, and improved landscape style of gardening, the German Court fashion, and such places as The Hague, Versailles, Schönbrunn, Sans Souci, not to speak of modern botanical gardens, in which such an immense diversity of new exotic species is displayed. The extent and abundance of interesting disquisition will already be apparent to the reader. Much is here borrowed from "Les Jardins," by Arthur Mangin, but with copious additions of fresh matter. There are nearly a hundred wood engravings, which represent sometimes garden views, with pavilions or garden-houses, fountains, and other garden ornaments; sometimes, rare and beautiful plants or flowers.

The activity of production shown by the enterprising firm of La Belle Sauvage-yard obliges us to deal with several different publications of theirs in one paragraph. Not as being specially appropriate to the blessed Christmas season of "peace and goodwill to men," but as the timely completion of a really sound and useful work of recent history, both Messrs. Cassell and its able author, Mr. Edmund Ollier, must be congratulated upon the second and concluding volume. This work is their History of the Russo-Turkish War, and is worthy in all respects of the credit already won by Mr. Ollier and the publishers, in the success of two similar narrative works, treating of the war between France and Germany, and of the entire history of the United States of America, including the Civil War between the North and South. Mr. Ollier has far surpassed all the ordinary or occasional compilers, strictly so called, of contemporary political and military history, as well in diligence and correctness as in propriety and grace of style, and in the candour of his spirit; while the views he has taken of foreign public transactions are generally in consonance with English popular opinion. We hope, nevertheless, that he will not have an opportunity, for many years to come, of writing the connected account of another great war in our time. The two volumes are copiously illustrated by wood-engravings. Cassell's Natural History, edited by Dr. P. Martin Duncan, F.R.S., is continued in a second volume, to which the late lamented Professor A. H. Garrod contributed a section treating of the ruminant animals, Mr. W. S. Dallas that of the rodents, and Mr. Bowdler Sharpe the section dealing with birds. The two singular orders of edentata (toothless) and marsupian, or pouched mammals, including sloths, ant-eaters, kangaroos and opossums, and their congeners, are described by the editor, Dr. Martin Duncan. The first volume, it may be recollected, was taken up with apes and monkeys, bats and some insectivorous animals; so that there is full scope for zoological discourse in two volumes more. The illustrations are very neatly drawn and engraved. The National Portrait Gallery, with its bold tinted lithographs rendering lifelike likenesses of our distinguished living countrymen, still holds its place in popular esteem. It is now followed by the International Portrait Gallery, the first volume of which contains twenty foreigners of contemporary renown, Emperors, Princes, Presidents, Ministers of State, or Field Marshals. A collection of exemplary biographical and historical instances, each occupying less than six pages, and culled from the chronicles of all times and nations by Mary Hield, with some page illustrations, seems a desirable gift for boys, or even for girls. It is entitled Living Pages from Many Ages. The yearly bound-up volume of Cassell's Family Magazine, with its miscellaneous pieces of wholesome entertainment, is an acceptable publication for the end of the year.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington present the fourth series of the admirable photographic portraits, by Messrs. Lock and Whitfield, Regent-street, of the Men of Mark, statesmen, churchmen, scientific and literary men, artists, soldiers and sailors, lawyers, and physicians or surgeons, with brief memoirs by Mr. Thomson Cooper. The Imperial Crown Prince of Germany appears in the frontispiece to this volume, which contains the Home Secretary, Dean Stanley, the Bishops of Durham, Ely, Bath and Wells, and Truro, Mr. Spurgeon, and other persons of note, all good likenesses, in the finest style of the photographic art.

Some of the Christmas books designed for the gratification of juvenile readers will next week claim our notice.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Mr. Alexander Stuart has been appointed Agent-General of New South Wales in London.

The Goldsmiths' Company has voted £25 to the funds of the St. Giles's Christian Mission to Discharged Prisoners.

Sir Francis Wyatt Truscott and the Lady Mayoress have given their patronage to the concert on behalf of the Post Office Orphan Home, to be held at St. James's Hall on Dec. 13.

Dr. Warren De La Rue, F.R.S., has sent to the Chemical Society Research Fund a third donation of £100, the whole amount is to be devoted to a single research.

Mr. William Thackeray Marriott, Q.C., has been elected a Bencher of the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn, in place of the late Sir R. T. Kindersley.

Mr. W. H. Smith, M.P., the First Lord of the Admiralty, has consented to take the chair at the annual dinner of the friends of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools, on the 16th inst.

The terms for the purchase of Fulham-bridge for the purpose of freeing it from toll have been settled by the Metropolitan Board of Works at £58,000.

The Earl of Rosebery will preside at the biennial dinner, to be held at Willis's Rooms on April 30, 1880, in aid of the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Ventnor.

When the House of Lords assembled as a Court of Appeal on Monday morning it was announced that the Lord Chancellor had been ordered by his medical attendant to keep to his room for a few days, as his Lordship is suffering from a severe cold. The House accordingly adjourned till Monday next.

A large gathering was held in Hyde Park on Sunday to protest against the arrests of Messrs. Daly, Davitt, and Killen, and to demand a reform of the land laws. Mr. O'Connor Power, M.P., presided; and amongst the speakers were Mr. Callan, M.P., and Mr. T. P. O'Connor.

Lord Rosebery presided on Monday night at the Scottish Corporation, and in the course of a humorous speech proposed the health of that body, appealing for funds to carry on its work in behalf of needy Scotch persons in the metropolis. Contributions to the amount of £2900, including 100 guineas from the Queen, were announced.

A full meeting of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute took place on Monday evening at its house, 7, Adelphi-terrace. After the election of sixty-three new members, many being colonial, a paper by President Noah Porter, on Physiological Metaphysics, was read. Many afterwards joined in the consideration of the paper.

A circular issued by Cardinal Manning was on Sunday read in the Roman Catholic places of worship in the metropolis, calling attention to the condition of the London poor and the hunger and poverty existing in the West of Ireland. The letter also announces that a collection for the relief of the suffering will be made at all the masses and other services of Sunday, Dec. 7.

In a breach of promise case on Monday, in the Exchequer, Miss Hall, daughter of a Baptist minister at Kilburn, was the plaintiff, and Mr. Tarbox, Baptist Minister at Addlestone, was the defendant. The engagement began when the defendant was a student at Kilburn College. On the suggestion of the Judge, the matter was arranged, the defendant consenting to pay substantial damages; but the amount was not mentioned.

Mr. Spottiswoode, President of the Royal Society, gave an address at the anniversary meeting on Monday, in which he reviewed the history of the Society during the past year, and discussed its work and prospects. At the close of the address, the Copley medal was presented to Professor Clausius, the Davey medal to M. Lecoq de Boisbaudran, a Royal medal each to Professor Ramsay and Mr. Perkin, and the council and officers for the ensuing year were elected. The anniversary dinner was held at Willis's Rooms—the president in the chair.

A memorial to the Home Secretary, praying for the remission of the further imprisonment of Mr. J. Mortimer, is open for signature at the Figaro Office, 35, St. Bride-street. Mr. Mortimer, it will be remembered, was sentenced on the 24th ult. to pay a fine of £100 and to be imprisoned three months for publishing a libel which he neither wrote nor inspired, and of the appearance of which in his journal he alleges he was unaware until several weeks after its publication.

The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that the total number of paupers on the last day of the third week in November was 85,034, of whom 45,519 were in workhouses and 39,515 received outdoor relief. Compared with the corresponding weeks in the years 1878, 1877, and 1876 these figures show an increase of 4358, 4547, and 3313 respectively. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 872, of whom 649 were men, 175 women, and 48 children.

The hearing of the summons charging Mr. H. Labouchere, the proprietor of Truth, and Mr. C. H. Wyman, the printer of the journal, with having published a defamatory libel against Mr. E. Levy-Lawson, editor and one of the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph, was resumed on Wednesday before Sir R. Carden; and Mr. Labouchere and Mr. Wyman were committed for trial, being bound over in their own recognisances in the sum of £200, Mr. Lawson being bound over to prosecute in a like sum.

As there have been so many gatherings in honour of the military heroes of Zululand, it would scarcely have been well of the medical profession to omit to pay a compliment to Surgeon-Major Reynolds, who, with Chard and Bromhead, so distinguished himself in the defence of Rorke's Drift as to obtain the Victoria Cross. The British Medical Association bestowed its gold medal on him some time ago, but, in order to give the faculty generally an opportunity of greeting him, the same society organised a banquet, which was held recently at Willis's Rooms. Over 130 surgeons and physicians assembled on the occasion, and more than 300 letters expressing approval of the festive meeting had been received from members of the profession who were unable to attend.

The results of the London School Board elections were made known yesterday week. The numbers polled were, in most of the divisions, much smaller than at the election in 1876; and there was a great deal of "plumping." Twenty-eight of the candidates returned were on the late Board, and twenty-two are new members. Nine ladies have secured seats, and in five divisions they headed the poll. Of the fifty members elected about thirty-two will, it is understood, give a general support to the policy of the late Board.

Yesterday week the Master of the Rolls decided that Mr. Labouchere had been wrongfully expelled from the Beefsteak Club, on the grounds that the meeting at which the resolution was come to had been irregularly called, that a two thirds majority of the members present had not voted in favour of the expulsion, and that the manner in which the question was put by the chairman was in itself a mistake. His Lordship accordingly made an order entitling Mr. Labouchere to be restored to all the rights and privileges of the club, and to the costs of the proceedings.

A Quarterly Court of the Governors of the Brompton Hospital for Consumption was held on Thursday week, Mr. J. D. Rochfort in the chair. The secretary read the report of the Committee of Management, from which it appeared that since the last Court the necessary colouring and cleaning of the East Wing had been done, and the wards thus temporarily closed had been reopened. A grant of £814 10s. had been received from the Council of the Hospital Sunday Fund. The committee had paid instalments on account of the new building now being erected amounting to £15,200; and they earnestly trusted that their appeal for liberal aid to carry on their great work of extension would be widely responded to. Some legacies were announced.

There were 2530 births and 1802 deaths registered in London last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births exceeded by 69, and the deaths by 45, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 3 from smallpox, 78 from measles, 102 from scarlet fever, 8 from diphtheria, 49 from whooping-cough, and 28 from different forms of fever. At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean reading of the barometer last week was 29·91 in. The mean temperature was 33·2 deg., being 7·7 deg. below the average in the corresponding week of twenty years. The mean was considerably below the average on each day of the week; the coldest day was Sunday, the 23rd ult., when the mean was only 28·8 deg., and showed a deficiency of 12·2 deg. The lowest night temperature was 22·0 deg. on Sunday, and the highest day temperature in the shade, 41·2 deg. on Friday; the extreme range in the week was, therefore, 19·2 deg.

The annual distribution of prizes to the 2nd Middlesex Artillery Volunteers took place last Saturday evening in the Guildhall, the prizes being presented by the Lady Mayoress. No. 1 battery (Sergeant-Major Pooley) received the shell-practice prize and the brigade challenge cup, and No. 4 battery (Sergeant Hatfield) Lady Palliser's prize.—The Dramatic Club of the Civil Service Rifles gave an entertainment, of a most successful character, last Saturday evening, at St. George's Hall. The pieces played were "A Rough Diamond" and "Partners for Life."—The C company of the Queen's Westminster recently held its annual prize-meeting at Wormwood-scrubbs, when prizes were won by the following gentlemen:—Captain Comerford, Lieutenant Hewitt, Colour-Sergeant Dinham, Sergeants Holton and Tuke, Privates Kingston, Miles, Rooker, and Munday, and Bandsman Dove. Private Cameron won the monthly cup.

The twenty-fifth annual meeting and the autumnal election of the Royal Hospital for Incurables Institution took place yesterday week at the Cannon-street Hotel. Sir Charles Reed presided at the annual meeting, and was supported by several of the prominent friends of the charity. Mr. T. Andrew, the secretary, read the report, in which it was stated that the freehold hospital at Putney-heath was now all but full with 183 inmates. Besides the necessarily large outlay for the home, upwards of £8000 a year is required for the pensions. Sir C. Reed, in moving the adoption of the report, said it was with much regret that he referred to the death of Mr. Henry Huth, who had been seventeen years treasurer, and was a true friend, a most munificent supporter, and a valued counsellor to the hospital. They had in Mr. Allcroft, M.P., who had consented to act as treasurer in future, a gentleman well acquainted with business, and who had a connection with one of our greatest institutions—Christ's Hospital. In last July the institution was honoured by the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, at the laying of the first stone of the new wing. The result was a sum of £10,000 towards the expenses connected with the new buildings. After some remarks from Mr. A. H. Hill and Mr. White the report was adopted unanimously.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-Boat Institution was held on Thursday at its house, John-street, Adelphi. Admiral H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, in his official capacity of Admiral Superintendent of Naval Reserves, was unanimously elected a member of the committee of management of the institution. The silver medal of the institution and its thanks, inscribed on vellum, were voted to George Markwell, formerly coxswain of the Holy Island life-boat, in acknowledgment of his long and gallant services in saving life from shipwreck. Rewards amounting to £176 were also granted to the crews of life-boats for services rendered during last month's storms, in which period they had been instrumental in saving sixty lives from different shipwrecks, besides helping to save six vessels from destruction. A reward was granted to the crew of a shore-boat for saving two men from a boat belonging to the sloop John and Mary, of Goole, which was capsized at the entrance of Pool harbour during squally weather on Oct. 20. Payments amounting to £4000 were likewise made on different establishments, 270 being now under the management of the institution. The receipt of various contributions was announced, including £600 from Miss Onslow to provide a life-boat to be named the Denzil and Maria Onslow; and £50 annual subscription from the Independent Order of Fellows (M.U.) in aid of the support of their life-boat at Cleethorpe. The late Mrs. H. K. Holme Sumner, of Swaffham, and Mrs. Kirkpatrick, of Sutton, had each left the institution a legacy of £100. The meeting expressed deep regret at the lamented decease of Mr. Serjeant Cox and Mr. Delane, both of whom took considerable interest in the welfare of the Life-Boat Institution, and who were always ready to promote its great and national objects. Reports were read from the district inspectors of life-boats to the institution.

Mr. Trickett, late chief engineer at Keyham Factory, has been recommended for a pension of £600 per annum in recognition of his long, meritorious, and zealous services, and for his many inventions and improvements whereby numerous and extensive savings have been made.

The Extra Supplement.

A BULL FIGHT AT MADRID.

In our foreign news of this week, referring to the Royal Marriage in Spain, will be found a brief account of the ceremonial on Saturday, at the wedding of King Alfonso XII. to the Archduchess Marie Christine of Austria. The festivities and entertainments on Monday and Tuesday are further mentioned, and it appears that on both days the populace of Madrid was treated with a bull fight. We should have been glad to be able to state that this barbarous, cruel, and even cowardly public amusement had been waived, upon such an occasion, in deference to the wishes of the gentle young bride. For it is hardly possible that any well-bred German girl would feel more disposed to take pleasure in such a performance than one of our English young ladies would. The Special Envoy of Queen Victoria, that veteran soldier Lord Napier of Magdala, very properly absented himself, with Lady Napier, from the disgusting spectacle, where several bulls and horses were killed in the usual style. Our large Engraving, presented as the Extra Supplement for this week, shows the manner in which the poor beast is done to death, with a great deal of silly parade and display of needless paraphernalia, to make a vulgar holiday for the effeminate City loungers and fops and their female companions in the boxes and galleries above. As a feat of horsemanship, of dexterity or courage, and of skill or address in overcoming a wild animal, it is not worthy of comparison with the common task of an Australian or New Zealand mounted stockman, driving in the cattle to be slaughtered or branded in an inclosed station-yard. The reader who may be curious to learn the rules and methods of the Spanish bull-fight should consult Murray's celebrated "Handbook of Spain," by the late Mr. James Ford, of Exeter, which is the most instructive and interesting book of its class. It will tell him all about the special appointments of the "picador," or lancer on horseback, whose light weapon is intended merely to provoke and irritate the bull; the "Chulos" or attendants on foot, carrying their mantles or scarves, which they are ready to throw over the bull's head, so as to blindfold him, whenever he makes "an ugly rush," and who sometimes torment him with small darts and burning squibs or crackers; finally, the "matador" or killer, who actually slays the beasts, when quite tired and exhausted, by thrusting a sword into the heart just behind the left shoulder. These different performers are attired in costumes of gay and fantastic device, as shown in our Illustration. The bladders, containing a few peas to rattle and alarm the bull, which are suspended from his mane, will also be observed.

SUB-ASSISTANT COMMISSARY DALTON, V.C.

Along with Major Chard, Major Gonville Bromhead, and Surgeon Reynolds, the name of Mr. James Langley Dalton, Sub-Assistant Commissary, will be remembered for the heroic defence of Rorke's Drift, with a hundred men against three thousand, throughout the night of Jan. 22, after the disastrous affair of Isandhlwana. The Gazette a fortnight ago recorded that her Majesty the Queen has bestowed the Victoria Cross upon "this officer, to whose energy much of the defence of the place was due." It is officially stated, more particularly, that "he actively superintended the work of defence, and was amongst the foremost of those who received the first attack at the corner of the hospital, where the deadliness of his fire did great execution, and the mad rush of the Zulus met its first check, and where by his cool courage he saved the life of a man of the Army Hospital Corps by shooting the Zulu, who having seized the muzzle of the man's rifle, was in the act of assegaing him." Mr. Dalton was severely wounded during the contest, "but still continued to give the same example of cool courage." This testimonial of "conspicuous gallantry," as the official writer calls it, is equal to any praise of that kind earned by officers or soldiers in the late campaign. Mr. Dalton, we are informed, entered the service in 1849, as a private soldier in the 85th Regiment, in which he served twelve years, till he volunteered to the Commissariat Staff Corps. He completed his term of twenty-one years, and was pensioned as a first-class staff-sergeant. He was granted the medal for long service and good conduct before his discharge. On leaving the army he settled in Natal, but on the outbreak of the war applied for employment in the Commissariat, in which he was given a temporary appointment as Acting Assistant Commissary. He was employed in the duties of that office at the Rorke's Drift dépôt, when the Zulus attacked the post, and he then performed the acts of "conspicuous gallantry" above described. He has since received a commission in the Commissariat and Transport Department as Sub-Assistant Commissary.

The Portrait is from one taken by the London Photographic Company, of Norfolk-terrace, Bayswater, and of Regent-street.

AN AFGHAN MASTIFF.

At the twentieth annual dog-show held at the Curzon Hall, Birmingham, simultaneously with the Birmingham Cattle Show, one interesting novelty was the young mastiff of the wild Afghan race, exhibited by Captain A. G. Hartshorne, of the 12th (Kelat-i-Ghilzie) Regiment of Bengal Native Infantry. This animal, the first of that canine variety ever brought to Europe, is shown in our Illustration. He was born at Candahar last February, one of a litter of twelve; his parents were of the wild dogs of Afghanistan, which subsist chiefly on human flesh. They go about in packs of twenty to forty, and scratch up the bodies of the dead, who are buried only slightly below the surface of the ground. Captain Hartshorne has had this dog since it was a few days old, and has named it "Shere Alli," the name being thus spelt, differently from the common orthography of the late Ameer Shere Ali's name. This dog, in the first six weeks, marched six hundred miles with his master, on the return route from Candahar to India. He now stands 25 inches in height, and weighs 62 lb., being about nine months old. His colour is red and white, with black stripes on his sides, a black and white muzzle, and a thick fringe of long hair across the shoulders. In a natural state the ears should be large, and quite erect; the tail would be long and bushy. The Afghans, however, have the barbarous custom, too often practised with some of our own dogs, of cutting off the ears and tails of their puppies. "Shere Alli" is remarkably tame and good-tempered, but shows the ancestral propensity to burrowing, and is prone to scratch holes in any soft earth.

GIPSY LIFE NEAR LONDON.

Another sketch of the wild and squalid habits of life still retained by vagrant parties or clans of this singular race of people, often met with in the neighbourhood of suburban villages and other places around London, will be found in our Journal. We may again direct the reader's attention to the account of them which was contributed by Mr. George Smith, of Coalville, Leicester, to the late Social Science Congress at Manchester, and which was reprinted in our last week's publication. That well-known advocate of social reform and legal protection for the neglected vagrant classes of our population reckons the total number of gipsies in this country at three or four thousand men and women and ten thousand children. He is now seeking to have all movable habitations—i.e., tents, vans, shows, &c.—in which the families live who are earning a living by travelling from place to place, registered and numbered, as in the case of canal boats, and the parents compelled to send their children to school at the place wherever they may be temporarily located, be it National, British, or Board school. The following is Mr. Smith's note upon what what was to be seen in the gipsies' tent on Mitcham-common:—

"Inside this tent—with no other home—there were two men, their wives, and about fourteen children of all ages: two or three of these were almost men and women. The wife of one of the men had been confined of a baby the day before I called—her bed consisting of a layer of straw upon the damp ground. Such was the wretched and miserable condition they were in that I could not do otherwise than help the poor woman, and gave her a little money. But in her feelings of gratitude to me for this simple act of kindness she said she would name the baby anything I would like to choose; and, knowing that gipsies are fond of outlandish names, I was in a difficulty. After turning the thing over in my mind for a few minutes, I could think of nothing but 'Deliverance.' This seemed to please the poor woman very much; and the poor child is named Deliverance G——. Strange to say, the next older child is named 'Moses.'"

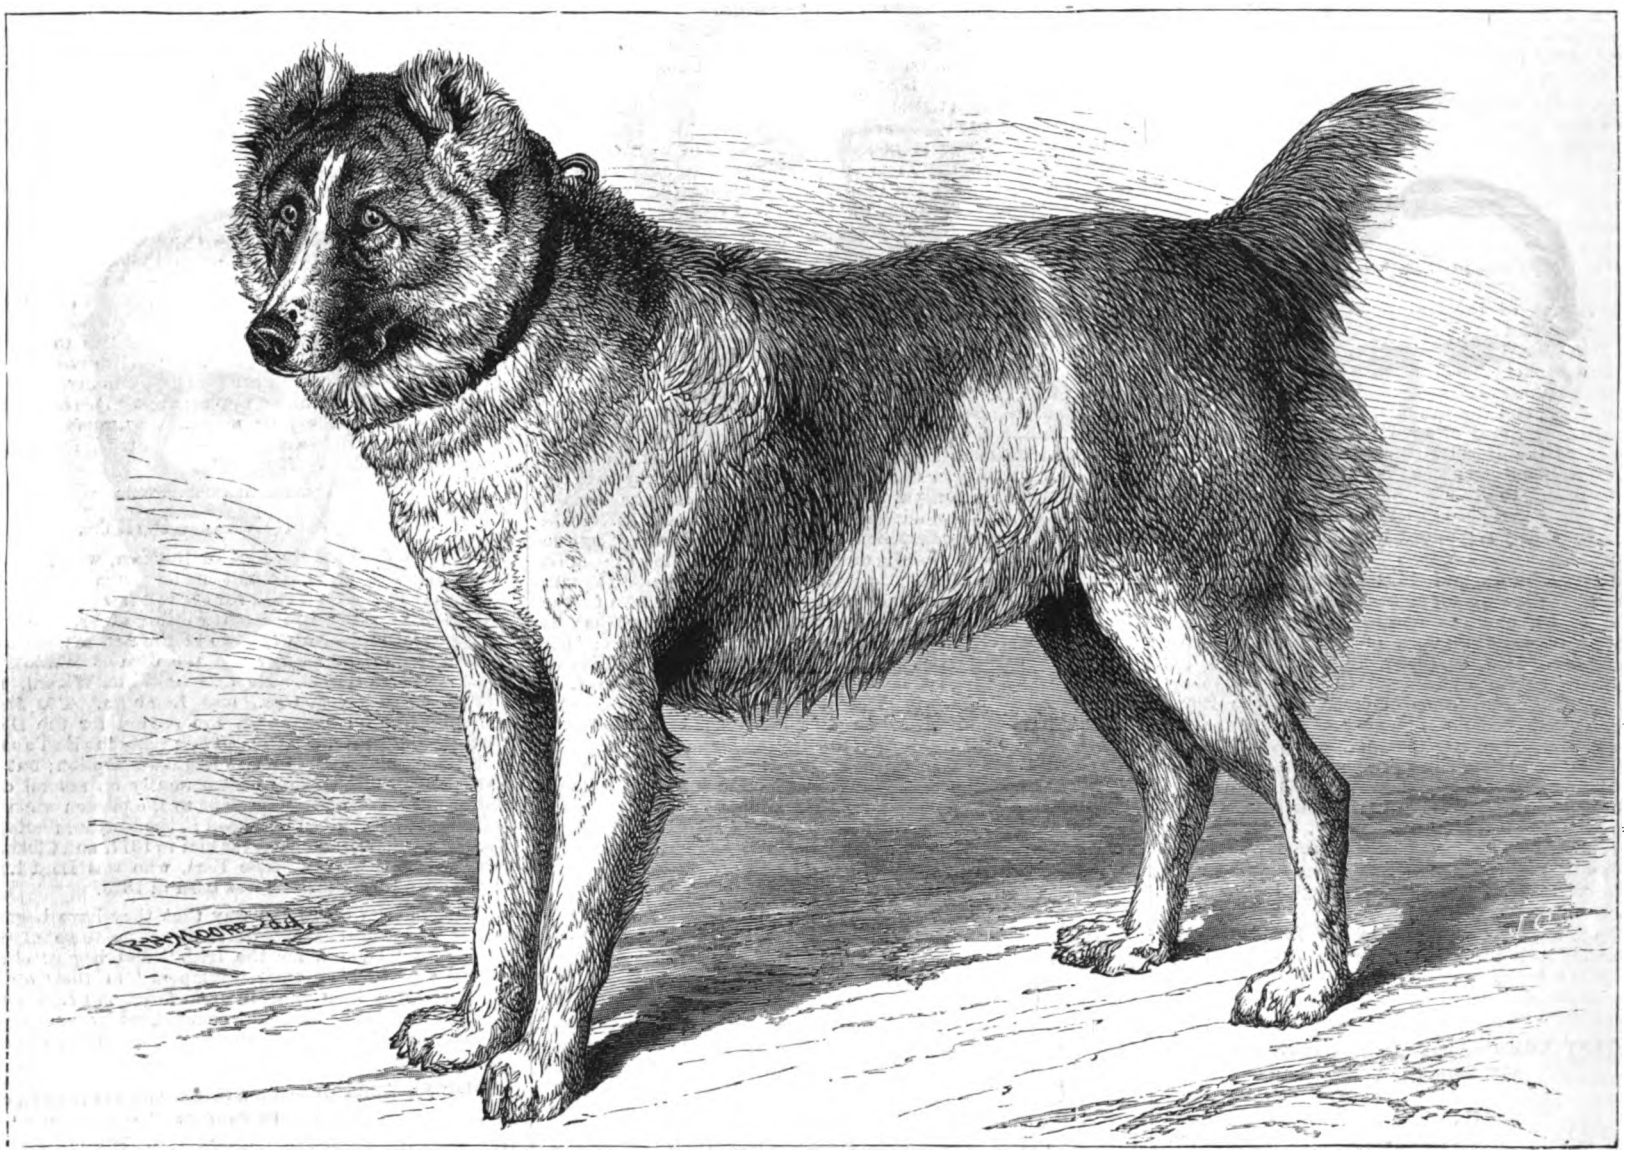
NATIONAL SPORTS.

Though the death of the Earl of Durham, which occurred last week, removes an honoured name from the list of the supporters of the turf, still, for the last few years, his Lordship had done very little in the way either of breeding or racing. Elphine and Equation were two of the first mares that he ever possessed, and the former was the dam of Warlock, the St. Leger winner of 1856. He also bred The Wizard, whom he sold as a foal for 200 gs., and Lambton. The first-named secured the Two Thousand, ran second for the Derby, and third for the Leger, in 1860. Of late years the Earl's connection with the turf has been of a very slight description; but Glendale carried his pretty colours conspicuously on several occasions, and it was a sad disappointment to the pitmen when the little horse twice succumbed by a head in the Northumberland Plate, Hampton proving too good for him in 1877, and Clearhead just beating him this year. The Earl, who was Lord Lieutenant of the county of Durham, was born in 1828.

If things go on in the way that they have begun in the matter of steeplechasing, we shall all be tempted to join in the cry of "Ireland for the Irish," and beg of our fellow-countrymen to keep their "jumpers" in their own island. Last week they invaded us in great force, and fairly sacked the Croydon prize-list. Latchkey commenced by winning the very first race in the commonest of canters, and then Venice, a very promising young mare indeed, secured the Grand National Hurdle-Race. Lord Marcus Beresford made a patriotic effort to keep the Great Metropolitan Steeplechase in this country by purchasing Queen of Kildare (11 st. 9 lb.) shortly before the race was decided; but her compatriot, Bacchus (11 st. 10 lb.), proved quite equal to the task of beating her and three others. He was decidedly short of condition, but, when thoroughly fit, is sure to accomplish something worthy of the promise that he showed last season. Controller upset a great favourite in Bugle March, and took the Norwood Steeplechase "across the water," and there was nothing else that we need notice, except that Puck recommenced his winning career in Hunters' Races. The Croydon executive were singularly fortunate in being able to run through their programme, as, at the time of writing, we appear to be in for a long spell of frost, and Sandown Park will probably suffer from another postponement.

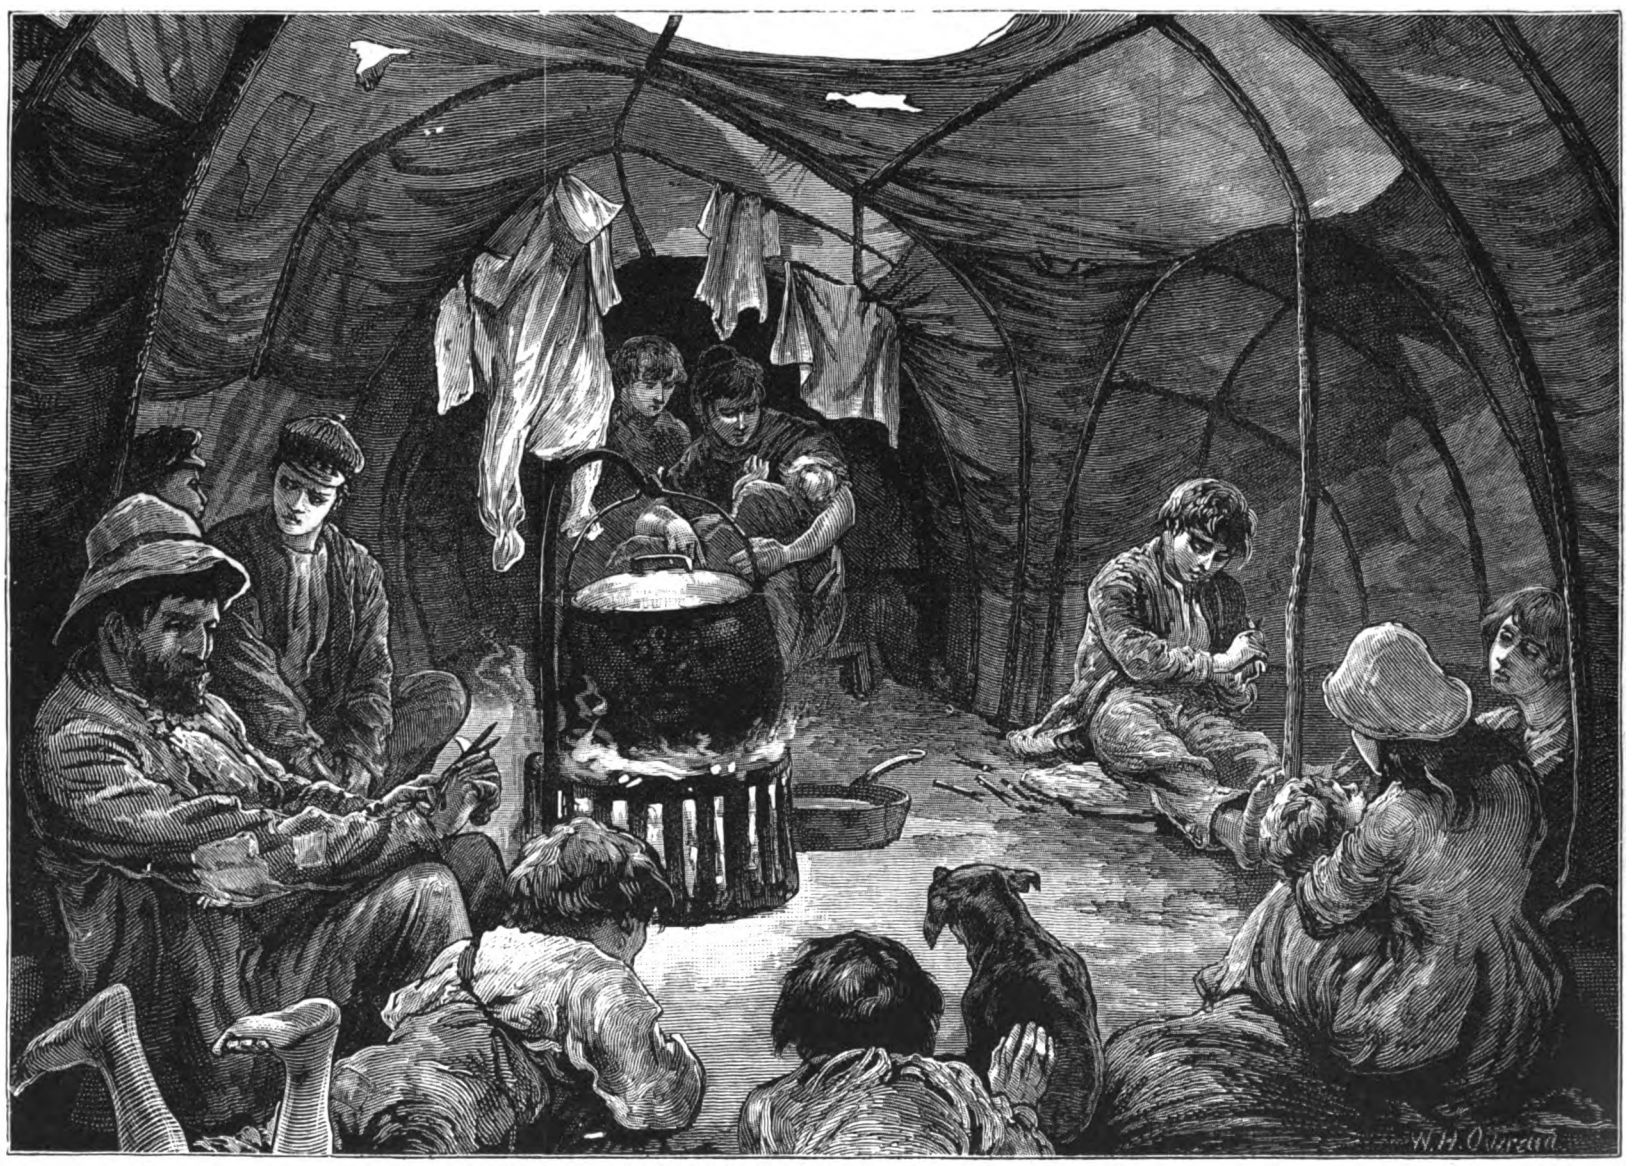
The season of turf statistics has now set in with all its accustomed severity. The list of winning owners is always an interesting one, and this year Count Lagrange has wrested the pride of place from Lord Falmouth, who occupied it in 1877-8. Thanks chiefly to Rayon d'Or, the Count is credited with £26,366, the stakes won in twenty-nine races, while Lord Falmouth's sixteen victories have brought in £23,588½. But for the unfortunate collapse of Wheel of Fortune, these positions would doubtless have been reversed. Bend d'Or and Evasion have been the chief contributors to the Duke of Westminster's total of £16,293; and then come Lord Rosebery (£13,270) and Lord Anglesey (£13,085). The latter had not a single "unprofitable servant" in his stud, and certainly chose the right time to dispose of his horses, Beaudesert and Prestonpans, both fetching very long prices. No other owner has reached £10,000, Mr. Craufurd's £8935 being little more than half the amount that Sefton and others placed to his credit last season.

On Monday last W. Spencer and G. Tarryer met for the second time on the championship course on the Thames, the stake at issue being £200. Tarryer was the quicker away, but only held the advantage for a few strokes, as Spencer then went to the front, having the race in hand before they had gone a quarter of a mile, won with ridiculous ease. On the previous occasion the result was the same.



The well-known collection of Continental pictures belonging to Mr. P. L. Everard, who is leaving England, is announced for sale at Christie, Manson, and Wood's next Saturday.

Two steamers arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday from the West Coast of Africa. They bring news that a war has broken out between the King of New Calabar and a neighbouring chief. In one battle two hundred were killed, and the prisoners taken were killed and eaten. The fear was entertained when the mail was despatched that the disturbances would spread.



A special grant was made by the Treasury, at the instance of the Duchess of Marlborough, to refit the greater portion of the state apartments in Dublin Castle with silk terry or poplin of Irish manufacture. Special designs were prepared by the Irish manufacturers. The one selected for Dublin Castle has been prepared by Messrs. William Fry and Co. It is an heraldic design of the seventeenth century; the groundwork is of shamrocks, conventionally arranged, the chief feature being the Royal arms.

A number of the tenant-farmers' delegates who went out to Canada in the summer returned on Tuesday in the Allan steamer Polynesian. They have been prospecting lands several hundred miles west of Winnepeg, Manitoba, and their report is understood to be of the same favourable nature as that of the delegates who returned last week, the opinion being that the farther they went west the better was the land. Mr. John Low, Secretary of the Department of Agriculture of the Canadian Government, was also a passenger by the steamer. He will attend a meeting of the whole of the delegates, which will be held at some place in the north at an early date.

THE LATE SERJEANT COX.

The death of Mr. Edward William Cox, Serjeant-at-Law, Deputy-Assistant-Judge of the Middlesex Court of Sessions, was recorded last week. This learned gentleman was born in 1809, and was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple when thirty-four years old. Twenty-five years later he was raised to the degree of Serjeant-at-Law, and was appointed Recorder of Portsmouth. In 1870 he became Deputy-Assistant-Judge of Middlesex. He founded and was for many years the editor of the Law Times, and is also understood to have been the proprietor of the Field, the Queen, and other newspapers. He was the author of a number of legal works, some of which, as, for instance, his treatises "On the Law of Joint-Stock Companies" (which has gone through six editions) and "On the Law of Registration and Elections" (which has gone through nine editions), have become text-books. Serjeant Cox took a prominent part in the controversy respecting spiritualism. His book, "What am I?" was a popular introduction to mental philosophy and psychology.

The portrait is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company.

COLONEL NOEL MONEY.

Among the notable services lately performed in connection with the advance of the British military forces to Cabul, the defeat of a large body of Machalga and Ahmedzai Ghilzais at the Shutargardan Pass, on Oct. 2, deserves to be mentioned. Colonel Gerard Noel Money of the Bengal Staff Corps, and in command of the 3rd Sikh Infantry, was holding this post in the intrenched camp, in the rear of General Sir F. Roberts, who was at Khushi, below the western side of the Pass. His position was threatened by the enemy with a very superor force. He sent 200 men, under Major C. J. Griffiths, afterwards reinforced by a company of the 67th Regiment, and supported by a mountain battery under Captain Morgan, to drive the enemy from a ridge above the camp. This service was performed in dashing style; Major Griffiths himself was slightly wounded. The merits of Colonel Money and of the officers under him were recognised by General Roberts in his address to the troops outside the Bala Hissar, upon the arrival of this rear-guard force at Cabul, when the Shutargardan route had been closed and abandoned for the winter. He spoke of their "splendid defence" of that position, the safety of which had been his only anxiety, because, if it had fallen to the enemy, there would have been a rising of the whole country to his rear and right flank. The message of her Majesty the Queen to General Roberts contains a distinct acknowledgment of these services.

Colonel Gerard Noel Money is the eldest son of the late Rev. James Drummond Money, of Stodham Park, Petersfield, by his first wife, Charlotte, daughter of the Hon. and Rev. Gerard Noel, and niece of the late Lord Gainsborough. His Indian military career was begun as an Ensign in the 1st Bengal Fusiliers, now the 101st Regiment of the Line, with which he served through the Indian Mutiny War, and at the siege of Delhi, where it encountered a fearful loss of officers and men in the final assaults on that city. He was also present at the engagements for the relief of Lucknow. More recently, he has held appointments in the Bengal Staff service, and has been actively employed on the Punjaub frontier. The portrait is from a photograph by Mr. T. Fall, of Baker-street.

SEDITION IN IRELAND.

The scene in the county town of Sligo, outside the Court-house and Police Barracks, during several days of last week, while the magistrates were examining the evidence against Messrs. Daly, Killen, and Michael Davitt, on the charge of seditious speaking, is the subject of one of our Illustrations. The magistrates' inquiry was brought to a close yesterday week, by committing Mr. Killen, the last of the three prisoners before them, to take his trial at the Leitrim Assizes. His solicitor, Mr. John Rea, of Belfast, a noted political agitator of the Orange faction, caused much useless delay of the procedure by his irregular and vehement behaviour. Mr. Davitt and Mr. Daly had been committed respectively on two of the previous days, but were liberated on bail, in their own recognisances for £500 and two sureties of £250 each. The inquiry had commenced on Monday, the 24th ult., before three magistrates of the county. Mr. Monroe, Q.C., and Mr. F. Le Poer Trench, instructed by Mr. Randal Peyton, solicitor, appeared for the Crown. Mr. Louden was council for Daly, who is proprietor of a local newspaper. Of the other two prisoners, Michael Davitt is a returned Fenian convict, and Mr. James Bryce Killen is a barrister. They are all charged with using language, in their speeches at the Gurteen tenant-right meeting on the 2nd ult. which would provoke rebellion and breach of the peace. The Court-house was crowded, from day to day, with an excited audience, amongst whom were many women.

At a meeting of the City Commission of Sewers on Tuesday, at which Mr. W. J. Scott, the Chairman, presided, it was resolved, on the motion of Mr. Innes, "That this Commission would view with regret any failure in the negotiations between the Metropolitan Railway Companies, the Corporation, and the Metropolitan Board of Works, and deprecates any departure by the Companies from the terms of the Act for the completion of the Inner Circle Railway."

BOOKS FOR PRESENTS AND SCHOOL PRIZES.

Second Edition, crown 8vo, with Seventy-seven Illustrations, cloth, 7s. 6d.,

A SHORT HISTORY OF NATURAL SCIENCE, and of the Progress of Discovery from the Time of the Greeks to the Present Day. For the Use of Schools and Young Persons. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of "Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students," &c.

"In the present edition I have endeavoured to supply many important omissions, especially as regards 'Sound,' which had been before entirely neglected, and to which a new chapter (XXX.) is now devoted. I have also added some new matter, in the thirty-eighth chapter, upon the Botany of the Nineteenth Century. Lastly, besides many minor additions, I have given, in a new concluding chapter, a brief sketch of some of the latest advances in science."—Extract from Preface.

Sixth thousand, crown 8vo, with 74 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.,

THE FAIRYLAND OF SCIENCE. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of "A Short History of Natural Science," "Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students," &c.

"Altogether, with its attractive illustrations and brightly written pages, is one of the pleasantest volumes for intelligent boys and girls that has been produced this season. But, indeed, a book so instructive and entertaining deserves a welcome at all seasons, and is likely to secure a permanent reputation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, cloth, 6s.,

ADVENTURES IN THE AIR: being memorable experiences of Great Aeronauts. From the French of De Fonvielle. Edited and Translated by J. S. KELTIE.

"Will be doubtless read with delight by many a boy, while readers of more advanced years will find it full of instruction and recreation, the style being as easy and pleasant, as the subject matter is solidly entertaining."—London Quarterly Review.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.,

THE HEROES OF YOUNG AMERICA. By ASCOTT R. HOPE, Author of "A Book about Boys," "A Book about Dominies," &c. With Map and Illustrations.

Every page of the book relates some marvellous incident, and boy-readers will accept the volume as a rare and valuable addition to their store of knowledge. It is capitally illustrated by a large number of wood engravings as exciting as the text."—Art Journal.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.,

STUDIES IN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By JOHN DENNIS, Editor of "English Sonnets: A Selection from 1567," &c.

Contents: Pope—Defoe—Prior—Steele—The Wartons—John Wesley—Southey—English Lyrical Poetry—English Rural Poetry—The English Sonnet.

"One of the best books upon poetry which we have had for a very long time."—Westminster Review.

"A charming, useful, and well-written book, which all those who wish to learn anything of the literature of their own country will do well to read."—Publishers' Circular.

Post 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.,

DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE. Adapted for Home Education and for Schoolmistresses and Pupil-Teachers. By ROBERT JAMES MANN, M.D., late Superintendent of Education at Natal.

"In a series of short and easy lessons he discusses, in a clear and taking manner, almost every question on which the least experienced head of a family would require information—air and ventilation; food, cookery, and drink; heat, clothing, and washing; health, home, and money; and he never fails in being equally lucid, accurate, and practical. There have been many similar works, but after testing this, the latest of them, on a number of salient points, we have no hesitation in recommending it as in every respect worthy of confidence."—Examiner.

Post 8vo, cloth, 316 pp., 2s. 6d.,

DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE (Standard 5 of the Whitelands series of Standard Reading Books for Girls). Edited by Rev. J. P. FAUNTHORPE, M.A., Principal of Whitelands Training College. Dedicated, by permission, to his Grace the Duke of Westminster, K.G.

"It is a thoroughly eminent and comprehensive manual, and contains more information than half a dozen primers of health or social science. It would be a useful book to add to village lending libraries, or to give as prizes in Sunday schools, or as presents to young servants. It is, indeed, a pity that this, or some other book of the same sort, is not more commonly in use in so-called ladies' schools and private school-rooms. If misses as well as maids knew and acted up to the wise lessons contained in this little book, the price of which is only half-a-crown, there would be a marked increase in the domestic happiness of that large part of the community who cannot afford to pay accomplished cooks and experienced housekeepers."—Saturday Review.

18mo, cloth, 2s. 6d.,

SIMPLE LESSONS. Chiefly intended for Home Use and Elementary Schools. By Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, G. PHILLIPS BEVAN, F.G.S., Dr. MANN, F.R.G.S., J. C. BUCKMASTER, B.A., Mrs. BENJAMIN CLARKE, J. J. POPE, R. A. PROCTOR, B.A., Rev. F. O. MORRIS, M.A., Rev. G. HENSLOW, F.L.S., Rev. T. E. CHALLAN, M.A. Contents: Our Bodily Life—How and Why we Breathe—Food—Drink—Cookery—Plain Needlework—Clothing—Air and Ventilation—The Sicknesses that spread—Weather—Astronomy—Birds—Flowers—Money.

THE SIMPLE LESSONS are also published separately, 3d. each, or 18s. per 100 assorted. The set of 14, in card case, 3s.

"It would be difficult to award too high praise to this little volume. It consists of a series of leaflets, now bound up together, teaching the simple facts of domestic economy and elementary science. Each series is contributed by a writer of acknowledged eminence in his own department. These 'Simple Lessons' are chiefly intended for elementary schools. But, if the knowledge of the children is not to put the parents to shame, it is no less desirable that the book should circulate throughout the cottage homes of England. We can imagine no better present for the wife of an artizan."—Academy.

Fcap folio, 12s. 6d.,

AN ATLAS OF ANATOMY; or, Pictures of the Human Body. In 24 Quarto Coloured Plates, comprising 100 separate Figures, with Descriptive Letterpress by Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, Member of the London School Board, Author of the Physiological Sections of "simplé Lessons for Home Use," &c.

"It is hoped that this work, being issued at a comparatively low price, may be found useful both to science teachers and to students of all kinds. To the private student whose access to anatomical preparations and physiological laboratories is limited such a book is indispensable. Again, children, with their keen interest in the facts of Nature, and with their fresh, undistracted minds full of curiosity about what is around them, are almost always found to take a deep interest in the wonderful structure and functions of their own bodies. Thus this volume would generally be found an acceptable gift to an intelligent youth of twelve or fourteen, and would afford him useful instruction for his adult life."—Extract from Preface.

Folio, price 7s. 6d. each,

ROWLANDS' ODONTO
has been proved, by its unparalleled success of fifty years, to be the best Dentifrice for procuring White and Sound Teeth, Healthy Gums, and Fragrant Breath, being perfectly free from all deleterious and acid compounds, which give a temporary whiteness to the teeth, but ultimately ruin the enamel. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Each Box bears a 3d. Government stamp.

DOES YOUR HAIR TURN GREY? Then use HERRING'S PATENT MAGNETIC BRUSHES and COMBS. Brushes, 10s. and 15s. each. Combs, 2s. 6d., 5s., 7s. 6d., 10s., 15s., and 20s. each. Pamphlets upon application.—5, Great Marlborough-st., W.; 93 and 95, City-road; and of all Perfumers.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored by this valuable specific to its original shade, after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Used as a dressing, it causes growth and arrests falling. The most harmless and effectual restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials post-free.—R. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

GOLDEN HAIR.—ROBARE'S AUREOLINE produces the beautiful Golden Colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all Perfumers. Wholesale, HOVENDEN and SONS, 5, Great Marlborough-street, W.; and 93 and 95, City-road, E.C. London; Pinaud and Meyer, 37, Boulevard de Strasbourg, Paris; 31, Graben, Vienna; 44, Rue des Longs Chariots, Brussels.

"AND TEETH LIKE ROWS OF PEARLS."
JEWSBURY and BROWN'S Exquisite Compound and Specialité, the
ORIENTAL TOOTH-PASTE.
The celebrated original and only genuine Oriental Tooth-Paste is signed "JEWSBURY and BROWN, Manchester. Established 50 years." PEARLY WHITE and SOUND TEETH, a healthy action of the gums, producing that firmness and rosy brightness of colour so essential to beauty, and fragrant breath, are all insured by the use of this most perfect Dentifrice. Pots, 1s. 6d.; double, 2s. 6d. All Perfumers and Chemists.

THE SKIN.—To give it smoothness, sweetness, and lustrous elegance use the ALBION MILK and SULPHUR SOAP. "The materials are choice."—Lancet. "It is the most elegant and delicate preparation for the skin that I know."—James Startin, Surgeon of St. John's Hospital, London. By all Chemists, in Tablets, 6d. and 1s.—The ALBION SANATORY SOAP CO., 532, Oxford-street, London.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants. It is perfectly harmless, and delicious as sherry. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London. Retailed everywhere.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots where the glands are not decayed. Ask any Chemist for "The Mexican Hair Renewer," price 3s. 6d. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

SOZODONT.—The Peerless liquid Dentifrice.
Its use imparts the most fragrant breath; it beautifies, cleanses, and preserves the teeth in a surprising manner. It gives a delightfully fresh taste and feeling to the mouth, removing all Tartar and Scurf from the Teeth, completely arresting the progress of decay, and whitening such parts as have already become black by decay or neglect. Impure Breath caused by Bad Teeth, Tobacco, Spirits, or Catarrh, is neutralised by Sozodont. The price of the Fragrant Sozodont is 3s. 6d., put up in large bottles, fitted with patent sprinklers for applying the liquid to the tooth-brush. Each bottle is inclosed in a handsome toilet box. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers, and by JOHN M. RICHARDS, Great Russell-street, London. Observe the Name SOZODONT on the label, box, and bottle.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL and COMFORTING.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly-nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

MR. GLADSTONE IN THE MUSIC-HALL, EDINBURGH.

MR. GLADSTONE IN MIDLOTHIAN.

The magnificent outburst of political oratory which the greatest of Liberal statesmen and speakers has been pouring forth in the metropolitan county of Scotland, while soliciting the electoral suffrages of the Midlothian constituency in opposition to the Earl of Dalkeith, was the occasion of those extraordinary scenes and grand exhibitions of popular enthusiasm the aspect of which our Special Artist has delineated in several Illustrations. At the Music-Hall, at the Corn Exchange, and in the Waverley Market of Edinburgh, at the neighbouring towns of Dalkeith and West Calder, and in other places of the district, Mr. Gladstone met with such a welcome as no part of Great Britain has ever exceeded in doing honour to an influential Parliamentary leader. The topics and arguments of his different speeches are briefly mentioned in our current notice of political utterances, which will be found in another page. It is sufficient here to observe some of the external features and accessary incidents of this remarkable series of public gatherings, from which the subjects of our Engravings are derived.

The right hon. gentleman, who was staying at the Earl of Rosebery's seat, Dalmeny Park, with Mrs. and Miss Gladstone, first met the Edinburgh citizens on the Tuesday of last week, at three in the afternoon, at the Music-Hall, in George-street. That fine hall, which is 108 ft. long and 90 ft. broad, has accommodation for more than two thousand persons seated. The county electors, admitted by ticket, occupied the benches nearest to the platform, and the non-electors were admitted to those farther removed, while the gallery was filled with ladies; the platform and organ gallery were occupied by leading members of the Liberal party in Edinburgh. The chair was taken by Sir David Wedderburn, M.P., beside whom sat Mr. Gladstone with his wife and daughter, Lord Reay, one of the Scotch Judges, Sir George Balfour, M.P., Sir George Campbell, M.P., Sheriff M'Laren, and other gentlemen of local importance. Mr. Gladstone here spoke an hour and three quarters, after which a vote of thanks was passed, and he left the Music-Hall. He then drove to the Council Chamber, in the Royal Exchange Buildings, opposite St. Giles's Cathedral, Old Town, where he was received by the Lord Provost, Mr. T. J. Boyd, the Bailies, Councillors, and magistrates of the city, in their official robes. An address of welcome from the Corporation was presented to him, and was acknowledged in a suitable speech; Mr. Gladstone, who had been joined by Lord Rosebery, then returned to Dalmeny.

The small town of Dalkeith, eight miles south-east of Edinburgh, adjacent to Dalkeith Palace, the seat of the wealthy Conservative peer, the Duke of Buccleuch, whose son is Mr. Gladstone's competitor for the honour of representing Midlothian, was visited next day. The meeting here took place in the Corn Exchange, where seats were placed for three thousand persons, besides those who found room in a large gallery at the south end. Provost Mitchell was in the chair, and Mr. James Cowan, M.P., with many gentlemen of the neighbourhood, sat beside him. Mr. Gladstone was again accompanied by Mrs. and Miss Gladstone. His speech here was nearly equal in length to that which he had made the day before. After the afternoon meeting, and taking tea at the Provost's house, the right hon. gentleman went to another great meeting at the Foresters' Hall, composed of members of the various district committees, with ladies in their company, from the sixteen parishes of the county. He spoke again, with unabated force and freshness, but in a less controversial tone, and with more feeling exhortation. Leaving Dalkeith at half-past seven in the evening, he returned by train to Edinburgh, and thence went on to the mansion of Lord Rosebery, which is seven miles west of the city, on the shore of the Firth of Forth, near Queensferry.

The third day, Thursday, was devoted to visiting West Calder, a town fifteen miles from Edinburgh to the westward, in the centre of a rich mineral district with flourishing trade and industry, noted especially for its paraffin oil. A large temporary wooden building had been erected for this occasion. It was adorned with a profusion of evergreens and greenhouse flowering plants, and rows of paraffin lamps in opal shades. At the railway station, and at several places along the road or street, were triumphal arches, with festoons and garlands and inscribed mottoes; a large bonfire was burning on a knoll near the station; and an electric light, on the top of a pole, shone full upon the entrance to the special pavilion. The scenes at the arrival and at the departure of Mr. Gladstone, at West Calder, are shown in two of our Illustrations. The hour of meeting was half-past four in the afternoon. Mr. P. M'Lagan, M.P. for Linlithgowshire, was in the chair. Mr. Gladstone, with whom were his wife and daughter, as before, was introduced to the electors and other people of the neighbourhood. He spoke long and with great vigour, as he had done on the two preceding days, and received a vote of thanks, besides repeated acclamations. From West Calder, he and the two ladies took the train to Edinburgh, whence they drove to Dalmeny.

There was a day of comparative repose and quiet for Mr. Gladstone on Friday, remaining at Lord Rosebery's house; but the Provost and Corporation of Leith came to present an address, and stayed to lunch with him and with the Earl and Countess, who gave also an evening party, attended by two hundred ladies and gentlemen. On Saturday the oratorical labours of the ex-Prime Minister recommenced at two more great meetings held in Edinburgh. The first of these, at three o'clock, was in the Corn Exchange, which is situated in the Grass Market, and in which the banquet of the Scott Centenary Festival took place in 1871. The platform, erected on the south side of the hall, was handsomely decorated with crimson cloth, bordered and tasselled with gold; a blazon of ornamental and significant devices was displayed behind it; festoons of foliage hung between the pillars, upon which were also suspended trophy shields and flags; and the Scottish Royal Arms confronted the platform on the north side. The Earl of Rosebery was in the chair, and introduced Mr. Gladstone. Among those present were the Countess of Rosebery, Mrs. and Miss Gladstone, the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earl of Airlie, the Earl of Elgin, Lord Berehaven, Lord Napier of Ettrick, the Right Hon. W. P. Adam, M.P., the Right Hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair, M.P., and many other members of Parliament. Mr. Gladstone's speech, dealing chiefly with the financial position and prospects of the Government, is noticed in another part of this Journal. A vote of thanks to him was moved by the Earl of Airlie, and was carried by acclamation. After this meeting, Mr. Gladstone, with the other ladies and gentlemen on the platform, went to the vast covered market-place, commonly used for the sale of vegetables, adjoining the Waverley Station of the North British Railway, in the valley of the Nor' Loch, at the south side of Lower Princes-street. It is estimated that nearly 20,000 persons were assembled here, the gallery around the market being filled with ladies. A large platform, in the middle, with some little decoration, and with an Earl's coronet, in jets of gas, above the chair, which was for Lord Rosebery, had been erected for this occasion. The proceedings were for successive deputations to present to Mr. Gladstone the addresses voted by the Liberal Associations of many different parts of Scotland, the East, North, and West, as well as Edinburgh and Glasgow. The first was presented by Mr. John M'Laren, Advocate, from "the Council of the General Liberal Association for the East and North of Scotland, and for sixty other Liberal Associations who concurred with it." Mr. Gladstone made a general reply to them all in his final address.

On Sunday, the right hon. gentleman, with the ladies of his family, attended Divine worship at St. Mary's Episcopalian Cathedral Church in the morning, and at St. Giles's Church (National Scottish Presbyterian) in the afternoon. On Monday, he took leave of Lord and Lady Rosebery, and travelled with Mrs. and Miss Gladstone to Perthshire, where they are the guests of the Marquis of Breadalbane, at Taymouth Castle. An address from the Corporation of Dunfermline, one from that of the City of Perth, and one from the Perth Liberal Association, were received by the way, during this journey to the Highlands.

In accordance with a request from the Home Secretary, the Mayor of Newport (Mr. H. Russell Evans) presented on Saturday, in the name of the Queen, the Albert Medal of the Second Class to Charles Morgany, collier, for gallantry in saving life at the Abercarne Colliery in September, 1878. It will be remembered that about 270 lives were lost by the explosion which occurred at the Prince of Wales Pit, and the recipient of the medal, with many others, greatly distinguished himself in his efforts to save life.

The committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society have appointed the Rev. Charles E. B. Reed, M.A., to the office of secretary, from Jan. 1 next, in place of the Rev. S. B. Bergne, who, after twenty-six years of able and devoted service, accepts the less onerous post of consulting secretary. Mr. Reed was formerly scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took a first-class in the Classical Tripos of 1868, and was for some years minister of the Common Close Congregational Church, Warminster.

At a meeting of the Norwich Town Council yesterday week the difficulty in regard to the mayoralty was surmounted. Mr. Newman, who was elected on the previous Saturday, had failed to qualify; and, though legal proceedings had been threatened to compel him to do so, the threat came to nothing. After a heated discussion yesterday week, a solution of the difficulty was found by the present Mayor (Mr. H. Bullard) consenting to retain office for another year. A meeting was held last Tuesday for the purpose of electing Mr. Bullard.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

The present exhibition more than maintains the improvement which marked the return of this Society to its old quarters in Suffolk-street, and the concurrent election of a number of new members. The intention of the founders of the Society—namely, to supply an adequate succursale and feeder to the Royal Academy, is now again carried out more fully than it has been within our recollection. The advantage the Society enjoys in the spaciousness of its rooms allows the exhibition of work on a larger scale than is encouraged at the Dudley Gallery, and artists' aims are apt to be limited with the limitations of their canvas. The stereotyped productions of some of the old members (who seem to have exhausted themselves by a small success here as completely as are other artists by the time that they arrive at the full honours of the Academy) formerly brought more discredit on "Suffolk-street art" than even the crude attempts of tyros. But now such productions are in much diminished proportion; whilst the general mass of contributions testify here, as elsewhere, to the greatly extended cultivation of art, and an improvement in at least the technical modes of procedure. In all the higher branches of art-education, however, this country is still too much behindhand for us not to find in this almost indiscriminate assemblage of nearly nine hundred paintings, drawings, and sculpture, much that is lamentably immature or commonplace. And as it is in art, as in society, that obtrusiveness is usually the measure of incapacity, vulgarity, and ignorance, so the visitor will probably receive an unfavourable first impression from the plentiful bad work here, which will be much modified on careful and selective examination.

Among the new members Mr. John Burr takes the first place in virtue of the skill and power he displays over the materials and in manipulation according to the methods of the Scotch School, which methods originated in emulation of Velasquez and Rembrandt, but have been much modified by the practice of Raeburn, John Phillip, and later painters. Mr. Burr has scarcely redeemed the great promise of some early works, and he now seems to address himself to a less select audience than he has a right to challenge. Yet in his "Incorrigible" (162)—an old dominie leaning over his rostrum towards an urchin on whom he has in vain administered exemplary punishment, and who grinningly displays a concealed apple to his schoolfellows; and in his "Flower Girl" (252), "Watercress Boy" (252), and "The Image of his Father" (397), there are passages which, if all parts were up to the same level, would give them high rank. Another picture, however, called "After the Dance" (357), has, judged as a tour de force of colouring, new and rare qualities which we have not seen equalled by any recent work of the Scotch School. It is a small half-length of a rather blowsy girl in amber bodice, grey neckerchief, and purplish-grey skirt, with a black fan, and a bit of scarlet in her fair hair, seated in profile, and relieved only by a primrose-coloured curtain. The colouring is beautiful and harmonious, and its brilliancy and purity could only have been secured by that certainty and readiness which admits of painting "at once," or "alla prima" as the Italians say, and which no modern method of glazing (though certainly practised by Titian) will yield. The Scotch School are in force in this exhibition. Another noteworthy picture is J. Macbeth's "Mountain and Glen" (101). "Upright" in shape, it admits of representing an extensive range of distance from the far-off purple mountain to the deep glen crimsoned with heather, along which trudges a lassie with her linen from the burn. The painting is generally excellent, though the colour is a little forced and feverish in the foreground. Mr. P. Macnab, a new member, has a picture of a girl lying on a seashore, "Waiting for the Tide" (292). It is fairly executed, but a little formal. Two small landscapes, with figures, by J. R. Reid (the young Scotch artist, one of whose pictures was bought by the Academy out of the Chantry Bequest this year) are remarkable for vigour of handling and strength of colour. By J. Frazer there is a sea-piece, "A Recollection of the Yang-Tse" (353), with junks, which is very powerful, and not less truthful in the rendering of a storm—the typhoon, probably. The effect of the darkling sea under the slaty, ominous sky shows a fine sense of observation. "A Fisherhaven" (267), by T. Graham, is a study for, or replica (with modifications) of, the artist's picture in the Academy this year, and is, perhaps, less loose in its brush-work and has fewer of the other faults of the Scotch School than that picture had.

Speaking of technicalities (being naturally incited thereto by the works of the Scotch School), there is a picture by J. W. B. Knight of two lasses rowing with a will, "Taking the Lads' Boat Down Tide" (228), in which the pigments are loaded to a very unusual degree, but which seems justified by the descriptive decision of the strokes, the truthful aspect of mellowed light that is obtained, and the liquidity of the water. Mr. A. Hill has made a rather bold essay, rendered acceptable, however, as far as may be, by the respectable draughtsmanship of the figure and the creditable workmanship generally, in a whole-length of a Copt girl in a long semi-transparent black robe or haikh, which allows the nude figure to be seen through (more equally, we think, than would be in fact), holding a tambourine and leaning against a marble wall. It is called "La Danseuse" (471), and recalls a work by Gérome; but why the title is given in French we know not. Mr. Cauty has made a decided advance in his picture (92) of a fair girl leaning against a stile in reverie, which has an open-air aspect of singular luminousness, that verges, however, on diaphanous evanescence. "Strays" (221) by the same; the rencontre of a little girl and little pig is pleasant. "News from Abroad," (419) by A. M. Rossi; three ladies discussing a letter in a drawing-room looking out on a garden, is very dashing and brilliant in colour. Mr. A. W. Bayes has dramatically conceived a moment of suggestive interest in "Reconnoitring: Marston Moor" (158); four Roundhead troopers, with other Cavalier figures emerging over a near hill. The two last pictures deserve to be better hung. Mr. Hindley's "Merry Singer and Toper," in No. 139, is excellently painted. Several works, with figures in combination with landscape, are also to be commended for merit and promise, particularly "The Turn of the Leaf" (277), and No. 15, by Stuart Lloyd. "Over the Brow" (402), by J. L. Pickering, and the pleasing but rather slight works of H. Caffieri and A. Ludovici. The last also sends a female head (539), which shows a delicate sense of beauty though very vague in treatment. There is a promising little picture by A. Ludovici, jun., "Many happy returns of the day" (193). Mr. J. Gow exhibits a painstaking representation of "The Young Poet, Robert Bloomfield, Reading to the Shoemakers" (127). "Quite in Confidence" (216)—a couple of male gossips in eighteenth-century costumes, by H. G. Glindoni, is careful but rather hard. "Matchmaking" (281), an Irish version of "Auld Robin Gray," by H. Helmick, inclines to caricature, and otherwise hardly bears out the promise of a few years back. There is a tendency apparently to exaggerate character also in Yeend King's picture of a French skittle-alley, "Le Quillier" (319), nor is the colouring so good as in recent works.

Among the aspirants of mark in landscape is E. Ellis, whose ambition is to paint in a broad indicative masterly style, and he attains considerable success in several small subjects. But this very success is beset with the danger to a young painter of falling into mannerism or conventionality. His largest picture (212), representing effects of wind, is somewhat empty. Another landscapist aiming at expression and power, not without a measure of attainment, is B. Evans: see No. 611, representing approaching storm. To the specialists in still-life and architecture, Messrs. Muckley, and Wyke Baylis a word of praise is due. The "Rhododendrons, Hydrangea, &c." (248), by the former, present much beauty in the hues and tints, though the technique has something of the character of water-colour painting. The latter is much preferable in oil than in water-colours: "The Bride's Door, St. Sebald's, Nuremburg" (299), with a happy couple coming out into the sunshine, shows that sentiment should be aimed at in architecture as in other departments, whilst the draughtsmanship evinces competent knowledge. We must object, however, to the floury texture of the stone. There are, besides, two very small but capital architectural studies in Siena, by Harry Goodwin (387 and 525).

We should have mentioned before that among the Academic painters who exhibit here "by courtesy" are Sir John Gilbert, and Messrs. Elmore and Storey, who are represented respectively by an illustration of "Pilgrim's Progress"—"Christian over against the Mouth of the Burning Pit in the Valley of the Shadow of Death" (185); a study for the picture of Columbus speculating on a small wooden Mexican idol washed ashore at Porto Santo (232); and "Memory" (316), a small half-length of a fair girl in profile. Other artists of established reputation likewise contribute—viz., H. Moore, whose "Ebb-Tide" (86) appears to us much superior to his pictures in the Dudley; E. Hayes: two small sea-pieces, which prove that an artist need not necessarily be spoiled by popularity; J. Peel, whose "Sussex Common" (284) is, perhaps, his best work; G. S. Walters, and other members of more or less standing, of whom there is nothing new to say—to wit, Messrs. Woolmer, Hayllar, Hemsley, Haynes King, Holyoake, Cobbett, Patten, Wainwright, Goaling, and Bromley. Apropos of Mr. Woolmer, we are tempted to repeat what we have said in effect often before—namely, that his works reveal the possession of the wherewithal to have made a poetical painter of eminence. In this "Fête Champêtre" (27) we find an arrangement of colour—an almost arbitrary arrangement, and colour that must be taken per se—which is really beautiful in many of its hues, tones, and relations. It has indeed an affinity to the later work of Turner; only Turner's work at its wildest was informed and nourished by life-long study of nature, and was not the mere decorative and suggestive outcome of life-long studio invention.

We have still to recommend to the visitor's attention the following works of merit, on which we have not space to dwell. "A Weedy Common in the Isle of Wight" (246), by T. Hines; "Peaceful Old Age" (242), by W. L. Wyllie—a man-of-war and other ships laid up in dock, not without impressiveness and well painted; landscapes by T. O. Hume, J. E. Grace, W. H. Bartlett, R. Gallon, &c.; "In Readiness" (115), a picture of dogs by J. S. Noble; several small pictures by Beatrice Meyer, particularly one of the Johnsonian circle "At Tea," a little heavy in general tone, but otherwise very praiseworthy; "Reverie" (34), a small female figure by Mary L. Gow, very promising as colour; "Art" (588), a young lady student at her easel, by Frances L. Grace; Carl Baurle's pretty and broadly-painted child-figure entitled "Spring" (467); T. Davidson's "The Quill Pen: a Writer's Weapon" (403)—a gentleman in costume of fifty years ago, significantly sharpening the same—very highly finished; T. S. Muschamp's "Idlers" (605); and single figures or studies of heads by B. G. Head, R. J. Gordon, J. Archer, C. W. Pittard, W. Walker, T. Hill, and S. Paget.

The water-colour room contains some nice drawings by A. Powell, Mary Eley, J. E. Grace, A. B. Donaldson, T. B. Hardy, G. S. Walters, Carlton A. Smith, A. Strange-Lionel P. Smythe, E. Wake Cook, and others, but hardly of sufficient consequence to demand comment. Among the sculpture deserving mention are two works in marble, "Andromeda," by F. Junck, and "Isabella," by Percival Ball.

The private views of the Winter Exhibitions of the Society and Institute of Painters in Water Colours take place to-day (Saturday). The galleries open to the public on Monday next.

The exhibition of etchings by Méryon is now open at the Burlington Fine-Arts Club. We hope to give a notice thereof as soon as we have available space.

The International Exhibition of Fine Arts at Bruges will open on Sunday next, and remain open till Feb. 8, 1880.

The proceedings at the opening meeting of the Royal Institute of British Architects on Monday night were particularly interesting, first, from the admission of the Dukes of Edinburgh and Connaught and Prince Leopold; secondly, from the investiture of the President with a gold chain and badge of office; and, thirdly, by the reading of a letter from General Menabrea assuring the Society and the art world at large that Italy would protect St. Mark's, Venice, from the Vandalism of restoration.—At a meeting of the Society of Antiquaries on Thursday week a letter was read which it was proposed that Lord Carnarvon should send to the Marquis of Salisbury respecting the proposed "restoration" of St. Mark's, Venice—a work which was severely condemned by several speakers.

THE MAGAZINES.

The chief attraction to the generality of readers in this month's Cornhill will no doubt be found in "Mademoiselle de Mersac," a story long improving, and now invigorated by a change of scene. From Algiers the action is shifted to England, and equal mastery is shown in the description of English autumnal landscape, and of a new character whose introspective nature seems in a measure the counterpart of the season and the scenery. "White Wings" also improves, but the best thing in it is the charming vignette, in which moving water is represented with a perfection rarely attained in wood engraving. Mr. Alfred Austin's poems "Teaching Grandmother" and "Grandmother's Teaching" are very clever indeed, but the cleverness is of the kind which, affecting extreme simplicity, is unsatisfactory in proportion to its very success. "Life in Brittany" and "The Four Southern Headlands of Devon" are two excellent descriptive papers, the former dealing chiefly with the inhabitants, the latter with the physical features of the districts under review. "The History of Haconby" is an ingenious endeavour to depict geological and ethnological changes on the evidence of palæontological research. "Isaac Disraeli and Bolton Corney" revives an old controversy, in which the author of "The Curiosities of Literature" cuts a poor figure, but of which nothing would have been heard in our day if his son had never become Prime Minister.

Fraser has one very bright paper, a joint production of a father and a son on the subject of Eton. We are happy to learn that Eton boys work harder than generally supposed, and that Mr. Gladstone's charge of an undue deference to wealth is groundless. Mr. Howell's article on strikes is an able summary of all that can be said upon them from the trades-union point of view. The other contributions are somewhat disappointing. The Duke of Argyll's "Impressions of the New World" would hardly have been printed at all if they had been the impressions of a less exalted personage; Count Orsi's escapes from the Communards and the Versaillais fail to thrill us; and we care just now more about Mr. Gladstone's Midlothian campaign than his views of Homeric mythology. The paper on Bishop Stanley and his wife, however, makes us acquainted with a woman, not only of great ability, but of marked originality of character.

After the continuation of "Reata," which maintains its place at the head of the serial fiction of the day, the most interesting contribution to Blackwood is the tribute to its late lamented editor, a master of his craft, whom it will be most difficult to replace. There are also a pleasant account of bush life in Queensland, a caustic essay querying the reality of modern progress, and a disparaging criticism on Mr. Irving.

The Contemporary Review commences with a series of letters addressed to a clergyman by Mr. Ruskin, entitled "The Lord's Prayer and the Church." It will generally be considered, we think, that these letters do more credit to Mr. Ruskin's heart than his head, and, with much valuable truth, contain mischievous fallacies calculated to widen the gulf already existing between the affluent and the indigent classes. Colonel Osborn's "India Under Lord Lytton" will be registered with the other documents from which the historian will one day deduce his final sentence on Lord Lytton's administration; but is too palpably inspired by a discontented Bengal journalist to be of much immediate service to the Viceroy's antagonists. Mr. Justice Fry undertakes to show, in opposition to Mr. Grant Allen, that the utility of beautiful tints to flowers is not sufficient to account for their existence in all cases, which merely proves that a complex phenomenon is not to be accounted for by a single cause. "An Eastern Statesman" contrasts the present conditions of life in Constantinople with those prevailing fifty years ago, and concludes that the Christian is better off, and the Turk worse. Professor Monier Williams describes the tenets of the Jain sect in India, and seems inclined to consider that is more ancient than Buddhism. M. Gabriel Monod's review of French political and literary affairs presents several points of much interest.

The contents of the Fortnightly Review are mainly political, but the number is beyond the average, if not in variety, yet in interest. The general tenor of Mr. Harrison's remarks on the Cabul Expedition, and Dr. Sandwith's on the condition of Bulgaria, may, indeed, be surmised without reading them, and the chief novelty of Mr. Osborne Morgan's essay on Land Law Reform is the proposition, not, of course, formulated in these precise terms, that the work can only be accomplished by Chancery lawyers exempt from professional prejudices. It is long since we have heard so discouraging a deliverance. But M. de Laveleye's paper on the Austro-German Alliance is thoughtful and suggestive. The key to the situation is, he says, the impossibility of Germany allowing Russia to obtain a hold upon the Danube, and Prince Bismarck's repentance for having, under the pressure of circumstances, yielded more in this direction than he should have done. Mr. Stillman, with the authority belonging to an undoubted friend of Italy, expounds to the Italians the parallel impossibility of Germany allowing them to occupy Trieste. His words should carry the more weight as he is entirely at one with the party of action on the question of the Italian Tyrol. Mr. W. L. Courtney contributes a very able and suggestive paper on the good and evil in Mr. Carlyle's political doctrines, pointing out that, by a strange irony of fate, the only English statesman who has made any approach towards realising them is Mr. Carlyle's pet aversion, Lord Beaconsfield. Mr. Minto manages to put the whole essence of Dickens's letters into a single review. The most remarkable contribution to the number, however, is Mr. Rhys Davids's translation of Buddha's first sermon, with a most instructive commentary, reiterating Mr. Davids's view that the Buddhistic Nervane is not a future state of existence or non-existence, but a habit of mind to be attained in the present life.

The Nineteenth Century, unlike the Fortnightly, is exceedingly varied, but contains no paper of remarkable calibre. It is, notwithstanding, very pleasant reading, though such a description is hardly applicable to the two contributions of most interest. Mr. O'Connor Power does not overrate the evils of Irish tenancy at will; but his faith must be robust if he deems that the national treasury will advance money to turn Irish tenants into peasant proprietors, in the face of the Home-Rule agitation and the Home-Rule leaders' justification of the repudiation of inconvenient contracts. Nor does he take account of the tendency of peasant proprietorship towards the subdivision of holdings already too small. The true remedy is an approach to fixity of tenure under lease; but with this Mr. Power says the Irish people will not be content. Sir James Paget's deeply interesting account of the invention and inventors of anæsthesia under surgical operations is deeply painful from its statement of the requital of the men to whom humanity is indebted for this blessing. The honour is pretty equally divided among four Americans, three of whom became insane, while the fourth lived and died in obscurity. Mr. James Payn's somewhat alarming suggestion that boys should be trained up to be authors seems only to mean that they should receive such an education as will qualify them to follow the literary profession if they desire. In this sense it is highly commendable. Miss Bevington concludes her reply to Mr. Mallock; Miss Stephen contributes some kindly and sensible observations on the relation between mistresses and servants; the Abbé Martin writes an almost jubilant article on the present strength of the French Church, apparently forgetting that it is not the French National Church but the Church of Rome in France that he is talking of; and Mr. E. J. Wilson warns the Liberal party against the damage and discredit of an alliance with the Home Rulers.

We shall notice the remainder of the magazines next week.

The Christmas annuals come thronging in. The Belgravia Annual boasts a goodly number of short tales and sketches, in prose and verse, by writers of note, accompanied by some good illustrations. "Esther's Glove," by R. E. Francillon, and "Giovanni Calvotti," by D. Christie Murray, form the staple attractions of the Gentleman's Annual. The extra part of the Quiver is named "Swift Arrows," and possesses many features of interest. Mrs. Oliphant writes the tale, "The Fugitives," for "Good Cheer," as the Christmas number of Good Words is named. "Sweet Nelly, my Heart's Delight," by Walter Besant and James Rice, is the tale in the double number of All the Year Round, and the Once a Week Annual is composed of a tale of the sea by Mr. Manville Fenn. In comic literature we have Hood's Annual and Judy's Annual, both excellent in their special way. Of the Misletoe Bough, edited by Miss Braddon, and the Stage Door, edited by Clement W. Scott, favourable mention has already been made in these columns. While writing these brief notices another annual comes to hand—Grant and Co.'s Christmas Number, from the pen of R. E. Francillon, with coloured illustrations. Many of these numbers are deformed by advertisements being obtruded into the middle of the letterpress; but in this annual the objectionable system is carried still further, the backs of all the illustrations having advertisements upon them.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Mozart's "Il Flauto Magico" ("Die Zauberflöte") was given last week, for the first time this season, with most features of the cast as formerly, including the brilliant bravura singing of Mdlle. Ilma di Murska as the Queen of Night, and the artistic performance of Madame Marie Roze as Pamina. Signor Frapolli was again the Tamino; a novelty having been the Papageno of that clever artist Signor Pantaleoni, to whom, however, the music seemed to be new. Mr. Conly's genuine bass voice told well in Sarastro's solos, "Possente Numi" and "Qui sdegno;" and Madame Sinico and Mr. Thomas were efficient representatives respectively of the small parts of Papagena and Monostatos.

On Thursday week "Carmen" was repeated, with Madame Marie Roze's second assumption of the title-character, in which that lady again produced a favourable impression, notwithstanding the special identification of Mdlle. Minnie Hauk with the part with which she was originally identified here, and in her admirable representation of which she has scarcely yet been equalled by other occasional substitutes. Mdlle. Lido again proved her value by her effective singing as Michaela, as did Mr. Carleton by his clever performance, vocal and dramatic, as Escamillo, whose characteristic song "Toreador, attento," gained the usual encore. Signor Tecchi was, as before, the Don José, and the cast was otherwise mostly as hitherto

The extra autumn series of performances closed on Saturday evening, when "Lohengrin" was given for the first time this season, with the novelty of Madame Pappenheim's assumption of the character of Elsa, in which that meritorious artist gained a fresh success, her performance having been of exceptional merit, alike in the ideal as in the declamatory portions of the music. Madame Sinico was a very efficient representative of Ortruda; and Signor Fancelli—recovered from his recent indisposition—sang finely as Lohengrin. Signor Pantaleoni gave a highly dramatic rendering of the part of Telramondo; and the cast included Mr. Conly as the King, and Mr. Pyatt as the Herald.

The short winter series of performances, supplemental to the extra season, began on Monday with "Faust," repetitions of other operas having been promised for the following evenings and this (Saturday) morning.

The second "London Ballad Concert" of the new season took place at St. James's Hall last week, when Mr. Sims Reeves made ample amends for his unavoidable absence from the previous concert by his admirable singing of the ballads of "Black-Eyed Susan" and "The Bay of Biscay," the enthusiastic encore of the latter having been replied to by singing "The Jolly Young Waterman." Several new songs were given with great success—Blumenthal's "The Wedding Day," by Madame Antoinette Sterling; Behrend's "Joan of Arc," by Miss Annie Marriott; Madame Sainton-Dolby's "I can wait," by Miss Mary Davies; Neale's vocal minuet, "The Old Oak Hall," by Miss Orridge; Balfe's "The Spanish Serenade," by Mr. E. Lloyd; Tovey's "Old Timbertoes," by Mr. Santley; and Adams's "The Midshipmite," by Mr. Maybrick—all having been encored. Balfe's "Serenade" is, we believe, from an opera which he began but never finished. The piece referred to has only just been made known, and will doubtless soon become popular. The vocalists named also sang various well-known songs and ballads, several of which were encored. There was also some effective part-singing by the gentlemen of the London Vocal Union, and some brilliant pianoforte-playing by Madame Arabella Goddard. Messrs. S. Naylor and H. Parker were again the conductors.

The Sacred Harmonic Society opened its forty-eighth season yesterday (Friday) evening at Exeter Hall, this being the last series of performances to be given there by the society, in consequence of the intended appropriation of the hall to other purposes. The oratorio was Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," and the principal singers announced were Madame Sherrington, Misses Wigan and Elton, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. M. Smith, and Mr. Bridson—Sir Michael Costa being the conductor, as for many years past. Of the performance we must speak next week.

On the same evening the South London Choral Association was to give a concert at St. James's Hall.

Spohr's "Last Judgment" was performed, as part of a special service, at St. Paul's Cathedral, on Tuesday evening, in celebration of the first day of Advent.

Last Saturday's concert at the Crystal Palace included a performance of Haydn's bright symphony entitled "La Chasse," given for the first time here, as was Mr. W. Shakspeare's pianoforte concerto in C major, in which Miss Kuhe made her first appearance here, and was very favourably received. The young lady is a daughter of the well-known pianist and professor at Brighton, at whose festival there last year the same concerto was played by Miss Kuhe. The other items of Saturday's concert call for no special remark. The vocalists were Madame Sherrington and Mr. Shakspeare—the lady having replaced Miss Lillian Bailey, in consequence of the latter's indisposition.

This week's Monday Popular Concert opened with Haydn's bright and melodious quartet in E major, from op. 17, which was finely played (for the first time here) by the usual party. Mr. Charles Hallé was again the pianist, his solo piece having been Beethoven's sonata in F sharp major. Another solo performance was that of Signor Piatti in a sonata for violoncello by Locatelli. Mr. Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda gave a fine interpretation of Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata for pianoforte and violin; and Herr Henschel contributed vocal pieces.

HERR GEORG HENSCHEL'S CONCERT.

A concert was given at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday evening, which had a double interest, first in a musical sense, and next on account of its purpose, this being to aid the funds of that excellent institution—the Victoria Hospital for Children at Chelsea. The concert opened with Brahms's first symphony (in C minor), which was finely played by a full orchestra, conducted by Herr Henschel. This gentleman and Mr. F. King then sang a clever setting, as a duet, by the former, of Byron's lines, "Oh, weep for those that wept by Babel's stream."

The programme included the first performance here of two much more important works—one composed by Herr Henschel, the other by Herr Brahms. Herr Henschel's setting of the 130th Psalm, "Out of Darkness," is for solo voices, five-voice chorus, and orchestra, each of its five movements containing some effective writing, both choral and solo; the music of the latter kind consisting of a melodious trio for soprano, tenor, and bass, and a bass solo with chorus.

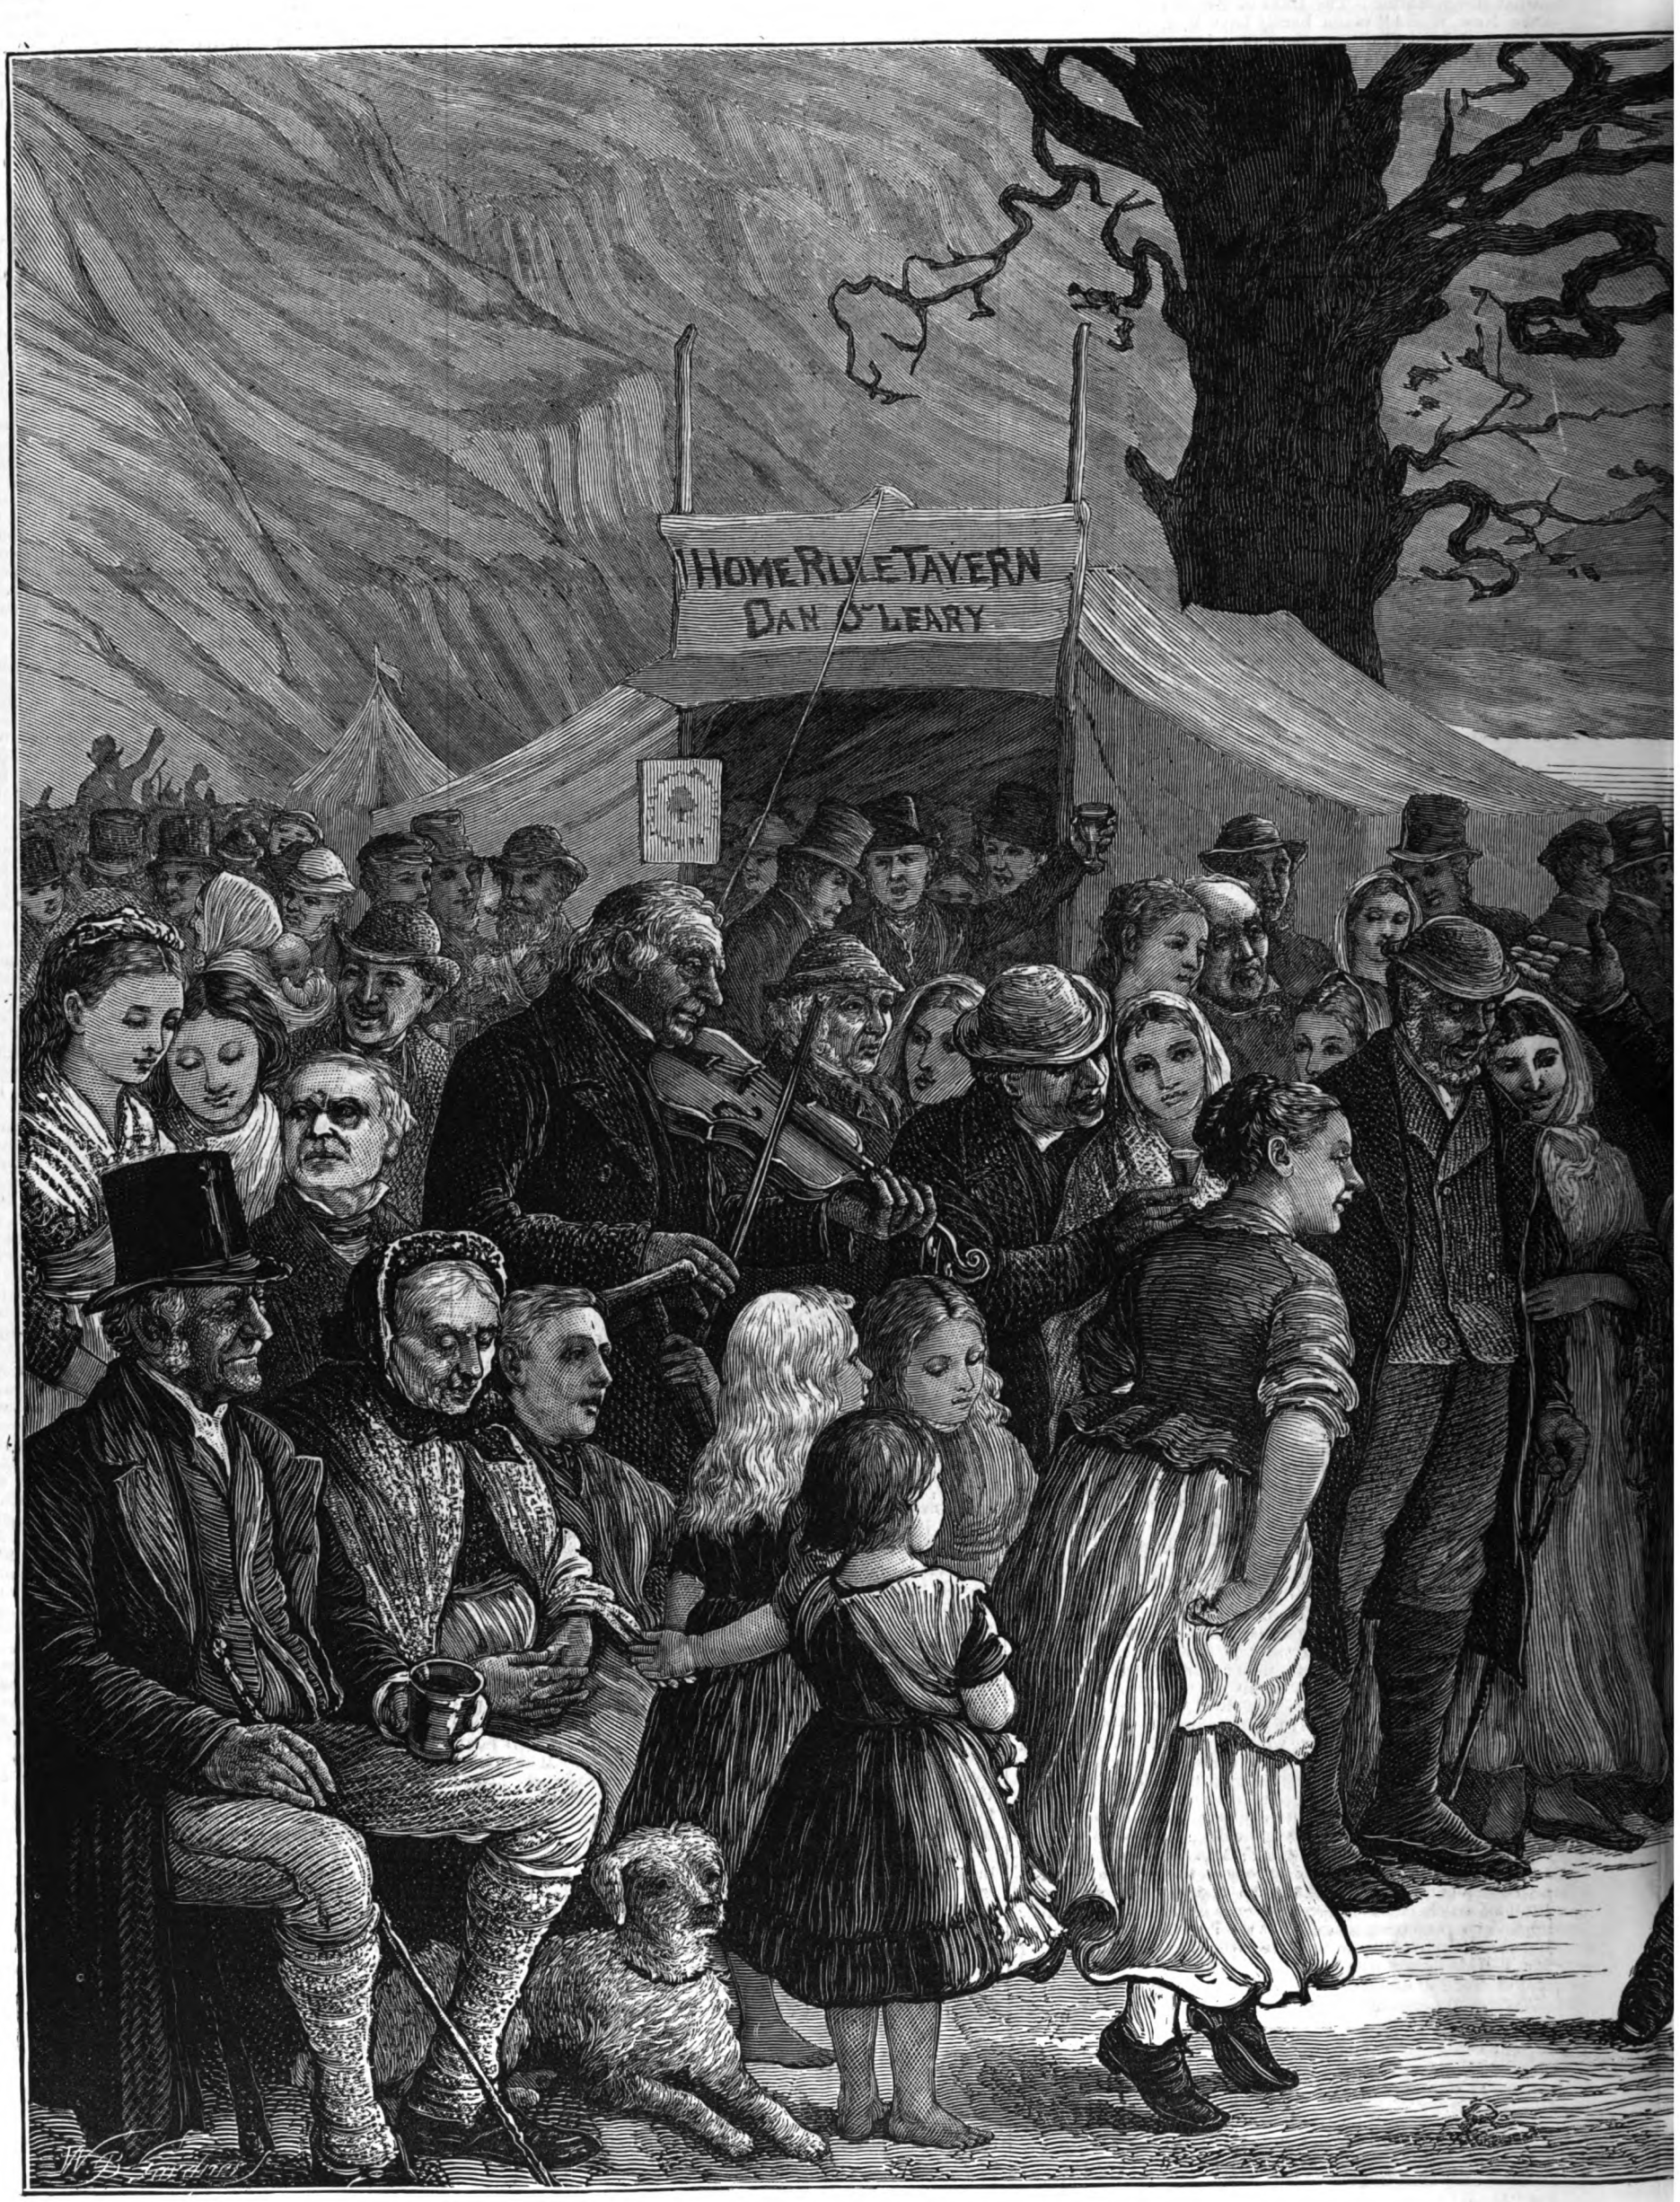
Brahms's "Triumphlied" is for a double choir and orchestra, and includes some very skilful composition, especially in the combined and contrasted choral and orchestral effects. The Hymn consists of three portions, each containing some highly impressive music, including the occasional use of the forms of fugue and canon. The solos in Herr Henschel's Psalm were sung by himself, Miss Lillian Bailey and Mr. F. Boyle; the few occasional baritone solos in Brahms's Hymn, by Mr. F. King. Mr. Barnby conducted the Psalm, and Herr Henschel the Hymn. Both works were much applauded by a large audience. Princess Louise, the Duke of Edinburgh, and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught were present.

THEATRES.

The genial humour of Mr. F. C. Burnand is in great demand at the present moment. His vivacious adaptation of a French comedy under the title of "Betsy," nightly elicits laughter at the Criterion. On Monday, an extravaganza, in the authorship of which Mr. Burnand shared, was produced at the Royalty, and shall presently be noticed. At the Gaiety, the "Robbing Roy" burlesque of Mr. Burnand maintains its place as the chief attraction. Few plays are so obviously capable of being burlesqued as "Rob Roy;" and few authors could extract more fun or good-humoured satire out of the romantic drama than Mr. Burnand has done in "Robbing Roy." The Gaiety company, moreover, enact the piece in the true spirit of burlesque. Result—infectious mirth. The transformation of Rob Roy himself into a hen-pecked Macgregor affords Mr. Edward Terry an opportunity of adding to his gallery of grotesque creations; and the clarion tones of Miss Edith Bruce as Helen Macgregor give an appropriate vigour to the representation of the Highland virago, whose personal charms, however, prove attractive foils to the pretty amazon of "Robbing Roy." Admirably conceived and excellently executed, the Rashleigh of Mr. W. Elton is a finished caricature of the ancient "heavy villain;" and the noisy obtrusiveness of the Dougal creature could not well be parodied better than it is by Mr. E. W. Royce, whose duel with Rashleigh is inimitably funny. Sparkling, light, and merry, Miss E. Farren acts as sprightly and dances as featly as ever in the rôle of Francis Osbaldistone. This high-spirited actress offers to Miss Lizzie Coote (Diana Vernon) a good example, which she would do well to profit by, of how to trip gaily through a play without making herself jerkily and obtrusively prominent. Some irony is shown in casting little Miss Connie Gilchrist as Major Galbraith; but this precocious young lady goes through the ordeal with sufficient equanimity. The usual Gaiety completeness is to be observed in the beauty of the scenery, the comeliness of the chorus, and the vivacity of the Scottish music arranged by Herr Meyer Lutz for "Robbing Roy"—an afternoon performance of which takes place to-day. When the chief aim of a manager is to group on the stage a number of ladies, more or less tastefully clad, it might be expected that the closest attention would be paid to the stage management. This necessary supervision was either not forthcoming or was exercised fruitlessly on the second night of "Balloonacy," the new extravaganza, by Mr. Burnand and Mr. P. Stephens. Presumably, the deservedly successful comedy of Mr. George Sims, "Crutch and Toothpick" (which has run over two hundred nights), had put the audience in good humour, or "Balloonacy" might have fared ill. What little plot "Balloonacy" has is not new. One Mr. Smith the impecunious owner of a pleasure-garden, takes advantage of the presence of a captive balloon in his grounds to seek refuge from pursuing bailiffs in its car. The ropes are cut; and Smith, with his wife and the aeronaut, is wafted to the land of King Fogle. There Smith is betrothed to the Princess and chosen Prime Minister, but is reduced to his former station ere the curtain descends on an extravaganza which Mr. Burnand has done his best to lighten with topical songs, and which Mesdames Amalia, Edith Blande, and Marie Williams, and Messrs. Philip Day, Charles Groves, and H. Saker zealously strive to make successful. Costumier and musical conductor (Mr. Solomons) likewise worthily seconded the efforts of the company.

Mr. J. R. Gibson, whose Sir Pertinax Macsycophant has already commended him to the afternoon public, gave another matinée at the Adelphi on Saturday last, when the first four acts of "The Merchant of Venice" were performed, and the débutant made his first appearance as Shylock on the London stage. His selection of these two characters may indicate the tendency of his talent and the choice of characters which he is likely to make. One would expect from this direction that he aims at distinction in the Kean school of acting, and he possesses much that enables him to sustain the line of characters, at the head of which stands Richard III. Mr. Gibson is, no doubt, a thoroughly good and honest actor, who sufficiently studies his parts, and well understands what he has to do in each. He acts with great care and precision, and shows signs of genius occasionally. The fire is in him, but he as yet lacks the confidence needful to sustain its continuous force. He was supported by a tolerably good company on the whole, but they were far from equal, and one or two provoked disapprobation. This fault may be amended. Miss Louise Moodie played Portia, and played it well. Mr. J. G. Taylor displayed much humour in Launcelot Gobbo, and was warmly applauded. There is hope for Mr. Gibson when he shall have gone through a little more practice, and gained the facility which is required in an artistic rendering of Shaksperean characters.

The drama of "East Lynne" was produced in the evening, and again displayed the ability of Miss Bella Pateman, in the dual part of Lady Isabel and Madame Vine. Miss Emily Duncan showed considerable talent as Barbara Hare. Archibald Carlyle was efficiently acted by Mr. E. H. Brooke, and Mr. James Fernandez was in great force as Sir Francis Levison. The performance may be pronounced highly successful.



A new Spanish ballet was produced on Monday at the Alhambra, in which Senorita Fuensanta, a celebrated Spanish dancer, appeared. The ballet is called "The Torrera," or Spanish Bull Fight. The action is stirring, and capitally interpreted.

The "Roscius Dramatic Club" (under the management of Mr. Edwin F. Marshall) will give its next performance at the Ladbroke Hall, Notting-hill, next Monday, Dec. 8, when the programme will comprise the comedy of "Squabbles; or, My Wife's Daughter," and the farce of "Cool as a Cucumber."

Perhaps one of the most interesting of the theatrical tea meetings was held on Monday afternoon in Exeter (Lower) Hall. There was a large attendance of ladies of the ballet, chorus ladies, and dressers. After an excellent tea several hymns were sung, and addresses were given by Mrs. E. Trotter and another lady, and by Mr. W. Forbes, the originator and conductor of these meetings. Lady Lycett, the Hon. Miss Kinnaird, and other ladies showed their sympathy with this work by being present.

Mr. E. D. Gray, M.P., was on Monday unanimously elected Lord Mayor of Dublin for 1880.

CHARLES DICKENS'S LETTERS.

Suppose a posthumous work of fiction by the late Charles Dickens could now be presented to the hundred thousand readers who would be glad to receive it, having missed his genius sadly since the story of "Edwin Drood" was left untold in June, 1870, when the pen dropped from the dying author's hand! We know what a shout of delight would be raised at such a publication. But it is not quite the same to receive (from Messrs. Chapman and Hall) two volumes of The Letters of Charles Dickens, edited by his sister-in-law and one of his daughters. These letters, now printed for general information, come long after his completed biography by the late Mr. John Forster. The personal and domestic life of the great imaginative artist and humorist, with all his amiable and estimable qualities, has, we confess, not afforded a study that yields unmixed and unlimited satisfaction. His perpetual restlessness, his morbid love of self-display and appetite for flattery, and the soreness as well as fussiness with which he nursed his claims to social admiration, left a rather uncomfortable impression. Such was the feeling of many who read the biography, and who had never come within the charmed circle of his intimate conversation Here was an eminent man, the cleverest and pleasantest entertaining man of his age, at the head of that profession, the literary painters of modern society, or "novelists," which should teach all moral grace and practical wisdom in the conduct of ordinary life. Was he the happiest of men in his own life at home? If he seemed to have lost the capability of enjoying wholesome and natural repose of heart from an excessive craving for applause, one might be inclined to suspect a latent reaction from his own teaching. His writings were a sort of Gospel to many young persons thirty years ago. Their preaching of Mark Tapleyism, or "the credit of being jolly," could not be ignored or evaded, under penalty of seeming less wise than otherwise. That phase of social temper has somewhat changed. But these collected letters to his family and personal friends contain, with much that scarcely appears worth printing, a great deal, especially in the letters to Mr Macready, of sincere and hearty expression of his real convictions and aspirations. Some additional details of his experiences during the two visits to America, in 1842 and 1867, and the residence in Italy, in 1844, serve also to vary the progress of literary labours and successes. The series of letters begins almost with the writing of the "Pickwick Papers," in 1835, soon after which time the author married, while still living in Furnival's Inn. There are sixteen letters to his wife, the latest being dated May 5, 1856; and the frequent remembrances of all his children, both in their infancy and when growing up to be men and women, are most endearing. Miss Hogarth, who latterly superintended the household of her brother-in-law, contributes about eighty of his letters addressed to herself, which are to be found mostly in the second volume. A considerable number, during the same period, from August, 1858, to the end of his life, were addressed to his eldest unmarried daughter. The other regular or frequent correspondents seem to have been Mr. Wilkie Collins, Mr. Wills (then sub-editor of Household Words), Miss Boyle, the Hon Mrs. Watson, Mr. Forster, Mr. Charles Kent, Mr. Clarkson Stanfield, and M. de Cerjat. There are epistles also, of earlier date, to Jerrold, Landor, Mrs. Gaskell, and Mark Lemon, which have a slight degree of literary interest; but very many of the letters here printed are mere replies to invitations or proposals concerning social affairs of the day. Among those of the former class is one that shows Lord Lytton giving Dickens some counsel regarding the plot of his "Tale of Two Cities." It was the habit of Dickens, we perceive, very frankly to take some of his intimate friends into his confidence with respect to the intended construction of a story already in progress. He was not less ready to give the benefit of his own remarks to such contemporary writers as Mr. Wilkie Collins and Mrs. Gaskell, upon their own productions of that kind. His candour in answering the remonstrances of strangers who wrote in a proper tone and manner to find fault with some feature of his works is exemplified in several instances. A Jewish lady complained of his having made Fagin the only type of Jewish character; and he not only gave her a reasonable explanation, but created the benevolent Riah, in "Bleak House," for a specimen of the good and virtuous Jew. He was very much hurt, as well as surprised, by the notion of one or two such critical correspondents that he could ever have meant to throw a slight on the profession of the Christian faith. All but the last private letter he wrote, a few days before his unexpected death, was in answer to this imputation, and was an earnest expression of his reverence for "the life and lessons of our Saviour." He had, indeed, long before prepared for the instruction of his younger children a summary of the historical and religious truths of the New Testament. In a farewell letter to his son Edward, who was going out to Australia, and likewise in one to his son Henry, about to enter on a student's life at Cambridge, he solemnly impressed on them "the study of that Book as the one unfailing guide of life, and the habit of saying a Christian prayer every night and morning." But he sometimes broke out in vehement indignation against the arrogant spirit of ecclesiastical partisanship and theological dogmatism in some of the clergy and other professional ministers of religion. He also considered that "a fatal mistake" was commonly made in their mode of using the Bible. "Half the misery and hypocrisy of the Christian world," he says, "arises from a stubborn determination to refuse the New Testament as a sufficient guide in itself, and to force the Old Testament into alliance with it, whereof comes all manner of camel-swallowing and gnat-straining. But so to resent this miserable error as by any implication to depreciate the Divine goodness and beauty of the New Testament is to commit even a worse folly." Dickens was never more in earnest than in expressing these convictions. His political sentiments, on the other hand, were sometimes coloured with splenetic disgust and impatience of the tardy movement of national opinion. Towards the American Republic he was decidedly unjust; and there was gross inconsistency, to say the least, in his professions of grateful affection for its people, when he privately regretted that England and France did not intervene to break up the Union in the Civil War between North and South. This will be found in a letter to M. de Cerjat, at page 240, vol ii., accompanied by another ebullition of harsh and reckless temper, against the "meeting of jawbones of asses at Manchester, to censure the Jamaica Governor for his manner of putting down the insurrection." It always seemed that the purely emotional temperament of Charles Dickens, with his deficiency of logical and critical discernment, prevented him from rightly understanding questions of law and civil government. He was, notwithstanding, too prone to dogmatise and even to rave furiously upon subjects of that nature. There is more pleasure in reading the delightful anecdotes of his children, and in recognising his parental tenderness and judicious carefulness for their welfare. A good little youngest boy, playfully nicknamed "the Plornish-ghenter," is the subject of many comical reports and messages from the loving father. The most homelike and comfortable incidents, however, in the glimpses we here get of Dickens's family life are those belonging to his country residence at Gad's Hill, near Rochester, from 1857, when he removed there out of town. At Tavistock House, Tavistock-square, his household seems to have been kept in a whirl of private theatricals and other laborious entertainments, which could not have been favourable to health and peace of mind. Yet the extraordinary aptitude of Dickens for directing theatrical performances, as well as for acting on the stage, might have made him the greatest of managers, and have raised the British drama to more than its old place of power and glory. There was a period of his life apparently when his disposition, had circumstances been favourable, and with any offer of substantial remuneration, would perhaps have led him to change the work of novelist for that of dramatist and superintendent, and living example of dramatic art. This impulse to come forward in actual impersonation of his imaginative ideas found vent in the successful public readings which obliged him to be continually making rapid journeys all over the country. It was probably the physical exhaustion and disturbance of vital and cerebral functions occasioned by that mode of living, combined with the stress of literary work and other drains of nervous force, that prematurely cut short his mortal career. The continuance of his uniform literary industry, or the management of business, in a settled residence, with quiet and regular hours, could not have had such a fatal effect at a much more advanced age. He was, in more than one sense, the victim of that besoin de paraître, which is hard to resist in the case of a man of rare talents and of great combative energy, who has won for himself immense popular renown, with desirable pecuniary rewards consequent upon it, and who knows that more fame and money can be earned by continuance in his conspicuous public efforts. The success of Charles Dickens was amply deserved, as well by his vast diligence and conscientious spirit of artistic workmanship as by his matchless powers of humorous portraiture and description. But in his case, as in others we have known, it was proved that "nothing succeeds like success;" and it was, unhappily, an instance, also, of the success which too often kills. We regret to acknowledge the existence of any personal failing in one to whom so much of the world's gratitude is due for an immense amount of innocent pleasure.

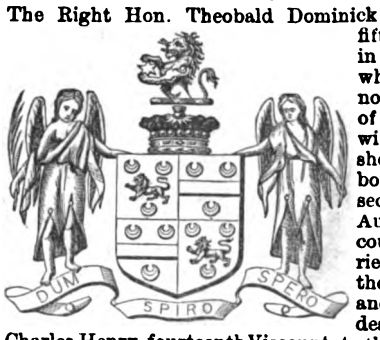
RUSTIC DANCE IN IRELAND.

There have been times—but it is not so now, we are thankful to believe—when the distressed condition of the Irish peasantry, compared with those of English agricultural districts, would have made it a cruel mockery to place before our readers, along with the scene of a Government prosecution for sedition at Sligo, this one of a cheerful popular festivity in another part of Ireland. That the present alarming discontent is wanton and groundless, we are by no means prepared to admit, however mad and wicked may be the attempt of political demagogues to make it the occasion for malignant attacks upon the landed proprietors, or silly hatred of the connection with Great Britain, which alone can supply the capital and agency for developing Irish industrial wealth. But the real causes of the embarrassed state of small farmers in Ireland, as a class, are to be found in bad social and economic arrangements, and especially, we are told, in their habitual bondage to usurious money-lenders, whose oppression is far more grievous than that of the landlords with their ordinary rent. It is not at all certain that this evil would be diminished by making the peasant farmer, such as he is, freehold owner of the soil. In the meantime, it is the duty of any Government—and would equally remain so with Home Rule, or with a total separation of that country from England—to protect the rights of property, alike for the rich and the poor. The Irish peasant class, happily, are now very far removed from a state of actual destitution, and in many districts are rather better off than many English agricultural labourers. It is several years, indeed, since one of our Special Artists, himself a thorough Irishman, attending a "pattern fair," or local Saint's-day festival, at a place celebrated for the mystic virtues of its "Holy Well," there made his lively Sketch of a party of rustic people enjoying themselves in the social dance. We think it will give pleasure to many of our readers, and will serve to remind them of that brighter side of Irish humble life, which was described in touching words by the poet of "The Deserted Village." Too many instances have been recorded of a sad change coming over the fortunes of the simple rural community, and of enforced wholesale expatriation, the result of hopeless poverty, leaving the village indeed a deserted one. But let us all think how to "make the best of it," and hope for a more propitious season.

CATTLE SHOWS.

The thirty-first exhibition of cattle, sheep, &c., at Birmingham was opened for the judging last Saturday. The total entries this year, including roots, corn, implements, poultry, and pigeons, are 3742, or just one in excess of last year, when the number was 3741. In the cattle there is an increase on the previous show of twenty-seven animals, or 152 against 125, amongst the exhibitors being the Queen and the Prince of Wales. The best class shown is undoubtedly, in the opinion of the judges, the shorthorn heifers; and, though there are thirteen animals, each has deservedly received a commendation card. The Herefords and cross-breds are also of remarkable excellence, whilst the quality of both cattle and sheep is above the average. The prizes offered this year by the Agricultural Exhibition Society amount to £2700, of which £1200 is assigned to cattle, £300 to sheep, and £130 to pigs, the rest being divided among the successful exhibitors of poultry, pigeons, roots, &c. The challenge cup, given by Messrs. Elkington for the best animal in the cattle classes, to be won two years successively or any three years, has fallen to Mr. Henry D. Adamson, Balquharn, Vale of Alford, Aberdeen, for a splendid roan shorthorn steer, which, as champion of its class, "shorthorn steers, not exceeding two and a half years old," also takes the extra prize of £100. The special prize of £100 for the best Hereford is won by Mr. Edwards, of Leominster, with "Leonora," an animal of almost perfect symmetry, which also takes first honours in the class of Hereford cows. The Queen exhibits in three of the classes for cattle, and gains the second prize for Hereford heifers. Royalty has, however, not been as successful as usual at the present show, the prize mentioned being the only one accorded, although the Prince of Wales exhibits some very excellent cattle and sheep, especially the latter, which are, however, fairly beaten by Lord Walsingham. Mr. T. Dyer, of Cornwall, takes the extra prize of fifty guineas, half of which is contributed by the hotel and inn keepers of Birmingham for the best Devon, which is the champion in the class of "Devon oxen or steers exceeding three and not exceeding four and a half years old." The special prize of £50 for the best Scot goes to Mr. W. M'Combie, Aberdeen; the special prize of the same amount for the best cross-bred to Mrs. M'William, Aberdeen; and the president's (Earl Howe's) silver cup or other suitable piece of plate, value £25, for the best animal in the cattle classes of any breed or age, bred and fed by the exhibitor, to Mr. James Merson, also of Aberdeen.

The general arrangement for the forthcoming Smithfield Club Cattle Show, which opens at the Agricultural Hall on Monday next were completed on Tuesday, and accommodation has been provided for fifty head of cattle more than last year. There is also a considerable augmentation in the entries in the sheep and pig classes. This increase in the cattle is owing to the relaxation by the Smithfield Club of a rule which prohibited the exhibition of any animal at the metropolitan show which had been exhibited at any provincial show within a period of one month previously; this entirely excluded the exhibition of any of the prize stock of the Birmingham and other shows, which will now have an opportunity of competing at the Smithfield Club Show. The special regulations for 1879 make it necessary that the exhibitor of every animal shall send with it a certificate that it has not for fourteen days previously to leaving home for the Smithfield Club Show been in contact with any animal suffering from contagious or infectious diseases, and that all animals shall undergo veterinary examination previous to entering the doors of the Agricultural Hall. The prize-list of this year has been increased to upwards of £3000 in the aggregate; and it is possible for the same steer or ox to win prizes of the value of £220, and the same heifer or cow £215; for one pen of sheep to win £90, and one pen of pigs £25. The increase in the demands for space for implements is so great that difficulty has been found in affording accommodation.



OBITUARY.

THE EARL OF DURHAM.

The Right Hon. George Frederick D'Arcy, second Earl of Durham, Viscount Lambton and Baron Durham, Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Durham, and Lieutenant-Colonel of the Northumberland Rifle Volunteers, died at his residence in Hill-street, Berkeley-square, on the 28th ult. His Lordship was born Sept. 5, 1828, the second son of John George, first Earl of Durham, G.C.B., at one time Ambassador at St. Petersburg, Lord Privy Seal from 1830 to 1833, and eventually Governor-General of British North America, by Lady Louisa Elizabeth, his wife, eldest daughter of Charles, Earl Grey, Prime Minister, and represented the very ancient and distinguished family of Lambton of Lambton. His elder brother, Charles William (the "Master Lambton" of Sir Thomas Lawrence's famous picture), having died in 1831, the nobleman whose death we record succeeded to the family honours at the death of his father, July 28, 1840. He married, May 23, 1854, Lady Beatrix Frances Hamilton, second daughter of the Duke of Abercorn, K.G., and by her (who died Jan. 21, 1871) leaves a large family, of which the eldest, John George, Viscount Lambton, born June 19, 1855, succeeds as third Earl of Durham. The eldest daughter, Beatrix Louisa, was married, Aug. 29, 1877, to the Hon. Sidney Herbert, brother of the Earl of Pembroke.

VISCOUNT DILLON.

The Right Hon. Theobald Dominick Geoffrey Lee-Dillon, fifteenth Viscount Dillon, in the Peerage of Ireland, whose death is just announced from the effects of an accident he met with at Ditchley Park a short time since, was born April 5, 1811, the second son of Henry Augustus, thirteenth Viscount Dillon, by Henrietta, his wife, sister of the first Lord Oranmore, and succeeded at the death of his brother, Charles Henry, fourteenth Viscount, to the ancient title of Dillon of Costello-Gallen, which was conferred in 1621 on Sir Theobald Dillon, a Commander in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and subsequently Lord President of Munster. Lord Dillon was formerly a Lieutenant in the 60th Rifles, and was a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant for the county of Mayo. He married in 1856 Sarah Augusta, daughter of the late Alexander Hanna, Esq., but had no issue, and the title devolves, consequently, on his brother, the Hon. Arthur Edmund Denis Lee-Dillon, now sixteenth Viscount Dillon.

SIR ARCHIBALD BURT.

Sir Archibald Paull Burt, Chief Justice of Western Australia, died at Perth, in that colony, on the 21st ult., aged sixty-nine. He was second son of George Henry Burt, Speaker of the House of Assembly, St. Kitt's, by Eliza M'Fair, his wife, and was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1845. In 1849 he was appointed Attorney-General for the Island of St. Christopher, and held that office until 1860, when he was made Civil Commissioner and Chairman of Quarter Sessions in Western Australia. He had been some time Speaker of the House of Assembly and a member of the Administrative Committee of St. Kitt's. On leaving that island for Australia, he received a public grant, acknowledgments from all classes of the colony, and the presentation of a valuable piece of plate. In 1861 he was constituted Chief Justice of Western Australia, and in 1873 received the honour of knighthood. He married, in 1836, Louisa, daughter of John Bryan, M.D., of St. Kitts.

MR. ROEBUCK, M.P.

The Right Hon. John Arthur Roebuck, M.P. for Sheffield, and a Privy Councillor, Q.C., and a Bencher of the Inner Temple, died on the 30th ult. He was born Dec. 28, 1802, the son of E. Roebuck, Esq., of Madras, by Zipporah, his wife, daughter of Richard Tickell, Esq., and was grandson of Dr. John Roebuck, of Sheffield. This well-known politician, originally a strong Liberal, but latterly a supporter of the present Government, was called to the Bar in 1831, went the Northern Circuit, and was made Q.C. in 1843. In 1834 he had been Agent in England for the House of Assembly of Lower Canada. He represented Bath from 1832 to 1837, and from 1841 to 1847, and sat for Sheffield from 1849 to 1868, and from 1874 to the period of his death. He was author of "History of the Whig Ministry of 1830," "The Colonies of England," the "Roebuck Pamphlets," and of contributions to the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews. He married, 1834, Henrietta, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Falconer, M.A., of Bath, at one time Bampton Lecturer at the University of Oxford.

The deaths have also been announced of—

Lydia, Lady Grant, widow of Admiral Sir Richard Grant (who was knighted by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1820), on the 21st ult., at Adelaide-crescent, Brighton, in her ninetieth year. Lady Grant was previously married to James Lambert, Esq., of Fowlers, Hawkhurst, Kent.

Mr. John Allan Brown, F.R.S., a well-known meteorologist, on the 22nd ult., aged sixty-three.

Alfred Gilbey, Esq., J.P., at his residence, Wooburn House, Bucks, on the 28th ult., after a short illness, aged forty-six.

The Rev. Arthur Turner, formerly Rector of Ladbroke, Warwickshire, on the 25th ult., at The Oaks, Ryde, Isle of Wight, aged seventy-seven.

James Penrose Ingham, Esq., on the 28th ult. He married, in December, 1867, Lady Caroline Marguerite Stanhope, eldest daughter of the Earl and Countess of Harrington.

Thomas Kingdon Kingdon, Esq., Q.C., Bencher of the Inner Temple and Recorder of Bristol, on the 2nd inst., at the age of sixty-seven. Mr. Kingdon was called to the Bar in Hilary Term, 1848.

Elizabeth Juliana, Lady Sabine, wife of General Sir Edward Sabine, K.C.B., and daughter of the late William Leeves, Esq., of Tortington, Sussex, on the 28th ult., at Ashley-place, Westminster, aged seventy-two.

James O'Dowd, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Assistant Solicitor of Customs, on the 24th ult., in his seventy-eighth year. He belonged to a County Mayo family. Called to the Irish Bar, he practised for several years in Ireland, and was author of some legal works.

Miss Maria Frances Wyatt-Edgell, of 40, Grosvenor-street, daughter of the late Edgell Wyatt-Edgell, Esq., of Milton Place, Surrey, at Cowley House, near Exeter. She was sister of the Rev. Edgell Wyatt-Edgell, who married Henrietta, Lady Braye.

Lieutenant-General Arthur Cyril Goodenough, C.B., on the 29th ult., at 2, Cleveland-row, St. James's. He served at the siege of Sebastopol, and commanded the 34th Regiment at the assault of the Redan, and received the medal with clasp, the Turkish medal, and the orders of the Legion of Honour and Medjidie.

Sir Isaac Morley, the oldest member of the Doncaster Town Council, and a member of the old Corporation previous to the passing of the Municipal Act, at Beechfield, Doncaster, on the 1st inst., at the age of seventy-eight. Sir Isaac was knighted in 1841, when Mayor, on the occasion of the birth of the Prince of Wales. He was a director of the Midland Railway Company.

John Cargill Rutherford-Drummond, Esq., late Lieutenant 25th Regiment (the King's Own Borderers), who died in Peshawur, suddenly, on Nov. 4, in the twenty-first year of his age, was eldest son of Captain J. Rutherford-Drummond, of Strageath and Balquhandy, Perthshire, N.B., and late H.M. 10th Regiment of Hussars. He went through the last campaign in Afghanistan, for which service he obtained the medal.

Miss Mary Stanley, eldest sister of the Dean of Westminster, and daughter of Edward Stanley, D.D., late Bishop of Norwich, on the 26th ult., at 6, Grosvenor-crescent, in her sixty-fifth year. Miss Stanley took a leading part in many philanthropic movements. During the Crimean War she was in charge of a detachment of nurses and ladies, similar to that conducted by Miss Nightingale. In 1856 she joined the Church of Rome.

Michael Thunder, Esq., of Lagore, in the county of Meath, J.P. and D.L., High Sheriff 1850, on the 20th ult., at Stratford, Rathgar, Dublin, aged seventy-seven. He was the eldest son of Patrick Thunder, Esq., of Lahore, by Elizabeth, his wife, eldest daughter of John Taaffe, Esq., of Smarmore Castle, in the county of Louth. He married, Sept. 2, 1834, Charlotte Mary, daughter of Colonel Harman D'Alton, H.E.I.C., by whom he leaves a large family.

Major-General Charles Need, late of her Majesty's Local Indian Forces, and formerly 6th Bengal European Regiment, on the 22nd ult., in London, in his fifty-ninth year. He was son of the late Lieutenant-General Samuel Need, of Fountain Dale, Notts, by Annie, his wife, daughter of Captain William Grant, of Rothiemurchus, and was nephew of John Need, Esq., of Blidworth, High Sheriff of Notts in 1813. He entered the Army in 1840, served in the Indian Mutiny, and retired as Major-General in 1875.

Dr. Harry Leach, M.R.C.P., the medical officer of the Port of London, on the 26th ult., at 12, Albert Mansions, Victoria-street, aged forty-three. Dr. Leach had been in ill-health for some time, having obtained a lengthened leave of absence for a voyage to South Africa, in hopes of restoration. The labours of the Port of London Sanitary Committee and their officers, zealously directed by Dr. Leach, have been of incalculable service in warding off from the metropolis the introduction of infectious diseases by vessels arriving in the Thames.

William Paynter, Esq., of Camborne House, Richmond, Surrey, and of Belgrave-square, London, M.A., J.P. and D.L., Barrister-at-Law, on the 26th inst., at St. Leonard's-on-Sea, in his eightieth year. He was only son of Samuel Paynter, Esq., of Camborne House, J.P., who acquired estates in Middlesex and Surrey, and served as High Sheriff of the latter in 1838. Mr. Paynter, whose death we record, married, March 15, 1825, Anne Berdmore, daughter of Thomas Fenton Best, Esq., of Fenton Culvert and Hollin House, in the county of Stafford, by whom he leaves sons and daughters.

The Rev. Horatio Nelson Goldney, of Southborough, Tunbridge Wells, on the 23rd ult., at 25, Cleveland-gardens, in his seventy-fourth year. He was fifth son of Francis Bennett Goldney, Esq., of Great Marlow, Bucks, by Elizabeth, his wife, daughter of John Lovegrove, Esq., and was grandson of Samuel Goldney, of Bath, by Eleanora, his wife, sister of the millionaire, Philip Rundell, of Ludgate-hill, goldsmith. The Goldneys are a family of great antiquity at Bristol and Chippenham, for which latter town one of the descendants, Gabriel Goldney, Esq., is now M.P.

The Hon. Granville Dudley Ryder, of Westbrook Hay, near Hemel Hempstead, Hertfordshire, on the 1st inst., at his country residence, in the eightieth year of his age. He was the second son of Dudley, first Earl of Harrowby, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, was elected M.P. for Tiverton in the Conservative interest two years before the passing of the first Reform Act, and sat for that borough down to December, 1832. From 1841 until 1847 he represented Hertfordshire, but retired at the dissolution, in that year. He served when young for some years in the Royal Navy, from which he retired with the rank of commander.

At the request of the solicitors practising in the Sheffield County Court, the Judge has issued an order for solicitors to wear robes in court, to distinguish them from accountants.

The English Spelling Reform Association has appointed a committee to collect, for the purpose of comparison, lists and specimens of the various schemes of spelling reform that have at different times been proposed.

The distinguished-service reward of £100 per annum, vacant by the death of Brigadier-General E. W. D. Bell, V.C., C.B., has been awarded to Colonel Charles Knight Pearson, C.B., in recognition of his services in Zululand.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

R V R (Madras).—We share your regret that the postal charge for the transmission of letters from India to London is so heavy as to prevent Indian problem makers and solvers communicating with us more frequently; but, as you surmise, we cannot undertake to bear the cost ourselves. Why not use the postal card? Your solutions of Nos. 1857, 1858, and 1859 are correct.

W H D (Liverpool).—It is not Problem No. 1866, but your attempted solution of it, that is unsound.

F I B (South Shields).—Both are wide of the mark; nevertheless, be not disheartened at one or two failures

J S (Exeter).—The privilege of capturing en passant belongs to the Pawns only.

A C (Broad-street).—We are obliged to you for the trouble you have taken. See note to the solution below.

G H (Kentish Town).—We should recommend to a student of openings Staunton's Handbook, Gossip's "Theory of the Openings," and the German "Handbuch."

Toz (Manchester).—We have to thank you for the book of diagrams. The "Chess Museum" is a very handsome and useful volume.

A B (Derby).—You may claim a Queen for every Pawn advanced to the eighth square, and may, therefore, have nine Queens on the board.

J G F (Ramsgate).—The two-move problem, if found correct, shall appear; the other is unworthy of you, and will be returned if you desire it.

Onno (Utrecht).—The words "Turf, Field, and Farm," at the head of a game of chess, imply that the game has been taken from a newspaper published under that title.

Trial (Glasgow).—The position of the Pawns is a defect in the problem referred to.

A D (Brussels).—We are very pleased to hear from you again.

R W (Cheltenham).—See the answer to Wilkie in our last issue.

H J (Manchester).—Thanks. The game shall appear.

C W R (Gravesend).—If you will send a diagram of No. 1676 we will endeavour to answer your question. It must have been published nearly five years ago.

G B (Cheadle).—Thanks; Mr. Blackburne's games are always acceptable.

T C (Poole).—In answer to the advance of the Pawn White plays 2. Kt to K B 2nd.

Problem No. 1867.—The author of this problem requests our readers to place a Black Pawn on K Kt 4th, designing to prevent the action of the Queen and Rook—at the fifth rank. We have already received a large number of proposed solutions of this problem beginning with 1. Q takes P (ch), the senders overlooking that the move of the Black King discovers check on the White King. These correspondents will please re-examine the position.

Correct Solutions of Problem No. 1864 received from Toz, H E Steegman, M D B, C J Stephen, Athboy, J M G (Sandycove), B Shindler, F J Ramos, J A S Moreno, H A Moes, Coalscuttle, and H B.

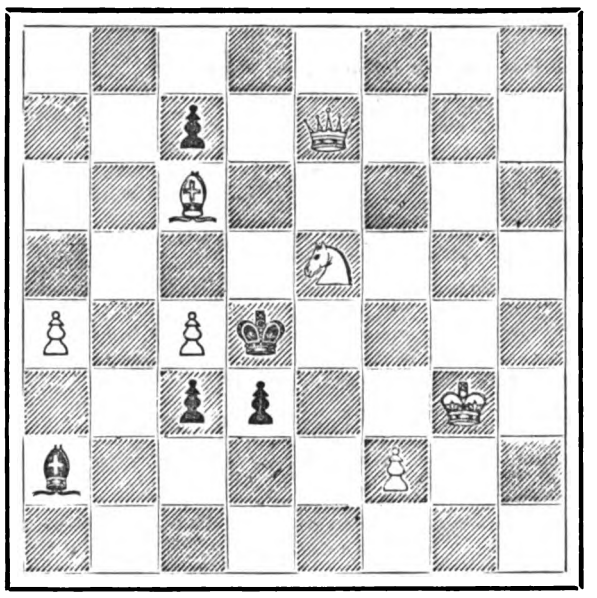
Solution of Problem No. 1864.



WHITE.	BLACK.
1. R to Kt 8th	K to B 3rd
2. R to Q R 8th	Any move
3. Queen mates.

The foregoing is the author's solution, but the problem can be solved in several other ways.

Solution of Problem No. 1865.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Kt takes K B P	Any move
2. Q, R, or either, Kt mates accordingly.

PROBLEM No. 1868.
By J. W. Abbott.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in three moves.

An interesting Game played recently at Ootacamund, Nilgiri Hills, India, between the Rev. Henry Pope and an Amateur of Madras.
(Allgaier-Kieseritzky.)

WHITE (Mr. P.)	BLACK (Mr. E. S.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. P to K B 4th	P takes P
3. Kt to K B 3rd	P to K Kt 4th
4. P to K R 4th	P to Kt 5th
5. Kt to K 5th	Kt to K B 3rd
6. B to B 4th	Q to K 2nd

This move has been condemned by the authorities as giving White an advantage in the opening. The correct line of play here is 6. P to Q 4th, followed by 7. B to Q 3rd, if White takes Pawn with Pawn.

7. P to Q 4th	P to Q 3rd
8. B takes P (ch)	K to Q sq
9. Q B takes P

The usual move here is 9. B to Kt 3rd, and the Handbuch continues the variation to the advantage of the first player.

9.	B to Q 2nd

Black gives White time to develop his game at this point. It would have been better to have taken the Kt at once, for if then 10. P takes P (ch), B to Q 2nd; and now if White captures the Kt, then follows Q takes P (ch), &c.

10. Kt to B 3rd	P takes Kt
11. B to Kt 5th	P to Q B 3rd
12. Castles	B to Kt 2nd
13. P takes P	Q takes P
14. R to B 5th	Q to K 2nd
15. P to K 5th	Q takes B
16. Kt to K 4th	P to K R 3rd

This looks very weak, but we cannot discern any good move for Black in this position.

17. R takes Kt	B takes R
18. B takes B (ch)	K to B 2nd
19. Q to Q 6th (ch)	K to Kt 3rd
20. P to K 6th

The ending is very well played by White.

20.	Q to R 4th
21. B to Q 4th (ch).
Black resigned.

The inauguration of the winter season is marked, as usual, by matches between neighbouring chess associations in London and the provinces. On the 22nd ult., ten representatives of the Liverpool Club visited Manchester, and engaged an equal number of members of the local club. After four hours' play each side had won four games and three others were drawn, but the match was eventually decided in favour of Liverpool by the judgment of an arbitrator, pronounced upon the unfinished games. The objections to this practice are so obvious, and have been so frequently stated, that it is unnecessary to repeat them; but we must express our surprise that the practical men of the North should accept the result of a match decided for or against them upon theoretical grounds.—The amateurs of Cheadle and Burslem met in the former town on the 29th ult., nine players on each side. The competitors were paired according to their reputed chess force, and in the result Burslem won by 14½ points to 11½. After play the visitors were entertained by the Cheadle Club, and a scheme for the formation of a North Staffordshire Chess Association was, on the motion of Mr. Beach, discussed and adopted. A few days before the match above recorded, Mr. Blackburne visited the Potteries, and at Burslem played ten games sans voir, winning six games, drawing three, and losing one, the winner being Mr. Peaty. The champion afterwards encountered twenty-four players simultaneously, defeating twenty and drawing with four. On the 26th ult. a drawn match was played between the clubs of Llanelly and Swansea.

In London the Ladies' College Club has been successful against the Excelsior. Miss Florence Down drew her game opposed to a strong adversary, and Miss Helen Down won one and lost one.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Jan. 25, 1876) of Mr. Archibald McLachlan, formerly of Melbourne, but late of Hatherley Hall, Cheltenham, who died on Oct. 14 last, was proved on the 17th ult. by Mrs. Elizabeth McLachlan, the widow, David Aitchison, and William Richmond Mewburn, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £45,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife £500, and such part of his household furniture and effects as she may select; and to his executors, Mr. Aitchison and Mr. Mewburn, 100 guineas each. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust for his wife for life, if she shall so long remain unmarried; and then as to £12,500 and one third of the remainder for his daughter Emily Charlotte, and the other two thirds for his daughters Mrs. Mary Ann Douglas and Mrs. Helen Upward Eden.

The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Lane, all his furniture and effects; to his executors, £100 each; and an annuity to his son Herbert during the lifetime of his widow. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust for his wife for life, and then, subject to a provision for his daughters, Mrs. Lydia Cragg and Mrs. Jessie Matilda Morris, and for his son Herbert, for his four sons, William Ralph, Henry James, Edwin Frederick, and Arthur.

The will (dated April 8, 1876) of Mrs. Jane Smith, late of No. 73, Eaton-square, and of Bella Vista, Bournemouth, who died on Oct. 1 last, was proved on the 19th ult. by Oswald Augustus Smith and Eric Carrington Smith, the nephews, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £16,000. Among numerous other legacies, the testatrix bequeaths £100 each to the National Sanatorium, Bournemouth; Firs Bank Home, Bournemouth; and the Victoria Hospital for Sick Children, Gough-square, Chelsea; and the residue of her property to her brother, General Maberley.

The will (dated Oct 14, 1872) of Mr. Thomas Entwisle, late of Wolhayes, near Christchurch, Hants, who died on Aug. 26 last, was proved on the 25th ult. by Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Entwisle, the widow, and Arthur Entwisle, the son, the surviving executors, the personal estate being sworn under £16,000.

The will (dated Dec. 7, 1877) of Mr. Clement Tudway Swanston, Q.C., who died on Sept. 22 last, was proved on the 17th ult., by the Hon. Mrs. Anne Swanston, the widow, and the Hon. Edward Romilly, the acting executors, the personal estate being sworn under £4000. The testator devises his Twickenham estates to his son Clement Romilly; his Leatherhead estate to his daughter Caroline Frances; his houses at Queen's Gate-terrace to his son William Knight Bruce; his Cosham estate to his son Edward Sherland; and his Forton and Cowes estate to his daughter Beatrice Hilda; subject in each case to the payment of a considerable annuity for life to his widow and other charges. To his wife he leaves his furniture and effects, and the residue of his property is to be divided between his children.

Some particulars of the will of Mrs. S. A. Dillwyn, late of No. 1, Raby-place, Bath, are given by the Bristol and Bath papers. She bequeaths the following legacies to the undermentioned local and other charities:—To the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Church Missionary Society, £500 each; to the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, the Religious Tract Society, the Church Pastoral Aid Society, and the Irish Church Missions, £300 each; to the Native Pastorate in India, under the Rev. Thomas Valpy French, the Anti-Slavery Society, and the Colonial and Continental Church Society, £200 each; to the Lowestoft Sailors' Bethel, the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and the Bath City Mission, £100 each; to the Bath Temperance Society, the Bath Penitentiary, the Seamen's Mission, of which W. H. Langley, Esq., of Bath, was formerly the treasurer or secretary, the St. James's (Bath) District Visiting Society, the St. James's (Bath) Schools, the poor of St. James's, Bath; the St. Mark's School, Lyncombe, Bath; the poor of St. Mark's, Lyncombe, Bath; the Lord's Day Observance Society, and the Society for Boatmen and Fishermen at Lowestoft, £50 each. ON an average about every seven days OPPOSITION VELVETEENS to the LOUIS are started and endeavoured to be introduced to public notice, under one name or another. Not only is the style of making up, and the stamping of the name on the back of every yard resorted to
IN ORDER TO DECEIVE,
but they are actually asserted to be equal or superior.
The Proprietor of the LOUIS Velveteen, whilst admitting that "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," cannot but caution the public that the genuine article is stamped Every Yard at the Back the "Louis Velveteen," in plain letters.
Avoid all imitations under whatever names they are offered.

CHLORODYNE.
DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
COUGHS, ASTHMA,
COLDS, BRONCHITIS, &c.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. Collis Browne, and the word Chlorodyne coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness and as being the same thing. Dr. J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne; that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE is a liquid medicine which assuages pain of every kind, affords a calm and refreshing sleep without headache, and invigorates the nervous system when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC for CHOLERA.
DYSENTERY,
DIARRHŒA.
Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians that he had received a despatch from her Majesty's Consul at Manilla to the effect that cholera had been raging fearfully, and that the only remedy of any service was Chlorodyne.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1864.
The General Board of Health, London, reports that it acts as a charm. One dose generally sufficient.
Dr. Gibbon, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states:—"Two doses completely cured me of diarrhœa."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE
rapidly cuts short all attacks of
EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC,
PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE
is the true palliative in NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER,
TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.
From Dr. B. J. Boulton and Co., Horncastle.
"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct sedative and anti-spasmodic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.
The immense sale of this remedy has given rise to many unscrupulous imitations.
N.B.—Every bottle of genuine Chlorodyne bears on the Government stamp the name of the inventor.
DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE.
Sold in Bottles, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d.

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT.
ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT.
ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT.

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT (Trade Mark "Anti-Fat," registered) is the celebrated REMEDY for CORPULENCY. It is purely vegetable and perfectly harmless. No particular change of diet required. Will reduce a fat person from 2 lb. to 5 lb. a week. It acts upon the food in the stomach, preventing its conversion into fat.

THOMAS FAIRBANK, M.D., of Windsor, Surgeon to her Majesty the Queen, referring to Anti-Fat in the "British Medical Journal" of June 7, 1879, says:—"I gave some of this extract (Fucus Vesiculosus) to a very corpulent lady, who in three months lost three stones in weight without any change of diet. Since then I have frequently given it for reducing weight, depending on the accumulation of adipose tissue, and have never found it fail. I may state that a patient who has been lately taking it as an anti-fat, and who always suffered very much from rheumatic pains about the body, has been entirely free from such trouble while she has been taking the extract, a fact which she quite independently noted."

ALLAN'S ANTI-FAT, sold by Wholesale and Retail Chemists, everywhere. Price 6s. 6d. per Bottle. Send stamp for pamphlet, entitled "How to get Lean without Starvation."—BOTANIC MEDICINE COMPANY, Sole Proprietors, Great Russell-street Buildings, Great Russell-street, London, W.C.

ASTHMA, and DIFFICULT BREATHING arising from affections of the Respiratory Organs, PROMPTLY RELIEVED and PAROXYSMS AVERTED by the use of SAVORY and MOORE'S

DATURA TATULA, for INHALATIONS, for which purpose the plant is prepared as Cigarettes and other forms for smoking, and as pastiles and powder for burning on a plate or censer.

SAVORY and MOORE, New Bond-street, London, and sold by Chemists everywhere, from whom pamphlets, with full particulars and Medical Testimonials, may be obtained on application.

ALLEN AND HANBURYS' "PERFECTED" COD-LIVER OIL is not only freer from taste and smell than any oil ever before offered to the public, but it does not give rise to the nausea and eructations which render the use of ordinary oil, even of the finest quality, so repulsive. It is the pure oil, made at A. and Hs.' own factory in Norway, and prepared by an entirely new and special process. It presents in the most effective condition all the invaluable properties of the remedy. All who have difficulty in taking Cod-Liver Oil should insist on having A. and Hs.' "PERFECTED" OIL. Sold only in Impl. Pts., 4s. 9d.; ½ Pts., 2s. 6d.; ¼ Pts. 1s. 6d. Trade mark, a Plough. Of all Chemists; and of Allen and Hanburys, Plough-court, Lombard-street, London.

THROAT AFFECTIONS and HOARSENESS.—All suffering from Irritation of the Throat and Hoarseness will be agreeably surprised at the almost immediate relief afforded by the use of BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES. These famous Lozenges are now sold by most respectable Chemists in this country, at 1s. 1½d. per Box. People troubled with a hacking cough, a slight cold, or bronchial affections cannot try them too soon, as smaller troubles, if allowed to progress, result in serious pulmonary and asthmatic affections. Depôt, 493, Oxford-street, London.

(KNIGHT OF THE ORDER OF LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM, KNIGHT OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR)
LIGHT-BROWN
COD-LIVER OIL,
proved by nearly thirty years' medical experience to be
THE ONLY COD-LIVER OIL
which produces the full curative effects in
CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST, THROAT AFFECTIONS, GENERAL DEBILITY, WASTING DISEASES OF CHILDREN, RICKETS, AND ALL SCROFULOUS DISORDERS.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.
SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."
DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients preferred they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, that DR. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."
DR. HUNTER SEMPLE,
Physician Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest.
"I have long been aware of the great reputation enjoyed by the LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL introduced into medical practice by Dr. DE JONGH, and have recommended it with the utmost confidence. I have no hesitation in stating my opinion, that it possesses all the qualities of a good and efficient medicine. Its taste is by no means disagreeable, and might even be called pleasant. I have found Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."
JOSEPH J. POPE, Esq., M.R.C.S.,
Late Staff Surg., Army, Prof. of Hygiene, Birkbeck Institution.
"I found during my Indian experience that the worth and character of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL remained unchanged by tropical heat or foreign climate, and it was, from its uniformity of character, particularly adapted for long-continued administration. The value of 'hydro-carbons' in all debilitated states of the system is now becoming thoroughly recognised; and it is, without doubt, from the animal oils and fats, rather than from their vegetable substitutes, that we may hope to derive the surest benefit. The Oil of Dr. DE JONGH places in everyone's reach a reliable and valuable remedy, one that cannot be too widely recognised."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capsuled IMPERIAL Half-Pints, 2s. 6d.; Pints, 4s. 9d.; Quarts, 9s.; by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the World.

The Coloured Supplement.

"MY DARLING'S BETTER!"

No monarch more supremely rules
Than does a Babe with despot sway;
All in its household-kingdom serfs,
Proud to obey.

To kingly sceptre is transformed
The rattle in its puny hand,
Its subjects watchful to attend
Its least command.

A burst of music, wedding bells,
The wild bird's carol, lover's wooing,
Are sweet; but sweeter far to them
Is Baby's cooing.

And each event of Babyhood—
The coming of its firstling tooth,
When first it walked, and first it talked—
Is told, forsooth,

As though some grave affair of state
Held everyone within its spell,
When happy mothers of their babes
Rare marvels tell.

All in the house allegiance yield,
And of its sense and beauty rave;
But chief the doting mother proves
Its veriest slave.

Ah! what is like a mother's love,
With every virtue in its train!
There's our near neighbour, Mrs. Dove—
We thought her vain;

Too fond of company, where she
Out-dazzled all at ball or rout,
Until her Darling's illness brought
Her virtues out.

Slight chafe of polished manners oft
Shows what mean nature lies concealed;
With Mrs. Dove 'twas sterling worth
Shone out revealed.

Have you not known o'er summer sky
A gathering storm its blackness fling—
While in the dread expectant hush
Birds cease to sing?

So fared it when our neighbour's child
Needed the doctor's utmost care;
Death's shadow, thickening in its gloom,
Hung pall-like there.

Poor Mrs. Dove gave up at once
Coquetting with her wit and beauty;
All thoughts absorbed in mother's love,
Transcending duty.

Her child with watchful care she tended
Unceasingly, by day and night,
While hopes and fears thronged, interblended,
In dizzying flight.

Her husband and their two big boys
On tiptoe crept about the house,
While lively Clara, moping, sat,
Still as a mouse.

Have you not known a summer storm
Make clear the air, sweet odours bringing—
The sky again a flood of light,
And birds gay singing?

So quickly turned to light and life
Our neighbour's dwelling, erst so dark:
The boys hurraed, and Clara sang
Gay as a lark.

For had not the good doctor told them
Their Darling now was past all fear?
Indeed he quite forgot to scold them
For their wild cheer.

So, trooping into Baby's room,
They rushed to see their little sister;
And, disregarding all commands,
They hugged and kissed her.

The mother, who, the illness through,
When driven to the verge of madness,
Could find no blest relief in tears,
Now wept for gladness.

To right and left the good news flew,
By word of mouth or briefest letter;
This being all her bulletin—
My Darling's Better!

BREAKERS AHEAD!

Out in the dark, where the waves roll high
And the sleepless ocean curls and tumbles,
The pilot stares at the broad black sky,
While the thunder ever nearer grumbles.
But the ship must still sail on, perforce,
With none but he to guide her course,
Though a warning voice through the air hath sped,
And chilled his heart with its message dread:
"Take care! take care!
To the windward bear!
Breakers ahead—breakers ahead!
Pilot, beware!
There are breakers ahead!"

Hard a starboard he puts the ship,
From the line where the dim grey surf assembles;
Though white in the cold is his tight-drawn lip
His heart fears not, his hand never trembles.
He thinks not of home, nor of life and death,
Nor his mother's prayer, nor his sweetheart's faith;
He moves not a muscle, he breathes not a breath,
But holds right on, for the keen voice saith—
"Keep there, keep there!
To the windward bear!
Breakers ahead—breakers ahead!
Pilot, beware!
There are breakers ahead!"

THE MISSES POPKIN.

BY MRS. J. H. RIDDELL.

CHAPTER I.

TOLD BY MR. MARGISON.

You should know them, dear reader, you really should, not because they are great, or grand, or clever, or rich, or beautiful, but simply because they are unique.

They are like one of the bits of china by which people nowadays set such store—cracked, very possibly, but none the less rare or valuable for all that.

"We never mean to feel old," said Miss Jane to me the other day, with sprightly coquetry. "I do think old people are generally so dreadful."

And dear Miss Jane, though the third of the bright quartet, is not a mere child in years by any means. She is—must be;—well—well—let that pass. Somebody said, "Women and music should never be dated." So we will not date the Misses Popkin, except by inference.

Ten years since, Miss Popkin, though still quite young—in feeling—wore a front, and had given up, so she said, all thoughts of matrimony. She and Miss Catherine and Miss Jane all meant to live three old maids together, and never to marry. For Essie they could not answer. She was the youngest of the flock, the junior by years of all: it would be wrong to bind her. Marriage they considered a mistake. Still, if Essie chose a gentleman possessed of nice tastes they would not ostracise her because she held different opinions to those at which they had arrived.

It will be inferred from this that Miss Essie was quite a young thing—of nine and thirty, or thereabouts—whom her sisters treated as a perfect baby, and whom they looked upon as scarcely fit to be trusted out alone.

In Willowsdale there was a gentleman whom they supposed to be distractedly in love with her, a Mr. Ancidell, who had been a great traveller, who had also, according to their ideas, seen everything there was to be seen on earth, but who, like many other great men, was shy, and required a certain amount of encouragement, which "poor dear Essie" was not sufficiently bold to give him.

Mr. Ancidell, who had faced many lions, and knew his way about the world and the world's drawing-rooms, and the fine ladies who adorn them, as well as most people, was supposed to be afflicted with an access of diffidence when he came into the presence of the fair Esther. Everyone in the parish knew, however, the Misses Popkin expected him to propose to her, and he was quite aware of this expectation himself.

"If she would only put the question plainly to me—that is, plainly in words," he said one day to the present writer, "I should know what to do."

"You like her very much?" was the hesitating interrogation.

"Very much indeed; and so I do them all." With which remark he went off, laughing.

A sad fellow! A graceless, unthankful scamp, to have such kindness shown him, so much hospitality given him!

If I do not describe the house, I cannot describe the Misses Popkin.

It was their own. A person could not be in their company five minutes without learning that fact.

A fair-sized house for a family of moderate means. The regulation drawing-room, the regulation dining-room, the necessary breakfast-room, and the little snuggery—Miss Catherine, busy with her Dorcas accounts and charity garments, declared to be such a "perfect treasure;" eight bed-chambers, and the necessary "domestic offices." Not a bad house as regarded size, set sufficiently back from the road, and approached by a drive skirted on the one side by a tiny belt of plantation, and on the other skirting a grass-plot adorned with a fine larch, a weeping ash-tree, an evergreen oak, and a sun-dial.

Behind the house there was a flower-garden. To the left lay a paddock; to the right, stable-yard, coach-house, &c. At the back of these outbuildings the Misses Popkin informed all visitors they had a good acre of kitchen ground.

Not a bad little property, taken altogether. The maiden ladies were proud of it, and felt no shame in showing their pride.

The place was painfully trim; there was no stir of life or litter of use about it. No garden-roller was ever permitted to remain, when not in use, outside the tool-shed. No pigeons cooed and strutted along the roof of the empty stable. The fowls were relegated to a dreary run at the end of the paddock. There was not a weed in the garden or a scrap of moss on any walk about The Larches. An artist, if set down there, must have gone crazy, and anyone possessed of a taste for untidy comfort taken refuge in an old tumbledown barn standing in a field a little further down the road.

It was the same inside the house—line and plummet—mathematical accuracy. Miss Popkin's seat, Miss Catherine's chair, Miss Jane's footstool. You knew all these things, and kept clear of them as you entered the drawing-room. As for Miss Essie, she had, of course, her girlish accomplishments. She daubed in water colours and embroidered in wools, and sang a little and played a little; but she was tidy through all. Never a piece of music out of the canterbury, or a pattern lying on the table, or a drawing to be found, except on the easel or in the portfolio.

"Order," said Miss Popkin, for the benefit of her niece "is Heaven's first law;" and I dare say Miss Popkin, as well as the individual who first made that remark, is in the main right.

Only the niece fell out of rank. She was not orderly.

"Oh! dear," Miss Catherine used to say, piteously. "What would your poor papa think if he could see you?" Ah! what indeed? For my own part, I don't think any papa need have desired to look upon a fairer picture.

I had known the Misses Popkin some six years when this niece came to live with them. I saw her a few days after her arrival, and found her a gaunt young creature, clad in dresses too short for her, hair closely cropped, possessed of timid manners, a grave face, and, as her aunts truly said, with "A great want of development about her."

She had been at school—a day-school—till her mother's death, and now, explained Miss Popkin, "she has not a creature in the world except ourselves. Some day, however, I suppose, she will be our brother's heiress, and we must see she keeps up her studies."

If the absent Mr. Popkin had been the Maharajah Duleep Sing we could not have been led to entertain higher ideas of his wealth than was the case.

When he returned, the stable was to be put in requisition, the house filled with guests, the Misses Popkin were to go on the Continent; they meant to take a house in town; and as by that time, which might have meant a year hence, or half a life time, Kitty would be almost grown up—who knew? More unlikely things than a presentation at Court had occurred to girls possessed of rich uncles?

During the whole of this period Mr. Ancidell had been going backwards and forwards to and from The Larches. Now he wanted to present a plant for the conservatory. Again he was invited to view some of the contents of the latest box received from India. It was impossible to avoid thinking that Miss Essie Popkin grew livelier and brighter, and it was equally impossible for Willowsdale to remain blind to the fact that the eligible bachelor affected The Larches more and more.

True, there was a disparity, and that upon the wrong side; "but then," as Miss Popkin remarked, "dear Essie is so young in heart, that she will always remain a girl," whilst all the sisters declared "Mr. Ancidell is old both in appearance and manner—any one who did not know him intimately might imagine he was quite middle-aged."

Being unprotected females, and feeling that ladies so placed "could not be too particular," the Misses Popkin did not give dinner-parties—indeed, they did not give parties of any kind.

"When their brother returned," they hinted, Willowsdale might expect a reign of mad dissipation to set in at The Larches; but till that blest period arrived the most any friend could expect was a cup of tea or a glass of wine.

Mr. Ancidell partook of more cups of tea and glasses of wine than anyone else; and it was felt that, after a fashion, the Misses Popkin had bought him for Esther, and that if he refused to fulfil the bargain he would act shabbily towards them.

Apparently, the matter did not strike him in this light, for he continued to visit at The Larches, took all the cups of tea and slices of bread-and-butter the ladies offered him, drank a considerable amount of the very good sherry they decanted, and ate whole pounds of biscuits, and yet never proposed—no, though he sat in their drawing-room by the hour together and talked of his adventures by land and water, the while Miss Popkin knitted and Miss Catherine made up her comfortable garments for the poor, and Miss Jane embroidered and Miss Essie painted pictures, and that waif and stray Kitty let her work fall idly in her lap while she listened open-eyed to his stories of countries and people very far away.

"It was friendly, but it was not business." Miss Popkin no doubt felt this, for she decided it would be only wise to give him the opportunity he was evidently awaiting.

"We will ask him to dinner," said that astute lady, and Mr. Ancidell was asked to dinner accordingly, but, unhappily, nothing came of it.

Even Willowsdale had failed to learn whence the Misses Popkin derived their income. Except The Larches, no one ever heard them speak of property. The popular belief appeared to be that they had ten thousand pounds each in the Three per Cents; but I felt doubtful upon this point. Twice a year they went up to London, and Miss Jane slipped out on one occasion that they were going to get their money. Now, I knew that they could not be going to draw their dividends, because the time for that pleasing task had long been past.

They paid with the regularity of clock-work. So much for housekeeping, for taxes, for wages, for the church, for the poor, for dress, for that two weeks' outing turn in the year to London, and another fortnight's sojourn at some watering-place. Miss Popkin kept the accounts; Miss Jane managed domestic affairs; Miss Catherine attended to the poor; while Miss Essie, who was still too young to devote herself to matters which were merely useful, furnished the establishment with the lighter graces of existence.

As for Miss Kitty, you always met her where it seemed least likely the girl would be found. Swimming the retriever a few miles up the river, comforting some naughty child who had been getting into a scrape, dandling a disreputable-looking baby, remonstrating with the donkey-boys about their cruelty, or bribing the village lads not to stone the cats and pelt the frogs and kick the dogs.

I am quite satisfied the Misses Popkin had only the vaguest idea of their niece's proceedings. They would have fainted had they known one half of her doings.

When her aunts went to London she did not accompany them. A vague sort of promise was, indeed, given her that if she were a good girl some day she might be taken to the metropolis.

One hot afternoon I was pacing along the road which led past The Larches, when, in the paddock, I beheld the Misses Popkin's niece exercising that unfortunate retriever, who save when she unfastened his collar was always upon the chain.

I went up close to the fence and called her by name.

I can see her now hurrying across the field, coming laughing towards me.

"I am so glad to see you, Mr. Margison," she said, stretching out her gloveless hand. "Isn't it warm?" and she took off her hat and stood swinging it backwards and forwards while the sun shone down upon her through the leaves and branches of a great oak-tree.

I have said she was a fair picture; but no words could tell you how beautiful a girl I thought her.

"Some day you will break hearts," I considered often, as I looked at her. If mine had not been cleft in twain on the day I buried my young girl wife she must, old though I am, have hurt it sorely.

"All alone, Miss Kitty?" I said, for I had seen her aunts start for London when I was at the station that morning.

"All alone, Mr. Margison," she said, showing her dimples and her white even teeth. "The aunties went off to town by the eleven o'clock express."

"Yes, I know," I answered; "don't you feel lonely?"

"Not very," she said. "I shall this evening, perhaps."

"What are you going to do this evening?"

"I can't tell yet," she replied. Perhaps play, perhaps draw. If I feel industrious I may even do a little needlework."

"Have you dined?"

"Hours ago," she answered.

"In that case, I wonder if you would come and take tea with me."

"I shall be delighted," she answered. "I am so much obliged to you for asking me."

"You don't think your aunts would object?" I ventured.

"Why should they?" she asked, gravely; but there was a twinkle in her eyes and a smile dimpling her face which contradicted the seriousness of her question. "I am so young, you know, Mr. Margison, that it does not matter much where I go."

Never before had it occurred to me that the peculiarities of the Misses Popkin appeared ludicrous to their niece; but her words, and her smile, and that twinkle made me feel vaguely doubtful and uneasy.

"If you were not so young," I said, "I should not have been so bold as to ask you."

"What a blessing it is to be a mere 'chit,'" she answered, still with the light dancing in her eyes. "What time shall I come? When shall you be ready for me, and may I—oh! may I pour out the tea?"

A man must have been of adamant to withstand her.

"Of course you shall do anything and everything you like," I said. "Will half-past six be too early for you?"

"No; you may expect to see me at half-past six, dressed in all my best. I can't tell you how much I shall like to come."

And she put her hand over the fence and squeezed mine.

and once again I thought that some day she would break hearts, and that it was very nice to be so old as I am!

Half-past six came, and with it Miss Kitty, in the white gown she wore on Sundays, with some soft lace round neck and hands, with heavy gold bracelets on her wrists, and a Venetian chain twisted into an ornament for her throat.

"They were mamma's," she said softly, seeing my eyes rest upon these adornments. "I thought I would put them on to do you honour."

How charming she made herself. How sweet she seemed walking, her hand within my arm, in the dim twilight, as we sauntered through the garden, odorous with the scent of the night flowers.

"How old, Mr. Margison, do you suppose I am?" she asked at last.

"About fifteen or sixteen," I replied.

She broke out laughing. "I am nearly twenty," she said. "Do not you think I might soon be allowed to wear long dresses and let my hair grow."

What remark I should, or indeed could, have made in return may never now be recorded, because at this moment there came along one of the soft moss-covered walks a person—my housekeeper.

"If you please, Sir," she said, and I noticed her voice seemed a little unsteady, "Miss Popkins have come from London, and Miss Kitty is wanted back directly."

"Back already!" cried Miss Kitty, "nobody is ill, is there?"

"Not as I am aware of, Miss," answered Mrs. Hall, with grave propriety.

She had her hat on in a moment, and her little scarf around her shoulders.

"Good-by, dear Mr. Margison," she said, taking both my hands in hers. "How can I ever thank you sufficiently for this delightful evening?"

"I am going home with you," I answered, giving her my arm. "You have made yourself so charming, Miss Kitty, that I shall not part with you till I am compelled."

"Come in, Mr. Margison, pray," entreated Miss Kitty, as we stood under the sheltering porch. "My aunts are in the drawing-room, Mary, I suppose," she went on, addressing the trim maid who opened the door.

"No, Miss. They are up stairs—they have had news from their brother."

"From uncle?" repeated Kitty. "He is coming back then, no doubt; how delightful."

"I do not think so," said Mary; and then, as the girl was about to pass her, she cried, "Oh, Miss Kitty, don't go up to them with that smiling face. My mistresses are in great trouble. The gentleman is dead!"

I was walking towards my house when I met Mr. Ancidell.

"Heard the news?" he asked, after the first greetings were over.

"I told him that I had, and how sorry I felt for the Misses Popkin.

"Why, what is the matter with them? They have no money in the house, have they?"

We seemed to be playing a little at cross-purposes; but I merely said the Misses Popkins' was not a pecuniary trouble. "Their brother is dead," I added; "he died very suddenly."

"Then Miss Kitty will be an heiress immediately," he remarked, a little bitterly. "Mine is a bit of City news," he went on, immediately. "Hill and Jones, the great East India people, have gone for over a million of money, and people say there won't be twopence in the pound."

CHAPTER II.

TOLD BY MR. MARGISON.

It was six months after. I still walked about Willowsdale, and Mr. Ancidell also remained there, though he often talked of going back to Africa or of taking a tour through South America.

"I get dreadfully tired of this stupid place," he remarked, alluding, of course, to our village.

"You feel lost, no doubt, without the youngest Miss Popkin," I remarked.

He looked at me oddly for a minute, then said, "the fair Essie! that is it, no doubt. By-the-by, where are they now? Have you heard anything about them lately?"

I had; that very morning a letter reached me from Miss Popkin stating that she and her sisters desired either to sell The Larches or to let it on a long lease.

They did not think of returning to Willowsdale. For the present, their plans were somewhat uncertain. They might go abroad, or remain for the winter at the watering-place from which she dated; but they had no thought of again residing at The Larches.

"It would be painful for us now to do so," explained Miss Popkin; "the health of my second sister is far from good, and I do not feel very strong myself."

"Oh!" commented Mr. Ancidell. "Want to sever all connection with Willowsdale, evidently. I suppose that old Hindoo (such was his irreverent mode of speaking of the late respectable Mr. Popkin) left a pot of money behind him. Well, they need not have cut us so completely, no matter how rich they are. I am sure I never wanted any share of their wealth. And so you are to have the treat of getting The Larches off their hands for them, I suppose."

Yes, I said; I was to do the best I could for them, and arrange for an auction to take place shortly.

It was a blow to me, I confess. I had grown to like the Misses Popkin. They were very odd; but they suited my quiet, homely ways, and I once hoped I suited them.

Mr. Ancidell was very bitter about the estrangement which Mr. Popkin's death had caused.

"I wonder if they still think I want to marry the charming Miss Esther, and are keeping her out of my way?" he laughed. "I have a great mind to run down to that outlandish place Miss Popkin dated from, and call upon them." And shortly after he walked away.

Some weeks passed before I saw him again. I had arranged for the auction to take place almost immediately, when, quite unexpectedly, he came in one morning while I was at breakfast. He looked well—better than he had done for a long time past. He was in good spirits and health, and declared his trip had benefited him greatly.

"By-the-by," he said, after a little, "you may take down that notice about The Larches; the place is sold."

I looked at him incredulously. "Sold!" I repeated. "And who has bought it, pray?"

"I have," he answered.

"You?" I uttered the word stupidly.

"Yes. I called upon Miss Popkin's solicitor as I came through London, and settled the matter with him. He promised to write to you."

"Why, what can you want with The Larches?" I asked. "I thought you were so fond of The Cottage?"

"So I was, but it wouldn't be large enough for me now," he said. I looked at him again, and a sudden light flashed across me.

"You are going to be married," I guess.

He nodded. "Wish me joy!" he cried.

"I am sure I do, heartily," I returned; "but who is the lady?"

"Cannot you form any idea?"

"It is not Miss Popkin, is it?" I hesitated.

"Yes, it is Miss Popkin," and he laughed joyously. "Don't look so sorrowful, man," he added. "She will make me a very good wife; don't you think so?"

"I answered—I had no doubt of that. She was a very estimable person. The only thing—the only doubt" ——

"Yes; go on," said Mr. Ancidell, encouragingly. "I shan't feel offended, no matter what you say."

"I was only going to mention the disparity in your ages; but if you do not mind, of course" ——

"Oh! I don't mind; and she does not, either."

"I never supposed she would," I retorted, nettled; for his merriment struck me as unseemly. It did not appear possible he could have any affection for a woman so much older than himself, and it vexed me to think that, after all, he should marry for money. He had not even the excuse of being poor. His means were very good indeed.

He watched me for a few moments, his features twitching with amusement.

"Cheer up, Margison," he said, at last. "After all, it is not you who are going to marry her, and that reminds me you have not asked me which of the ladies has so far honoured me."

"There could only be one," I answered sulkily.

"There could only be one," he repeated after me.

"Why——" something in his face arrested Miss Esther's name on my lips. "You do not mean—" I gasped.

"Yes, I do; I do, indeed. Wish me joy, I am the happiest fellow in all the world. I fell in love with Kitty, I think, the first day I saw her, but I did not dare to say anything, as they made such a fuss about her expectations.

"What do they say to your carrying off the heiress now," I asked, somewhat nervously.

"My dear fellow—this in strict confidence—the uncle did not leave her anything, for the simple reason that every farthing he had was in Hill's house. There is no doubt the failure killed him, and that was what drove the Misses Popkin away from Willowsdale.

I know all about them now. Their father it appears, the original Popkin, was a tradesman in a county town. He made some money, and, being ambitious, gave his children good educations and pushed himself forward at elections, and so forth, till, somehow, he managed to get an appointment out in India for his one son and a commission for the other. He could not leave much behind him after doing all these things, so his daughters had to live as best they could upon a hundred a year.

"Then how did they get their money?" I asked.

"I am coming to that," he said.

"As William, the elder brother, you understand, got on in India, he began to allow them first fifty, then a hundred, then two hundred per annum, till the amount he sent over grew to three hundred every six months."

"And had these ladies nothing except what he gave them?"

"Nothing whatever, if we exclude The Larches, that they bought with the money left by their father. When the brother died they had but a hundred pounds of ready cash. They were obliged to part with their jewellery, and the morning I dropped down upon them a fortnight ago I found Kitty giving music lessons and preparing to devote herself to teaching for the remainder of her life. But her smile was as bright and saucy as ever when she said,

"I am glad to be able to do something for them—thankful—they were so good and kind to my poor mother, that if it were not a pleasure it would be my duty to work for them."

"Bravo! Miss Kitty!" I exclaimed. I was so delighted about all the good news Mr. Ancidell brought that after that outburst I stretched out my hand and shook his in happy silence.

"Who was Miss Kitty's mother?" I asked.

"A romantic girl of good family, who fell in love with Captain Popkin's handsome face. Her father renounced her—forbade any one to mention her name before him; and she must entirely have starved, for Captain Popkin left nothing but debts behind him, had not the Misses Popkin got help from their brother in India for her, and given her help themselves."

"And so you are going to buy The Larches," I remarked, after a pause.

"I have bought it," he answered.

"And do you mean to purchase the furniture?"

"I have purchased it," he said.

The Misses Popkin, then, will live in your cottage, I suppose," I suggested.

"No; the fact is, they are going to live with us."

"With you!" I repeated, stupified. "Do you think you will like that arrangement."

"It is Kitty's," he answered; "and I would not thwart it for the world. Besides, you know I was always very fond of the Misses Popkin!"

I felt glad—oh! very glad. Willowsdale had never seemed the same since those dear, delightful, ridiculous old ladies had left it.

Time will not permit me to tell about the marriage, and the breakfast, and the smiles of Miss Kitty and the tears of her aunts. I must hurry over the intervening period, and return to The Larches on Christmas Day, where I had been bidden to meet the bride and bridegroom returned from their honeymoon and Mrs. Ancidell's uncle and aunts.

The rooms were decked with greenery, and in the hall, more lovely than she had ever been, stood Kitty, with both hands outstretched to meet her old friend, laughing and crying, her face dimpled, but her eyes full of tears.

As for the Misses Popkin, how may I hope to describe them. In dress they were more gorgeous than ever, and at first I thought they were more stately, but this manner I soon found was only assumed to conceal their want of self-possession.

Before dinner Miss Popkin took me aside. "I want to tell you something about our darling. Her uncle has behaved to her with the greatest kindness—made over all the fortune which would have been his sister's had she married differently. And what—what do you think, Mrs. Margison? This morning she sent each of us a little note with an order that we were to receive yearly seventy-five pounds. With the money Mr. Ancidell paid us for this place we have therefore a hundred a year a piece so long as we live. We shall not need it, of course; but still—still" ——

The poor lady broke down. The most genuine tears I ever saw shed were running down her cheeks.

"God bless Kitty!" I said, and I said it from the bottom of my heart.

"Who is talking about Kitty?" cried Mrs. Ancidell, coming forward at that moment.

"We were," answered her aunt. "I was just telling Mr. Margison about your thought for your old aunts; and we really—really must give up calling you Kitty any longer" ——

"I hope I shall never be anything else to you," she interrupted, with a delightful smile. "John says he thinks it the prettiest name he ever heard, and uncle quite agrees with him."

COUSIN FRANK DISCOURSES ON THE MISTLETOE.

In an old manor house reside
Two girls, their widowed father's pride:
The elder, Joan, brimful of life,
While gentle Grace reflects his wife.
Each in her way is beauty's queen,
Though not in shops their photos seen,
Since these two maidens hold their reign
As woman should, in home's domain.

'Twas in the prime of Christmas-time,
One of those days known in our clime,
When frost and sunshine league together
To make the most delightful weather,
Constraining oft young folk to quit
The fireside where they shivering sit,
And take brisk walks, till rosiest hue
Mantles o'er cheek—and nose-tip, too:
On such a day these girls set forth,
Although the wind was in the north,
Upon a country ramble bent;
And as through fields and lanes they went
It happened—by mere accident—
The veriest chance, one may declare—
Their cousin Francis met them there,
Just where a veteran oak-tree spread
Its giant branches overhead.
So, after questions and replies,
Francis expressing his surprise,
And gladness too, at this chance meeting,
And being ended their warm greeting,
That slyboots, Master Frank, bethought him
('Twas surely Love's own self that taught him)
How best he might some topic start
That touched the purpose of his heart:
For, in a whisper be it said,
One of those girls he fain would wed;
Though whether Joan or Grace it be
The rack should not extort from me.
There was some mention of the oak,
And straight upon that hint he spoke.

"Ah, cousins dear, do you remember
One evening in the last December
I read to you our Laureate's rhymes,
That ring like sweet bells' sweetest chimes,
In which an oak is made to tell
How Olive loved her Walter well?
The nymph was charming, I allow;
But girls as fair are living now.
The oak in Sumner Chace was grand;
As noble this 'neath which we stand,
As wide outspread its sturdy boughs,
With shade as sweet for lovers' vows;
Besides, this is no talking-tree,
To blab what it might hear or see;
And then—O joy!—here clusters grow
Of pearl-bestudded mistletoe.

"What dainty shrub to effloresce
On this huge type of sturdiness!
Thou little plant, with starry eyes,
What marvellous virtue in thee lies!
When hung at Christmas-time to rafter,
Provocative of mirth and laughter;
Of lovers' scheming, stifled screaming,
Resistance sometimes only seeming—
For not all damsels take amiss
The sugar-plum which rhymes to bliss."

Then Frank most learnedly ran o'er
His varied store of Druid lore;
Told how the plant which oak-trees bore
To Druids mystic meaning wore,
Held sacred by those grim old priests,
And gracing all their solemn feasts;
Well harrowing his hearers' feelings
With his lugubrious revealings.
But, nowaday, Frank laughing said,
The plant to cheerier worship's wed,
And fair young priestesses now throw
Their glamour o'er the mistletoe.

Is that the chirrup of a bird
In the deep stillness that is heard?
Or does a sprig of mistletoe,
In love with those fair girls below,
Come toppling from its barren height
Upon their rosy lips to alight?
Whatever one may think the cause,
There is in Frank's discourse a pause,
And more than health's most roseate hues
The maidens' cheeks straightway suffuse.
'Tis what Frank calls the application
Of his long sermon-like narration;
Nor do the girls seem greatly vexed
With his expounding of love's text.
But what the text, and how applied,
Is left for young folk to decide.

JOHN LATEY.

"MAY I HAVE THE PLEASURE?"

Ah! these Regency beaux! with their graces elastic;
Their invincible manners, persuasive yet bold;
With The Sex (Heaven bless 'em!) how charmingly plastic!
What adepts at the practice of never being old!
Here is one who betrays in each confident twinkle,
The beau who remembers the hearts he has caged;
There's the air of the slayer in raiment and wrinkle,
'Tis a conqueror speaks in his
"Are you engaged?"

A conqueror—well? The sweet battle 's not fought yet,
And that face wears the aspect (if eyes tell the truth)
Of a maiden undaunted who has not been caught yet,
And is not to be caught, by this well-preserved youth!
For, though 'tis a dance he solicits, so tender 's
The voice she may fear a proposal 's presaged
To the fair who her finger-tips lightly surrenders
When this beau so bewitching 's asked
"Are you engaged?"

The rejoinder is Yes!—you preposterous creature!
So retire, lest she smite you in tones swift and sharp;
Retire, while becalmed is each beautiful feature,
Retire, and enrapture—flute, fiddle, and harp!
She is waiting for one who has No for his answer,
And, unless you would see that blithe suitor enraged,
Seek solace elsewhere, and—well, if you can't, Sir,
No solace you 'll hear in his
"Are you engaged?"

MAJOR BLACK'S LOVE-LETTER.

BY DUTTON COOK.

Major Black had returned to his native land after an absence of many years' duration. He left England a smooth-faced, pink-cheeked boy, fresh from Addiscombe, a subaltern in the employment of John Company, who was Emperor of India in those days; he came back from the East a withered-looking, sun-dried, stiff-limbed gentleman of middle age and something more, a Major of Bengal Light Cavalry, who had seen active service in the field, who had suffered considerably from wear and tear, from the influences of time and climate. His complexion had now the look and the hue of old parchment; little wisps of iron-grey hair filled scantily the place once completely occupied by the most luxuriant of brown locks; a heavy moustache now sat astride upon the upper lip, which formerly had borne no burden of hair save of a very light and downy sort. Certainly, the Major was not handsome; yet was there something picturesque about his grave, lined, worn face; he had the air of a gentleman and of a soldier; and at times there was a tender, sympathetic expression in his grey eyes that was curiously winning.

He found himself alone in London. He was without kith or kin. It seemed to him that he belonged to a past generation; that the England he had known was not this present England to which he had journeyed. He had friends, comrades, and acquaintances left behind in India or acquired upon the voyage home. But the friends he had known of old and left behind him in England, the friends of his youth—well, they, it appeared, had gone with his youth, never to return. Over and over again he said to himself, as though he were repeating the burden of a song, "The streets to me are peopled with shadows; the city is as a city of the dead." It was a line from some book he had read a long while since. The words lingered in his memory, although he had forgotten all about the source whence they were derived. But in his present mood and condition they recurred to him as appropriate. "The streets to me are peopled with shadows; the city is as a city of the dead." And melancholy took possession of him.

"I've been away too long. I ought never to have returned. I am a mummy—a positive mummy," said the Major.

He was a member of a club instituted for the benefit of old East Indians returned to England for a holiday or for good. It was not so much a club, perhaps, as a hospital for invalids suffering from the effects of life and service in the East. There was much liver complaint in that club, with other disorders resulting from tropical experiences. The members boasted very bronzed complexions, and were exceedingly yellow as to the whites of their eyes. They ate of strange Indian dishes, that seemed from their colour to be composed in great part of gamboge; they were partial to rice dexterously boiled so that no adherence occurred amongst its grains. They were irascible of temper; they smoked cheroots. They called lunch "tiffin;" and cold brandy-and-water, a compound to which they were partial, "brandy pawnee." They were much interested in Indian news, but cared little for home politics. The British Government was to them a thing to be scorned, and even abominated. It had grievously neglected Oriental interests, and had in some way, not clearly to be stated or understood, irreparably wronged "the service" of which they were members and ornaments.

The Major spent many hours daily at his club—almost lived there, in fact, occupying at night a confined bedchamber over a bootmaker's shop in Jermyn-street. "I had a room here when I was a cadet, before I went to India," he observed, adding, with an air of doubt, "at least, I think it was in this very same house." He could not be quite sure; it was so many years ago. "Indeed, Sir," said the landlady, not much interested, and not, of course, remembering him. How could she? She must have been quite a child when he was a cadet. And very likely it was not really the same house. "So many gentlemen has slept in this room from time to time. We're most always full in the season." Had he been trying to take up his life in London exactly where he left it off so many years back, before he went to India?

It was dull work. He sat at the club window reading the papers or gazing at the passers-by. He wandered about the club's spacious saloons; he was to be seen, but always sad and wearied-looking, now in the morning-room, now in the smoking-room, now in the library, now watching the billiard or the whist players. His life was very objectless. "I think I had best go back again," he said. "There was somethink to do in India, although it was but routine sort of work. But it suited me to feel myself in harness. I miss the barrack-yard and the life in camp, the tramping of hoofs and the clattering of sabres. Yet I so longed to get home to England! I caught the habit of longing from the other men who had good reason for longing to be at home again. I forgot that there existed no reason in my case. I had no friends or relations to get home to. There was no one here to care whether I came home or stayed in India. I think I had best go back again."

An only child, he had long years back lost his father. He had lately paid a pilgrimage to his mother's grave in the picturesque cemetery at Bath. The poor lady had survived but for a little while the departure from England of her much-loved boy. He had outlived all the uncles and aunts he had ever possessed. So far as he knew, he had no cousins in existence. Certainly he was very much alone.

But, of course, there were many old Indian officers of his own standing, members of the same club, to be encountered there very frequently. Military talk went on perpetually in in the smoking-room, with much discussion of Oriental topics generally. Major Black could scarcely refrain from throwing in a word now and then, returned, as he was, so recently from the East, in possession of the latest information on the subjects in question. In such wise he established relations of an amicable character now with this veteran, and now with that. And an officer he had first met on his voyage home—on board the P. and O. Company's steamer Otranto, indeed—now returned to town from visiting his relatives in the west of England. This was Colonel Blake, an artillery officer of distinction, whose name had been well known to the Major long before chance made the two gentlemen personally acquainted. At sea they had enjoyed much discourse as they smoked their cheroots, leaning over the side, or paced the deck together, or reclined in easy-chairs, the awning above screening them from the sun-rays.

Colonel Blake was fiery of speech and crimson of face, with a round nose that shone like a knob of burnished copper, a ragged grey fringe of moustache straggling out beneath it. The Colonel, renewing his acquaintance with his native land, had formed the lowest opinion of it.

"By George, Sir! the country is going to the deuce (he pronounced it juice) as fast as it can go. They think of nothing now, Sir, in England but trade and money-grubbing. The City is now everywhere. There is a business element in everything. I confess that it's not at all the sort of thing that I've been accustomed to. By George, Sir, I was brought up with gentlemanly notions. I was always taught to hold myself aloof from the shop-keeping community. But what do we now find, Sir? By George! the very Peerage has gone into trade. They tell me, Sir, that now in England you may buy your coals of a Duke, your game and fish of a Marquis, your wine of a Viscount! I am not sure, indeed, that you don't have an Earl or two calling every morning to know if you have any order for the butcher. As for the Bishops—the spiritual peers, as they are called—I can't say for certain, but I should not be at all surprised to find that they also have gone into business of some sort; the muffin and crumpet trade, very likely."

And the Colonel chuckled acridly and hoarsely over the decadence of his country's nobility. It transpired at a later date that the officer had met with severe disappointment during his visit to the west of England. A widow lady, whom he had fully designed to marry, and who had certainly afforded some encouragement to his suit, had at the last moment expressed her preference for another lover, who had acquired extraordinary wealth in the coal-trade; and thereupon the Colonel had been promptly dismissed. "By George, Sir!" he exclaimed, when he came afterwards to relate the ill-treatment he had undergone, "to think that a man of my standing should have been cut out by a mere coal-heaver! What is the country coming to?" His gloomy views had their warrant in his own sombre experiences.

They agreed that the England they had come back to was a much colder England than the England they had quitted in their youth. There had been a great change for the worse as to its climate. And there was talk of another sort between the veterans. They inquired of each other concerning their common friends. What had become of Hopkins of the 15th? Had anything been heard of Fosbrook of the 50th? How about Bambury of the Irregular Horse? And Granby, George Granby, not William—he was in the Cape Rifles—George Granby, you know, great friend of poor Tom Osborne, who died at Delhi—where was George Granby? Well, George Granby was dead, too—of dysentery, at Cairo, on his way home to England. Poor old George Granby! Poor old Tom Osborne!

The soldiers lighted their final cheroots and strolled from their club, retreating towards their bachelor beds. The Colonel also occupied a room in Jermyn-street, but not over the Major's boot-shop. The Colonel was lodged at a stationer's a few doors off, immediately beneath the shadow of St. James's Church.

Major Black could not sleep that night. Not because of the confined dimensions of his room or by reason of the powerful odour of boot-leather and blacking that pervaded the premises; but that a train of recollections had been fired within him, and his mind was in a very disturbed, and, indeed, explosive state in consequence.

Tom Osborne. He had died, leaving behind him a tiny child—Rosy Osborne she was called—a sweet little English baby-girl, with soft white-rose transparent complexion, sky-blue eyes, and coral-red lips. She had been the pet of the whole station. The Major had promised himself, and promised her father, in the case of any calamity befalling him, always to befriend little Rosy Osborne, and to be, so far as he could, a second father to her.

But that was years ago. The little maiden had been carried away from India to England, as English children usually are carried away, for health's sake, on emerging from their earlier years; and the Major had stayed behind, bound by his military duties. He had seen her no more; for a long time he had heard nothing of her. Time had slipped away with fatal imperceptibility. Almost, the Major had forgotton the very existence of Rosy Osborne.

Now he resolved that he would find her out. Some clue he possessed in certain letters and papers stored away in a corner of his desk. At least he knew where English relatives of hers might be looked for. He would seek out poor Tom Osborne's daughter and serve and befriend her if he might. He had secured something to do at last. His life was now a little less objectless than it had seemed to him for some time past.

A pretty English garden, neatly folded round by a tall, dense, closely-clipped box hedge; a smooth carpet of green velvet lawn, with here and there a standard rose-tree showering at every breath of wind its scented leaves at its feet; an old country house, pleasantly variegated as to colour, from the many patches of moss and lichen and the partial coat of dark, satin-leaved ivy clothing its red walls; a background of thick woodland, and beyond a grand range of breezy downs. Summerleas the place was called. A village nestled in a hollow close by; a little group of white-faced cottages with thatched roofs, a tiny inn with an ill-painted sign, a general shop, a blacksmith's forge, a post-office, and a diminutive cruciform church of grey stone, with a square, squat tower, loopholed and battlemented like a fortress.

Miss Rose Osborne stepped from a conservatory that adjoined the drawing-room of the old red brick house, and found herself face to face with Mr. MacGillevray, the gardener, a tyrant in his way and in his own province, as gardeners are apt to be.

"Now, dontee rob the greenhouse—dontee, now, Miss Rose. But you gentlefolks has no mercy. You think a flower's a thing may be snipped off anyhow, and made waste with—given to the first comer. You can't understand what a gardener's feelings are. You don't know what it is to go to bed with potting-out and late frosts on your mind. Sometimes I can't get so much as a wink of sleep o' nights for the new pelargoniums weighing so heavy on my chest. A bud d'ye want? Blessee, I'd sooner give you a flower that was full blown and tumbling to pieces. Well, you shall have a bud, and a pretty one; only promise never to take one without asking old MacGillevray's permission first. A flower!" the old man continued, with a sort of polite garrulousness. "I do declare there's ne'er a prettier flower in the whole garden, no, nor for miles round, than my Miss Rose. With such roses and lilies in your face, and sunshine in your smile, as is a'most enough to ripen the grapes afore their time. Only dontee give yourself away like a poor cut flower, to be stuck in anybody's button-hole. Why, there's a blush! Like a bed of damask roses in June, I do declare. Ah, them as christened you did right to call you Miss Rose! For a rose you are, in very truth."

Now, Major Black was looking over the trim box hedge, and he was quite of the old gardener's opinion, that there wasn't a prettier flower in the garden, no, nor for miles round, than Miss Rose Osborne.

"It was quite worth while coming home," he said, "if it was only to see that sweet English rose." And straightway the Major fell in love, with all the impetuosity of age. For it is youth that deliberates and calculates in such cases; having to relinquish exceeding love for itself before it can devote its love to another object absolutely.

Major Black was welcomed to Summerleas. It was sufficient that he had stated himself to be the friend of the late Captain Osborne; but the Major, by way of voucher for his integrity, produced a packet of letters of long ago, the paper now frayed and faded, the black ink turned to dull brown, addressed to him by his departed friend. Summerleas was occupied by Miss Sarah Osborne, the maiden aunt of Rose. Miss Osborne the elder was in delicate health; she had adopted her niece, was sincerely attached to her. Rose was, indeed, as her daughter, and a very devoted daughter.

The Major's visits to Summerleas became frequent. The railway was so convenient, he said. He could breakfast at his club, munch his usual dry toast, tap his accustomed egg, read through his morning paper, and yet be in time almost for luncheon at Summerleas. And the oftener he went to Summerleas, and the longer he stayed there, so much the more did he find himself in love with Miss Rose Osborne.

She was very beautiful. The Major declared that he had never seen anyone so beautiful; and he had seen many men, women, and cities; he had lived many years and travelled very far; so his evidence might be accounted as of some value. He delighted to note the lustre of her eyes, the witchery of her smile, the loveliness of her colour, the exquisite grace of her every movement. He became her constant knight—her most abject slave. He idolised her; he followed her about like a faithful dog. It was joy to him to sit at her feet worshipping her, or to be near her when she played or sang. With eyes of tenderest admiration he watched her soft, delicate hands fluttering like white birds about the keys of the piano. He seemed quite rapt when she sang. It was clear to him that he had never listened to a voice more exquisitely musical, or to melodies of more graceful or affecting quality.

It was in vain he avowed to himself the conviction that he was an old fool—that he had no sort of business to be in love—that it was really hardly becoming a man of his mature years—that he was old enough to be Rose's father—that it was altogether a great deal too absurd—and so on. Arguments of that kind are never of much avail in the way of remedying the quotidian of love.

He was very happy at Summerleas; he was very miserable in London, away from Rose. It was true, as he frankly conceded, that he was mad at Summerleas; whereas he was comparatively sane in London. But is there not, as the poet has told us, a pleasure in being mad which only madmen know? He had sought an object in life; well, he had found one now—with a vengeance—in love.

But while his love was most absorbing and supreme, he was, nevertheless, one of the most timid of lovers. He would far sooner have charged a battery, or have faced the most murderous fire of the enemy, than have made a formal proposal to Rose to become his wife. He thought very modestly of his own merits. She was so young and so fair; he was, as he assured himself over and over again, so old and ugly. It was true that he possessed some fortune; he had saved money, and of late years his pay had been more than adequate. His wants, indeed, were few and simple, and, though by no means inclined to parsimony, still his habits were of an inexpensive sort. Rose Osborne was portionless.

Major Black, like Alexander,

> Gazed on the fair,
> Who caused his care,
> And sighed and looked, sighed and looked,
> Sighed and looked, and sighed again.

But he could not bring himself to speak of his love. He was as a traveller in Alpine regions—he dreaded to whisper even, lest he should bring down upon himself an avalanche of disappointment.

Ah! if he had but known. The course of true love was running smooth enough—if he had but possessed the wit to perceive the fact. Rose loved him.

It is a bad compliment to pay him, but really there was no one else for her to love in the neighbourhood of Summerleas. There was a curate, of course—there is always a curate in the country; but this curate was a married man, and, as often happens with the married clergy, blessed with numerous offspring. And there was a medical man—a septuagenarian. These were almost the only males for miles round. Of course, it was no use reckoning the small farmers, broad of face and of dialect, who were but little removed above the class of labourers. Rose could scarcely find among these some one to love.

Even if there had been other and eligible suitors about her, however, it is quite possible that Rose would have preferred the Major. She was a soldier's daughter, and she cherished a sort of romantic regard for the profession of arms—and for its followers. She was much interested in the Major, who had been the firm friend of her departed father, who was brave and worthy in every respect, who had fought and bled for his country—and for the Honourable East India Company. She looked at him as something of a Bayard, and she really thought his battered, bronzed old face, with its heavy grey moustaches, deep hollows, and wrinkles, quite handsome. "Don't you think so, aunt?" she said, appealing to Miss Sarah Osborne.

"Well, no, Rose, dear, I should not say 'handsome,' exactly," the elder lady replied, ingenuously; "but certainly gentlemanly-looking and interesting—oh, dear, yes!—and a fine figure, if just a little stiff at the joints; but that's scarcely noticeable. Your poor dear father was just as flat in the back as the Major."

The two ladies liked to see the tall, gaunt, military figure of the Major striding and stalking about the trim garden of Summerleas. But he was wholly unconscious of the fact. Indeed, he was growing day by day more and more miserable. The secret love within him seemed like a serpent warmed into cruel liveliness, and plying its teeth greedily. And now Rose Osborne was about to quit Summerleas for some months, to pay a long-promised long visit to friends in the North of England. It was clear that for the while Rose and the Major must part. Should she see him when she returned to Summerleas? she asked.

Yes; he hoped so. But he did not speak or look very hopefully.

He would not be gone back to India?

He thought not. He was not quite sure. But he thought not.

She gave him her hand. He pressed it to his lips and sighed. She blushed and cast down her eyes. He should have spoken then, if ever, of his love. But he said only, "Good-bye, Miss Rose."

"Good-bye, Major Black." They shook hands and separated.

The Major returned to London promptly. In his despair, he determined upon resumption of his military duties in India. With this view he attended a levée at the Horse Guards. He was honoured by an interview with a very important martial functionary. It was understood that his departure was to be immediate.

He was braver away from Rose than when in her presence. He had been unable to speak to her; but it seemed to him that he could write to her. So he sat down to his desk—to find that the task he had set himself was not nearly so easy of accomplishment as he had imagined. How hard it was to hit on expressions of the right kind, to choose appropriate words, to turn his phrases neatly! He destroyed many sheets of paper; he began the letter afresh many times. He wrote with his room full of trunks, strewed with evidences of imminent departure and travel. And now the floor was littered with fragmentary beginnings and rough incomplete draughts of his love-letter.

It was finished at last, he hardly knew how. Something he had said, he did not quite know what, but it seemed to convey his meaning, if not so completely as he could have wished. But at any rate he had told her of his love; he had assured her of his devotion to her; he had asked her to become his wife. And then he went on to speak of the agony suspense would inflict upon him. Might he ask for an immediate answer? Time was very short with him; he was on the eve of departure. Would she telegraph reply? One word would suffice—the word "Yes." Might he hope to receive such a telegram from his beloved Rose in reply to his suit? His head ached; his hand shook; he felt parched and feverish. He was suffering from exhaustion both of body and mind; from excitement of brain and irritation of nerve. It seemed to him that he was losing direct command of his consciousness; that he was subsiding into a state of trance. That he was doing this and that, moving to and from, more like a somnambulist or a man in a dream than a wakeful and acute middle-aged and grey-haired Major of Bengal light cavalry.

The letter completed, the Major breathed more freely. He was as one who had done a desperate deed, over which he had long meditated painfully. It was done now and the consequences might be serious; but in any case he was spared the pain of further meditation on the subject. He had only now to wait the issue as patiently as he could: which was rather impatiently altogether.

He engaged in much mental arithmetic. He set himself long sums. He tried to calculate the exact time it would take to bring him an answer from Rose. She would receive his letter at such an hour; how long would she be before she made up her mind?—how long before she dispatched the telegram "Yes"? For he decided that if there was to be a telegram at all it would contain the word "Yes." Otherwise she would write by post.

The Major waited at home all day long. Frequently he looked from his window hoping to see approach a telegraph-boy playing the part of Cupid and bringing a favourable answer to his suit—the telegram "Yes." No such boy appeared, however. It was growing serious. But at any rate the post of the next morning would bring a letter.

It did not, however. The Major waited and waited. No telegraph-boy arrived with a telegram. No postman brought a letter. An expression of blank despair took up permanent abode upon the Major's face. Still he waited. He even deferred his departure. He would go, he decided, by the steamer from Marseilles instead of the steamer from Southampton.

He did not write again to Miss Rose Osborne, however. He was too proud for that.

At last—there was no help for it—his trunks were piled upon a cab; he paid his bills at his lodgings; he bade adieu to London. He was driven to the station of the South-Eastern Railway Company. He journeyed to Dover en route for India viâ Marseilles.

He remained in India five years.

He was a miserable man the while. He had no news of Rose Osborne. He did not write to her; no letter came from her. His love affair—the romance of his life—seemed to have terminated abruptly, to have become suddenly shrouded in an impenetrable mystery. Often and often he asked himself why Rose had not replied to his love-letter?

Had there been any mistake? As he knew, mistakes must happen at times. Suppose she had sent a telegram, and suppose there had been error in the address, or inadvertence on the part of the telegraph-boy; and suppose the telegram had been delivered not to Major Black, but to Colonel Blake, at his lodgings, a little lower down in Jermyn-street! It was absurd, perhaps; yet there was an element of reason in the notion. There was nothing impossible about it; and really it afforded an explanation, after a fashion, of a circumstance that was otherwise inexplicable.

But the Major could not resist a grim and desperate laugh—a gaunt sort of mirth not wholly inconsistent with his condition of gloom and despondency—as he pictured to himself his red-nosed friend, Colonel Blake of the Artillery, musing over the telegram "Yes," and wondering what on earth it signified! What question had he asked of anyone to which this was the proper answer? How strangely perplexed he would be! What if he should imagine that the widow lady in the West of England had reconsidered her decision, and had rejected the gentleman who so prospered in the coal trade in favour of him, her military suitor, Colonel Blake!

But the Major (by-the-way he had now attained the rank of Colonel) could not permit himself much lively and fanciful entertainment of this kind. As a rule, his mood was one of exceeding depression. He was very weary of India. He was sick of the service. He yearned to be in England again. And he had a reason for this yearning. He should not return home again without an object. He wanted to know about Rose.

Presently he had turned his back upon India for ever. He had quitted the service. His name appeared upon the list of retired Colonels. He was again in London, and he was inquiring if he could resume occupation of his room over the bootmaker's. This time the landlady recognised him, although he was now but the ghost of his former self, he was so thin and bent, and his moustache and his side tufts of hair were quite white.

"Dear me, Sir!" she said, "and to think of your calling to-day, of all days in the week! Why, it was only this morning I was turning over those papers you left behind you, as the girl wanted to light the fires with; but I wouldn't let her, knowing that gentlemen's particular about their papers and such like being burned, and feeling certain as you'd come back to your room again when you was next in England, Sir. You see, I know gentlemen's ways, as I did ought to, having let lodgings to them now for so many years. And I'm glad to see you back again, I'm sure, Major Black—heartily glad."

"Yes; but papers—what papers?"

"Well, Sir, I thought it best to take care of them, for when you come to gentlemen's papers there's never any knowing for certain when they're of value and when they ain't. Letters and bits of letters they seemed to be, but I'm not very clever at reading handwriting. But one of them I remember looked for all the world like a love-letter."

"A love-letter!" cried Major Black.

"Yes, Sir, a love-letter or an offer of marriage, I won't be quite sure which, and, of course, they ain't quite the same thing, though sometimes they may seem like it."

Presently she handed him a little soiled crumpled packet. He opened it with fingers that would tremble though he tried hard to prevent them. And then he uttered a strange cry. Among many odd scraps and fragments and rough draughts of his love-letter to Rose Osborne, he found the love-letter itself which should have been in her hands five years before; but somehow, as it seemed, had never left the lodging-house in Jermyn-street.

Colonel Black was looking over the neat box hedge encompassing the garden at Summerleas. But he did not see Rose this time, nor MacGillcvray the gardener. His eyes rested upon a board announcing that the house was to be Let or Sold. And then he perceived that the place was deserted—the window-shutters were closed—the garden was in a neglected state—the house was empty.

He learned upon inquiry in the village that Miss Sarah Osborne had been dead some three years; that Miss Rose Osborne had gone away, none knew whither.

It is necessary to be brief now. Colonel Black's search for Rose may not be fully related.

He found her at last. She was unmarried. That part of the discovery was a prodigious relief to him. She was a governess in the family of a wealthy manufacturer in the north of England. Through a pane of glass, the Colonel peered into the school-room and found Rose, pale and thin and saddened, and somewhat suffering, yet, as he avowed, more beautiful than ever, teaching French to three little girls with flaxen heads and rather red noses.

"Rose!" he said, in a low voice, as he softly opened the window.

"Yes!" she answered. He had waited six years to hear that word!

"Rose! My Rose!"

She recognised him instantly, but her face was very white, and there was a frightened look in her eyes as she advanced to meet him.

"At last!" she murmured. And then but for his aid she would have fallen. He held her tightly in his arms, however.

"My poor child!" he said. "Forgive me and pity me. People say there's no fool like an old fool; and, faith, I think they're right. You must have thought me very unkind, cruel, heartless."

"If you had only written a line, Major Black, I think I could have borne it better."

"I did write, Rose; that is what I want to tell you."

"I received this—only this—five years ago!" She took from e bosom an envelope addressed to her at Summerleas. Colonel Black's handwriting appeared upon the envelope, but it contained—a blank sheet of paper only!

"I know—I know!" he said desperately. "Some cruel fatality has been at work! I was mad, I think, my dear; I was fairly beside myself; but it was because of my great love for you, Rose. It turned my brain. This letter should have gone in the envelope." He produced the missing letter. "But somehow—I cannot explain it, for I cannot understand it—it did not get into the envelope, or it slipped out again. But see there, it's in the envelope now, and it has safely reached your hands at last. Better late than never. Read it, Rose, dearest. I know little enough about love-letters; but it tells you—what I now tell you by word of mouth on my knees, Rose—that I love you with all my heart and soul, and that I implore you to be mine!"

If he had but spoken instead of writing five years before, or if he had been but a little more careful in dispatching his love-letter! But then the perturbation of his feelings! the intensity of his love! What wonder that he lost his senses. But—"All's well that ends well!" he murmured, as he clasped his Rose Osborne to his heart.

He found himself forgiven, and fondly loved. Soon he was to make the further discovery that he was the supremely happy husband of an adorable wife.

Yet very often the Colonel was tempted to repine. "It was a cruel, cruel thing," he said; "especially when my age is borne in mind. I was simply cheated, or I cheated myself, out of five years of happiness. I can never recover those five lost years."

His wife demanded: "May it not be, dearest, that we are the happier now because of our five years of doubt and suspense and despair? We were serving an apprenticeship!"

The Colonel said something about his being too old to serve an apprenticeship, and then dropped the subject. He had to be busy in the cellar, indeed. For his old friend, Colonel Blake, of the Artillery—still a bachelor, and with a nose redder than ever—was coming to dinner.

MY FIRST AND LAST PROPOSALS.

MY FIRST PROPOSAL.

Fifty years ago. Could I have dreamed then that——

But I must not anticipate. That is to say, I must go back, trudge back, the long, long high road to the very first stage, when I see little Tom Brindley, a fine lad—he was always thus complimented—on the eve of going to school, at the age of ten. Tom was the son of a great man who had made money in the iron way—and by the iron Ways—not a merchant prince, but a sort of merchant lord, and as proud as if he were a real prince. My father—for I am Tom Brindley—had a large family of boys and girls, and we all "played about" in beautiful grounds, and had each a pony, with masters and governesses, and lived in the lap of luxury among graperies and hot-houses. We were great people indeed. That is if the root of all evil sprouts up into greatness. And the time that Tom was to go to school—to, of course, the greatest school that money could secure—had now arrived.

I was in terrible trouble. For long I had known that the blow was impending, that the step was being talked of by Government in councils. But I did not think it was so near. One day it—the stroke—came, short and sharp; my father announcing in his decisive way, "Tom, Sir, you must go to Eton on the tenth." Just a fortnight. O the misery, the blankness, the chill at my heart! To come at such a moment, when my fair hopes were in the ear! And all my happiness —— But once more I am anticipating. Our modest little village church, to which we repaired on Sundays in state—Government in a brougham and pair, the family in a large waggonette—was served by the Rev. Mr. Pearkes, the Curate, the Rector being in bad health and living abroad; where, indeed, he was soon expected to die. It would be unbecoming to say hoped, but I fear such was the fact. Mr. Pearkes supported an immense family, on the usual stipend, and, it was understood, was to succeed. He was a dreamy, poetical being, who liked fishing and did not look sad or whine over his difficulties. He had a daughter, of my own age, and—— Here I must pause.

Of all the entanglements that hamper life, nothing, it will be admitted, can compare for embarrassment with those for which the other sex is responsible. How many wretched shipwrecks may be set down to this—when the navigator, even with foreknowledge, and what sailors term a wide berth before him, declines to keep his course clear and will run on certain destruction!

Here was I, now, a clever boy, as I was told often, with the world opening before me, about to be made a man of, consumed with the most hopeless passion that ever preyed on the vitals of boyhood.

Abigail was her name—a plump, rosy little nymph, whom I have seen dispose of a plate of bread-and-butter in masterly style; nay, in a most bewitching way plead for a slice of mine in addition. That made no difference. Every one in the parish knew that I adored her, except, I suppose, my father, who was too busy with his iron to notice such a trifle. Often used I to make my way down to the Rectory, and as we were both fond of mystery, we rarely met but by appointment, in a concealed and remote part of the garden, where there was a delightful swing. A swing was considered too vulgar for opulent children such as we were at Brindley. Seated side by side, and somewhat squeezed (but we found no objection to that), we spent such happy hours! The time flew by, until, as before explained, the bolt fell, and we were reduced to the lowest pitch of human wretchedness. I was, at last.

Shall I ever forget that evening when, in the swing, I told her that I madly loved her; that we must not be parted; and that we must—well, do something! "O! but didn't you," she cried, without being so much agitated as I had expected, "hear the news? O! such delightful, good news!" The old Rector's dead at last, and papa and all of us are going to be so happy! Old Mr. Brindley is to give him the place, and I am to have a new dress, and there's to be—such fun!"

Well, I had hoped for a little more tragic sympathy. But "it was her nature to." I saw that all lay upon me, me the MAN! And that I must up and do. And do quickly if I did at all.

I went straight to Mr. Pearkes and told him that "I loved his daughter." He was reading poetry at the time. He was a man that was never surprised. "But," said he gravely, "you are both too young—are you not?" he added, in a hesitating way. But I told him we could wait—wait for years, if necessary (which it was), while I was at school. That he might speak to my father. We could be engaged. Her education would be going on with mine. "O, dear Sir, it must be." "Very well," said Mr. Pearkes. "Really, now, I give you my word, I did not think there was so much poetry left in the world. By-the-way, I have to go to Mr. Brindley about the Living, and I could mention it—eh?"

"Do, do, my dear Sir; the very thing. We will wait for you here."

Mr. Pearkes, singing a love song himself, got his hat and stick and walked gaily off to Brindley. We went into the garden and got into the swing once more, and swung ourselves up into the seventh heaven, the little lady being gradually worked into a sort of delightful anticipation of the joys of being "engaged." So we swung and swung on.

We waited long.

The result may be summarised. The next morning at daybreak I was "packed off"—the very words used by Mr. Brindley—to school, and within three weeks the swing in the Rectory Garden was being used by new children—i.e., children of a new Rector. Alas! Poor Mr. Pearkes!—his poetry, his long family, and the bewitching little Abigail had been "packed off" too. Curacy, all, was lost.

MY LAST PROPOSAL.

That was fifty years ago. Could I have dreamed then——

I may now anticipate. But for Mrs. Hawkins I certainly should never have recovered. Her tender interest, her unwearying solicitude, and never-flagging watchfulness "pulled me through," as it is called. That day, near the Beachside Hotel, when I was run over by the mail-phaeton and carried insensible into the hotel, had nearly proved my death. And, on recovering, it was my worthy physician, who, on receiving about his fortieth fee, declared to me solemnly, "Under Providence, my dear Sir, you owe your recovery to Mrs. Hawkins and her watchful care."

Though not knowing this literally, I had been conscious of it all the time. A buxom widow lady staying at the hotel—so the friendly doctor told me—had seen the poor shattered gentleman carried in, and had asked had he no friends or relations to be written to? Naturally, they could tell nothing; nor could he, for other reasons.

Alas! the great Brindley, my father, had long since passed away, having been ruined first, his children dispersed—dead, or struggling in far-off colonies—and the bold Tom Brindley, having gone into a dashing Hussar regiment, had been forced, when the crash came, to pass into a foot regiment and, after serving abroad many years, to retire on half pay. This had not been a cheerful life for Tom; and when Tom met this accident he felt literally that he was alone in the world.

But how strange! Fifty years ago? Could I have dreamed, then, the words with which I commenced this story. But hear Mrs. Hawkins herself, presently, that is.

"How shall I ever repay you?" I said, as I sat leaning on my stick. "You have snatched me from death."

"By getting well," she said, as she smiled. Her rather plain face looked as handsome as good nature can make a face look. "You must go to the sea, take plenty of exercise, the doctor says."

I laughed. "That I can't do, if I were, as the vulgar say, to swing for it."

She looked at me steadily.

"And that is not so bad a form of exercise."

"What?"

"The swing. Did you ever try it when a boy?"

There was something strange in that face—a kind of softening of the lines, much like the quivering that takes place in dissolving views.

"Good gracious!" I exclaimed. "What is your name? What was it?"

"Strange that you never asked even my Christian name all this time. It is Abigail—the Abigail that once sat in the swing with you, and that"——

"I caused, by my folly, to be cast out on the world, ruined. O, I see it now!"

"Not so bad as that," she said, smiling; "and so you recollect the swing?"

Then I made my last Proposal. PERCY FITZGERALD.

CHRISTMAS WAITS IN THE OLDEN TIME.

Here is a trio of old English minstrels, with their hautboy, fiddle, and bagpipe, striking up a tuneful strain beneath the lighted window of a comfortable mansion, the dwelling of some gentlefolk, as shown by the sculptured crest on the wall. It puts us back into the fifteenth century, to reckon from their fashion of dress, and that will do pretty well for "the olden time." There is a diversity of opinions concerning the origin and first meaning of the title "waits." Dr. Busby holds that this word is a corruption of "wayghtes"—that is to say, hautboys or recorders, the pleasing little wind-instrument commonly used by the leader of the band, who was often merely accompanied by a harp or a fiddle. It is not unlikely that the plural name of the instrument, "wayghtes," having no singular form, would come to be transferred to the company of performers. On the other hand, from Rymer's "Fœdera" we learn that in the King's Court there were certain musical watchmen, whose duty was "to pipe the watch" every night; three times a night in the summer, four times a night between Michaelmas and Shrove Tuesday; and on Christmas Eve they would furnish the music of a sacred carol.

THE OLD MILL ON THE MARSH.

BY W. W. FENN.

A rough account of the adventure which I am about to narrate was partly written down by me soon after it happened, now a long time ago, and it is a strange fact that at the end of all these years I should be stirred to put it into shape and finish it by seeing my friend Mr. Samuel Read's drawing of "The Old Mill on the Marsh," at the Black and White Exhibition last summer; but such is the case, for the still stranger fact is that the picture so exactly represents the dreary aspect of the scene and the general look of the mill on that wild autumn evening that one can hardly think the circumstance a mere coincidence: had I been the artist, and equally skilled, I might have made the sketch as it stands on the spot. Coincidence only it can be, nevertheless, even to the light in the window of the little tumble-down house, which must thus have shone during part of the time I spent there.

Out for an autumn holiday, I was wandering late one wet and windy afternoon along a certain lonely road in the Eastern Counties when I first came in sight of this solitary mill. It did not appear to be very distant from the highway, and, having a queer, dreamy predilection for poking my nose into strange and unusual places, I was naturally induced to bend my steps towards this quaint, picturesque, tumble-down structure. Only, after trudging along for a quarter of a mile or so, the narrow track or cartway, which turned out of the main road towards the mill, did I begin to discover that it was very much farther off than I supposed. The heavy rain which had been falling all the morning had made the stretch of flat and dreary marsh across which I was going a complete swamp in many places. More than once I missed the road in the mire, and got half-way up to my knees in bog; but I cared nothing for that sort of thing in those days. I rather gloried in it, and was never put off my propensity for exploring by trifles.

When within a few hundred yards of my bourne, I halted to enjoy the wild, weird, solitude of the scene, which was in thorough harmony with my mood. Not a living creature was in sight—not another building or human habitation. The wind-riven clouds in the west were fringed with an angry light from the declining sun, and the chilly blast moaned dolefully as it swept through the sails and rigging of the mill (which was at rest) and round the ramshackle dwelling-house attached to it. There was no evidence either of life, any more inside the place than out of it, for I pushed on to the half-open door of the cottage and looked in. It seemed utterly deserted. Closer inspection, however, showed that it had been lately inhabited, poor and miserable as the kitchen or sort of house-place looked in the dimness of the now fast-increasing twilight. I wandered all round the mill, peeped in upon the conglomeration of wheels, cranks, and ladders, returned to the door of the cottage, peeped in there again, wandered round the whole affair once more, still saw no one, regretted there was no time to make a sketch, and finally turned my face towards the track of swampy road by which I had come. Immediately I did so, I saw I was in a fix; it was nearly dark, and now that I looked away from where the sun had gone down, I could scarcely distinguish earth from sky. In two minutes I had missed the road, and was up to my knees in bog; but, struggling back, and regaining the way, I trudged on for fifty yards, it might be, fairly well. Suddenly I was floundering once more in the swamp, and now sinking deeper and deeper. I knew enough of the dangers of marsh and fen to make me aware that this was no joke; in fact, I had a squeak for it, and I might in another moment have been irretrievably swallowed up by the treacherous bog. But I got out of it somehow, returned to the cottage, and determined that nothing should tempt me away from it without a guide and a lantern. So, rapping loudly at the door and shouting at the top of my voice, I listened. There was not a sound save the rising and falling of the melancholy wind. Clearly there was no one within hail. Walking boldly into the room I called aloud once more; still, all was silent.

To cut short this part of my story, I determined, after much deliberation, to stay where I was, come what might, till some one, or daylight, appeared. To attempt to find my way back was a sheer impossibility. I struck a match, found a half-burned candle on the smoky mantle-shelf, lighted it and looked about. A miserable hole, truly, to spend the night in! But there seemed nothing else for it.

At the farther end of the apartment were a truckle bed and some old dilapidated bits of furniture. Near the fire-place, which was close to the window, was a high-backed and cushioned settle, and on this at last I stretched myself at full length, determining to fill up the dreary waiting, if I could, with a nap, for I was very tired.

Letting the meagre candle gutter and burn out in its socket, I was presently in total darkness and fast asleep. I fancy I slept some hours, and that it was nearly midnight when I was aroused by voices. No! not voices—one voice—that of an old man, evidently talking to himself. This fact I arrived at as soon as I was conscious. He had entered the room whilst I was asleep, and clearly had not observed me, hidden, as my recumbent form was, by the high back of the settle. He was now standing with a lantern close to the bed, his back towards me, chattering away to himself in the most voluble fashion. A tallish, grey-haired man, with round, stooping shoulders, and thin, guitered legs.

"Mike; Mike, old man, you're late to-night, you're late. Terrible dark till the moon rose; couldn't get on, couldn't get on," were the first words distinctly audible, and, of course, then was the time that I ought to have disclosed myself, but I was in a lazy, drowsy state, disinclined to move, and somehow I hesitated until it seemed too late, for the next minute, having stood the lantern on a shelf, he had taken a small bag from the pocket of his rough smock, and was emptying out of it a little stream of sovereigns on to the counterpane of his bed.

"There 's a fine sight! There 's a fine lot!" he went on, in croaking, spluttering tones. "Oh! my golden boys! Ha, ha! you 'll swell the store. You 'll pile it up, won't ye? Ho, ho! my precious pippins; you 're the chaps for me! How I love ye, how I love ye, don't I? There, you 're all safe now. Nothing like being open and above board; nothing so safe as things that are never locked up. If I was to put ye under lock and key, somebody 'ud be sure to find ye out, and get at ye; if I was to bar and bolt this broken-down old shop, and make a show of securing myself from being robbed, people 'ud think I had got something to rob! They 'd say, 'Old Mike 's a miser; he 's got a rare lot o' money, you may depend.' That fool Jack Turrell, my nephew, and his slut of a wife and all their brats, 'ud be swarming round me like flies on honey, if they didn't think I was as poor as Job! But who 'ud ever think that a man with all the swag I've got in the house 'ud leave door and window open and unfastened. He wouldn't be such a born fool, they 'd say; no man would! He, he, he! Ha, ha, ha!" and the old fellow chuckled, and rubbed his hands exultingly in the intervals when he was not dabbling them in the heap of gold, or counting and piling up the sovereigns in little pillars. "Why, I should be robbed and murdered within a week if I wasn't to keep open house and show everybody that there was nothing to steal. Ho, ho! it 's rarely cunning of me, that it is! Folks thinks now what little money I have is all in the bank, and don't suppose I have a penny of it here; but where 'ud be the use, the use of the money in the bank to me? I can't see it, and kiss it, and love it, there! No, no, my precious boys, I'm too fond of ye for that! Now, let 's have up all your brothers and sisters, and put ye all together, ye 'll make a rare sight by this time! A rare fine family party!"

With this the old fellow lifted the foot of the bedstead away from the wall, and with his foot kicked aside a battered old hat-box standing under the bed. Then, stooping, he raised the plank in the floor, which had thus been discovered, and diving his hands into the aperture, began to pull out some dozen or more strong canvas bags, each evidently filled with his precious golden stores. Then, one by one, he emptied their contents on to the first pile of sovereigns until really an enormous heap of gold lay upon the bed. Then the wretched old man literally shrieked and gasped with excitement and exultation at the sight, and, dropping on his knees, half buried his face and head in the coin, whilst his bony old hands nervously clutched at it or drove themselves greedily down into its depths.

I was spell-bound by the strange and horrid spectacle which had thus, as it seemed, suddenly burst in upon my sleep, like a dreadful nightmare. Had prudence not warned me to remain motionless I doubt if I could, for the time being, have moved or spoken, so strange an effect had this exhibition of the frantic delirious stage of the passion of avarice on my nerves. I take it, it is given but to few to witness it, and certainly I shall never forget it. For fully half an hour did the wretched man revel in, and prolong, his horrid orgy, I can call it nothing else, sheer exhaustion alone appearing to bring it to an end. Panting and foaming at the mouth, he at last stretched himself upon the bed, his head still pillowed on the gold, and for a time lay quite quiet, save for the tremulous twitching of the fingers as they continued dabbling amongst the coin. By degrees he sat upright, and then, counting his hoard methodically, still giving vent at intervals to explosive mutterings of exultation and of his frenzied and loathly lust for gold, gradually replaced it in the bags, never even for a moment casting a glance into the dark obscurity of that end of the room where I lay, the involuntary witness of this strange scene; no, nor ever taking his eyes off the money, but looking as if he would have devoured it with them if he could, until the last sovereign had disappeared, and the precious, useless dross put back in its hiding-place. Then in two minutes he had undressed, blown out his lantern, and, I suppose, tumbled into bed, for within a quarter of an hour he was snoring loudly.

When well assured that he could not be easily awakened, I for the first time sat up to wait for the tardy daylight. I could not move until it appeared, for I dared not risk letting the old man know of my presence after what I had seen. Setting aside the possibility of an accusation of being found on the premises with a felonious intent, I had no taste for coming in contact with the detestable old brute. So, patiently, I waited and waited, till a faint and sickly streak of light from a waning moon was increased sufficiently by the coming dawn to show me the dingy window-blind, and enable me, noiselessly and on tiptoe, to find the door, and slip out into the fresh morning air.

Very soon the cloudless sky was bright enough for me to steer clear of the bog, and within another hour or so I had left far behind me "The Old Mill on the Marsh."

* * * * * *

Jack Turrell! Jack Turrell his nephew! This name which the miser had uttered was familiar to me. I had known a youngster at Cambridge so called—a hard-working, capital fellow, but very poor, and who had come to terrible grief. After taking orders, he married some extravagant woman—a widow, with a lot of children—who had let him in, as I had heard, for no end of debt; that he had separated from her; and that it was with the greatest difficulty he could keep body and soul together.

Could this Jack Turrell, by any chance, be the nephew? I determined to find out; for, if he were, it might be just as well that he should know of the resources possessed by his aged and respectable relative at the mill. The inquiries I set on foot led to the discovery that the Turrell in question was none other than my old college friend. He had always been very close concerning his family and connections, so that the kinship did not surprise me. But where was he to be heard of? He was keeping out of the way; however, in the course of a few weeks, I came upon him and found him in a most terrible plight.

In a miserable lodging, in the back slums of Kentish Town, he lay all but at death's door—this scholarly, high-minded, generous-hearted fellow, as I knew him to be, who had entirely by his own hard work and unaided efforts taken first-class University honours, and then, by one fatal mistake, had wrecked his life. I sought the parish doctor who was attending him.

"Is there no chance, no hope for him?" I asked.

"None, unless he could afford to go abroad. Two or three years' residence in a southern climate might restore him. Short of that, his days are numbered."

I took a resolution; I went off to the Eastern Counties, and for the second time found my way to "the Old Mill on the Marsh."

History repeats itself—it was, indeed, doing so now. Little could I have calculated on ever crossing that threshold again. Yet, there I was! loudly knocking at the door and shouting at the top of my voice, exactly as I had done three months before; and, as before, getting no answer. Again I am entering the sordid, miserable hovel: once more it seems to be untenanted. But a second glance discovers the old man stretched upon his wretched pallet, much as I must have left him on that eventful morning.

Is he asleep? I walk up to the bed, and the first look tells me that he is. But he will never awake! He will never again add another penny to his hoard! He must have been dead some hours, for he is stiff and cold.

I see that all legal steps are properly taken, and a seal put upon the premises; but I keep my secret for the present. Then I hasten away to the bedside of my friend.

So worn did he look that I trembled as I asked him,

"Hadn't you an uncle a miller? I heard of him accidentally, and also that he has just died; have you no claim on his estate!"

"Estate! my dear fellow! he was as poor as Job, and could barely make a living for himself, out of his business."

"But what relatives had he? any besides yourself?"

"No, none; if he had anything to be heir to I should be his heir, but he had nothing."

"Can you bear a great surprise, old friend, news of something that will show you the way to hope, health, and prosperity?"

He smiled wearily, and said no such luck was in store for him, but if it were he thought he could bear it well!

Then I told him my story, and, to make an end of it here, I need only add that John Turrell proved his claim on the miser's hoard, which, but for my timely discovery of it, might have lain perdu for years beneath the rotten old flooring of the mill cottage, and until it would have been too late to save a dear and valuable life.

HOW JOHN MORGAN WON HIS WIFE.

BY MRS. EILOART.

The great man of Branscombe Hollow was Sir George Hauteville. He or his forefathers had come over with the Conqueror. He considered himself second to no man in the country. He had the oldest house, the finest trees, the bluest blood, the longest pedigree of any man in that part of the world. Mushroom gentry or millionaire merchants, he despised them all alike; there were plenty in the neighbourhood, as it was but twenty miles from London. He was thoroughly satisfied with himself and his belongings. The prettiest girl in the kingdom called him uncle, and the only fault she had in his eyes was one that, in the case of a pretty girl, as she was, was sure to be cured some day or other, and that was that she wore the name of Brown.

Years ago he had cast off her mother because she chose to marry an Ensign in a marching regiment, who bore that name. The Ensign became a Lieutenant, and then died, leaving Mrs. Brown, with one daughter, not at all well provided for. Then it was that I first knew them. They lived next door to my mother, who, like Mrs. Brown, was a widow, and, like her, had a small income and one child—myself. It was a little country town where we lived, and our street was the genteelest, and poorest, and dullest in the place. Nelly Brown and I knew each other from the time we were children; I can't remember the time that we didn't know each other. Our mothers had trouble enough to keep up appearances and give us each a decent education; but these troubles did not affect our happiness, and, when Nelly was sixteen and I barely twenty, we were solemnly engaged to each other.

That was on my first return from walking the hospitals in London. I was to be a medical man, as my father had been before me. My mother had set her heart on that—how she managed to make me one was one of those miracles that mothers only know how to accomplish. But a doctor in good time I became, and went home to announce the fact that I had passed my examination with honours, and to meet with the severest disappointment that had yet befallen me.

Nelly's mother was dead. That in itself was a great blow to me. She was the kindest friend and truest lady I had ever known; but that was not all. Nelly's uncle, who had ignored her existence and that of her mother during the lifetime of the latter, had made his appearance at Waring as soon as he heard of his sister's death, followed at her funeral, and taken Nelly away with him to his place at Branscombe.

Nelly had left a little letter for me with my mother, in which she said she was "still the same as ever," and how many times I read that letter I decline to say. But still Nelly was, to all practical purposes, out of my world altogether. If not exactly her uncle's heiress—the estate was entailed in the male line, which was represented by a distant cousin—still, as the acknowledged niece of Sir George Hauteville, living under his roof, mixing in society to which no mere professional man could aspire, she would be as much out of my reach as would be any one of the Royal Princesses.

That was the way my mother argued—sorrowfully enough, for she was very fond of Nelly; but her arguments failed to convince me. If Nelly herself was still the same as ever, nothing should part us, and I would yet win her for my wife.

Of course, I wrote in answer to the letter, and Nelly wrote back, lovingly and tenderly as ever. This went on for a little while; then came a break in our correspondence. She had thought it due to her uncle to acquaint him with our engagement; in fact, circumstances—which circumstances I construed to mean another and unwelcome suitor—made it necessary that she should do so. Then Sir George forbade the correspondence, and desired that the engagement should be given up. Nelly did not enter into particulars; but I fancy he had been rather peremptory. However, my dear girl kept her faith, though she said that, while under Sir George's roof, she could not disobey him by writing to or receiving letters from me; and so we must wait in silence till better times, which I interpreted till I could make a home for her.

That very day I saw an advertisement in the Times for a medical assistant in Lorton, which, as I knew very well, was the nearest town to Branscombe Hollow. That advertisement I answered; that situation I obtained; and judge of my delight when I found that my employer was the medical attendant of the whole establishment at Branscombe Hall, including Sir George himself.

It was a capital berth, independently of the especial reasons which made it so delightful to me. There was plenty of practice, a good salary; my employer was a gentleman, and treated me like one; and if, now and then, he took things rather easily, and liked a run up to town in the opera season, or to follow the hounds when hunting came round, why that only gave me yet more opportunities of improving in a profession to which, for Nelly's sake as well as its own, I had devoted myself heart and soul. But Dr. Gordon had no wish to overwork me; I might have had more leisure on weekdays than I chose to take; but, to his surprise, all I asked for was ample time on Sunday mornings to attend church, intimating at the same time that there was no church in Lorton I cared to go to. He had no objection to this; nay, he was such a good-natured old bachelor that perhaps he guessed my motives, for he told me, with a laugh, that I might worship where and whom I pleased.

So every Sunday morning Dr. Gordon went to the parish church at Lorton, at the risk of being interrupted in his devotions; and I took a two-mile walk to the old church at Branscombe Hollow, where, in its pew of state, surrounded by his lowlier neighbours, Sir George set a good example to those beneath him by the loudness with which he uttered the responses and the profound attention he gave to the sermon. He never saw me; but somebody else did. The very first Sunday Nelly espied me, though I was half hidden behind a pillar, and blushed and brightened with the loveliest, deepest crimson. She passed me when she went out. I touched her dress; I caught one kind glance; and I went home the happiest, most hopeful fellow under the sun. This lasted for a year. One whole twelvemonth, let the weather be what it might—hail, rain, snow or wind—I went my two-mile walk, and was rewarded with the sight of Nelly, but never interchanged a word with or received a line from her.

Then I got tired of waiting so quietly, and I wrote to Nelly asking her if I might not now appeal to Sir George to let us at least correspond. I had for answer that I might try, but that the trial would be useless. And so it proved. I wrote to Sir George, stating that I was making way in my profession; that I hoped, before many years were past, to be able to provide a home for a wife; that I had no wish for any dowry with her; and that, as Nelly's engagement with me had been sanctioned by her late mother, I could not consider myself unduly presumptuous in asking him, as Nelly's guardian, to sanction it likewise.

Sir George did not keep me waiting for an answer, and the answer was a plain one. He professed himself to be astounded at my audacity; at the same time he was good enough to say that a doctor might be a gentleman, and that if I had made such a footing in my profession as Fergusson or Gull, and others of a similar standing had done, he might have taken my proposal into consideration; but, for a mere country apothecary—a stripling with his way to make, and nothing to show that he was ever likely to make such way—to aspire to the hand of Sir George Hauteville's niece, was an unequalled piece of presumption.

I folded up that letter, and I said to myself, "I'll not only aspire to Sir George's niece, but I'll win her." Then I went about my day's duties, took my round of patients, and came home—it was Saturday night—happy in the thought that to-morrow I should at least rejoice in the sight of my Nelly.

She looked very unhappy when I did see her. Her eyes were red, and her face was pale. I heard afterwards that Sir George had insisted that she should think no more of me; that he had spoken of my presumption in the severest terms, and had done his best to make her promise to break off with me entirely. I went home very unhappy, blaming my unlucky stars that I could not at once offer Nelly a home, and wondering what would be the smallest pittance on which we could keep house together. To think of her being under that old martinet's authority! He would break her heart! He would crush her spirit! I was full of a thousand apprehensions for her; and the one look she had given me on leaving the church, which seemed so full of suffering patience, haunted me all the night through.

In the morning, when I went down, I found Dr. Gordon in scarlet, and as full of spirits as he generally was when a day's hunting was before him. "I must leave all to you to-day," he said. "Luckily, there is not much in hand. We are to meet at Sir George's; and, if the fox only does his duty, I don't know at what time you will see me back to-night. I dare say I shall dine at the Hall. Sir George generally takes a few of us home after a day's sport; and I know I can leave everything to you."

He made his breakfast as calmly as if he were not going into Nelly's presence; as if to be at the Hall, to see her, to sit by her side, was the most everyday event that could befall him. I don't know which was the predominant feeling in my mind, envy of his good fortune, or indignation at the indifference with which he regarded it. Poor fellow! he rode away cheerily enough, little thinking of the price he was to pay for that day's sport.

When I came home at six, expecting my dinner, to which I was prepared to do ample justice, Mrs. Simpson, Dr. Gordon's housekeeper, met me in the hall with a troubled face. Would I go up stairs and see her master? He had had a bad accident in the hunting-field, and they had brought him home an hour ago. He was quite sensible, and had been asking repeatedly for me. I went up to him at once.

"Another patient, Morgan," he said, with a laugh. He was evidently in great pain, but perfectly cheerful. "You'll have double work on your hands a little longer than we either of us bargained for. I've damaged my leg a good deal. You'll be able to do all that's wanted for me; and in a few weeks I shall be about again. But Sir George is in a worse fix than I am. Our two horses took the same hedge almost at the same moment, and rolled over each other. The poor animals are done for, and it's a miracle Sir George and I have not shared their fate."

I saw to his hurt, which was not alarming; and then he spoke again of Sir George. "He fell on his face and bruised it awfully. I saw it when they raised him; and I fancied, by what I heard, he had some internal injury. His horse rolled on him. My poor Dick simply threw me. We were both of us perfectly sensible when we had had a little brandy, and I asked if he would have you to attend him? He answered that he didn't want boys, and told those about him to send his groom off to town for Sir W. H——" (at that time there was no telegraph office within a dozen miles). "Curious chance, wasn't it, for a man's doctor to be disabled by the same accident that laid himself up? There, now go and get your dinner; and tell Mrs. Simpson to make me some toast-and-water and keep the house quiet. I should like to sleep, if I can."

I ate my solitary dinner, then crept softly up to the door of the Doctor's room, and was glad to find him in a sound sleep. Then I had to go out again, to a couple of rather serious cases in the town; and, having duly attended to them, I thought I would go to the station and see if the great medico from London had come. I found Sir George's carriage waiting there; and the station-master told me the train by which Sir William H—— was expected would be shortly in. I thought I should like to have a good look at him again, and see how time was dealing with him. So I went on the platform; but, as far as seeing Sir William was concerned, with no result. Half a dozen passengers stepped out when the train came in, but not one of them was the great doctor. "It's a bad look out for Sir George," said the station-master; and, unless they put on a special for him, there won't be another down train for five hours."

Five hours! A badly-bruised face, eyesight injured, perhaps gone; serious internal hurts, and a heavy elderly man. I cast up the little sum, and the total was very unfavourable to the master of Branscombe Hall. Why couldn't he have let me attend him; or, at any rate, do what I could till the great gun came down from London. For the last six months I had had more than half Dr. Gordon's patients on my hands, with results that had been very satisfactory both to themselves and to him; and I really did not see why I could not attend to Sir George's hurts as well as to those of the carter over whose legs his waggon-wheels had gone, or the ploughman on whose body his own horses had trodden. I resolved to go to the house and offer my services, till Sir William came. They could but be rejected; and, at any rate, I should have done my duty. I went up to the coachman, as he sat in state on his box. He had evidently been consoling himself for his master's injuries with an extra glass. "Wait here for five minutes," I said, "till I get one or two things I want, and then you can take me up to Sir George."

"You be the doctor, I suppose, Sir?" he said, and touched his hat with a shaky forefinger.

"I am a doctor," I answered, which I thought was information enough for him; "but I can't work without my tools, and I haven't got them all with me."

I hurried home, put up instruments, bandages, and other still appliances, gave a hasty look at Dr. Gordon, who was sleeping soundly, told Mrs. Simpson I might be out all night as I had a very bad case in hand, and gave her ample directions as to the proper attendance on her master, and then went off in state to the Hall, the coachman who drove me firmly believing that he had the honour of driving Sir William H——. We met with no accident on the road, which was almost more than I had expected, considering the state of my charioteer; and when we arrived at the house found the upper servants anxiously expecting us. I did not think it necessary to give either butler or housekeeper any explanations, but asked to be shown to Sir George's room at once. Nelly was there, sitting by his side. She gave a little start when she saw me, but I held up my finger to enjoin silence, and turned at once to my patient. His face was fearfully bruised and swollen, and his eyes were closed—it would be days, I expected, before he would be able to open them. He was perfectly conscious, however, and informed me, in answer to the first question I put, that I had been "a devil of a time coming."

"If you will allow me to explain, Sir George," I said.

"I do not want any explanations. Now you have come, do what you can for me, or I shall be dead before the morning," he said, testily.

He was evidently in great pain, possibly in danger, I would do what I could for him pending H——'s arrival, and make my explanations when he was able to hear them. I asked Nelly to leave the room—if I had been H—— himself I couldn't have done it in a more professional manner—and then, with the help of the valet and butler, I set to work.

Sir George was severely injured, that was certain. I didn't feel at all sure that, if H—— came, he would be able to pull him through. I made up my mind to remain for the night, and got a little rest, at intervals, on a couch in the room. In the morning my patient, who had had a little sleep, was rather easier, and H—— had not, as I had been expecting, made his appearance. I gave Sir George a little nourishment, myself. It required a more skilful hand than that of a servant to administer it; and, blind as he was, he evidently knew me from them, taking me, however, for Sir William.

"Must you go back to town to-day, doctor?" he said. "If any arrangements could be made for you to see me through this I should be glad. My own medical man is laid up, and the only other in the place is a boy fresh from the hospitals—and a d—d impertinent puppy into the bargain, he added, in a lower tone.

"I think I can stay for a day or two," I said, with all due professional gravity, "and then we will see how things go;" but you must allow me to leave you for a few hours, Sir George, and to send up to London for a nurse."

I saw Nelly before I went. I thought I had a right to that indulgence after my exertions in her uncle's behalf. I explained the whole state of the case to her, and advised her not to let her uncle know, when Sir William did make his appearance, that the "boy from the hospitals" had added to his impertinence by taking care of him during the night. Then I sent up to London for a suitable nurse. That messenger went and came, having duly executed his errand; but of the groom who had been dispatched for the great doctor we still saw and heard nothing. Then I went to see Dr. Morgan, who was going on very well, and whom I did not think it necessary to trouble with an account of my proceedings during the night, and, after going my rounds, went again to the Hall, where I found the nurse had arrived, but not Sir William.

Sir George was a little better, and very glad to have me back. I began to feel more hopeful, but still quite aware that Death would not give him up too easily. Then, as I looked on him, I decided on my course. I would try and save him. The case was bad, but it was a straightforward one enough, and, I honestly believed, was one that any fairly competent medical man, who could give the due care and attention, might deal with as readily as Sir William H—— himself. I liked difficult cases. I liked the hand-to-hand fight with Death, the forcing him to give up his grasp of his expected victim. Such a contest roused a feeling of pugnacity in me, a determination not to be baffled and conquered if skill or patience could prevent it, and I only hoped now that Sir William would not make his appearance, so that I, puppy and boy as I was, might bring back to life and health the man who had so called me.

Well, as I said, the great doctor from London never came, and I went on doing his work for him. If any of the servants recognised me, which I dare say some of them did, it was no business of theirs to interfere, as their master's niece evidently regarded me as his medical attendant. Sir George was too ill at first, besides being too much impressed with a sense of his own importance, to think it very wonderful that one of the first medical men in London should find it worth his while to neglect all his London patients for the sake of a single country gentleman. When he became a little better, he would have monopolised my time completely if I would have allowed him. He had certainly taken a fancy to me, and was very pleased when I rendered him any little services which, perhaps, were more a nurse's work than a doctor's. He liked to keep me in talk, or, rather, for me to hear him talk, and had a number of strange theories in medicine and surgery which he was glad to propound to one who he imagined must be so good a judge of their feasibility. We had many a long discussion in his sick room, and I found that, when I was not there, he was never weary of uttering my praises to Nelly. I got to like him, myself, much better than at one time I could have thought possible. He was eccentric, and fearfully proud, but good and sound at heart, I was convinced. Then, too, he was very kind to Nelly, and Nelly had grown very fond of him. Altogether, I felt ready, if Sir George would only allow me to call him uncle, to make one of the best of nephews. Nelly herself was very anxious that he should know to whom he was indebted for his recovery, and one day informed me that she could not much longer keep him in ignorance of the true state of the case. He had been praising me more warmly than ever. I was not only a doctor, but a thorough good fellow, well informed, well educated, and able to hold my own anywhere. There was not a lady in the kingdom whom a man like that might not aspire to. If she, Nelly, had fallen in love with such a one he might have said something to it. Nay, he would have said something to the tune of five thousand pounds and his blessing; but to want to throw herself away on a country doctor's assistant, a fellow who would most likely be a mere apothecary all his life, was a piece of absurdity he hoped that by this time she was ashamed of.

"He must know the truth," said Nelly, "if you think he is able to bear it, John."

"If his eyes are able to bear the light he shall know everything the next time I come," I said.

All this time Sir George had had the upper part of his face so covered with bandages that he was virtually blind. Indeed, at one time, I had been afraid that he might become really so. But he was now much better, and I made up my mind, the next time I came, to remove the bandages, and let him look on the face of his doctor. He was delighted enough when I told him I thought he could bear daylight now; and looked eagerly and tenderly enough towards Nelly as soon as his eyes were free.

"We shan't fall out, my dear, even if I am not quite so handsome a fellow as I was," he said, holding out his hand to her, though I don't know that we Hautevilles—ladies, of course, excepted—were ever remarkable for good looks. Am I very much scarred, doctor," he added, turning to me. He looked at me a little curiously, then said, "Upon my word, Sir William, to have made the name you have made you're the youngest looking fellow I ever saw in my life; and—and, you'll excuse me, but there's something about your face that's rather familiar to me. I certainly have seen some one very like you in our own neighbourhood."

"That's very possible, Sir George," I said, "for I'm not half such an important personage as Sir William H——. I am a sadly insignificant person altogether; still, I can lay claim to the honour and pleasure of having attended you with very fair success since that unfortunate accident of yours."

"And where the deuce is Sir William, Sir, and, above all, who are you?"

Sir William H—— is, I believe, in London at the present time. Nothing has been heard of the man who was dispatched for him on one of your best horses, and I am John Morgan, at your service, Sir George."

My patient lost his temper so completely that I was afraid he would throw himself back and undo all my labour for the last six weeks. He would hear of no explanation, either from Nelly or me, and at last I thought it best to take my leave, and go at once to Dr. Gordon and put my case and my patient's both in his hands.

He was astonished at my audacity in conducting a case which, from what I told him, was one that would have tried the skill even of the great man whose substitute I had been. He was equally astonished at my audacity in aspiring to the hand of my patient's niece. But he was getting about now, and able to go to the Hall himself. He found Sir George in a fair way of recovery, but furious at the deception which he considered had been practised upon him. To have heard him, one would have thought I had shot the horse and murdered the groom for my own ends. But he was ready to acknowledge that I had done as much for him as Sir William himself could have done, and that I might in time be something better than a mere apothecary. Nelly reminded him of the manner in which he had expressed himself concerning me, and he was too proud a man to go back from his word. He said that, in right of my skill and talents, I was good enough for his niece, and abided, in a grim fashion of his own, by what he had said.

He gave Nelly to me, and he gave me five thousand pounds with her; and we took a house in a good part of London, and I have made way even beyond my own expectations, which were always sanguine enough.

Some months after my marriage I came across the missing groom in one of the London hospitals; and then I learned how it was I had been enabled to take Sir William H——'s place. The man had duly reached the great surgeon's house, and learned that he was at the other end of the kingdom occupied on a critical case, which it was impossible to leave for a day or two. John thought both he and his horse would be the better for rest and refreshment, and sought both at an inn he knew juts out of London. There he took somewhat more than was good for him, and soon, after he had remounted his horse, used the spur so freely that the animal, who had certainly a right to think himself entitled to return home at a slower pace than that at which he had left it, threw his rider and started off without him. John was disabled for a week. His horse, no doubt, soon found another master, but John, ashamed to return and own his misadventure, did not find it so easy to do so. He got what jobs he could in London, lived from hand to mouth, fell ill; and so I found him.

Well, of course Sir George was the loser by John's want of sobriety; but then I was very much the gainer. If he had come back straight to the Hall another great doctor would have been sent for at once, I should never have had the honour of curing Sir George, and never have had the best of wives for a fee. I forgave John, like a Christian; and he drives my carriage and pair now, and looks—and I believe his looks do not belie him—as if he never tasted anything stronger than water.

A FAMILY RELIC.

"Here is the Sword!—Now for the tale—you know
You promised us so very long ago."
Thus pleaded Nellie; while her sister Prue
Added a sweet petitionary "Do!
Tell us the story of these rusty stains,
And you shall have a sweet song for your pains."

Thus urged, their uncle took the ancestral brand,
Wellnigh too weighty for his single hand,
And thus began—"I shall not take you back
Through this sword's lengthy genealogic track;
Lest it should be like that Welsh pedigree
(As in veracious Miller you may see)
That notes—'About this time was Adam living,'
And then goes on remoter links still giving.
I'll not detail all that our archives say
Of its performance in the killing way,
Far back in mystifying history's youth,
But give one incident that's known for truth.

Sir Hugh—whose 'scutcheon in yon window glows,
Through which the light this Christmas morning flows,
And paints your heads, fair nieces, with its gold
And green and azure—in the days of old
To this, our ancient house, brought great renown,
Which others have unsullied handed down.
That was a time of lawless riot, when
The right was laughed to scorn by lawless men;
And he, a veritable Arthur in his time,
Went righting wrong and extirpating crime.
One day, o'erpowered by numbers, he was cast
Into a loathsome dungeon, bound full fast;
Where as he lay a spirit came one night—
Or such she seemed, so spiritually bright—
Drew back the bolts, loosed chains, and set him free;
Whispering, "Your sword is 'neath an apple-tree,
Close-hid, the third beyond the orchard gate;
And near some faithful followers you await.
Adieu, Sir Knight!" And the fair maiden fled
Before a word of grateful thanks was said.
Sir Hugh soon found, as told, his trusty brand—
This self-same sword—and, with his little band,
Upon the troop of base marauders flew,
And wrought dire vengeance on the fiendish crew.
Misrule and violence from the country passed,
And this good sword was sheathed in peace at last.
What of that lady fair? you ask. That dame,
Or damsel, your great-grandmama became.—ANON.

My whole in London city plain appears,
By day and night, through all the long-drawn years.
Bisect it, and my first will scatheless stand,
Most self-important being in the land;
My second plays chief part amid the hum
And clatter of a modish kettledrum.—L.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

A few drops of the FRAGRANT FLORILINE on a wet tooth-brush produce a delightful foam, which cleanses the Teeth from all impurities, strengthens and hardens the gums, prevents tartar and arrests the progress of decay. It gives to the Teeth a peculiar and beautiful whiteness, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable, and equally adapted to old and young.

The FRAGRANT FLORILINE should be used in all cases of bad breath, and particularly by gentlemen after smoking. The Floriline combines, in a concentrated form, the most desirable, cleansing, and astringent properties. At the same time, it contains nothing which can possibly injure the most sensitive and delicate organisation.

It beautifies the teeth and gums.
It arrests the decay of the teeth.
It acts as a detergent after smoking.
It renders the gums hard and healthy.
It neutralises the offensive secretions of the mouth.
It imparts to the breath a fragrance purely aromatic and pleasant.

Put up in large bottles (only one size) and in elegant toilet-cases, complete, at 2s. 6d. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers. Prepared only by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-st., London.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

Sweet as the ambrosial air,
With its perfume rich and rare; .
Sweet as violets at the morn,
Which the emerald nooks adorn;
Sweet as rosebuds bursting forth,
From the richly-laden earth,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

The teeth it makes a pearly white,
So pure and lovely to the sight;
The gums assume a rosy hue,
The breath is sweet as violets blue;
While scented as the flowers of May,
Which cast their sweetness from each spray,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

Sure, some fairy with its hand
Cast around its mystic wand,
And produced from fairy's bower
Scented perfumes from each flower;
For in this liquid gem we trace—
All that can beauty add and grace—
Such is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

Is the best liquid dentifrice in the world, it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalcules," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco-smoke.

For children and adults whose teeth show marks of decay its advantages are paramount. The "Floriline" should be thoroughly brushed into all the cavities; no one needs fear using it too often or too much at a time. Among the ingredients being soda, honey, spirits of wine, borax, and extracts from sweet herbs and plants, it forms not only the very best dentifrice for cleansing ever discovered, but one that is perfectly delicious to the taste and as harmless as sherry. The taste is so pleasing that, instead of taking up the toothbrush with dislike, as is often the case, children will on no account omit to use the "Floriline" regularly each morning if only left to their own choice. Children cannot be taught the use of the toothbrush too young; early neglect invariably produces premature decay of the teeth. "Floriline" is prepared only by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London; and sold by all Chemists and Perfumers throughout the world, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

If teeth are white and beautiful,
It keeps them so intact;
If they're discoloured in the least,
It brings their whiteness back;
And by its use what good effects
Are daily to be seen;
Thus hence it is that general praise
Greets "FRAGRANT FLORILINE!"

One trial proves conclusive quite,
That by its constant use
The very best effects arise
That science can produce.
It is the talk of every one,
An all-absorbing theme;
Whilst general now becomes the use,
Of "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

It makes the breath as sweet as flowers,
The teeth a pearly white;
The gums it hardens, and it gives
Sensations of delight.
All vile secretions it removes,
However long they've been;
The enamel, too, it will preserve,
The "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

It may or may not be generally known that microscopical examinations have proved that animal or vegetable parasites gather, unobserved by the naked eye, upon the teeth and gums of at least nine persons in every ten; any individual may easily satisfy himself in this matter by placing a powerful microscope over a partially-decayed tooth, when the living animalculæ will be found to resemble a partially-decayed cheese more than anything else we can compare it to. We may also state that the FRAGRANT FLORILINE is the only remedy yet discovered able perfectly to free the teeth and gums from these parasites without the slightest injury to the teeth or the most tender gums.

Read this.—From the "Weekly Times," March 20, 1871:—"There are so many toilet articles which obtain all their celebrity from being constantly and extensively advertised that it makes it necessary when anything new and good is introduced to the public that special attention should be called to it. The most delightful and effective toilet article for cleansing and beautifying the teeth that we in a long experience have ever used is the new Fragrant Floriline. It is quite a pleasure to use it, and its properties of imparting a fragrance to the breath and giving a pearly whiteness to the teeth make it still more valuable. Of all the numerous nostrums for cleaning the teeth which from time to time have been fashionable and popular, nothing to be compared with the Floriline has hitherto been produced, whether considered as a beautifier or a valuable cleanser and preserver of the teeth and gums."

From the "Young Ladies' Journal":—"An agreeable dentifrice is always a luxury. As one of the most agreeable may be reckoned Floriline. It cleanses the teeth and imparts a pleasant odour to the breath. It has been analysed by several eminent professors of chemistry, and they concur in their testimony to its usefulness. We are frequently asked to recommend a dentifrice to our readers; therefore we cannot do better than advise them to try the Fragrant Floriline."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

I have heard a strange statement, dear Fanny, to-day,
That the reason that teeth do decay
Is traced to some objects that form in the gums,
And eat them in time quite away.
Animalcules, they say, are engendered—that is,
If the mouth is not wholesome and clean;
And I also have heard to preserve them the best
Is the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

Oh, yes! it is true that secretions will cause
Living objects to form on your teeth,
And certainly and silently do they gnaw on
In cavities made underneath;
But a certain preservative Gallup has found,
To keep your mouth wholesome and clean;
And you're perfectly right for your teeth to preserve,
There's nothing like sweet "FLORILINE!"

'Tis nice and refreshing, and pleasant to use,
And no danger its use can attend;
For clever physicians and dentists as well
Their uniform praises now blend.
They say it's the best preparation that's known,
And evident proofs have they seen,
That nothing can equal the virtues that dwell
In the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.

The 'Christian World" of March 17, 1871, says, with respect to Floriline:—"Floriline bids fair to become a household word in England, and one of peculiarly pleasant meaning. It would be elegant to conceive a more efficacious and agreeable preparation for the teeth. Those who once begin to use it will certainly never willingly give it up."

Mr. G. H. Jones, the eminent Dentist, of 57, Great Russell-street, in his valuable little book on Dentistry, says:—"The use of a good dentifrice is also indispensable, and one of the best preparations for cleansing the teeth and removing the impure secretions of the mouth is the liquid dentifrice called 'Fragrant Floriline,' which is sold by all respectable chemists."

The words "Fragrant Floriline" are a Trade-Mark.

IS DYSPEPSIA AN INCURABLE DISEASE?

The proportion of the community which Dyspepsia or Indigestion has claimed as victims is so alarmingly great that the most point as to whether the disease is curable or incurable is fast becoming one of the most prominent topics of the day. The developments of the disease itself are so varied and deceptive, even to the eyes of the skilled physician, and hence is so often mistakenly named, that hundreds—nay, thousands—at this moment are really suffering from Dyspepsia, or its effects, and know it not, because they, their friends or medical attendant, have been led to misname the complaint. The symptoms of the disease alone wellnigh appal all who would attempt its remedy, and Dyspepsia has therefore been pronounced by many to be incurable. If some of the following symptoms are apparent, let the reader be assured that the disease is present. It may be known by the pains in the back and chest, and dull, sleepy feeling, by the disagreeable taste in the mouth in the morning, and by the sticky slime collecting about the teeth, which makes the breath fœtid and offensive to others. A poor appetite, with a feeling as of a heavy load on the stomach, and a sometimes all-gone feeling at its pit may be noted as signs of the complaint, as are also cold, clammy, and adhesively-perspiring hands and feet. Giddiness, whirling in the head—especially when rising up suddenly—constipated bowels, thick and stagnant blood, and sunken eyes are all parts of the aggravations with which patients suffering from Dyspepsia are afflicted. Webs and spots before the eyes, a hot and dry skin, and frequent spittings up of food—for the stomach has become as sensitive as quicksilver—with sometimes a filling of the mouth with sweetish water, at others a sour taste to the palate, all denote the presence of this most unwelcome disease, which, it is universally agreed, is frightfully prevalent among all classes of society. How often do we hear the harsh and distressing cough—at first dry, afterwards attended with greenish coloured expectoration, yet seldom does the unfortunate possessor or his advisers attribute it to the Dyspepsia from which it really springs, so that by mistaken treatment the condition of the patient becomes gloomy indeed. Though apparently hopeless of cure, the disease is really curable in all stages, by SEIGEL'S CURATIVE SYRUP, a remedy prepared especially to combat its evil influence. That this is no mere assertion, but capable of being put to the proof, may be inferred by the enormous and increasing consumption of this medicine; the present average sale being at the rate of 677,000 bottles yearly. Does not this prove, first, the horrible prevalence of Dyspepsia throughout the land, and, second, that SEIGEL'S CURATIVE SYRUP—which is avowedly and openly sold as a remedy for the disease—must achieve its mission of giving, as claimed, relief to sufferers from this complaint. Can it be supposed for one moment that the people of this country would continue to purchase—increasingly so—a worthless remedy? The fact is, the Medicine does possess the merit claimed for it, and from its first introduction the rapid strides it has made in public favour denote the esteem in which it is held. Mr. A. J. WHITE, of 21, Farringdon-road, London, E.C., has received hundreds upon hundreds of letters teeming with favourable mention of SIEGEL'S SYRUP, and has put a few of them in pamphlet form for the perusal or investigation of parties who, before giving the medicine a trial, may be desirous of obtaining more information as to its efficacy. The CURATIVE SYRUP is sold by all Chemists and all Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom, at 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. per bottle; or, where difficulty is experienced in obtaining it, will be sent carriage-paid to nearest railway station on receipt of stamps.

A NEW ARTICLE HAVING AN ENORMOUS SALE.—Twelve hundred (1200) Bottles have been sold in nine months—to the perfect satisfaction of customers—and during that period but three days have passed without sale. This is what is said by Mr. CALEB WEEKS, of 18, Lower Union-street, Torquay, and it is asked, Would not the gentleman named have been held up to the opprobrium of his fellow-townsmen and himself ruined in business had the article of which he had sold so much been worthless? The fact is, the remedy does possess the real merit with which it is credited, and it therefore sells largely to the satisfaction of purchasers, otherwise the many favourable reports which follow—a few only of the many hundreds received—could not be possible.

Mr. JNO. BOWEN, 44, Mill-lane, Sutton, Macclesfield, says:—"I have sold many a dozen bottles, and it is well spoken of."

Mr. THOS. B. PERCY, Chemist, Truro, says:—"I have sold thirteen dozen bottles from January to May, 1879."

Mr. E. F. KENT, 134, Broad-street, Pendleton, has sold twenty-six dozen small size and some large, and says:—"I have always found it give every satisfaction."

Mr. T. D. WRIGHT, 26, Chapel-street, Southport, speaks of over £30 disposed of, and states:—"I have heard it spoken of in very high terms by many, especially as a remedy for Indigestion."

Mr. HENRY HALSTEAD, 22, Bank-street, Rawstenstall, says:—"I have already sold at retail seven or eight dozen."

Messrs. FARNHAM and PADFIELD, say:—"Please send immediately, as, though we sell other Medicines, the people set them all aside, and inquire only for yours."

Mr. T. PICKERING, John St. Over, Winsford, says:—"I am disposing of it quicker than any other I ever sold."

Mr. J. A. LAMBLE, 23, Pembroke-street, Devonport:—"I write to inform you of its enormous sale in my neighbourhood."

Mr. ROBT. WRIGHT, Percy-buildings, Shields-road, Byker, Newcastle-on-Tyne, says:—"People come back for bottle after bottle, and their testimony is very gratifying as to its medicinal action."

The Exors. of the late H. W. MACKERETH, Market Place, Ulverston, report sale of upwards of 300 bottles, and state:—"We find that, once asked for, the order is generally repeated, through its beneficial effects."

From Mr. J. CLEGG, Brunswick-street, Morley:—"It has cured a lady friend of ours of indigestion after trying a great many other medicines to no purpose."

Mr. T. W. ROBINSON, Trinity-street, Hull, says:—"I could name a dozen people who have been cured by it, some of them having been of twelve years' standing. In fact, every bottle sold by me has given, in every instance, perfect satisfaction."

The remedy to which allusion is made above is a cure for Indigestion—a disease to which all are more or less subject—in its most aggravated forms, and is sold by all Chemists and Medicine Venders, and of whom, and the undersigned, may be obtained a descriptive pamphlet, containing remarkable testimony from parties benefited by the use of this remedy, now enjoying a sale far in excess of its compeers.

A. J. WHITE, 21, Farringdon-road, London, E.C.

AN ALARMING DISEASE AFFLICTING A NUMEROUS CLASS.

The disease commences with a slight derangement of the stomach, but, if neglected, it in time involves the whole frame, embracing the kidneys, liver, pancreas, and, in fact, the entire glandular system, and the afflicted drags out a miserable existence, until death gives relief from suffering. The disease is often mistaken for other complaints; but if the reader will ask himself the following questions, he will be able to determine whether he himself is one of the afflicted:—Have I distress, pain, or difficulty in breathing after eating? Is there a dull, heavy feeling, attended by drowsiness? Have the eyes a yellow tinge? Does a thick, sticky mucus gather about the gums and teeth in the mornings, accompanied by a disagreeable taste? Is the tongue coated? Is there pain in the sides and back? Is there a fulness about the right side as if the liver were enlarging? Is there costiveness? Is there vertigo or dizziness when rising suddenly from an horizontal position? Are the secretions from the kidneys scanty and highly coloured, with a deposit after standing? Does food ferment soon after eating, accompanied by flatulence, or a belching of gas from the stomach? Is there frequent palpitation of the heart? These various symptoms may not be present at one time, but they torment the sufferer in turn as the dreadful disease progresses. If the case be one of long standing, there will be a dry, hacking cough, attended after a time by expectoration. In very advanced stages the skin assumes a dirty brownish appearance, and the hands and feet are covered by a cold, sticky perspiration. As the liver and kidneys become more and more diseased, rheumatic pains appear, and the usual treatment proves entirely unavailing against this latter agonising disorder. The origin of this malady is indigestion or dyspepsia, and a small quantity of the proper medicine will remove the disease if taken in its incipiency. It is most important that the disease should be promptly and properly treated in its first stages, when a little medicine will effect a cure, and even when it has obtained a strong hold the correct remedy should be persevered in until every vestige of the disease is eradicated, until the appetite has returned, and the digestive organs restored to a healthy condition. The surest and most effectual remedy for this distressing complaint is SEIGEL'S CURATIVE SYRUP, a vegetable preparation made in America, and sold by A. J. WHITE, 21, Farringdon-road, London, E.C. This Syrup strikes at the very foundation of the disease, and drives it, root and branch, out of the system.

A. J. WHITE, 21, Farringdon-road, London, E.C., between Charterhouse and Charles streets. For Sale by all respectable Chemists and Patent Medicine Venders, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. per Bottle. In case the Reader cannot obtain the Medicine from a local dealer, I will forward the same, carriage paid, on receipt of P.O.O. or stamps in a registered letter for the quantity required.

"ELECTRICITY IS LIFE."

PULVERMACHER'S IMPROVED PATENT GALVANIC CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, BATTERIES, &c.,

approved by the Académie de Médecine, Paris, and by eminent Medical and Scientific Authorities in England and Abroad.

THE VIRTUE of their genuine ELECTRIC CAPACITIES is authentically acknowledged, and their extensive curative powers proved, by the innumerable cures effected in cases of

Indigestion,	Loss of Voice,	Gout,
Liver Complaints,	Asthma,	Constipation,
Neuralgia,	Bronchitis,	Local Debility,
Sciatica,	Paralysis,	General Debility,
Deafness,	Epilepsy,	Mental and Physical
Writer's Cramp,	Rheumatism,	Weakness, &c.

Pulvermacher's appliances, unlike those quasi-curative novelties periodically cropping up like mushrooms, and calculated to entrap the unwary by means of a few testimonials, anyhow obtained, have creditably stood the test for the past thirty-five years.

Imbued with the importance of this humanitary invention, the inventor has unceasingly simplified and improved it, so that it can now be self-applied without any inconvenience whatever, and has become a household remedy.

The daily increasing testimonials of cures may be seen in the pamphlet, "Galvanism: Nature's Chief Restorer of Impaired Vital Energy." Post-free for three stamps.

The following are a few of the most RECENT TESTIMONIALS:—

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, &c.

GALVANISM v. GENERAL DEBILITY and WEAKNESS in ARMS and LEGS.

"2, Prospect-place, Bow-street, Scarborough, "Oct. 11, 1879.

"Dear Sir,—I may briefly summarise the benefits which my daughter has received from the use of your Belts to be as follows:—An increased warmth in the system, a better appetite and digestion, the removal of the leaden feeling in the legs and arms, leading to the full use of the same. You are at liberty to make use of this letter as you think fit.—Yours truly, "GEO. JONES.

"Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher."

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, Belts, &c.

GALVANISM v. RHEUMATISM.

"Robeston, Wathan, Narberth, Oct. 9, 1879.

"Sir,—I am pleased to be able to inform you that the Galvanic Chain-Band which I had from you some little time ago proved to me to be most effective. After I had applied it four times I found myself perfectly cured, and since have not been affected the slightest by rheumatism, from which I had suffered severely. If you desire, you may make use of this. Yours respectfully,

"Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher. "B. JAMES."

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, &c.

GALVANISM v. LOCAL DEBILITY.

"South Hackney, Sept. 25, 1879.

"Gentlemen,—It is with great pleasure I desire to say that your Galvanic Bands have proved entirely successful in my case of nervous debility; and after wearing them four months, I am now thoroughly restored. I think it only right to add my testimony to the many testimonials you must have received; and you are at liberty to use this letter, reserving my name and address. Thanking you most sincerely, I remain, yours faithfully,

"Messrs. Pulvermacher and Co. "J. S. H."

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, &c.

GALVANISM v. INFANTILE PARALYSIS.

"Museum-street, Ipswich, Sept. 23, 1879.

"Dear Sir,—Having seen the name of Mr. Robert Seagar, of Ipswich, so prominently before the public in connection with your Galvanic Chain-Bands, I had the desire to put the virtue of this remedy to a test of personal inspection.

"Mrs. Everard has a little girl in the eighth year of her age, who has been a great sufferer from Paralysis. The child seemed to have no strength on one side of her body, and could with difficulty stand alone. She was sent to the East Suffolk Hospital for four months, but came out an incurable. By the kindness of the clergyman of the parish in which her parents reside the child was sent to Guy's Hospital, London, for four months, from which she returned an incurable. I saw the child on her return from Guy's Hospital with irons on her legs, and the iron had wounded the heel. She was a helpless cripple, and at that time her parents had no hope of her recovery.

"I felt a great desire to see the child put under the regimen of the Galvanic Chain-Bands, and advised the mother to consult Mr. Robert Seagar. The result is not only highly favourable, but has surpassed our most sanguine anticipations. The child is now capable of walking to school. It is true that at present she walks with the aid of a little walking-stick, as the journey is long; but she can walk about the house without the aid of a stick; and we are in good hopes that shortly her strength will be so restored that she will run about as free as other children.

"Here, therefore, is a case which has come under my own personal observation, and for the authenticity and genuineness of which I can vouch. The united skill of two of the greatest hospitals in the kingdom has failed to effect what has been so successfully accomplished by your Galvanic regimen.—I remain, yours most respectfully,

"(Rev.) JOHN BREWSTER, Wesleyan Minister.

"J. L. Pulvermacher, Esq."

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, &c.

GALVANISM v. AFFECTIONS of the KIDNEYS and GENERAL DEBILITY.

"Leicester, Sept. 9, 1879.

"Dear Sir,—I have derived great benefit from the use of your Chain-Bands. The disinclination for active service has passed away, the kidneys have also resumed their usual healthy state and the general tone of the body is altered. The Bands have done all I could desire, and more. If you use this as a testimonial, please reserve the name and address.—Yours very faithfully, "H. A. S.

"Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher."

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, &c.

GALVANISM v. RHEUMATISM in FEET and ANKLES.

"St. Clement's, Oxford, Aug. 25, 1879.

"Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in adding my testimony as to the curative powers of your Galvanic appliances. I had suffered severely for nearly two years from rheumatics in my feet and ankles, and could not get across the room without help. I was induced to try one of your chains, from which I received much benefit. I afterwards procured a battery from you, and am pleased to say it has completely cured me. You can make any use you like of this. I delayed writing in order to see if the cure was permanent.—I am, yours gratefully,

"J. L. Pulvermacher, Esq. "J. THATCHER."

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, &c.

GALVANISM v. GENERAL WEAKNESS.

"3, Annie Villas, Hall-lane, Bowling, Bradford, July 5, 1879.

"Dear Sir,—In January, 1878, you sent me one of your Voltaic Belts. I was then very ill, and I am happy to say it has restored my health. I have now been working for twelve months without any drawback whatever. I was told many times that I should never be able to work again. I think you with all my heart for the interest you took in my case. Should you like to use my name you can do so in any way you like.—I am, dear Sir, yours truly, "JAMES PITTS.

"Mr. Pulvermacher."

PULVERMACHER'S CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, &c.

GALVANISM v. LIVER COMPLAINT and NERVOUS DEBILITY.

"Langley Lodge, King's Langley, July 4, 1879.

"Sir,—It gives me much pleasure to let you know that I derived great benefit from your appliances in a severe attack of liver disorder and debility. I place much faith in Galvanism, and highly recommend it to others, and am convinced of its curative power by my own experience.—I am, yours very truly,

"HARRIETT A. CAIN."

POWELL'S BALSAM OF ANISEED, FOR COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS.

DUC DE MONTABOR WRITES:

"Château de Montabor, Aveyron.

"Sir,—Having suffered for some time from an obstinate cough, accompanied with fever, continuous headaches, and sleepless night, I resolved, after having vainly tried several other medicines, to have recourse to your BALSAM OF ANISEED. I cannot resist, Sir, the desire of making you acquainted with the really marvellous results which I derived from it. From the first dose I felt great relief, the bad symptoms grew feebler, the irritation of the throat was calming down, and I recovered the sleep which had nearly left me. The third dose delivered me completely, and I am now completely restored to health.

"Receive, Sir, with the expression of my gratitude, the assurance of my distinguished sentiments.

"DUC DE MONTABOR."

IMPORTANT TESTIMONY from the Rev. GEORGE THOMAS HORN, M.A., Oxford, Clerk in Holy Orders:—

"Dear Sir,—Being troubled with a severe cough during a recent visit to London, I purchased a bottle of your BALSAM OF ANISEED, and was thankful to find immediate and permanent relief.—I am, very faithfully yours,

"GEORGE THOMAS HORN, M.A."

TOOTHACHE

INSTANTLY CURED BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE.

TOOTHACHE. J. Hounsell, Esq., Surgeon, Bridport, writes:—"I consider BUNTER'S NERVINE a specific for Toothache. Very severe cases under my care have found instantaneous and permanent relief. I therefore recommend its use to the Profession and the Public as invaluable to all who suffer from Toothache."

A Gentleman at Bristol writes:—"For six years a decayed tooth prevented mastication on the side it was situated, as well as causing many sleepless nights; but, having used BUNTER'S NERVINE, I am not only relieved of the most troublesome of all pains, but can now use the tooth without the slightest inconvenience."

TOOTHACHE. The Rev. JOHN THOMAS, St. John's-wood, writes:—

"I wish to say that I have received much benefit from the use of BUNTER'S NERVINE—often when all other professed remedies failed, this gave me complete relief. I have frequently recommended it to others who, like myself, were martyrs to Toothache. Sufferers ought not to be mocked; hence, were I not certain that BUNTER'S NERVINE has relieved me and many of my friends, I should not write to say so."

BUNTER'S NERVINE instantly stays the Toothache by a painless constriction of the nerve; it also prevents decay, forms a stopping, and saves the tooth.

BROWN and POLSON'S CORN FLOUR.

The excellence, utility, and economy of CORN FLOUR as a substitute for Arrowroot and as a basis for many culinary purposes have long established it in the favour of the public and of the best dietary authorities.
BROWN and POLSON have now the satisfaction of republishing, by special permission, the following Instructions issued by THE NATIONAL TRAINING-SCHOOL FOR COOKERY, which are a further recognition of the merits of a manufacture which BROWN and POLSON were the first to initiate, and which they have carried to an unrivalled perfection.
THE NATIONAL TRAINING-SCHOOL FOR COOKERY has issued a valuable HANDBOOK (published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall), which contains the following amongst other lessons:—

PUDDINGS.

LESSON No. 15.—CORN FLOUR PUDDING.
Average cost of a "Corn Flour Pudding" (in a cup).

INGREDIENTS.

	d.
2 dessert spoonsful of corn flour	1
½ pint of milk	1
6 lumps of sugar	0½
1 egg	1
	3½

Time required, about an hour.

Now we will show you how to make a Corn Flour Pudding (in a cup, for infants or invalids).
1. We put a saucepan half full of warm water on the fire to boil.
2. We put two dessert spoonsful of corn flour into a saucepan.
3. We pour in by degrees half a pint of milk, mixing it very smoothly. N.B.—We must be careful that it does not get lumpy.
4. We now add to it six lumps of sugar, put the saucepan on the fire, and stir smoothly until it boils; it will take about ten minutes.
5. We then move the saucepan to the side of the fire.
6. We break one egg into the saucepan, and beat it up until it is all well mixed.
7. We take a cup (just large enough to hold the pudding), and grease it inside with a piece of butter.
8. We pour the mixture out of the saucepan into the cup.
9. We take a small cloth, wring it out in boiling water, flour it well, and tie it over the top of the cup with a piece of string.
N.B. We should tie the four corners of the cloth over the top of the cup.
10. When the water in the saucepan is quite boiling, we put it in the cup and let it boil for twenty-five minutes.
11. For serving, we take the cloth off the cup, and the pudding may be turned out or not, according to taste.
Now it is finished.

CAKES.

LESSON No. 6.—CORN FLOUR CAKE.
Average cost of a "Corn Flour Cake" (about three quarters of a pound).

INGREDIENTS.

	d.
¼ lb. of corn flour	2
¼ lb. of loaf sugar	1
2 oz. of butter	2
1 teaspoonful of baking powder	0½
2 eggs	2
	7½

Time required, about one hour.

Now we will show you how to make a Corn Flour Cake.
1. We put two ounces of butter into a basin, and beat it to a cream.
2. We add to the butter a quarter of a pound of pounded loaf sugar, and mix it well.
3. We break in two eggs and beat all well together.
4. We now stir lightly into the mixture a quarter of a pound of corn flour and a teaspoonful of baking powder, and beat it well together for five minutes.
5. We grease a cake-tin inside with butter or dripping.
6. We pour the mixture into the tin and put it immediately into the oven (the heat should rise to 240 deg.) to bake for half an hour.
7. After that time we turn the cake out of the tin and slant it against a plate until it is cold. (This will prevent its getting heavy.)
N.B.—If preferred, the mixture could be baked in small tins instead of one large one, in which case it would only take fifteen minutes to bake.
Now it is finished.

A SCIENTIFIC CHRISTMAS.

Philosophy in sport, or rather science in fun, may be carried beyond a joke. That clever and eccentric old gentleman, Sir Liberty Hall, Bart., whose favourite pursuit was experimental physics, used his superior knowledge to invent strange mystifications for his Christmas guests. Having diligently attended the lectures and actual demonstrations upon the subject at the Royal Institution, he ordered a great deal of costly and complex apparatus to be sent down to St. Oswald's Abbey. There, in the stately Elizabethan mansion reared by his ancestors upon the site of the ancient monastic foundation, surrounded by a noble deer-park and woods abundantly stocked with pheasants he never cared to shoot, this enthusiastic amateur sat among Leyden jars, galvanic batteries, and a variety of electrical machines. He had got hundreds of miles of copper and iron wire coiled up in his cellars, and he devoted some weeks, aided by the local plumber and glazier and bell-hanger, to an extensive series of incomprehensible arrangements all over the house. In the absence of her Ladyship with her sons and daughters, who remained at Hastings till the third week of December, Sir Liberty was enabled to play the master at home, and to do what he liked with his own, in a style worthy of the name he bore.

A numerous party of staying visitors, including several uncles and aunts and many junior cousins of both sexes, had been invited to the Abbey upon this occasion to enjoy the family hospitalities and festivities during the Christmas week. The lady mistress and the young people returned home just in time to receive their expected company. Domestic preparations of the needful kind had been duly made by the experienced housekeeper and butler, with the services of cook and kitchen-maid, of footman and housemaid, under tolerable discipline. Sir Liberty Hall was supposed, as he had promised his confiding spouse, to be exercising a general superintendence over these proper departments of household stewardship. Whatever he had been about in the time his wife was away, she found nothing amiss or wanting, either in kitchen or parlour, dining-room or drawing-room, up stairs or down stairs, or in all the bed-chambers, which seemed in perfect readiness for the arrival of twenty or thirty friends. We have received the following account of what took place from the late butler, Mr. John Tapper, who has left his situation.

"Now, I really feel for her Ladyship, who is a kindly, honest, good-natured sort of woman, and I am quite ashamed to tell of the tricks that were played upon her invited company, by day and by night, from the 20th to the 27th of December, in that bewitched old Abbey manor house, through the mad freaks of Sir Liberty Hall. It was a scandal to the whole county, and to the respectable order of landlord aristocracy, which ought never again to be repeated, unless we mean to overthrow both Church and State. If we are to follow the example of those French Communists, in preferring a chemist or professor of physics to the Presidency of the New Republic, these doings and goings-on may be all right and fit in times to come. But I only hope those times will not come in my time.

"The first party that drove up to the house door, when the gentlemen got out of the coach and went to pull the bell-handle, to be let in, the electric spirit or devil, or whatever it was, that was put into the brass knob, caught hold of the palm of his hand, and almost wrenched his arm out of his shoulder, making him shriek and howl with pain before it let him go. That was a pretty way of shaking hands with a visitor at one's own door! I do say, that for a clever, learned, book-reading old gentleman, like Sir Liberty Hall, with his scientific philosophy and all that, to do such a thing at a place like St. Oswald's Abbey, is enough to make St. Oswald and all the old Abbots and monks, and all the Knights and Baronets that have lived there since, come up out of their graves to rebuke him. Friar Bacon, they say, was a sort of scientific man, and so was Prince Rupert; but neither Monk nor Cavalier, six hundred or two hundred years ago, ever thought what the nineteenth century would come to.

"Reverence for antiquity is here utterly lost. The awful scene we were compelled to witness in the great hall on Christmas Eve was nothing less than sacrilege. Would you believe it, that he brought out the suits of knightly armour, which his great ancestors wore in the Wars of the Roses or in the Tournaments at King Henry's or King Edward's Court; and he fitted them upon iron frames to stand upright, and put their feet upon roller-skates; and then, with a set of electric wires to their arms and legs, he set these warlike old figures dancing all over the smooth oak floor! That is neither more nor less than what Sir Liberty Hall did with the plate-armour of Sir Geoffrey, Sir Miles, and Sir Ralph, that used to hang on the wall, and to look so grand and noble.

"But I won't deny that there was some harmless fun with his queer tricks and traps and the shocks he gave us at every turn—it was all very shocking—to the gentlefolk as well as the servants, till we were all set laughing together. There was a Mistletoe, of course, or else the Christmas wouldn't have been a proper spree for the young ladies and the young gentlemen, like. Well, but the old gentleman, he was so clever and artful, you know, that he had fixed up a telegraph wire to the Mistletoe Bough. And the wire, it goes along the passage and up the stairs to a sort of clock or indicator dial, where the company was having their supper. And so, when Mr. Jack Springleton, that is my Lady's nephew in Berkshire, who had come for one of the party, kisses his cousin, Miss Emily, what does this telegraph clock do, but strikes a bell, and signals what's going on down there in the Conservatory? And they all jump up from their chairs, my Lady and the Hon. Mrs. Crisp, and Lady Springleton and Miss, and the rest, and run down stairs, to catch my young lady and her young man in their love-making. But, of course, it passed for a joke; only her Ladyship of this house was not very well pleased.

"And at dinner on Christmas Day there was one grand upset, when Thomas was bringing in the second plum-pudding. You see, the old gentleman had been down in the kitchen with Cook, and what he fixed up in that dish I cannot rightly understand, but it was connected with some of his wires and his electric batteries in the study up stairs. All I know is that the pudding flew in pieces like a bomb-shell and scattered about the room. Thomas was frightened nearly into fits, while the company at table were all in fits of laughter.

"Then, on the last night, they kept it up dancing, when the young people had been footing away merrily, till near three o'clock in the morning, there was a regular massacre of them all at once. They 'd all joined hands to go round and round, you know, in the way of the dance; and two of the youngsters, at Sir Liberty Hall's bidding, had slily laid a wire round the circle on the floor. So young Tommy, when he gets the tip, he takes up the handle and just touches it off! My eyes! didn't it make them skip, and the girls to squall, and the boys to laugh and shout, and then to finish with three cheers for Sir Liberty! And there was a vote passed then and there, by the whole company of guests and friends, to alter the name of St. Oswald's Abbey; and henceforth to call both the place and master 'Electricity Hall!'

"This is my account of the matter.

"John Tapper (Late Butler at the Abbey)."

"MY CHRISTMAS BOX!"

O'er Melton Hall a gathering shadow lay,
Though now had dawned another Christmas Day,
And all had been arranged to welcome it
With festal honours that the day befit;
For that hilarious maiden, Catherine,
Sole daughter of the house, began to pine;
No radiant smiles wreathed now her dimpling face,
No more her laughter echoed through the place;
A numbing languor, creeping by degrees,
All her bright faculties began to seize.

But, see! what miracle on Kate is wrought!
How has the maiden this fine rapture caught?
She who so listlessly one moment stirred
Now skips as airily as any bird.
Waving aloft an open letter, she
Dances with more than her old buoyancy.
Who would have thought the postman's sharp rat-tat
Could such life-giving power possess as that?
One moment at the doorway Katie stands,
With the just-opened letter in her hands;
Her tell-tale eyes most eloquently bright,
Her face new kindled with her soul's delight.
Crying "My Christmas Box!" all in a flutter
She to her mother runs her joy to utter;
And tells her love, or partly tells; the rest
A mother's subtle instinct quickly guessed.
Thus, amid sobs and laughter, ran her tale—
Rose-red her face, that long had been so pale.

"Yes, Archibald is true, as good as gold,
And all his love for me has frankly told;
Why that fine London lady, Amy Smart,
Had never shared an atom of his heart.
It happened thus. He must, his father said,
At once go some far journey in his stead.
Then Archie mentioned of his visits here,
And spoke of me, and how I was most dear;
And that he did not care a pin for life
Unless some day he had me for his wife.
And then—what do you think, Mamma!—outspoke
His father—seriously, and not in joke—
'I see no reason in the world, my man,
Against your having her—that's if you can.
I've met your Kate, and what I heard and saw Makes me approve the lass as daughter-in-law.'
Now wasn't it kind of him to speak like this?
I 'll give him, some day, such a hearty kiss!
And O, Mamma, there 's something more to say—
Dear Archie 's coming here this very day;
And from his mother brings a note to you,
Who were, she says, in youth her friend most true.
His father said, 'Eat there your Christmas dinner;
And if you can, my boy, go in and win her!'
'Win if he can'—O, dear! it sounds like fun—
I know, I feel, I am already won."
When frankly thus the maid her love confessed
She hid her blushes in her mother's breast.

The Christmas bells glad music pour amain,
But Katie's heart throbs yet a tenderer strain.—J. L.

TIRED OUT.

Tired out! you pet of golden curls;
Dear sweetest rosebud of small girls;
Loved with the tender love that all
Bestow on things so sweet and small.
What has tired out our rosy pet,
This second Christmas she 's seen yet?
Ah! well I guess, our best of misses
Is homeward borne, tired out with kisses,
With softest words and fondest sayings,
With merriest laughs and shrillest playings,
With lovings, rompings, and all treats
Of tasting cakes and eating sweets.

Tired out! so seek your downy nest
And warm and rosy, sink to rest,
And all your slumbering visions be
Of things that Elsie's self would see,
Not of our care and toil and strife,
But all that now to you is life.
Ah, would the joy, to your small seeming,
That makes existence in your dreaming,
Might be your lot through all your hours,
And all your way be still through flowers;
So that, tired out, your latest breath
Should give you to blest dreams in death.

W. C. Bennett.

WELCOME HOME.

The waves have beat, the winds have blown,
This whole night long so wearily;
And I no moment's sleep have known
For thought of him that 's at the sea.
I got me up, I oped the door,
I stepped upon the foamy beach,
I shrank to hear the surges roar,
The billows clashing each on each.

No moon was there to light the dark,
The stars seemed few and little worth,
I could not bear the waves to mark
That rushed against the solid earth.
It shook, and I, with terror filled
To know my love so far from land—
Sure never vessel's fragile build
The crash of tumbling seas could stand.

Ah, when he comes, and when my heart
Beats hard against his stormy breast,
I think my very life will part
To know him safe, at home, at rest!
What words shall tell him all my love,
That wayward fancies sometimes hide?
How speak my joy all joys above
To have my husband at my side?

Oh not a word, and not the speech
Of hands that wild and helpless move,
Will bear the tidings that shall reach
His inmost heart, of my dear love.
But something crying from my face,
An eager silence, grave and glad,
Shall light the rough and gloomy place
With Welcome to my fisher-lad!

Edward Rose.

AFTER CHURCH—THE COMPLIMENTS OF THE SEASON.

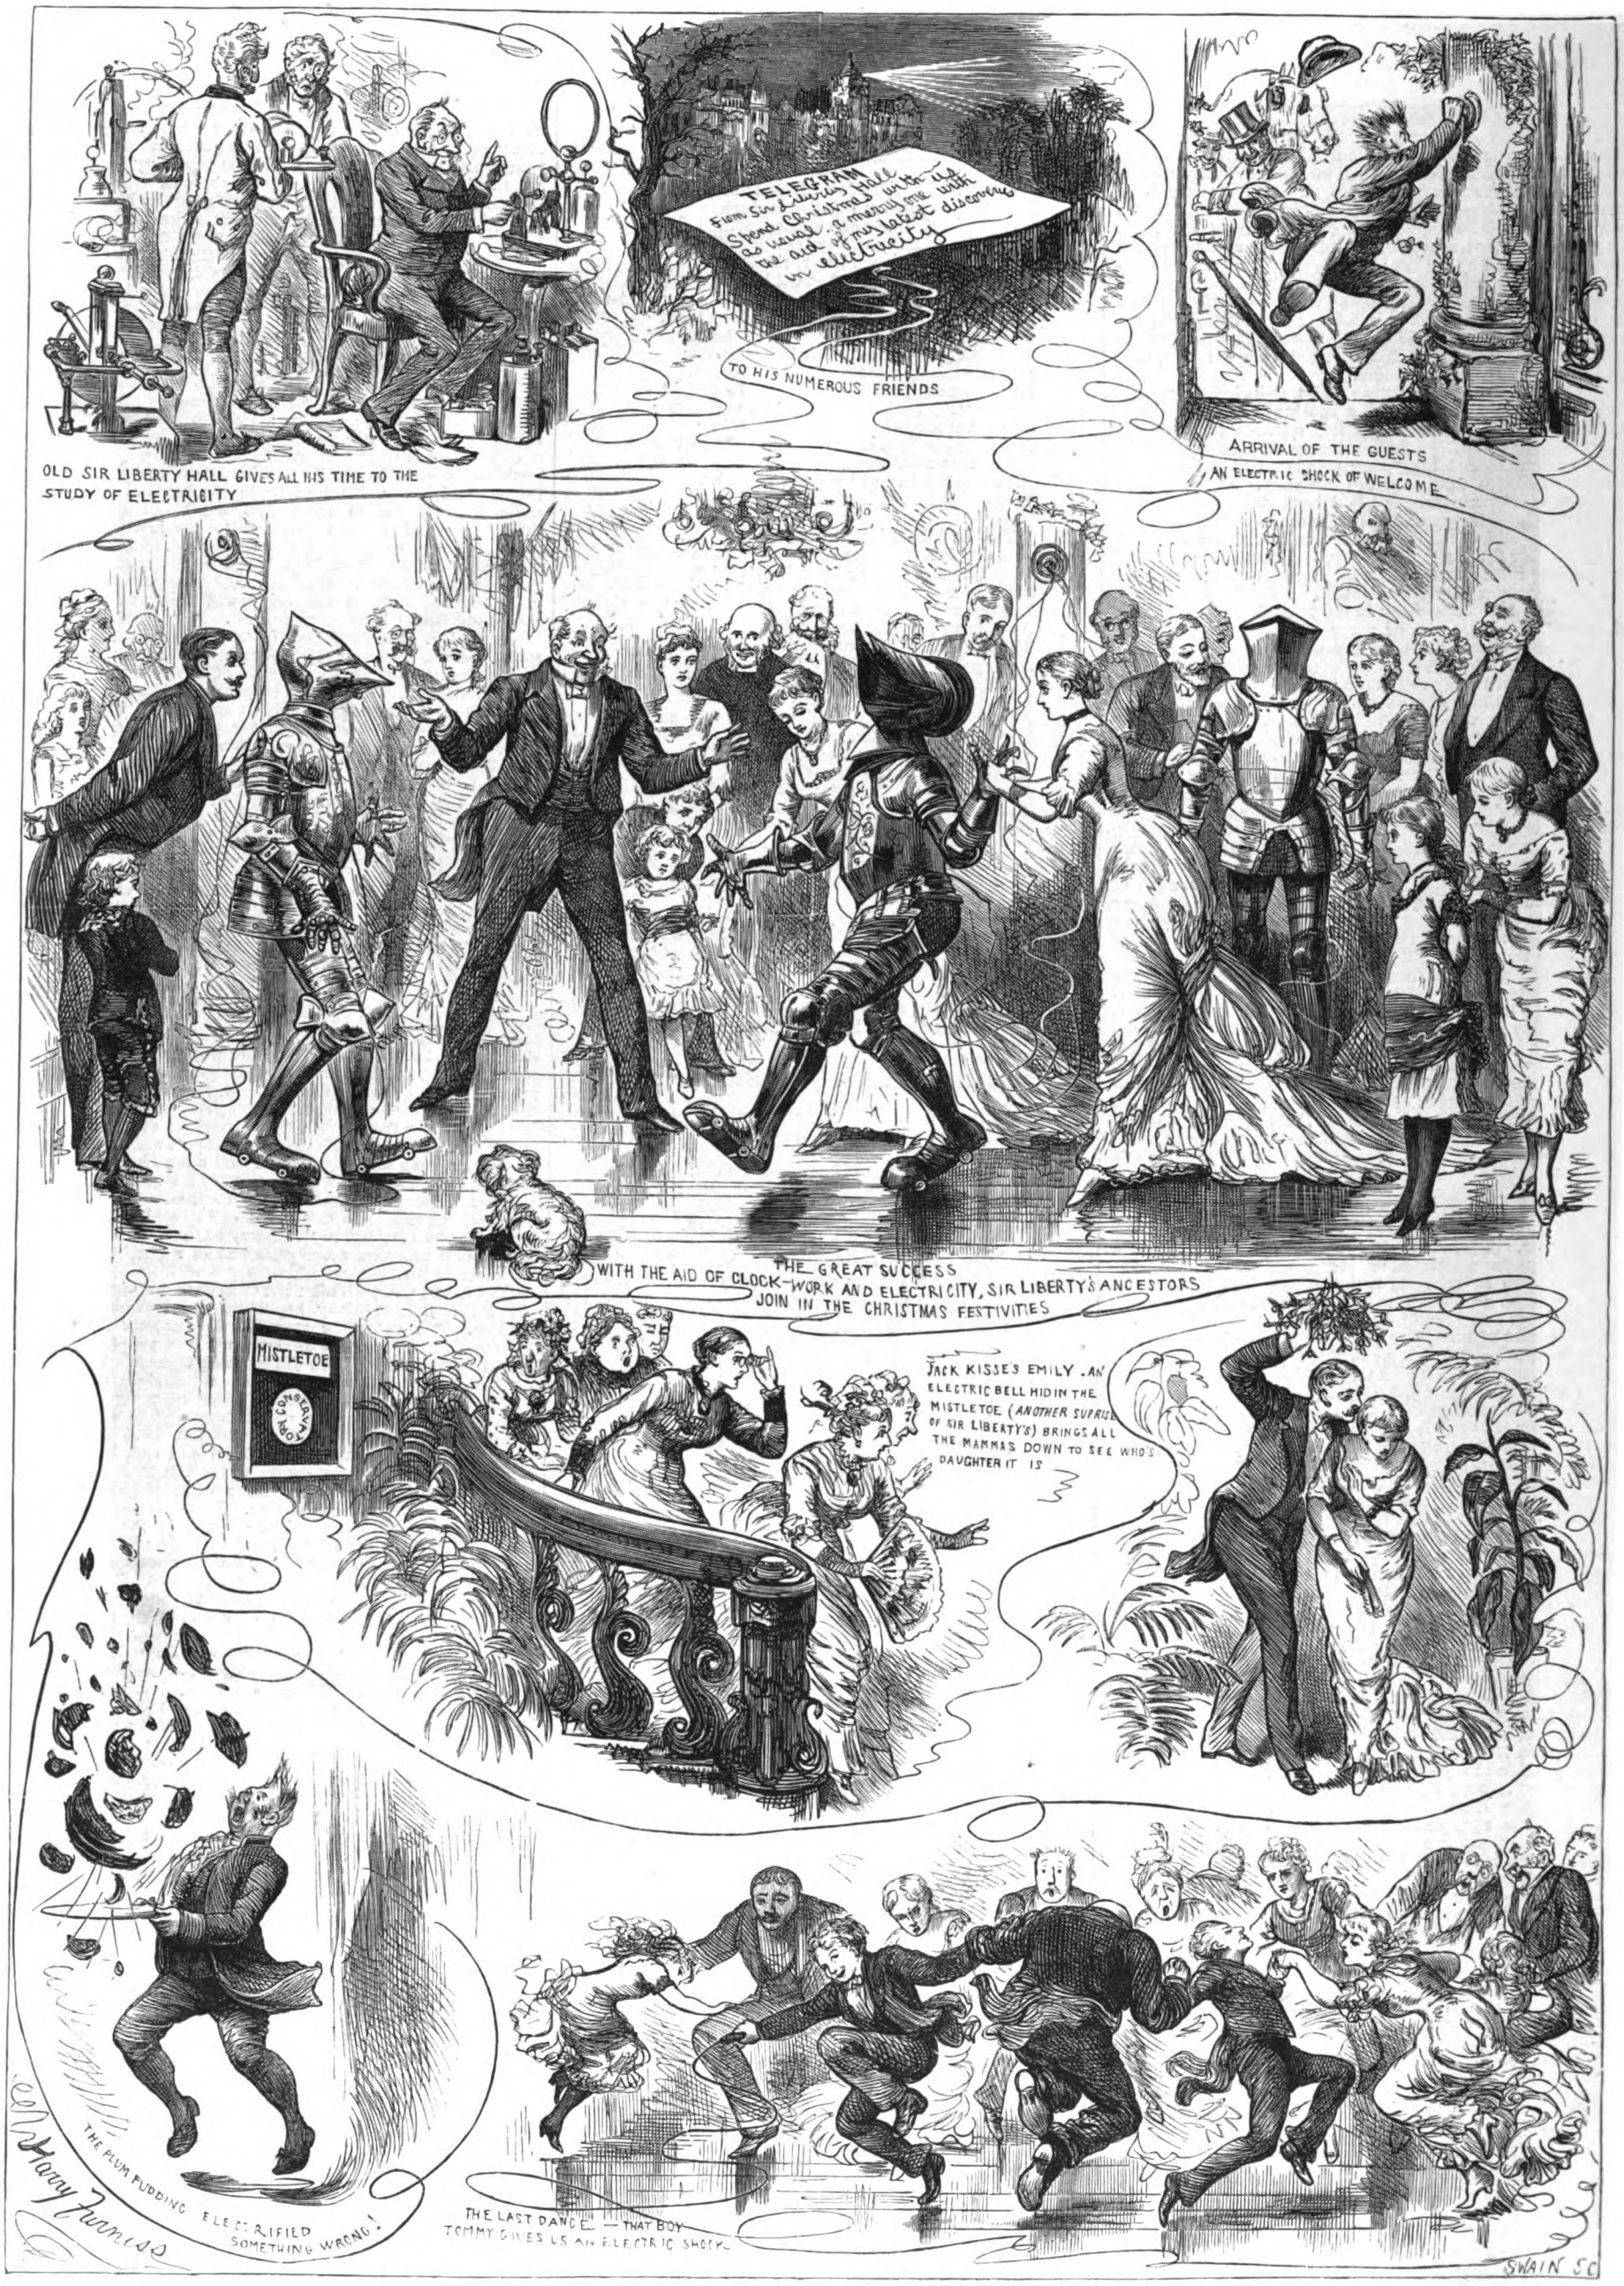
Queen Caroline bonnets in fashion again, eh? Ah! thereby hangs a tale of Christmas in the merry days of George the Fourth—which Mr. Fred. Barnard has adorned with accustomed character and humour, but to which the moral has yet to be supplied.

What! A pretty face looks well under any bonnet! I am with you there entirely. You never peep—well, "hardly ever" peep, you rogues—beneath the wide brim to gladden your hearts with a momentary glimpse of beauty. I did the same with equal rarity in my salad days, lads.

One face there is that Mr. Barnard's picture brings to my memory with a vividness which you will understand presently. I am carried by it close upon sixty years back to dear old Brighton. In those days we kept up Christmas in the good old style. Those were not skeleton Christmases, but flesh and blood Christmases. Ay, and there was some heart in the particular Christmas I have in my mind, boys.

It was Christmas Eve in Brighton; and the yule log on jovial Aylmer's hearth burnt all the more brightly in our imaginations from the wintry whiteness of the streets without; and the clusters of tall wax candles against the walls made the holly-berries seem redder than ever I remember them since. Aylmer was one of those jolly hosts with port-wine visages, twinkling eyes, and muscatel lips, who make you feel at home at once. Mrs. Aylmer was as rosy and comely a matron as you could meet in England. As for Grandame Aylmer, with her nut-brown wig, Ribstone-apple cheeks, and benevolent smile, she was one of those rare old ladies who preserve the freshness of youth undimmed to the last—the delight alike of the young and the middle-aged. Ruth Aylmer was indescribable. You have beauties portrayed nowadays in every shop window. Take the best features of each, and unite them in fancy in one being, and then you could not realise the dainty loveliness of Ruth. In a word, Ruth was incomparable. I idolised her; dreamt of her blue eyes, arch smile, and winsome ways by night; but, with that diffidence which always appears to increase with the intensity of a passion in the modest (ahem!), when brought face to face with Ruth, I was generally dumb. Of this complaint I was destined to be cured ere that Christmas Eve was over. Dancing was the general amusement. But I found it very difficult, indeed, to gain Ruth for a partner by reason of the pertinacious court paid her by an elegant dandy, who had crept into high favour at the Pavilion, for no earthly reason that I could learn except the nice conduct of his clouded cane, the elegant manner in which he took snuff, and the finished cut of his clothes. How Mr. Aylmer could have tolerated such an affected beau in his house I couldn't imagine. Yet there he was, carrying all before him—dancing dance after dance with Ruth, whose gaiety made me quite jealous of the fantastic fop—and I fancied Beau Barber was, in short, winning all the honours till, happening to stand up with pretty Mrs. Lockyer in a quadrille, I heard that very sensible lady drop a few criticisms that restored my confidence.

"A good dancer!" Mrs. Lockyer said, answering a leading question of mine with an arch smile at his elaborate posings and minute pirouettes before Ruth. "Yes; he 's a good dancing master. But I fancy Ruth would prefer a man for partner!" The simple remark quite gave me the courage of my affections. It was near midnight, and the musicians were tuning up for the last dance. I was fortunate enough to win Ruth's hand for the Sir Roger de Coverley; and, emboldened as I felt, her pretty little hand and inviting waist were pressed, no doubt, with a lover's vigour. There was a tremulous movement in Ruth's fingers that was scarcely a return squeeze, but was yet sufficient encouragement to induce me to snatch a blissful salute (as you lads might call it) under the mistletoe berries in the hall before "A Merry Christmas!" came to be wished to the musical accompaniment of a Christmas peal on the church bells.



But it was not until after the Christmas morning service in the old church that my happiness was crowned by Ruth Aylmer. It may not be romantic to associate the savoury incense of roast goose with love, nor the purple nose of a time-honoured beadle with the torch of Hymen. Yet to this day the scent of that relishable dish and the sight of the most portentous of ecclesiastical dignitaries will recall the memorable Christmas Day of the long-ago to one who in those days wore a David-Copperfieldian kind of hat and habit, and who had fallen over head and ears in love with bewitching Ruth Aylmer, drawn to the life in her beplumed Queen Caroline bonnet and cloak of amplest dimensions. Glance once more at the drawing. Prominent as young Jack Aylmer and little Mistress Lockyer are in the foreground, their inmost affections are too much wrapped up in mince-pies and plum-pudding as yet to enchain your attention. Then, merry Mr. and Mrs. Aylmer and their friends the Lockyers, crossing hands as in Sir Roger de Coverley on Christmas Eve, whilst they exchange all the good wishes of the season, after dropping a silver souvenir each into the cup-like palm of Joe Priddle, the beadle—they are a good way through the second volume of their life-romance just as Grandame Aylmer yonder is not far from her final page, but yet bears up merrily and bravely as the best of them. With regard to the young couple in the background, I need only add that the Christmas morning greeting—a shake-hands which made one heart tingle with rapture, I can vouch for—was followed by a delightful walk home in the snow, and by Ruth Aylmer's roguish avowal that she had flirted with Beau Barber ("sound asleep in bed still, I 'll warrant!" laughingly quoth she), only to provoke me into a declaration; and, for my part, I am bound to confess that, whatever may be the quiet advantages of "popping the question" in the Whispering Gallery of St. Paul's, or while ascending the Monument, or whatever furtive charm there may be to a business man in coming to the point in a hansom cab, I was quite content with plighting my troth on the way home from church on Christmas morning to your grandame, who is still here, hale and hearty, lads, to help me revive for your enjoyment a merry old Christmas of George the Fourth's time. Only—no crutches or toothpicks, mind!

PHILIP.

PUZZLE.

O list to my delicious whole,
And let it penetrate your soul;
Else, with my head off, I may take you
Leagues off, and to a jelly shake you.
Another letter gone, and I
Am welcomed as a stanch ally;
And then again throughout the land
There comes a cry to stay my hand.
A liquid letter gone, I hear
Myself in Scottish accents dear—
Sweeter than sweetest note of bird,
From lovers' whispering lips when heard.
From one more letter shaken free,
You 'll find warm welcome then in me.

"No," she said, "it matters little, because you have seen it, and you know that it is to Jehan Kerrec you have to look for the payment of your rent. It was on account of you I kept the paper. It has made you see plainly that Jehan is coming home to marry Marie."

Her blue eyes grew round again as she looked at him; for Louis Mellac stood shaking his head, and his face was utterly incredulous.

"No," he said, in answer to her stare of surprise; "I prefer to believe what I saw that night. What proof have I that the paper you showed me was really in Kerrec's handwriting? What do I know? It is possible that he does not even know how to write."

At this the stolid Barba roused and looked at the well-to-do farmer with a keenness of expression he had never before noted in her eyes.

"What is your meaning, Monsieur Mellac?" she said. "You have something more to say to me. You did not come here only to tell me I had been deceived."

Mellac again looked round him.

"Are you sure we are alone?" he said. "I have something to say, but it is only for your ears at present."

Barba went to the door that led into the cow-stable and listened. Then she opened it and looked in. "Marie!" she said.

These was no answer.

"You can speak freely," she said, when, after closing the door, she came back to the settle beside the hearth. "Marie has gone outside."

"Well, then,"—but Mellac still spoke in a low voice—"I tell you that Jehan Kerrec will not come back; so that, besides the cottage, you will also have Marie on your hands. By-and-by you will find out that it is not only I who saw her part from her lover in anger, the whole village will proclaim that she is cast off by him."

Barba's pink skin had reddened at last.

"It is false," she said, sternly; "and you know it is false. For what reason could he cast off my Marie?"

Mellac shrugged his shoulders.

"You ask the very question which I cannot answer; but I'll be bound, when once the thing gets wind, there will be plenty who can furnish a good reason for Jehan's desertion. There are things which are hard to say to a mother."

Barba looked stolid again; she felt contemptuous; but caution warned her that it was foolish to make an enemy of Mellac while the cottage remained in her possession.

"What else have you to say, Monsieur?" she asked, coldly.

Mellac felt the change in her voice.

"I want to be your friend, if you will let me," he said. "I know as well as you do that Marie is good and honest; but it looks ill for a girl to be deserted, and the best way to shut people's mouths is to give them something new to gossip about. Listen, then. I am willing to marry Marie. Will you have me for a son-in-law? That will make everything right."

The firelight showed Barba's face and white cap vividly in the darkened room. She was staring fixedly; she almost gasped with surprise.

"You!" she said at last. "You, a rich man; besides, you are twenty years older than the child."

"And for that reason better able to take care of her. Listen, Barba Gourin. I can give Marie a good home, plenty of clothes, a cart to ride in, and a servant to fetch water and do the hard work, and I know Marie shrinks from work. I can give you many comforts that Jehan Kerrec could never furnish if he lived to be a hundred."

Barba put up her hand to stop him.

"Peace!" she said. "You are going too fast, neighbour. I must think. I must be quite sure about Jehan Kerrec. Leave me now."

CHAPTER III.

HIS WIFE OR HIS WIDOW.

Louis Mellac went away, and left Barba sitting beside her fire. She felt uneasy—quite unlike herself. All through the years that had gone she had said, "Things happened because they were meant to happen;" and it had troubled her that there was so large an element of adventurousness in the loves of Marie and Jehan. It would have seemed more natural for her child to have become attached to one of the lads of her own village than to Jehan Kerrec, who had come there but twice to see his old blind cousin. This offer of Louis Mellac's was a far more natural and common-place arrangement; and yet Barba was troubled.

"I am a fool!" she said, at last, "and, what is worse, I did not know I was one. It is because of a fancy I have taken against Mellac, and because he did not say he loved Marie; it seemed as if he wanted her more from pity than from love."

Barba sighed. She had married without love, to please her parents, and she had hoped for a happier lot for Marie.

The latch of the cow-house lifted, and Marie came in. She seated herself on a stool beside her mother, and looked wearily into the fire.

Barba put one hand on her child's head. She was not addicted to caresses, and just now the poor girl's heart longed sorely for love. She drew her mother's brown hand to her lips and kissed it, and Barba felt a tear on the girl's cheek.

"Child," she said, "we must give up hope. I fear Jehan must have been lost at the fishing. He is surely dead."

Marie looked up. Her face was white and eager, and her eyes were full of dark light.

"He is not dead to me," she said, passionately. "He is my husband, and, mother, he will come back."

Barba sate still; she knew that it was useless to strive with Marie in this mood, but still she knew, too, that her words though unheeded at the time, were often accepted later on by her daughter. They sate silent some time before she again spoke.

"Child," she said, gently, "I mean that it is more seemly to give up the appearance of hope; it is better that I should lock up the cottage, or try to let it, and that you should give up the hope of marrying Jehan. It is fretting your life away to go on in vain expectation."

Marie started up, and began to pace the long dark room. At last she stopped and knelt down before her mother.

"Oh, mother," she cried—but there were no sobs or tears, though her face was white and wrung with anguish—"do not tempt me. I have sworn to-day, at the foot of the blessed Cross, that I will give up my self-will, and yet I felt but now as if I could strike you for quenching my hope. Mother, I heard sad news this day. I have seen Mathurin, the driver from Pont Croix, and he says"—she stopped and pressed her hands tightly together—"he says last time the boats came in two were missing, and one of them was Jehan's." She went up to the wall and leaned her face against it, but she could not sob or cry—her heart felt hard, and seemed to stifle her with its weight.

"Where is Mathurin?" said Barba, and she rose up and went towards the door.

Marie looked round in surprise. Though her grief made her feel dead and cold to all else, still, she had been so used to her mother's sympathy, that it seemed strange to see her going away without one word of comfort for her.

"He is gone," she answered. "I only saw him as he was driving out of the village with some travellers; but, mother, it is not true—I feel it is not."

Barba sate still; she could not say so to Marie just now, but it seemed to her that it was better to think of Jehan as dead than as faithless.

All at once Marie turned round.

"It is my punishment," she said; "if Jehan is taken from me I deserve it. I was so wilful to him always. I never thought of his feelings, only of my own."

Barba sate listening, and her face grew troubled.

"Marie"—her mother's voice startled her—"you and Jehan parted friends, did you not?"

The girl looked at her earnestly.

"I thank God and the Blessed Virgin we did, mother, though it was more than I deserved, for I had tormented him. I behaved so ill that night when he left me that I wonder he forgave me."

Had he forgiven Marie? Barba asked herself. His boat might not have come back, but he might not be drowned for all that. Suppose Louis Mellac was right. Jehan might have landed in some other fishing town, and they might never again hear of him. At St. Matthieu news was never heard, unless, indeed, by a chance like that of to-day, when Mathurin, or some other driver, passed through the village, taking English travellers round the coast. As a rule, news had become history before it reached the little lonely place, from which none but the fishermen ever travelled.

"Mother, what do you think?" the girl said at last, unable to bear the silence.

Then Barba got up and kissed her daughter's pale stricken face.

"I think that you must listen to me, my child. Whether Jehan has perished or not, I do not think he will come back, and I cannot think that my Marie will care to have the children pointing at her as they used to point at poor mad Genevieve."

Marie shuddered and turned away; but it seemed to her as if she saw the wild eyes and unkempt, uncovered head of the poor woman who had gone mad when her lover was lost at sea twenty years before. She made no answer, and her mother went on.

"We must take the things out of the cottage. Jehan's cousin, Michel, will help us to take care of them, and we must give up the cottage to Monsieur Mellac."

Marie turned slowly round and looked at her mother. "Do you mean," she began—

But Barba kept her eyes fixed on the wall before her. She knew that if once she let feeling get the upper hand Marie's will would rule.

"I mean," she said, in a dull, monotonous voice, "that it is best for you, my daughter, that we should both try to forget Jehan Kerrec."

Marie's eyes were full of sad protest, but her mother's face checked her. It seemed to the girl that her sorrow was flung back upon her; henceforth she must bear it alone. Her mother had never been demonstrative in her sympathy, but the girl had felt that it lay there ready for her when she chose to seek it. What had happened to change her mother's love?

But the vow she had taken against her self-will held back the angry words that rose on her lips. She turned a pale sad face towards Barba.

"You can forget him," she said. "You have forgotten him, or you could not speak so; but I am his wife in God's sight, and if, indeed, he has departed, I am his widow."

"It is useless to fight with Providence." Barba had gone back to her distaff. "It was meant to happen—there is no more to be said."

Marie only sighed. She felt deeply, almost bitterly, that no more could be said about Jehan to her mother.

CHAPTER IV.

BESIDE THE FOUNTAIN.

After that night a great change showed itself in Marie Gourin. Her bright archness, the saucy butterfly ways which had made her so popular in the little village, were scarcely ever apparent. The only time when she sparkled into one of her old smiles was when she was trying to cheer Jehan's blind uncle Michel.

She and her mother never spoke of Jehan. Louis Mellac came often to the cottage, but he usually talked to Barba, and Marie had not guessed that his visits were meant for her. He promised Barba that he would find a tenant for his cottage, and she put away her anxiety. Marie must not be hurried, she thought; but surely this marriage with Monsieur Mellac would be the best possible arrangement. "It was meant to happen;" and Barba repeated this till she believed she was piously doing God's will in encouraging the hopes of the rich farmer.

It was a warm evening in June, and Barba sate in her cottage spinning, thinking over Mellac's suit, and wondering how all would end. All at once she heard a step outside, and she left her spinning and went to the door to meet her visitor.

He came into the cottage with a determined look on his face, and seated himself.

"Marie has waited long enough," he said, without any greeting to Madame Gourin.

Barba was startled out of her dream of security as he went on, roughly, "I have been doing all I can to please and comfort you, neighbour. Most landlords would have asked for their rent at the quarter; but if Marie is to be my wife there need be no question of rent between you and me. But now it is time for you to try to please me in this matter."

Marie had said that her mother had forgotten Jehan; and, truly, Barba had tried to forget her own affection for the true and generous-hearted young fisherman; but at these words it seemed to her that Jehan Kerrac stood before her, his dark eyes full of mournful reproach. He had never said a rough word to her. Involuntarily she crossed herself and murmured an ejaculatory prayer.

Mellac started.

"What do you see?" he said. "You looked as if you saw the Ankou beside the hearth."

Barba shook her head.

"I see nothing present," she said. "Your words alarm me. I fear you are over-hasty. Marie is still so young."

The farmer rose. His face looked hard and stolid, as usual, but there was menace in his small sunken eyes.

"Bah! I am tired of excuses, Barba Gourin. I mean to wed Marie; and therefore, if you shrink from telling her so, I will tell her myself. You can choose. Tell her to-night, or I shall tell her to-morrow," he said, roughly.

Barba hesitated; but the farmer's face told her that she must yield.

"I will do your bidding," she said, simply; and Louis Mellac walked out of the house without so much as saying good evening to her.

Barba sate with her hands in her lap till Marie came in, and then she roused and told her daughter of Mellac's proposal.

The girl listened, looked hard at Barba to be sure she was in earnest, and then she gave a sad smile.

"Mother," she said, "Jehan is not dead. I cannot wed Louis Mellac while my heart is with Jehan Kerrec."

Barba gave her back a scared look that startled Marie.

"Child!" she said; "but now while I listened to Monsieur Mellac, I saw Jehan; he passed by me with the sad smile of the departed. Stay, Marie"—the girl shook her head incredulously, but Barba laid her hand solemnly on her arm—"it is that that makes me sure. When my mother was young she too lost her lover, and she went a long journey beyond Douarnenez, even to the shores of the Baie de Trépassés. There she waited as long as she dared, for it is a perilous thing to do. She watched one misty shape after another assemble at the edge of the water and wave long, shadow-like arms to hasten the boatman who plies between that fatal shore and the Isle de Sein; but she did not see her lover. She told me he was perhaps there after all, for every face she gazed on wore so subdued and sad a smile that she could not distinguish one from another—they seemed but mournful repetitions of the same face; and for this reason I know that Jehan is among those who have left us."

Marie stood thinking. She had heard this story before; but that was when her heart had been hardened against sad impressions by present happiness. A wild idea of going to the shore of the departed now thrilled through her. It seemed to her that she would recognise her beloved among the sad faces, however many there might be, and then hope rose and told her it was folly to seek Jehan among the dead.

"When did you think you saw him?" she asked, abruptly.

"Just before you came in. I will tell you all the truth, Marie. I will not deceive you in any way. Louis Mellac has long loved you. He has often asked me to speak to you for him, and I have said no, and bid him wait; but to-night he said he would wait no longer, and then all at once I saw Jehan's pale sad face."

Marie broke in impetuously,

"You saw Jehan—yes, and what did that mean? Mother, you are wise for other people's visions, but you cannot read your own. Jehan's face was shown you to remind you of him, to bid you beware of giving his promised wife to another man, for I am no longer yours to give. You gave me to Jehan," the girl said, passionately. "I am his—his only here, and for ever. Mother, I am his—maid, wife, or widow. I can never put anyone in the place of my love; there is no place here"—she put her hand softly on her heart—"he fills me."

Barba did not look angry, she had prepared herself for resistance; but there was a despairing ring in her voice, when she answered.

"You must have your will, Marie; you have always pleased yourself. But I must tell you all, so that you may choose with open eyes. If you will not marry Monsieur Mellac, we must either beg or we must go to service."

Marie fixed wondering eyes on her mother.

"What do you mean?" she said. "The cottage is ours, and we have the cow, and the rest. Nothing is changed with us."

"I must pay the rent of the cottage for Jehan, and Monsieur Mellac says I must pay also for repairs which Jehan said must be made. I have no money, Marie. We have nothing beyond our daily needs. If we pay Louis Mellac, we must sell all we have and work for others."

Marie was silent. In her inexperience it seemed to her that nothing could be a hardship that was done for the sake of Jehan; but she could not let her mother suffer.

Presently she raised her head. "You must let me think," she said. "Perhaps my way will be made clear. I will tell you to-morrow."

She went up to her mother and held her forehead for the usual kiss, but Barba put both arms round the girl.

"My child," she whispered, "it is not for myself I urge this, but I long to see thee rich and happy."

Marie threw back her head so that she might look up in her mother's face. There were tears in her dark eyes, but Barba was surprised to see some of the old sparkle in the girl's face.

"Riches and happiness are not always found in company, dear mother. Riches wants so much, and happiness can do with so little. But good-night, mother, dear."

Marie was soon in one of the box beds that stood on each side the fire-place, but she did not get to sleep. She was a great believer in dreams; and, as she had prayed devoutly before she lay down, it seemed to her that an answer would probably come to her in sleep. She could not wed Louis Mellac, but some other way would be shown out of her perplexity. She fell off at last into heavy dreamless slumber.

Marie rubbed her eyes when she awoke. Her last idea as she fell asleep recurred as she looked round her; but all was blank. Nothing had come to her during sleep. The talk with her mother had not been effaced by any hopeful dream. Every word of it was fixed in her memory.

She got up earlier than usual; and, without disturbing Barba, she took a tall red earthen pitcher and went out of the house.

The village stood on a point of land almost surrounded by the sea; but the country behind the village was wooded, and not very far from Barba Gourin's cottage there was a ruined fountain of ancient date, with a niche holding an image of the saint to whom the spring had been dedicated. A broken wall had once extended round the fountain, and it still measured a square space shaded by trees. The steps which led down to this damp retreat were moss-grown and broken; but between the fissures tufts of lady fern and black spleenwort had secured a footing, and looked bright as the morning sun shone down on them through the branches overhead.

Marie tripped down quickly; but she came up the steps more slowly, for she had taken a pail as well as the tall red pitcher, and the water brimmed over as she left the fountain.

She sighed. Ah, how Jehan used to lie in wait, always ready to carry home her pails for her, and how hard she had been; she had rarely indulged him in ever so short a talk, but had always hurried home, with, perhaps, scarcely a smile of thanks for his trouble.

"I did not deserve his love," she said, "and it has been taken away."

Something made her look up, and she saw Louis Mellac. He must have been concealed among the trees, Marie thought; she felt sure no one could have come down the green lane which led from the high road to the fountain. She turned pale, for she guessed his purpose.

"Good morning, Marie," he said; "that is a heavy pail—let me take it."

"No, thank you;" and, as Marie held it firmly and Louis Mellac tried to take it from her hand, the water splashed out and filled his sabots.

He muttered an ugly sounding word, but he forced a smile.

"Come, let me have it, little one," he said. "I am stronger than you."

But it seemed to Marie that she could not let the farmer do for her what Jehan had done. It would be putting him in her lover's place.

THE

MISTLETOE SPRIG OF OLDSTONE HALL.

(From the Oldstone Chronicles.)

BY F. C. BURNAND.

They were asked down to Oldstone by the Baronet and his lady,—grandpapa and grandmamma. Two coaches full; one held the Barton Gilpins, bringing Miss Constance Greville, and the other brought Squire Tull and his family, with young Ned Tull, Sir Marmaduke Oldstone's grandson.

Ned would have preferred a Christmas in town had he not heard of Miss Constance being expected, and as he looked out of the postchaise, in which, with his portly parents, he had a far from comfortable seat, he scarcely congratulated himself on having relinquished the dissipations of the metropolis on seeing Miss Constance, listening demurely enough, if attitude went for anything, to the remarks of a young dandy recently come in from riding.

What he was saying Ned Tull hadn't an idea. What he himself, Ned Tull, would have been saying in a similar position, was as clear as possible.

"Constance must be won this Christmas Eve" muttered Ned to himself, as, on the chariot turning the corner, he obtained a more distinct view of the youthful beau who was paying most assiduous court to the lady in question.

"He looks an empty conceited fellow," said Ned to himself as he gave his ruffles a shake, and settled his cravat.

The Gilpins were settling down. Such a family! Barton Gilpin, High Sheriff of his county, had married Miss Lætitia Oldstone some ten years ago, and several little Gilpins had been among the results.

Constance Greville was a sort of relation of the Gilpins—"the sort" being a very poor one. She was the daughter of a country clergyman who was "passing rich"—or parson rich—on a very small sum; and so his comely daughter had to give her services as governess where there was some chance of remuneration, and, at all events, a certainty of relieving the family at home by her enforced absence.

Constance was the dearest little thing in the world, as any of my readers may see from the illustration; and was the cheapest little thing in the house, as anyone, acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Barton Gilpin's establishment of seven children, would soon have ascertained.

Education was not at high pressure then, as it is now, but human nature was pretty much the same; and the Barton Gilpins—for all their fine house, splendid liveries, and influential connections—were not less pleased than other generous spirits at getting as much as they could for as little as possible.

If Constance was their poor relation, they were her "near" relations—very near indeed. Be this as it may, Constance was included in the invitation; for, somehow or other, Lady Oldstone, the kindliest old gentlewoman possible, had heard a sort of whisper of Ned Tull having suddenly discovered under his enormous waistcoat and resplendent frill a something which seemed to trouble him considerably, and which my Lady concluded was most certainly a warm, impressionable heart.

The young man, for all his pleasure-loving, pleasure-seeking temperament, was well-disposed enough, and, being also well-to-do, would soon be well disposed of. He was free to choose, and had enough and to spare for himself and a wife of his choice, without troubling himself as to what the world might be pleased to say.

True that he was my Lady's grandson; but what of that? Sir Marmaduke had married both his daughters sufficiently well for love and money; and Ned Tull, the first issue of the first marriage, was now twenty-five years of age, while the Gilpin offspring had many many years before them ere they would be called upon to lead, or be led, to the Hymeneal altar.

Ned was a favourite of my Lady's; so was Constance; and there would be an extra provision in my Lady's last will and testament, which undoubtedly would be for their particular benefit.

Squire Tull and his wife looked higher for a daughter-in-law than a poor relation, forced to go out as a governess, and in craning their necks after the ideal they overlooked the real, which either of them could have seen, with half an eye between them, had they taken the trouble. Such being their views for a daughter-in-law, it is no wonder that they were equally ambitious for the future of their daughter Amelia Tull, who had been staying with the Gilpins, and had arrived with them in their coach. There was one other to make up the resident party at Oldstone Hall, and as he was no unimportant person in his own eyes—and not unfavourably regarded by somebody else's—he cannot be omitted here.

The Hon. Dick Pauncefort was a beau, a gay gallant, without any idea of "ranging" himself, and very strong ideas about *dis*arranging himself. He was sufficiently rich to enable him to pass his time between town and country, enjoying both and belonging distinctly to neither.

He was emphatically a gay young bachelor, the second son of an Earl, and heir to a far more considerable property than usually falls to the lot of younger sons of noble families.

In society a beau, in the field a sportsman, a kind-hearted, careless, inconsistent sort of a person, balancing between good and evil, vain of his personal appearance, and too apt to think himself irresistible with the fair sex—"if he only took the trouble." Seeing Constance, he thought she was worth the trouble; and after a slight greeting to Amelia, who seemed dreadfully chagrined by his neglect, he commenced a flirtation on the spot with the pretty young companion, who had the merit of appealing to him as a novelty.

It was dangerous, in more ways than one. In those good old days, duelling was not by any means out of fashion, and for les beaux yeux, two young sparks, crossed in love, would soon find their blades crossed in anger.

Ned Tull neither knew nor cared who the dandy in the riding-coat might be; but he did know and care, very much, for the little lady in the prodigious bonnet and the enormous muff, both of which were seasonable and fashionable presents from my Lady of Oldstone Hall, while Sir Marmaduke had presented her with a stick à la mode and a neat little silken purse for her own private pocket, accompanied by a neat little speech for her own private ear.

So Constance's heart was glad; and no wonder there was a smile on her lips, as Dick Pauncefort, after a formal introduction, began paying his court to her in the latest style of Fops' Alley.

"I am so glad to hear we are to spend our holiday together here," observed Dick. "I hope we shall become better acquainted."

"Indeed, Sir, I hope we shall," was the maiden's simple reply.

"I trust I shall be found to improve on acquaintance, like good wine," continued the youth, smiling, and, sooth to say, not unwilling to throw out a bait for a compliment.

"Oh, I am sure you will," returned Miss Constance, so artlessly, and so readily, as to cause the slightest shade of annoyance to pass over the young man's brow.

"I am sure that Miss Constance won't," he said.

"Won't what?" she asked naïvely.

"Improve," he replied, with a look intended to convey unutterable things.

"Why not?" she asked again.

He was in for a catechism.

"Because she can't," answered the young man, rather abashed at the obscurity of his compliment.

"Can't improve!" exclaimed Miss Constantia, pretending to be horribly shocked. "Am I so bad?"

"No; pardon me—so perfect, there is no room for improvement."

She curtsied; he bowed.

Sir Marmaduke, at the door, called out,

"Here, Dick Pauncefort, let me introduce to you my grandson, Master Edward Tull. You're just about of an age, and ought to know one another."

The two young men saluted each other courteously, but rather more ceremoniously than Sir Marmaduke had expected. He was a stickler for ceremony, but not on these occasions. However, he trusted to a loving cup of spiced wine, round the cheery fire, to smooth the wrinkles and warm the hearts.

They all adjourned to the dining-room, where the butler, the men-servants, and maids, were preparing for keeping the eve in true old-fashioned style.

Christmas itself was to be magnificent, but this was just the preparation, the overture.

It was not to be a late night. There was to be no deep drinking, or long sitting, but a merry dinner, foreshadowing the Pudding, the Turkey, and the Boar's Head, which were to be in all their glory to-morrow, and a social, cheery gathering in the evening to dance until midnight, and not a minute after, so as to be ready for the duties and pleasure of the next day.

My Lady had strictly commanded her maids that, on no account, should any mistletoe appear before Christmas Day itself. That was her rule.

"Plenty of Folly, under the Holly," said the Old Lady, "on the day itself; but not before."

But Dick Pauncefort had a design.

Stealing quietly out of the drawing-room, he chose a secluded spot behind "My Grandfather's clock"—since celebrated in the ballad-lore of our country, or rather of our Town—and fixed the tiniest atom of mistletoe to the bottom of the lamp that hung in the recess.

Then he retired.

In the meantime, Ned has engaged Constance in a tête-à-tête, and has taken good care to secure her as his neighbour at dinner, and as his partner in most of the dances afterwards. Health and Happiness, and Christmas Cheer, and a Hearty Welcome to Oldstone Hall, were the toasts of the evening, the Host and Hostess were "drunk" with all the honours, and, after a brief discussion of the full-bodied port, which Squire Tull and the elders were loth to leave, but for the prospect of a midnight bowl of punch by way of a nightcap, the whole party reassembled in the drawing-room, where spinnet, fiddles, and "all kinds of music" were already tuning up for glees, carols, and the dance.

"Why," observed Squire Tull, who was in the merriest mood possible, "there's no mistletoe!"

The omission was noticed by all in various ways.

Miss Constance smiled at the fire.

Dick Pauncefort looked hard at her, which is a wrong expression in his case, as he looked anything but hard—on the contrary, remarkably soft, until, meeting Amelia Tull's glance, he seemed to be a bit ashamed of himself, and pretended to be absorbed in contemplating the decorations.

Ned Tull looked angry, and then looked foolish.

Sir Marmaduke answered his son-in-law the Squire,

"My dear John, don't you know by this time that we never do have mistletoe on Christmas Eve?"

"I never noticed its absence before," the Squire protested.

"And you don't know the story?" asked my Lady.

Well, whether he did or not, or whether they did or not, very certain it is that Sir Marmaduke was ready to give it them in rhyme, in his bluff, old, hearty voice, with a good tune and a chorus to it, too, on which he absolutely insisted. He called it

THE SPRIG OF MISTLETOE.

(From the Chronicles of Oldstone Hall.)

I.

In Oldstone Hall there's a legend old,
The Mistletoe Kiss, 'tis writ in gold.
On a parchment scroll of an ancient date,
When the Red and White Rose were within the gate.
When Christmas Eve was kept in the way
That our forefathers kept it for many a day.
When the merry retainers a carol sang,
And the bell in the tower a welcome rang.
Sing ho! sing hey!
Be merry and gay,
With the Mistletoe Bough
In the ancient way!

CHORUS (taken up by all the guests),
Sing ho! sing hey! &c.

II.

In Oldstone Hall, so the story goes,
Were met the friends of the pure White Rose.
And the Baron's daughter,
So fair that night
Than the pure White Rose,
Was far more white.
For in secret her wounded lover lay
A Red Rose hurt in the last affray.
And o'er the door where he lay so low
Hung a fresh-gathered sprig of mistletoe.
Sing ho! sing hey! &c.

III.

'Twas Christmas Eve,—and a White Rose Knight,
Whose eyes beamed wild with a fiendish light,
The damsel track'd—
And his arm he threw
Around her waist,
"I will take my due,
For Cupid's mistletoe hangs above,"
He cried;—but a blow from a mailéd glove
Flouted his ear, and laid him low
'Neath the fresh-gathered sprig of mistletoe.
Sing ho! sing hey! &c.

IV.

The wounded lover has risen in strength;
The White Rose Knight has measured his length
On the floor. She clung
To her lover,—they fled
In the night. The Two Roses,
The White and the Red.
And lives were lost, hearts broke with tears,
And never at Oldstone these many years
On Christmas Eve do they ever show
A fresh-gathered sprig of mistletoe.
Sing ho! sing hey! &c.

"They were idiots to fight," said the Squire.

"I quite agree with you," said his wife.

"I suppose," observed Sir Marmaduke to the first speaker, "that had you been the Baron you would have ordered the two young men to shake hands—have stopped all quarrelling for that night at least."

"Of course, my dear," exclaimed my Lady. "I detest politics in families. And the White and Red Roses were political parties."

The Squire was not so certain about this; but if he had been the Baron, his opinion was that the best thing would have been to have summoned the chaplain, given away his daughter, made the Red Rose into a White one, and then all would have lived happily ever after.

A dance! A dance!

It was getting late; at least, so said the Grandfather's clock.

There was no "sitting out" in those days except when you were honestly tired.

The clock's old hands—cunning "old hands" both of them—stole on noiselessly upon all, except the few who might be listening for the regular mechanical beat, as it ticked off the seconds and approached nearer and nearer to the end of Christmas Eve, and the beginning of Christmas Day. The old people might have been listening, and have heard the sound of the clock above that of the music, and above the hum of the dancers. But for all that, they talked on and on, of the years that were past, of former meetings like the present, of those who had passed away, and whose places in their old haunts and their kindly memories could never again be filled.

It was the quadrille, and le Cavalier seul had to perform.

The Cavalier Seul was Mr. Tull.

Suddenly, in the very middle of his advance, he dashed forward, with a low exclamation that startled everyone out of their propriety, and made for the clock.

A scream—a woman's scream—a blow—a fall.

* * * * *

That unhappy Dick!

That confounded mistletoe!

He had been watching Constance, who had been charged with the duty of superintending the arrangement of the trays and glasses for the midnight wassail-bowl, in which the Health of Old Father Christmas was to be celebrated.

On her return he had waylaid her under the mistletoe. Ned had seen his arm passing round her waist, and that was enough, and too much, for him.

* * * * *

In a second the whole room was in an uproar.

The clock hands pointed warningly—five minutes to midnight. Old Father Christmas within five paces of the room.

Outrage, abuse, violence—a challenge!

All in two minutes, and Old Father Christmas within three paces of the door.

Rage, sorrow, and tears. Expostulation, explanation, accusation, and Old Father Christmas within one minute of the door!

"Stop, all of you!" cries Sir Marmaduke, imperatively, as he stands clasping his old wife round the waist, and holding one hand aloft, as if commanding their silence.

The solemn hour of midnight chimed forth.

Then, from without, in sweet harmony arose the old familiar carol, of which the sweet burden is—

"Peace on earth! To men goodwill!
Peace on earth!
To men goodwill!"

* * * * *

Ah! my good friends, "In the King's name, let fall your swords and daggers!"

What need to recount how this night ended or the next day began?

What need to say that the Honourable Dick got a lesson, and that Amelia read it to him? That Master Edward and Miss Constance found such support in Sir Marmaduke and my Lady that any opposition was withdrawn on the spot, and all ended happily?

And wasn't the little sprig of mistletoe preserved until it dried up, and became dust, and was lost, and was swept away with some other rubbish by a new housemaid in the course of the next quarter; and how it was asked for next Christmas and was not forthcoming? And how Sir Marmaduke sang the old song and told a new story—the story I've just been telling—which was thenceforth entered into the Chronicles of Oldstone Hall, where it may now be found by anyone who can find that invaluable work—to whom and every one else I send this greeting, and wish, as freshly and heartily as ever,

A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

THE STIRRUP CUP.

Long and late were the revels in the old Tudor lodge on the occasion which our Artist has depicted. Ah! as Hans Breitmann said, on a memorable occasion, "Where is dat barty now?" But a truce to melancholy. There is no indigestion, at all events, to remind us of that seventeenth-century Christmas merry-making, whatever may be the case as regards the feast—the liberal and abundant feast which we have in anticipation. They, that is to say, my Lord Bountiful and his pretty daughters and their gallant Cavalier guests, have evidently no fear of consequences before their eyes. Fast and furious, we suspect, has been the drinking as well as the dancing in the old hall this night. Yet those noble gentlemen must not be suffered to leave without the final rite of hospitality—the cavalier's parting stirrup-cup—to wish them God's speed; to keep their blood aglow on the journey through the frosty air along the snow-covered road, and as a pledge of another merry meeting. So, the guests being accompanied to the door or watched from the casement, their great riding-cloaks and slouched hats donned, their feet in the stirrups, the retainers in readiness with their torches to light them to the park gates, the bumpers of malmsey poured out from the silver tankards, there is nothing remains but to quaff the generous wine; and then one "Hurrah!" nay, another, and yet another, longer—"Hurra—h!" till the very dog joins in chorus, and the startled owls in the ivy take up the shout in a plaintive minor refrain, and even the rooks in the tall trees of the neighbouring wood caw a dream-like echo. No fear for these gay knights of a Roundhead surprise on their way home; the costumes tell us that the "King" had already "come to his own." The only fear which will haunt one of them is touching the prosperity of his suit with one of those pretty damsels standing in the doorway; but as it was this same gentleman who (unless we are falling into an historical error) shortly afterwards commissioned the Court painter of the time, Sir Peter Lely, to execute her portrait as a shepherdess in amber and blue satin, with a lapful of flowers, he could not have been kept long in suspense.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S

WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.

Happy Days. There is something of regret and gloom in the first appearance of grey hairs; our prospects are often blighted by their premature appearance. MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER happily affords a safe and sure means of restoring them again to the freshness and beauty of youth. MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER is no new low-priced article; it is the old-established standard and reliable article known and spoken most highly of in every civilised country. Every good thing for the hair that the most scientific men of the old and new world can suggest are combined in MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. It requires only a few applications to restore grey hair to its youthful colour and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. Dandriff is quickly and permanently removed. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S

WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.

IT CANNOT FAIL TO RESTORE GREY HAIR TO ITS YOUTHFUL COLOUR, GLOSS, AND BEAUTY. When the hair turns grey, loses its lustre, and falls out, it simply requires nourishment. MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER, by its gentle tonic action, strengthens and invigorates the hair, and by the operation of natural causes grey or white hair is quickly restored to its youthful colour, gloss, and beauty. It will stop its falling, and induce a healthy and most luxurious growth. Use no other preparation with it, not even oil or pomade, or Zylo-Balsamum.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S

WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.

There are two special qualities which determine and fix the superiority and excellence of MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. First—Its prompt, quick action, and the new growth, life, and vigour that it is sure to give to the hair never failing by a few applications to RESTORE GREY OR WHITE HAIR TO ITS YOUTHFUL COLOUR, imparting to the hair a delightful aroma, fresh, delicate, and unchangeable in any climate. Second—Its easy application without any previous preparation of the hair; without that sticky and disagreeable sulphur odour found and complained of in other preparations. It never stains the skin or linen. It retains the hair in any desired position, and is cooling and cleansing to the scalp.

CAUTION!—The Genuine only in Pink Wrappers.

Sold by all Chemists, Perfumers, and Dealers in Toilet Articles, in only one size. Large Bottles.

WHOLESALE DEPOT, 114 AND 116, SOUTHAMPTON-ROW, LONDON.

ZYLO-BALSAMUM.

ZYLO-BALSAMUM successfully rivals all other preparations for the hair. It is truly termed by those who do not delay its use too long to be the matchless preserver and beautifier of the hair, imparting to it lustrous beauty, promoting its growth, stopping its falling, and removing dandriff.

ZYLO-BALSAMUM.

Apply the Zylo-Balsamum early to your children's hair, and continue its use, thus securing a bountiful and luxuriant growth through life. Those of all ages whose Hair is still healthy and strong should apply the ZYLO-BALSAMUM, and thus put off to the end of time all grey or fading, thin, and falling Hair. A single application will remove all dandruff, and give the Hair a beautiful gloss. Words cannot describe the gloss, the silkiness, the flowing wavy beauty of the Hair that is dressed with ZYLO-BALSAMUM. It cleanses the Hair, gives to it a healthy vigour and growth, removes all dandruff, and imparts a most delightful fragrance.

ZYLO-BALSAMUM.

It is a clear, transparent, cooling vegetable oil, combined with a spirit extract of rare herbs and flowers, forming a preparation for the hair of extraordinary virtues. Its extremely low price, only Three Shillings and Sixpence, in large bottles, commends it to all, young and old, rich and poor. Do not delay its use until a more powerful agent may be necessary. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers. Ask for MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S ZYLO-BALSAMUM.

LEGALISATION OF MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

OPINIONS of the PRESS, &c.

THE PRINCE OF WALES, May 6, 1879.

"My Lords,—I have to present a petition, signed by 3258 farmers of Norfolk, praying for the legalisation of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. I present it, my Lords, on local and general grounds. It is my firm conviction that if this bill passed it would be of advantage to the community at large, and I therefore give my hearty support to the noble Lord who moves the second reading of the bill."

LORD HOUGHTON, May 6, 1879.

"What, my Lords, was the moral position to which the House and the country were committed by the passing of that Act (Lord Lyndhurst's Act)? The Legislature declared that such marriages after a certain date were to be unlawful, and in the religious aspect sinful; and yet they were made obligatory on all who had contracted them up to that date. By one portion of that Act Parliament placed a certain number of persons in a position in which, if they came to consider these marriages wrong and void, they could be enforced upon them by an action for the restitution of conjugal rights; by another clause in the same Act Parliament declared them void ab initio, and by implication sinful. There neither was, nor is there in fact, in the Statute Book of any country in the world an Act so inconsistent in its provisions, so repugnant to common sense, and so shocking to the first dictates of morality."

THE TIMES, May 7, 1879.—"The debate yesterday in the House of Lords upon the bill for legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister cannot but mark an important stage in the discussion of this question. The bill was rejected, but by a majority of only 20 in a House of 182; and as fourteen Bishops voted in the majority against one in the minority, it is evident that lay opinion was very closely balanced indeed. The division must be regarded as a spontaneous expression of the existing balance of opinion. From that point of view it must needs have great weight. The persons who have married their deceased wives' sisters, and those who are desirous to do so, will be able to say that in the House of Lords there is a very close balance of opinion on the subject, and that the question must be regarded as at least an open one. The consequence must be to give encouragement to such marriages, and thus to increase the pressure which is brought to bear upon Parliament in favour of an alteration of the law. . . . The decision of this, as of all other matters of legislation, rests ultimately with the people themselves. If, as Lord Houghton maintains, the majority of the middle classes are represented by the petition of the farmers of Norfolk and Buckinghamshire, the dislike of women to the measure, of which the Bishop of London is confident, will not prevent its passing. There is no unquestioned authority by which the matter can be decided. The Bishop of London admits that there is no direct prohibition of these marriages to be found in Scripture; and as soon as the question becomes one of inference and presumption, considerations of general expediency and of the tendency of public opinion can no longer be excluded. The mere fact that we are very singular in maintaining our prohibition of such marriages is sufficient to show that there is much to be said in favour of allowing them."

THE DAILY NEWS, May 7, 1879.—"Is there any conceivable reason why the law should thrust in its stiff and awkward hand, and declare that under no circumstances shall such a marriage take place in England? Can anything be more absurd than the argument which treats a man's relation to his sister-in-law as consanguinity, and insists that because he sometimes speaks of her as his sister she is as though she were born of the same blood? Finally, can any theory be more unfounded and less inviting than that which assumes that no man can look upon his sisters-in-law or his cousins or his aunts without resolving to marry one of them so soon as his wife shall have given him the opportunity by considerately dying? Such, however, are the theories by which the opposition is justified to a measure which, entirely harmless as regards the bulk of the community, would tend to remove in certain peculiar cases an unnatural obstruction to a very natural arrangement."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH, May 7, 1879.

"To say, as did the Bishop of London, that 'any change in the law would destroy the free, trustful, and pure feelings with which a man regards his sister-in-law at present,' is simply to argue outside the region of human nature. A man's 'feelings' in such matters are wholly unaffected by statutes, for as yet no human legislature has discovered how to modify or control the domestic affections by Act of Parliament. The Bishop of London's reasoning seems to rest on the assumption, which is really as insulting as it is gratuitous, that but for the law which prohibits a man marrying his deceased wife's sister, everybody would try to taint with impurity this now spotless relationship. The way of dealing with such a question is to treat it in the spirit of those whose solvent for all social and political difficulties is liberty."

THE DAILY CHRONICLE, May 7, 1879.

"We have little sympathy with the objections raised on the ground that the bill would upset happy social relations, as the Bishop of London contended, or would destroy the relations between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, as Lord Cranbrook maintained. It seems to us that the public feeling is decidedly in its favour, for the marriages in question are socially recognised as valid. Why, then, maintain a restriction which has only the effect of branding the issue of such marriages with the mark of illegitimacy?"

THE ECHO, May 7, 1879.—"The position of a man with a small income who finds himself suddenly left with the burden of a young family upon his hands is often peculiarly difficult. To him a second marriage is almost a necessity. He needs in his house a woman young enough to undertake the multifarious duties of the household; if he does not marry her, be she a deceased wife's sister or any one else, scandal is almost sure to arise. Such a man's choice is extremely limited. It is not easy for him to find a wife, in other ways suitable, who is willing to commence married life with a family of young children upon her hands. Between a strange woman and the sister of the deceased wife there can, as a rule, be very little doubt as to who would be the most likely to treat the children with kindness, and the result is that both with and without the form of marriage such unions are frequent among the industrial classes."

THE GLOBE, May 9, 1879.—"It cannot be denied that there is very strong and influential pressure, and a powerful current of sentiment and opinion, not only in our colonies, but at home, in favour of legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister. It is already legal in some of our colonies, and it is anomalous, and doubtless sometimes causes pain and grievous embarrassment, that marriages which are valid in one part of the empire should not be the same in all parts."

LLOYD'S WEEKLY LONDON NEWSPAPER, May 10, 1879.—"All that can be said for and against marriage with the sister of a man's deceased wife has been repeated ad nauseam, and the balance is largely in favour of such marriages. Indeed, public opinion is so thoroughly made up on the subject that people become impatient when it is reopened. It is understood to be one of those undeniably necessary social reforms that must, by the impulse of necessity, be carried."

A POOR PARSON, 1879.—Extract from a letter in the "Standard," of Feb. 17, 1879:—"To declare that this question is not an important one is to ignore facts. The question would be the burning question of the day if the good sense and right feeling of the public did not extend that indulgence and absolution to the perpetrators of these marriages which only a small section of the Church of England denies. I sincerely hope that something will be done to remedy the painful position of thousands of deserving families during the coming Session of Parliament, for, if not, I am convinced that the question will be made very prominent in the next general election, and I would not support any member who would not pledge himself to vote for the removal of this oppressive law."

THE COUNTESS of CHARLEMONT, May 1, 1879:—"There is one argument, and Lady Charlemont considers it a strong one, in favour of such marriages, which is, that now the foolish opponents thereof say that a woman would never feel safe in admitting her sister to her house as a resident if, after a wife's death, a marriage between the widower and the sister were possible. This is sheer folly. Why, such a degrading idea would prevent a woman having a cousin—often dear as a sister—or a friend to stay with her. Now, if a kind girl goes to nurse and comfort her dead sister's children—for whom she must have a natural affection—old gossips shake their heads and malign her, though, as the law stands (not, we hope, for long), she is in her brother's house. Who would cherish the motherless things like her? A stranger? Well, the kind aunt would be thrust aside for some giddy girl, who would have no love for them—perhaps even a feeling of repulsion."

EDINBURGH UNITED PRESBYTERIAN PRESBYTERY, Jan. 7, 1879:—"That marriage with a deceased wife's sister, being a matter in regard to which the law of Christ is a law of liberty, shall no longer be a bar to membership in the United Presbyterian Church."

OTHER PRESBYTERIES.—Resolutions similar to the above have been passed by nineteen out of the twenty-seven Presbyteries in the United Presbyterian Church, and not one of the twenty-seven has declared these marriages to be anti-Scriptural.

THE Rev. Dr. MOFFAT, Aug. 22, 1877.

"In reference to marrying a deceased wife's sister, my opinion is that the command 'not to take a wife to her sister to vex her beside the other in her lifetime' can have only this one meaning, that after the death of a wife the widower is at perfect liberty to marry her sister. How anyone can view the text in any other light is to me incomprehensible. Having in the providence of God been employed in translating the Scripture into an African language, I think I have thoroughly and prayerfully studied every verse, but I never could conceive it to be possible for Biblical scholars and critics to come to any other conclusion in regard to the above passage than the one stated."

DUNCAN M'LAREN, M.P., Nov. 29, 1878.—"I have always voted against this bill, but the question is becoming more and more difficult and delicate every year, because both the last and the present Government have given their consent to bills passed by Colonial Legislatures legalising these marriages. When that is done in respect of them, which are almost part and parcel of ourselves, it is difficult to [illegible] why they should not be legalised in this country."

ARCHBISHOP WHATELY, Feb. 20, 1851.

"Waiving, then, the irrelevant questions of what marriages are suitable and desirable, and of the Mosaic Law and foreign canons, let people be brought to the discussion of the true question, which is whether a sufficient public benefit from the restriction can be proved to justify the abridgment of a man's liberty? Whether the evil of leaving all men to judge for themselves in this point is greater than that of meddlesome legislative interference with domestic concerns. Certainly experience proved for a century and more, before the Act of 1835, that the evils to society now apprehended are chimerical, for there was then no real prohibition of such marriages. It was well known that these marriages might and did not seldom take place, and yet no such evil results to society as men now dream of ensued. Those dreams are refuted by experience as well a by reason."

CARDINAL WISEMAN.—"'Do you construe that passage in Leviticus (xviii. 18) as prohibiting marriage with a deceased wife's sister, or merely as saying that a man should not take two wives together, at the same time, being so related?' 'Certainly, that verse appears to have the latter meaning, that two sisters should not be living together in the same house as wives of the same person.' 'Is such a marriage held by your Church as prohibited in Scripture?' 'Certainly not. It is considered a matter of ecclesiastical legislation.'"

DR. FITZGERALD, Bishop of Cork.

"These marriages are not contrary to the Divine command. The Scriptural argument against them seems to me to break down at every step. In proportion as, by our prohibitions, we multiply the opportunities of temptation and prevent the enjoyment of any seeming advantage not evil in itself, in the same proportion we extend and increase the power of the enemy of mankind."

PROFESSOR MAX MULLER, Dec. 13, 1877.—"How any Hebrew scholar could so misinterpret Leviticus xviii. 18, so as to make it a prohibition of marriage with a deceased wife's sister is a puzzle to me. I know of one analogous case only—the falsification of a verse in the 'Veda,' by which it was turned into a commandment for the burning of a widow on the death of her husband."

THE Rev. Dr. VAUGHAN (Master of the Temple), Feb. 28, 1871:—"I am decidedly in favour of a change in the law regarding marriage with a deceased wife's sister. It appears to me to be at present in a position most unsatisfactory both in point of justice and policy, and I have never scrupled to express that opinion. We have no right to create sins, and I believe such marriages to be sins of man's creating, not God's. The argument against them from Scripture has always appeared to me to break down utterly. And my experience of social life among the poor in a Northern town leads me to lament the existence of any arbitrary hindrance, such as I believe this to be, to the legal union of two persons whose illegal union is the certain alternative."

THE ROYAL COMMISSIONERS, 1847-8.—"Some persons contend that these marriages are forbidden expressly or inferentially by Scripture. If this opinion be admitted, cadit quæstio. But it does not appear from the evidence that this opinion is generally entertained. We do not find that the persons who contract these marriages, and the relations and friends who approve them, have a less strong sense than others of religious and moral obligation, or are marked by laxity of conduct. These marriages will take place when a concurrence of circumstances gives rise to mutual attachment; they are not dependent on legislation."—Report signed by the Bishop of Lichfield, Mr. Stuart Wortley, Dr. Lushington, Mr. Blake, Mr. Justice Williams, and Lord Advocate Rutherfurd.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE DENMAN.—"If the Act (of 1835) has notoriously failed in its operation; if these marriages, though discountenanced by the Legislature, have become more numerous, not only among the lower classes, a large proportion of whom must ever remain ignorant of the existence of this and similar interferences by law with freedom, but among the cultivated, the thoughtful, the conscientious, the exemplary; if the stigma set by the law is not stamped by public opinion; if the offenders are as well received as before, and are even respected for acting on a just view of Scriptural text, perverted by erroneous interpretations; in such case it will surely be more politic to make the law consistent with reason, than in a fruitless endeavour to bend reason to arbitrary law, to vex and persecute where we cannot prevent, to 'curse whom the Lord hath not cursed, and defy whom he hath not defied.'"

THE Right Hon. JOHN BRIGHT, M.P., April 21, 1869.—"He had never heard yet, and he felt satisfied that he never should hear, an argument such as an honest and learned lawyer could offer to a learned Judge against the proposition of his honourable and learned friend the member for Marylebone (Mr. Thomas Chambers). An accumulated sense of the inconveniences arising from the present state of the law, and a knowledge of the grievous and fearful cases of injury and suffering arising from that law, made him feel he could not give a silent vote on that occasion, and that he ought to use any argument that occurred to him, with the hope of influencing some of those who heard him to give their votes for a final and satisfactory settlement of the question. He had heard this question discussed many times in the society of women—women of cultivation, and admirable in their lives—and yet he must say that he never heard in that society any of those fearful vaticinations which he had heard from the Opposition side of the House. He held that personal freedom should be the great rule in these cases. Men and women were themselves the best judges, on the whole, of the matrimonial contracts they should make. He asked the House to support the Bill on grounds of common justice, as between the rich class and the poor. He asked the House by an emphatic vote to affirm the principle—for this was all he asked—of personal liberty for the men and women of this country in the chief concern of their lives, as against a law in respect of which there was no pretence that it had a foundation in nature or received a sanction from revelation."

CHIEF JUSTICE STORY, Massachusetts.

"Nothing is more common in almost all the States of America than second marriages of this sort, and, so far from being doubtful as to their moral tendency, they are among us deemed the very best sort of marriages. In my whole life I never heard the slightest suggestion against them founded on moral or domestic considerations. Everything that I have read upon this subject for the last twenty years has satisfied me that the objection is utterly unscriptural and unfounded."

A SHORT HISTORY OF NATURAL SCIENCE, and of the Progress of Discovery from the Time of the Greeks to the Present Day. For the Use of Schools and Young Persons. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of "The Fairyland of Science," "Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students."
"A most admirable little manual. It is a classified résumé of the chief discoveries in physical science. But its chief merits are the excellent way in which the authoress has avoided alike overcrowding and omission, the extreme clearness with which each discovery is stated, and the capital practical illustrations by which it is brought down to the level of the least intelligent of readers. To the young student it is a book to open up new worlds with every chapter."—Graphic. (Critique on the First Edition.)

80 YEARS' unparalleled success have proved that ROWLANDS' MACASSAR OIL for the hair, Kalydor for the complexion, and Odonto for the teeth, are the best and purest toilet articles ever made, being free from any lead, mineral, or poisonous ingredients.

ROWLANDS' MACASSAR OIL prevents the hair falling off or turning grey, strengthens weak hair, cleanses it from scurf or dandriff, and is especially recommended for children as forming the basis of a beautiful head of hair.

ROWLANDS' KALYDOR eradicates cutaneous eruptions of all sorts, and produces a beautiful and delicate complexion.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO whitens the Teeth, and prevents decay; is far preferable to pastes or washes. To prevent fraud, the genuine Odonto has on each Box a 3d. Government stamp. Ask any Chemist, Perfumer, or Hair-dresser for Rowlands' Articles.

EVERY VARIETY IN DRESS,
SPECIALLY SELECTED BY A VERY EXPERIENCED MODISTE IN PARIS, AND REPRESENTING THE CORRECT FASHION OF THE SEASON.

THE FOLLOWING EXTRACT FROM AN AMERICAN PAPER IS A PLEASING TESTIMONY TO THE SYSTEM OF BUSINESS ADOPTED AT THIS HOUSE:—

"WE VISITED DURING OUR SOJOURN IN LONDON LAST YEAR THE WAREHOUSE OF MESSRS. JAY, THE MOST NOTED ESTABLISHMENT OF THE KIND IN THE WORLD. IN LOOKING THROUGH ITS NUMEROUS DEPARTMENTS WE WERE ABLE TO APPRECIATE THE TRUE CAUSE OF THE DISTINGUISHED SUCCESS WHICH HAS ATTENDED THE ESTABLISHMENT FOR MANY YEARS.

"MESSRS. JAY RECEIVE LARGE SUPPLIES OF COSTUMES AND MILLINERY DIRECT FROM THE FIRST HOUSES IN PARIS, AND THEY ARE SOLD AT MUCH MORE MODERATE PRICES THAN LADIES CAN PROCURE THEM ON THE CONTINENT. WE TAKE PLEASURE IN DIRECTING THE ATTENTION OF OUR FAIR READERS TO THIS TIME-HONOURED ESTABLISHMENT, WHERE WE ARE SURE THEY WILL BE HONESTLY AND LOYALLY DEALT WITH."

E. F. LANGDALE, Essence Distiller.
72 and 73, Hatton-garden.

BONDED FACTORY, No. 1 Warehouse, London Docks.

ESSENCES DISTILLED from HERBS, FRUITS, and SPICES,

GATHERED in their BLOOM and FRESHNESS,

FOR FLAVOURING SPIRITS, Custards, Wines, Jellies, Ices, and for all Culinary Purposes, ESSENCES of VANILLA, Lemon, Orange, Pine Apple, Raspberry,

ALMONDS, Ratafia, Noyau, &c.

THE LANCET, the great Medical Authority, says:—

E. F. LANGDALE, Essence Distiller, of 72, Hatton-garden, has forwarded to us a sample of Essence of Almonds distilled by him; this is quite free from Prussic Acid; it has a very beautiful odour of peach kernel. We have subjected it to a very extended test and found no trace of prussic acid.

A SPECIAL SCIENTIFIC COMMISSION, from the Editor of the "Lancet," after a visit to E. F. LANGDALE'S Laboratory, thus reports:—"The ESSENCE OF BITTER ALMONDS, of Ratafia, of Noyau, and Peach Kernels, in the state in which they are usually found in the shops, contain a most deadly poison, and are a very prolific source of death by suicide or accident, and the agreeable qualities of these liquids render them peculiarly dangerous."

ALFRED SWAIN TAYLOR, M.D., F.R.S., Professor of Medical Jurisprudence and Chymistry in Guy's Hospital, in his work on Poisons, in an article on

ESSENCE OF ALMONDS, says:—"It is a matter of difficulty to deprive it entirely of its prussic acid. The Essence of Almonds freed from prussic acid by Mr. Langdale, of Hatton-garden, one drachm (60 drops) given to a dog, half a drachm (30 drops) to a cat, four drops to a rat did not destroy life; while four drops of the common oil destroyed life in two instances."

THE SAME "LANCET" SPECIAL SCIENTIFIC COMMISSION further reports:—"It does not augment the enjoyment of a festive occasion to know that the custards, pound-cakes, or sweetmeats set before us may carry death or danger."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS says:—"E. F. Langdale's preparations to our mind are the most extraordinary productions of modern chemistry."

E. F. LANGDALE'S DISTILLED FLAVOURING ESSENCES are sold by all Grocers and Co-Operative Stores in the World; or will be forwarded direct from the Distillery, 72, Hatton-garden, London.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey or white, or falling off, use THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER; for it will positively restore, in every case, grey or white hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed.
This preparation has never been known to fail in restoring the hair to its natural colour and gloss in from eight to twelve days.
It promotes growth, and prevents the hair falling out, eradicating dandriff, and leaving the scalp in a clean, healthy condition.
It imparts peculiar vitality to the roots of the hair, restoring it to its youthful freshness and vigour. Daily applications of this preparation for a week or two will surely restore faded, grey, or white hair to its natural colour and richness.
It is not a dye, nor does it contain any colouring matter or offensive substance whatever. Hence it does not soil the hands, the scalp, or even white linen, but procures the colour within the substance of the hair.
It may be had of any respectable Chemist, Perfumer, or Dealer in Toilet Articles in the Kingdom, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle. In case the dealer has not "The Mexican Hair Renewer" in stock and will not procure it for you, it will be sent direct by rail, carriage paid, on receipt of 4s. in stamps, to any part of England.
Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
WHAT BEAUTIFIES THE HAIR?

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And pleases each one's fancies?
What adds a charm of perfect grace,
And Nature's gift enhances?
What gives a bright and beauteous gloss
And what says each reviewer?
"That quite successful is the use Of 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it bright and glowing?
And keeps it free from dandriff, too,
And healthy in its growing?
What does such wonders? Ask the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That none can equal or approach
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
Like some bright halo beaming?
What makes the hair a perfect mass
Of splendid ringlets teeming?
What gives profusion in excess?
Why, what says each reviewer?
"The choicest preparation is
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it so delightful?
Because to speak the honest truth
Is only just and rightful.
What say the people and the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That most superb for ladies' use Is 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
has gained for itself the highest reputation, and a decided preference over all other "hair dressings," as evinced from certificates and testimonials from the most respectable sources. Being compounded with the greatest care—combining, as it does, all the most desirable qualities of the best hair preparations of the day, without the objectionable ones—it may be relied on as the very best known to chemistry for restoring the natural colour to the hair, and causing new hair to grow on bald spots, unless the hair glands are decayed; for, if the glands are decayed and gone, no stimulant can restore them; but if, as is often the case, the glands are only torpid, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER will renew their vitality, and a new growth of hair will follow. Read the following Testimonial:—
From Messrs. Wm Hayes and Co., Chemists, 12, Grafton-street, Dublin:—"We are recommending THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER to all our customers as the best of the kind, as we have been told by several of our friends who tried it, that it has a wonderful effect in restoring and strengthening their Hair."

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
AN IMPORTANT QUESTION FOR LADIES.

Would you have luxuriant hair,
Beautiful, and rich, and rare?
Would you have it soft and bright,
And attractive to the sight?
This you really can produce,
If you put in constant use
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

The hair it strengthens and preserves,
And thus a double purpose serves;
It beautifies—improves it, too,
And gives it a most charming hue,
And thus in each essential way,
It public favour gains each day—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

If a single thread of hair
Of a greyish tint is there,
This "Renewer" will restore
All its colour as before,
And thus it is that vast renown
Does daily now its virtues crown—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

No matter whether faded grey,
Or falling like the leaves away,
It will renew the human hair,
And make it like itself appear:
It will revive it, beautify,
And every ardent wish supply—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
The constitution of the person and the condition of the scalp have much to do with the length of time it requires for new hair to grow; also thin or thick hair will depend much upon the vital force remaining in the hair-glands. New hairs are first seen to start around the margin of the bald spots near the permanent hair, and extending upwards until the spots are covered more or less thickly with fine short hair. Excessive brushing should be guarded against as soon as the small hairs make their appearance; but the scalp may be sponged with rain water to advantage occasionally. The scalp may be pressed and moved on the bone by the finger ends, which quickens the circulation and softens the spots which have remained long bald. On applying the hair-dressing it enlivens the scalp, and in cases where the hair begins to fall a few applications will arrest it, and the new growth presents the luxuriance and colour of youth. It may be relied on as the best hair-dressing known for restoring grey or faded hair to its original colour without dyeing it, producing the colour within the substance of the hair, imparting a peculiar vitality to the roots, preventing the hair from falling, keeping the head cool, clean, and free from dandriff, causing new hairs to grow, unless the hair-glands are entirely decayed. The MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER makes the hair soft, glossy, and luxuriant. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers, at 3s. 6d.; or sent to any address free on receipt of 4s. in stamps.
HENRY C. GALLUP, Proprietor, 493, Oxford-street, London.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

When the hair is weak and faded,
Like the autumn leaves that fall,
Then is felt that sadden'd feeling
Which does every heart enthral,
Then we look for some specific
To arrest it on its way,
And THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Bids it like enchantment stay.

It arrests decaying progress,
Though the hair is thin and grey:
It will strengthen and improve it,
And work wonders day by day.
It restores the colour,
And brings back its beauty, too;
For THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Makes it look both fresh and new.

What's the greatest hair restorer,
That the present age can show,
What produces wonders daily,
Which the world at large should know?
Why, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Eminently stands the first;
Thus its fame by countless thousands
Day by day is now rehears'd.

What beautifies, improves, and strengthens
Human hair of every age?
Why, this famous great restorer,
With the ladies is the rage,
And THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Is the very best in use.
For luxuriant tresses always Does its magic powers produce.

THE WORDS "THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER" are a Trade Mark; and the public will please see the words are on every case surrounding the Bottle, and the name H. C. GALLUP is blown in the bottle.

LEIGHTON, BROS.

FROM DANGER FREE.

You thoughtless boys, hid round the corner there,
How could you seek dear Redbreast to ensnare?
Don't you remember how good Robins gave
The poor Babes in the Wood a leafy grave?

And how you hated that malicious Sparrow
Who killed Cock Robin with his Bow and Arrow?
Had you entrapped dear Redbreast, you young sinners,
You surely should have gone without your dinners!

But Robin, saved, may smite your conscience still—
In sweet revenge for your intended ill,
Chirping Good-Morrow on your window-sill.—J. L.

THE FIRES OF ST. JOHN.

She shook her head, and went a few steps on her way.

Mellac walked silently beside her. He hardly knew how to begin.

"Has your mother spoken to you?" he said, at last; and he fixed his eyes intently on her face.

Marie's eyes fell under that masterful gaze. Hitherto Mellac had been entirely indifferent to her; but she felt dislike springing up so rapidly that she hated him as she answered,

"Yes, Monsieur Mellac; my mother told me of your wish, and I told her that it was impossible. I belong to Jehan Kerrec."

"But Jehan Kerrec is dead."

"I do not think so." And Marie went quicker along the lane.

Mellac made a stride forward and placed himself in front of her.

"Listen, Marie," he said, quietly. "I foresaw this objection, and I felt that it was reasonable. A woman should not be faithless." Marie looked up in surprise; she had not expected sympathy from Mellac. He went on more easily now he saw that he had secured her attention. "At first, I confess, I thought that Jehan had deserted you. I heard your quarrel that night, and I thought Jehan a hasty fellow to desert such a girl as you are, Marie, on such provocation."

He tried to look eloquently, but his eyes were restive. If Marie had not been deeply interested, she must have laughed at his grimace. He went on. "When I heard the news from the driver, Mathurin, I resolved to inquire, and I asked him to wait for me whenever he should be going back to Pont Croix. A week after he sent me word that he would be coming back at night, so as not to waste the day; and I met him at the cross-road there, and travelled with him to Douarnenez."

"Go on," said Marie; her eyes, strained with excitement, were fixed on his face, and she had set down both pitcher and pail, her hands trembled too much to hold them.

"There is not much to tell," he said, slowly. "I saw the owner of the boats in which Jehan had worked; he said there could be no doubt. Ten days before Christmas the boats went out as usual, and then a fearful gale sprung up. Scarcely any of the boats came in without damage, but all the crews came in safe except Jehan Kerrec and his partner, and next day their boat came ashore, broken across the middle; it had evidently gone to pieces on the savage rocks beyond the bay. The owner promised me if any news came he would send it, but none has come, Marie; it is too plain that Jehan was lost at sea."

He spoke sadly, and for an instant Marie's hope was quenched, her lips trembled so, she could not speak.

"But for all that," she said, at last, "I am his in life or in death." Then she took up her pail and pitcher again.

"You are showing me a new quality," he said. "I did not know you lived only for yourself, Marie, but your mother has, perhaps, not explained. If she is to be my mother, too, then I do not look to her for the rent for poor drowned Jehan's cottage; but if you persist in your refusal, it is but just, Marie, that I persist in my claim, and your mother must pay me what she owes since the year began."

"You are unjust," said Marie, impetuously; "she has never lived in the cottage, and how can she pay you what she does not possess?"

"It is as I just now said, fair Marie; you can make all even. Marry me, I will be as good a husband as possible, and I will be a son to Barba."

The girl stood balancing her pail and her pitcher. She had been thinking all she could, but no light fell on her trouble. At last she spoke.

"Listen, Monsieur Mellac! I hoped that my way would be made plain, but it is still darkness. Stay!" She lifted her hand, and her face shone as if light had come at last. "St. John's Eve is near, and you know that one can then send a message to the departed; nay, they come among us on that night. I do not believe that Jehan is among them; but I will not harden myself. I will send him a message. If an answer comes, you will hear of it; but if there is none, then, believe me, my Jehan lives, and your rent will be paid you."

She started off at so quick a pace that Mellac did not venture to follow, for the village had by this time awakened, and other maidens besides Marie were on their way to the fountain, some of them with the tall pitcher poised on their heads in Oriental fashion.

CHAPTER V.

THE MESSAGE.

In the early morning the children have been going round to every cottage in the village to beg a sou or a few sticks that they, too, may help to build a bonfire to St. John. North, east, south, in the very midst of the village, and in all directions, huge bonfires have been silently constructed in honour of St. John's Eve. Some of these are adorned with flags, in some squibs and crackers have been thrust in among the faggots; one—and this the very largest—has been made on the point where the Abbey ruins stand, near the rocky ridge where Jehan and Marie sate watching the sea a year ago.

Barba has not questioned her daughter, but Marie told her of her own meeting with Louis Mellac.

"Do not fear, mother," the girl said; "all will go well."

The day has gone all too slowly for many impatient spirits, but now evening has come, and the expectation that has all day smouldered among the lads and lasses of the village bursts into excitement.

Here is the Curé at last. He goes from one pile of faggots to another, and as he gives his blessing each fire is lighted, and the dry wood crackles and a fierce burst of flame shoots up on high. Then the smoke spreads itself over the flame like a pall, but the wind blows it back; and see, the red tongues of flame leap up wildly, the fire spreads, and a broad ruddy glare lightens the village.

Trooping silently one after another comes a bevy of maidens, dressed in the embroidered bodices and skirts that are only worn at Pardons, and great festivals. They join hands and dance round the first bonfire; but they do not make a long stay there. They have to dance round all they can find to-night, for she who dances round nine fires on St. John's Eve is safe to be married by the end of the year.

The elders of the village were grouped round some of the fires, but the larger number of them had seated themselves round the large bonfire on the point. It had been lighted last of all, and as yet the flames had not burst clearly through the veil of smoke. The figures around it were, except at intervals, in deep shadow. Benches had been placed at some distance from one another, and even on these the spectators did not sit close together—gaps were left here and there. Barba and Marie sate on one of these benches; but Barba set a wide space between them, and she gave Marie a significant look as she pointed to it.

The girl smiled sadly

"It is a kind thought, mother," the girl said; "but I think if my Jehan comes to me it will be in life. He is not one of the departed who sit with us to-night."

Barba put her finger on her lips and looked timidly at the empty places. Just then a tall, dark-browed girl came up to Marie.

"Come, little one," she said, "you must have one dance with us; or"—she whispered, for Marie shook her head—"have you no message to send to-night?"

Marie did not answer, and the girl darted back to her companions, who had already begun to dance round the fire. A tall peasant stood near Barba playing the biniou, and its wild, shrill music seemed in harmony with the scene. The flame had burst through the smoke, but on this unsheltered point the wind blew it backwards and forwards. There was a constant battle between smoke and flame, which made the glare fitful, and gave a weird aspect to the gloom. In this the dark skirts of the dancers were merged; but now and then there leapt up long thirsty tongues of fire, which threw a vivid and ruddy light on the white caps and glowing faces as they circled slowly round the huge pile of crackling faggots. All at once the dance ceased; a fierce burst of smoke spread over the circle, almost stifling those near; there was an outcry, a general movement; some even of the quiet watchers on the benches rose from their seats. Marie rose hastily; in the gloom no one but her mother saw that she flung a letter into the flaming mass. The girl stood an instant with both hands pressed on her heart, her head bent slightly forward, as if she waited for an answer; only for an instant, then she sate down again beside Barba.

"You have sent a message to Jehan?" Barba felt that it was easier to say this under cover of the darkness.

"Yes, mother. If an answer comes, then I will do all you wish; but if there is no answer—if I sleep through this night with no warning, no sign, to tell me that my beloved has seen the shores of the dead—then, mother, you must trust me, and all will go well."

But it was growing late, and the fires must be left to burn themselves out under the guardianship of the beggars, one of whom had begun to sing a ballad in a drawling, nasal voice that was not enticing to listen to.

Slowly, one after another, the villagers went home; and the Eve of St John was over.

Mother and daughter lay awake that night; but no sound disturbed them till the cocks began to rouse in the early morning hours.

Marie had listened with unbelief, yet with a secret dread lest some token should quench her hopes; but Barba's ears had all night been strained for the drip-drop of falling water, which would be so unanswerable a token of Jehan's death.

Marie rose first, and when she came in from the fountain with full pail and pitcher her mother saw that the girl's eyes sparkled in most unwonted fashion.

"Has anything chanced, Marie?" she said, for there was a bright flush on the girl's face.

"I do not know if it will trouble you, mother; it does not trouble me. Louis Mellac has been threatening me with the power he has over you, and I have said I do not fear him; believe me, mother, he is not a good man, he would not be a good son or a good husband."

Barba sighed.

"No one shows his best side to those who thwart him," she said, sadly. "I wish I could think you wise in this matter, but I cannot."

Days went by. Mellac sought out Barba, and, after long discussion, in which she remained patient and passive, while he was harsh and inflexible, he settled that he would wait yet a little longer; but at Michaelmas he was determined Marie should be his wife.

CHAPTER VI.

MATHURIN'S NEWS.

It is the Feast of the Assumption—the bell has been ringing for mass at intervals ever since five o'clock, and now high mass is over, and the worshippers stream out of the little church. The men stand in groups, exchanging a few grave words now and then, while the hard-worked patient wives hurry home with their children to have dinner ready. The scene is very quiet and full of peace. The Curé comes out of church when low mass is said, and goes to the presbytery—the choir boys went away some minutes sooner. The sea even is still to-day, and only a subdued moaning comes from the waves as they lap the rocky point. From the further end of the village, comes a murmur. No one knows whence it first arises; but all at once the knots of idlers, as by one spontaneous movement, merge into a crowd hurrying towards Barba's cottage. Some way before they reach it they come on a group near the green lane that leads to the fountain; Mathurin, the driver of Pont Croix, sits on the box of his hooded vehicle; and Louis Mellac, with a face dark as a thunder-cloud, listens to him as he tells his story for the third time to fresh listeners; but still the farmer listens jealously, he so longs to find some flaw in the narrative—something which may prove this marvellous history a mere trumped-up story.

At the sight of the concourse of fresh faces Mathurin rubs his hands.

"Ma foi!" he says, "I will tell it once again, and then I must feed my horse, the poor beast has not eaten or drank since yesterday; we have been driving all night long. I am as empty as a burst bladder." He claps both hands on his waistcoat, and there is a laugh from the crowd.

"Friends," he says pompously, for the intense expectation on the faces of his hearers makes him feel himself a hero, "it is all true, Jehan Kerrec was not drowned, and he is with Barba and Marie. He"—Mathurin raises his hands to stay the questions he sees on many eager lips—"he and his partner were all but lost in the storm that wrecked the boats of Douarnenez. They were picked up by an American vessel to all seeming, lifeless. The partner died; but Jehan recovered, and found himself against his will one of the crew of the vessel, which he believed to be no fair trader, spite of the colours she showed, but one of the privateers which, in this time of war between the Northern and Southern States, prey on friends and enemies. He tried to escape; but after that, as he was a good seaman, instead of putting a bullet in his head, they kept a watch on him night and day. A month ago he managed to escape and reach an English vessel, and he has travelled day and night since he landed. Now, my friends, I hunger and I thirst; and my poor Jello faints—see, his flank is bleeding."

There was a chorus of congratulatory voices. The poor Jello was unharnessed. Even Mellac was obliged to force a smile as Mathurin was dragged by the excited crowd to the inn, the Lion d'Or.

And, meantime, Marie was in Jehan's arms, and Barba looked at her children with a smiling face, while tears of joyful emotion fell over her pale cheeks.

Jehan had no eyes for anyone but Marie: but when Barba spoke he turned his bronzed, happy face towards her.

"It was meant to happen," she said: "and Marie has been right all through. Yes, Jehan, you may well love her, for her Love was stronger than Death"

CHRISTMAS AT LITTLEPEOPLETON MANOR.

CHAPTER I.

"Once upon a time."—Ancient Ballad.

You would like to know, first of all, where the Manor is? I thought so. I am sorry to say, however, that I cannot quite tell you. I know, of course; and Miss Kate Greenaway, the very clever young lady who has painted the Littlepeople portraits, she knows; but why should you bother your heads about it?

Do tell you the name of the country.

Well, I don't mind that. You must understand that Littlepeopleton Manor is (or was) the most beautiful country house in Lowther Arcadeshire, Great Toylumbia. All the persons places and things, all the nouns common and proper, were—Little, and everybody there looked curiously bright, and rosy, and young. Otherwise you would not have found the country peculiar. Yes, you would. I had forgotten. There were no railways And no public coaches. Those persons who did not keep carriages or horses of their own either walked (the Littlepeopletonians were excellent walkers) or, when they wished to travel long distances, went by the waggon. Accustomed as you are to wild omnibuses that shake as they go like an old gentleman with a bad cough, and to tram-cars that seem to slide along (when mischievous boys have not put gravel into the rails), and, above all, to express trains that run races with the wind,—I say, accustomed as you are to all these conveyances, you might have found the Littlepeopleton waggon rather slow, and sometimes sleepy; but the natives did not. Indeed, for persons who were fond of travelling, nothing could have been better than the waggon..

All the horses in Lowther Arcadeshire were small, like Shetland ponies that had been skilfully brushed and combed, seen through the wrong end of a telescope. They were brown, of the tint of the best gingerbread, and mostly round and dumply, like the kind of horse called a Suffolk punch. Their manes and tails were what would now be called the fashionable colour. Flaxen and golden, and tawny.

Round about the Manor and in the neighbourhood of Candytufton, a dot of a village which in a manner of speaking belonged to the Manor, the fields were dressed in white, trimmed with fringes and ruchings of dark brown, during the Christmas which Miss Greenaway and I spent there. (I declare if I have not again let the cat out of the bag. I never meant to say a word about the village. But it does not matter. I defy you to find it named in your atlases for all that.) Candytufton was a mite of a village that would have been called a hamlet in Shakspeare's time. It consisted of one street only, and possessed but one shop, which sold all sorts.

The uplands and downlands (there were no highlands) were as white as an ermine muff would be without its tails, but not so fluffy, and as sparkling as the top of a twelfth cake, but not so sweet. What used to be called pieces of water in the summer time (pieces of water, such ridiculous rubbish!) were changed into lumps of ice, which also were not sweet, and were a great deal colder than any ice-pudding that I have ever been made acquainted with.

You may guess how cold it was when I tell you that the geese cackled in whispers, like persons who found fault with things and were afraid to speak out; and the ducks gaped when they ought to have quacked, like so many guests at an evening party when the lady of the house has just ceased from playing upon the piano. They had lost their voices. Dame Marjoram, who was considered the sagest person in Candytufton—I have seldom known a sager—said that that was all stuff and nonsense. It was fat and not frost that had altered the voices of the ducks and geese. They would see on Christmas Eve whether she was right or not. Let them mark her words. They did. It was rather a pity, mind you, that not a duck nor a drake, nor a goose nor a gander, lived to benefit by Mistress Marjoram's opinion. Not one. Poor things! They were all dead on Christmas Eve. But she was right. When the cook at the Manor came to look into the matter, she found it was fat which had afflicted the waddlers, every one.

But Mistress Marjoram owned it to be the coldest Christmas she had seen in Candytufton since the year she was a little girl in frocks, when the frost stopped the church clock at exactly twenty minutes before midnight on Christmas Eve.

Robin Redbreast did not sing, but chattered with the cold, just for all the world as though he had had teeth—chattered like a chaffinch. When the blackbird spoke, which was not often, there were more quavers in his jolly voice than you would hear in a day's march if you followed a fife and drum. Before the frost the throstle used to gurgle; but when he found that his beautiful liquid notes were changed into icicles as they rolled from his beak, he gave up singing altogether, and devoted his attention to looking for a living. But it was chiefly with a tight bill. There never were such hard times for grub!

The Littlepeopletonians had plenty of skating, and there would have been more if the waggon had not got snowed up in the downlands at an awkward place miles from the Manor. When old Humbledum, the waggoner, was dug out, after many days' absence from the surface, it was found that he and Skewbalder, his horse, and Tailbiter, his dog, had kept themselves alive by partaking of the contents of the waggon. In what manner they did it was never clearly ascertained. Raisins and currants and citron and candles can scarcely be considered proper food for a horse, whatever they may be for a waggoner and his dog. I dare say, though, Tailbiter made his meals off the candles.

When the waggon came to be overhauled it was discovered that there were some bottles missing—or, rather, that some corks were missing from various bottles. Humbledum accused Tailbiter, but what should he want with corks flavoured with tincture of rhubarb and syrup of squills and lavender-water and paregoric and wine? Through Humbledum's waggon having to be scratched for in the snow, just as you might scratch for truffles in a field, or for cockles on the seashore, Miss Daisypied Dingle (only daughter of Sir Wangle Dingle) was very much put about, poor dear. She had ordered a pair of skates of Zinckleby, the whitesmith, skates with toes like swans' necks, intending to distinguish herself before the company that had been invited to spend Christmas at the Manor. However, being a good-natured young lady as well as good-looking—you can see that—she contented herself with an old pair of her brother's.

Now, it was while she and Lady Plumduffle were writing their names and addresses with their toes upon the ice, that the latter lady said she should insist on Sir Wangle Dingle's allowing them (meaning Daisy and herself) all their own way about the Ball which he had decided upon giving at the Manor.

CHAPTER II.

"Christmas comes but once a year."—Another Ancient Ballad.

That picture of the Waits which Miss Greenaway has painted is not so very bad as far as it goes, but it does not go half far enough. Bless you! It gives you no more idea of the musical talent of Littlepeopleton than a tune on a Jew's harp would give you a notion of the band of the Grenadier Guards. The singing in church was worth travelling miles, on foot, to hear. If you turn overleaf and look at the pictures you will find the portraits of the principal choristers. They are very like. But it was Marmaduke Bristlewax, the genius, who mostly made Candytufton the envy of other parts of Lowther Arcadeshire by his performances. To hear him sing—

Digitized by Google

Bid-dy Bun-dle, how do you do?
How is your mother and Mol-ly May?
'Tis time that they and I and you
Began to spend our hol-i-day was to set your feet moving to the tune with the regularity of clockwork. He played upon the pipe and tabor, did Master Bristlewax, and also upon the bass viol. But he was not a Wait. Dear me, no. He was above it. One of his own songs, made all by himself, out of his own head, he has often sung before the company at the Manor. It was called "Berries are Black." Here are three of the verses—:

Berries are black and roses are red,
And Jenny she carries a haughty head,
So I will marry the Duchess instead,
When buttercups blow blue.

For though I'm a lover of low degree,
The Duchess of Sugarlips dotes on me,
So, in silver buckles, I'll marry with she,
When buttercups blow blue.

And when I am married I'll walk no more,
But loll at my ease in a coach-and-four,
With a golden footman to open the door,
When buttercups blow blue.

As soon as it became known through Lowther Arcadeshire that Sir Wangle Dingle, Baronet, of Littlepeopleton Manor, placed the arrangements of the party in the hands of his daughter Daisy and her friend Lady Plumduffle, the excitement in Candytufton and the neighbourhood reached such a height as excitement had never reached before; and I will tell you why. Everybody, old and young, was invited. What you would call Persons of Consideration to the party, and others not so distinguished—plain folk like Dame Marjoram, and Farmer Vetches, and the schoolmaster, and the waits, and the ringers, and the choristers—to seats in the gallery at the end of the great hall, where they were to be provided with refreshments, and could look at the dancing.

Lady Dingle, when she dared—which was very seldom—poked her nose into the kitchen, just to give an eye to the cook. She (the cook, I mean), like most persons who make nice things, had a temper as short as her own piecrusts. Famous all over the parish for her delicious mince, she was quite as well known for the manner in which she did not mince her words when she thought people took a liberty with her kitchen. So Lady Dingle was not able to interfere much. They had conversations together—cook, with her cheeks shining with dripping, and the tip of her nose (which rather resembled a young tomato) powdered with flour, standing by a fire fierce enough to roast an ox; and my lady standing with her head just within the kitchen doorway; but very little was said by either of them. This is something like how they got on:—

"Cook!"

"Yes, my Lady."

"Can I help you in any way?"

"No, my Lady."

"You are quite sure?"

"Quite, my Lady. The eggs are beaten, the raisins are ready, the mince is made, the turkeys are trussed, and the capons and the geese, and the ducks and the hares, and the rabbits, and the boars' heads"—— (In her haste and anger she did not know what she was saying. I don't know; but people never truss hares, and rabbits, and boars' heads, do they?) "And if you don't want to stop me in my work, my Lady—and goodness knows I have enough to do, my Lady—you will leave me to myself in my own kitchen, my Lady!"

Rather impertinent, this, of cook; but she had to be left. Lady Wangle Dingle therefore betook herself elsewhere to superintend the dessert. Lowther Arcadeshire is famous for its fruit, and the apples and pears which are grown in the Manor orchard are delicious. The Wangle pippin—which is not exactly like a ribstone nor a "quarantine," but between your teeth reminds you of the beauties of both—is an apple, my dears, to hide behind your pillows and dream about. Oh! Chaumontel pears were not invented then; but in the orchard at the Manor there grew a pear called the Abbot's Thumb, which was as full of juice as a monkey is full of mischief, and as sweet as grapes that have grown ripe hidden away under the leaves. Then, my Lady saw to the baking of the twelfth-cake and the making of the tipsy-cake, and the tossing up of the trifle, and I think that was nearly all she did.

Daisy and Lady Plumduffle (her Christian name, I ought to tell you, was Damsonette) did not trouble their heads about the banqueting. They knew what that would be like. They spent hours rummaging in certain old oaken chests that were as deep and as long as that in the ballad of the "Mistletoe Bough." These chests were bound with iron and held together by locks that reminded you of the lock which Bluebeard dared his wife to open, or it would be worse for her. (The wretch!) What do you think the two conspirators Daisy and Damsonette were looking for? Why, raiment for a fancy ball! Not alone for themselves, but for a few of their favourite guests. "It would be necessary," Damsonette said to Daisy, "to have a dressing-up afternoon the day before the party, as a great deal of the drapery which they routed out of the chests had been worn by great-great-grandmothers and great-great-aunts who were taller and stouter than many of the dancers who were invited to the Manor." But it is astonishing what wonders you can work with old costume when it is pretty, and rich, and, above everything, good; with lace as fine as silk cocoons, and as beautiful as the diaper veil which the spider stretches between you and the moon when you try to count how many stars hang over the tree tops. They found yards—I had nearly written miles—of such lace buried in those huge houses of chests. And that was not all. They found kirtles, both gowns and petticoats, that stood by themselves, so thick were they with embroidery. And bodices of rainbow-coloured silk; and stomachers (I think that is what they are called, but I am not quite certain) such as Dame Trot probably wore before she grew old and lost her property. Some of the lace was as yellow as a guinea, and some the colour of saffron. But then it was the fashion to wear lace dyed deeper colours even than those in the days when all the lace that was made was real. It was not surprising, therefore, that Daisy and Damsonette should have found such treasure. Shoes with rosettes like china asters, and shoes with buckles and haughty high heels, the two searchers found hidden in these oaken caverns. And when all was said and done, my Lady Plumduffle and Miss Daisypied Dingle retired to a snug little room, which they had made their own without asking anybody's leave, and, having shaken a shower of sparks from a log that was as big as themselves almost—a yule-log, you know—they set their wits to work to arrange The Party.

CHAPTER III.

The gates are open, the road is wide,
The Great Bear is out in his jewelled hide,
And the Little Bear's giving Orion a ride,
And Golden Venus and Mars in his pride,
With many a cluster of stars beside,
Have come to our Christmas Party.

So, let Johnny Frost your noses tweak,
And shorten your breath till you scarce can speak,
If you trample the snow you shall hear it squeak!
We have welcome would warm a winter more bleak,
With mirth for a month and cheer for a week
At the Manor Christmas Party.—Marmaduke Bristlewax.

Master Bristlewax made his wonderful song of welcome (I wish I could recollect the other thirty-nine verses) as he walked home from the Manor to Candytufton after he had received Sir Wangle Dingle's orders concerning the music. He sang it from the balcony as the guests arrived, the waits and the choristers and the cat (whose portraits you have seen) helping him in the chorus. It was an interesting performance, and made a great impression.

But all this while I am forgetting Daisy and Damsonette. Their first difficulty was about the Babies. Daisy's youngest sister, a mite of a maiden who had just begun to toddle, was bound to be one of The Party, you see, because she belonged to the Manor. Indeed, I am not quite sure whether the saucy little queen was not the most important person at the Manor. In Lady Wangle Dingle's eyes Sir Wangle was not by any means a person of such great consequence as Baby. Indeed, he was Baby's slave. And, for that matter, so were all of us. Baby's name was Lovelibella; but nobody gave her that name, all at once, at the Manor. She was sometimes called Little Puss (but never Kitten, which may surprise you), and sometimes, by persons who did not appreciate babies, Little Plague. Those individuals, however, were not friends of the family. Daisy's everyday name for Baby was one of a good many syllables, and never sounded twice alike; and that which Lady Dingle smothered the dear child with, almost taking away its sweet breath, was similar. Now it was decided, since Baby must be one of the Party, that the other Baby should also be invited.

He (Miss Greenaway has painted his portrait as well as that of the Baby of the Manor) resided at Candytufton. His name was Wilfrid; but somehow or other he was seldom spoken of by another name than Wilful. He was a cousin of Daisy's, and, of course, of Daisy's sister, the other Baby. I am obliged to be particular, because they were. If little Wilful had not been invited, his mother and father, and two grown-up sisters, would not have stirred a step to oblige Lady Dingle. That is one of the sisters who is looking into her tea-cup as though she has doubts whether they have given her any sugar, and the other is the young chatterbox with the fan. Miss Naomi Nimini and Miss Ethelfleda. Portraits of their parents, Squire Nimini and his stately wife, were taken by the artist; but there was no room for them on the sheet. You will see by the picture that it would have been impossible for babies to be dressed with better taste. The Baby of the Manor, in satin bows, swansdown and rosettes, and the Candytufton Baby in rosettes, a Spanish hat and a feather. If they had been taller they would have been dressed more; but, except upon the little lady's dimpled arms, (it would have been a shame to cover them!), there was not a morsel of room upon either of the mites for more frills.

Now the Hanways, an old, old family that lived on the borders of Lowther Arcadeshire, were invited to the Party for an odd reason. They owned the largest umbrella in the land. It was as big as a tent and as strong as a pair of country boots. (Miss Kate Greenaway has drawn its portrait, but I don't consider it a faithful likeness at all. How could it be, upon such a small piece of paper?) The Hanways were farmers, and their farm was their own. Their chief pride, however, was not in butter and eggs and cheese and hay, but in that ancestral umbrella, which was always being taken out for a walk by one or other member of the family, whether the weather was wet or dry. So the umbrella was invited to the Party.

The Acorns were asked, but they could not come. Gaffer staid at home to nurse his cough, and Mistress Gaffer staid at home to nurse him. However, they sent Lady Dingle their finest goose, and, as holly was scarce that year, a branch of it to help to decorate the great hall, and a number of cheesecakes, for they thought a great deal of Sir Wangle and his Lady, who thought a great deal of them.

Master Bristlewax was singing about Orion riding upon the Little Bear—almost loud enough for the Little Bear to have heard him—when the first carriage-full arrived—Miss Honeysuckle and her sister, Miss Harriet Honeysuckle. There was not room inside for their brother Frank, so he was following, on foot. At least, that was the message which he had sent by his sisters; but he must have changed his mind, as he really came in the Pimpernel family coach, along with Winifred (that is Winifred seated next to Miss Nimini, with the fan) and her brother Ralph. The Pimpernels and Honeysuckles are neighbours. Those are the two Miss Honeysuckles seated next to Miss Nimini, without the fan. Of the seven beauties all in a row, who are drinking tea, I have only two more to mention. It was a great mercy they arrived at the Manor whole. Whether the driver of their coach had had too much frumenty before starting, or the horses too much corn, I cannot say; but three quarters of a mile off, Miss Tippety and Miss Witchet, her cousin, and Squire Tippety and his old-maid sister, Semiramide Jane, were upset in a snowdrift. Happily, they were more frightened than hurt. But they were frightened!

You should have seen the fuss that was made about the youngest of the guests, when he arrived. His Nurse, a lady with a marvellous cap, and a gown that made her appear for all the world like a new pincushion—his Nurse and he came together. When he was taken out of the cotton wool—I mean, of course, out of the furs in which they had packed him—and was handed round to the company to be kissed, you would have thought that such a thing as a beautiful Baby Boy had never been seen before. The Nurse was not so much as noticed, although she did pull his bows and polish his nose, and mop his chin, after the manner of nurses who have charge of admired babies. The chorus of "What a beau-ty!" might have lasted all night if Daisy had not sent for Lovelibella and his nurse (another pincushiony person); and then—goodness, gracious!—the kissing was louder than ever. The rosy little mites were introduced to each other; but, except that the girl said "Goo-goo," and the boy made a bud of a mouth which seemed to promise a blossom of a reply to the young lady's question, very little conversation took place between them.

The gentlemen having finished with their cherry-bounce, and the ladies their tea, a flourish from the musicians in the gallery apprised the company that dancing was about to begin.

Although Daisy had done her best (with Damsonette's assistance) to attire her favourites among the guests in a fanciful way, and had persuaded some of the others to dress up as people do in the upper circles of society at a superior ball, where the clothes are the principal attraction, it did not come to a fancy ball of that sort. Sir Wangle Dingle appeared in the uniform of the Candytufton Yeomanry Cavalry. He was the Colonel. Lady Dingle appeared in her wedding dress. For the rest of the ladies, they might have been copies of Miss Daisypied Dingle and Lady Plumduffle. Amongst the men I noticed sour Court dresses that might have come out of the chests, als more Candytufton uniforms, and a few extraordinary wigs.

As the dancers filed in (Sergeant Goosestep, who occupied a front seat in the tenants' gallery, insisted upon it that filed in was the proper expression) Humbledon "begged leave to tell them that in the course of his travels he had never, never seen anything so truly georgeous." (He meant gorgeous, poor man.) "Just look at my lady in her China silk. And at Sir Wangle's guinea-gold-lace." Dame Marjoram wept at the sight of Daisy. The old dame had nursed her through the mumps when she was quite a toddler. As for the young gentlemen, their admiration of Damsonette and Daisy knew no bounds. Ralph Nimini and Frank Honeysuckle quarrelled about Daisy's kerchief. She happened to drop it as she entered the hall, arm-in-arm with the Duke of Toylumbia, and Ralph and Frank, who observed the snowy piece of cambric flutter to the floor rushed from opposite directions to pick it up. As they stooped, their heads came suddenly together and brought tears into their eyes. Of course, Daisy laughed—who could have helped laughing?—as she received her kerchief from the two cavaliers, each of whom held a corner, but she little knew how miserable her merriment made them.

"I shall not forget this, Master Nimini," said Frank, rubbing his forehead.

"Neither shall I, Master Honeysuckle," replied Ralph rubbing his. "You mark me, Sir."

"I see that I have done so," retorted Frank, with a look of scorn.

Ralph growled and passed on.

A guest who came in as the last of the dancers filed into the Hall, was Lord Arcade, the Duke's eldest son. His arrival made quite a stir, for, to tell the truth, he had not been invited. Damsonette blushed when she saw him, and then looked at Daisy.

Humbledum was asked by the gazers in the gallery if he knew that elegant young gentleman? "Gentleman! nobleman was what they ought to call him, for was not he the next Duke of Toylumbia? Master Humbledum supposed they were not aware of his being in love with Lady Plumduffle, against Lady Plumduffle's father's wish? No! Well, then, it was true, he could assure them."

It is wonderful how much a person gets to know who travels! Master Humbledum's knowledge of the affairs of the country was astonishing. And all through his being a carrier.

Now all this time Master Bristlewax's band of musicians had been playing the March of the Candytuftons, in honour of Sir Wangle, and in order to allow the dancers to take their places and begin. Then, Sir Wangle having given the signal, Marmaduke flourished his fiddle-stick with a

One, two, THREE! FOUR! and away they went, the Duke leading off with Miss Daisypied Dingle, and Sir Wangle following with Lady Plumduffle as his partner. Lord Arcade's partner was Lady Dingle. And did not they dance! Bless you! I could not describe it, if I tried. (Miss Greenaway strove to make a sketch of the merry crowd; but, between you and me, she failed.) The figures looked like a mixture of the Lancers and the Caledonians, with a lively touch of Sir Roger de Coverley added.

It was generally observed after the dance was over, especially by Humbledum, that Lord Arcade paid Lady Plumduffle a great deal of attention. Also, by everybody in the gallery, especially by Dame Marjoram, that Master Honeysuckle and his "friend" Ralph hovered about Daisy like two thirsty bees round a ripe plum. This made Mistress Marjoram angry. She was sure, indeed! It was like the impertinence of a Honeysuckle to make so free with a Dingle. But Daisy did not mind. She had a good-tempered smile for everybody. First, Ralph felt its sweetness; then it was Frank; and as they did they forgot those bumps on the forehead which each of them had received in stooping to pick up her kerchief. Indeed, her smile might have been an application of vinegar and brown paper, it was so soothing!

The worst of parties nowadays is they are too long. They were the proper length at the Manor. On this occasion Daisy and Damsonette had arranged that the last dance, to the old tune of

Philip is fidgetty—fidgetty,
Phillis has flouted him, I know, should be danced immediately after supper, after which the elder wine would be passed round so that everybody might go home before the moon was abed. But before supper came The Minuet. This was Daisy's device. It was costumed, as you may observe in the picture, and the youngest of the guests (except the two babies, who by this time were fast asleep) danced it. The chief performers were the most juvenile members of the aristocracy present at the Party. It was beautiful. Master Humbledum said so, and he had seen a good many minuets in his time. Sergeant Goosestep approved of it; and Daisy, who all along had been afraid that the little people, being timid, might forget their lesson, was delighted. The stately way in which they made-believe to draw a circle before they took hold of hands was enough to make persons who had danced minuets and gavottes hundreds of time positively envious.

Such a supper! Cook was made happy when one of the servants who had waited at table told her what had been said about the nice things; but—would you believe it!—neither Lord Arcade nor Lady Plumduffle ate the tiniest morsel, although they sat next to each other and opposite the Manor mince-pies. Miss Semiramide Jane Tippety, who sat next to Damsonette and Damsonette's particular friend, Lord Arcade, was mean enough to listen to their conversation, which was never meant for her ears, instead of attending to her supper. And what was worse, the spiteful old thing did not keep the secret to herself.

It seems that Lord Acorn was telling Damsonette a story of a princess whose father, the king, would not let her marry the prince she loved, but shut her up in a high tower away from him. And one day, just when his heart was nearly broken for the loss of the princess, he climbed up to the top of the tower and carried her off to a beautiful green island in a beautiful blue sea, where they lived happy for ever afterwards.

"And if the prince and princess did this, darling Damsonette, so can we."

That was the conversation which nasty Miss Semiramide Jane Tippety repeated, when she left the party.

Whether Damsonette and her Prince did journey to a beautiful green island, or not, I cannot say. All I know is that when the last dance was ended and Sir Wangle Dingle and Lady Dingle and Daisy were standing in the porch of the Manor bidding the guests good night, Lord Arcade was again missing, and when he did reappear he was not alone. Lady Plumduffle was with him. And prying Miss Tippety declared she had seen him in the act of whispering something in her ear which made her face rosier than it was before, as they stood under the mistletoe! Except that Masters Honeysuckle and Nimini were not friendly with each other—owing to Daisy—there was not a soul who faced the moon that bright starry morning, not even Miss Semiramide Jane, who had not enjoyed that famous Christmas Party at Littlepeopleton Manor.

CHLORODYNE.
DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S.
COUGHS, ASTHMA,
COLDS, BRONCHITIS, &c.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.
This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. Collis Browne, and the word Chlorodyne coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and as it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness and as being the same thing. Dr. J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne; that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a liquid medicine which assuages pain of every kind, affords a calm and refreshing sleep without headache, and invigorates the nervous system when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the GREAT SPECIFIC for CHOLERA, DYSENTERY, DIARRHŒA.

Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians that he had received a despatch from her Majesty's Consul at Manilla to the effect that cholera had been raging fearfully, and that the only remedy of any service was Chlorodyne.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1864.

The General Board of Health, London, reports that it acts as a charm. One dose generally sufficient.

Dr. Gibbon, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states:—"Two doses completely cured me of diarrhœa."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC, PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the true palliative in NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER, TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.

From Dr. B. J. Boulton and Co., Horncastle.
"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct sedative and anti-spasmodic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.
The immense sale of this remedy has given rise to many unscrupulous imitations.
N.B.—Every bottle of genuine Chlorodyne bears on the Government stamp the name of the inventor.
DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE.

CRAMERS' THREE-YEARS' SYSTEM for the HIRE of PIANOFORTES, Harps, Harmoniums, Pipe and Reed Organs, &c., has been adopted and is advertised by other firms, but was originated by Cramers, and is carried out on a thoroughly large and liberal scale only by themselves. Regent-street, W.; and Moorgate-street, E.C.

CRAMER and CO. cannot too frequently repeat that their THREE-YEARS' SYSTEM of HIRING PIANOFORTES is not confined to those of their own manufacture—although they are as good as any, and better than most—but includes instruments by all the eminent manufacturers—Broadwood, Collard, and Erard—of whose Pianofortes Cramer and Co. have always in stock a very extensive and complete selection, ready to be sent out at any time. Illustrated Lists, with prices, terms, and other information, on application to either of Cramer and Co.'s Ware-Rooms, in Regent-street, or Moorgate-street, City.

COTTAGE PIANOFORTES.—CRAMERS SUPPLY UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES of every description, by all the great makers, from £2 12s. 6d. to £10 10s. per quarter.—Pianoforte Gallery (largest in Europe), 207 and 209, Regent-street; 40 to 46, Moorgate-street, E.C.

CRAMERS' "MIGNON" (REGISTERED) PIANOFORTE, 46 gs. in Rosewood; 50 gs. in Walnut. A very remarkable instrument. In size it is between the Pianette and the Cottage. It has check action, steel bridge, and brass studs with a power of brilliancy and tone hitherto unattained by any ordinary upright instrument.

CRAMERS' BOUDOIR OBLIQUE, 50 gs., of which the leading Musical Journal writes:—"The best 50-guinea Oblique ever produced."—Orchestra.

CRAMERS' BOUDOIR GRANDS, in Walnut or Rosewood Cases, can be HIRED for the Season at 207 and 209, Regent-street, W.; and 40 to 46, Moorgate-street, City.

GRAND PIANOFORTES, best GERMAN, 60 gs.
GRAND PIANOFORTES, best English, 75 gs. to 100 gs.

CRAMERS' SCHOOL CHOIR ORGAN, in Stained Pine Case, with three stops, 30 gs.; or £3 per quarter on their Three-Years' System.

CRAMERS' CABINET ORGAN, with four stops, containing 136 pipes, beautiful design, with diapered front pipes; 6 ft. high, 5 ft. wide, and 3 ft. deep. Price, in dark-stained Pine, 95 gs.; in Black Walnut, 70 gs.; in Oak, 82 gs.; and in dark Mahogany, 85 gs. With two manuals, seven stops, and pedals, containing 200 pipes, same dimensions as above. Price, in Stained Pine, 85 gs.; Black Walnut, 100 gs.; Oak, 105 gs.; dark Mahogany, 110 gs.

CRAMERS' CHURCH, Chamber, and Cabinet ORGANS for SALE or HIRE, on Cramers' Three-Years' System. Illustrated List, with full particulars on application to No 201, Regent-street, W.; or 40, Moorgate-street, E.C.

CRAMERS' AMERICAN ORGANS, from 12 gs. to 200 gs. These Instruments, manufactured by Cramer and Co., are brighter in tone, have more variety of stops, and are generally superior to all imported goods of this class. They are sold, hired, or supplied on Cramers' Three-Years' System.
J. B. Cramer and Co. can supply instruments with any required combination of stops, and manufacture thirty different kinds. An Illustrated List furnished on application.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
PARIS, 1878.

THE HIGHEST HONOURS—
THE CROSS OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR:
Also the GOLD MEDAL (l'Académie Nationale). &c., have been accorded to

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS,
18, WIGMORE-STREET, LONDON, W.,
For the superiority of their Pianos exhibited at the PARIS INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION of 1878.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the DECORATION OF THE CROSS OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR CONSTITUTES A SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE."
Extract from the Special Report signed by M. A. FETIS, Official Reporter.

The value of this Award is still further enhanced by the fact that the Decoration was CONFERRED ON NO OTHER British Pianoforte Manufacturer.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
The principal of the previous honours gained by the BRINSMEAD PIANOS are:—
THE DIPLOMA OF HONOUR and GOLD MEDAL, South Africa, 1877.
THE GRAND MEDAL OF HONOUR and DIPLOMA OF MERIT, Philadelphia, 1876.
THE DIPLOMA OF HONOUR, Paris, 1874, and the HONORARY MEMBERSHIP OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF FRANCE.
THE GOLD MEDAL, Paris, 1870.
THE DIPLOMA OF EXTRAORDINARY MERIT, Netherlands International Exhibition, 1869.
THE MEDAL OF HONOUR, Paris, 1867.
THE PRIZE MEDAL, London, 1862, &c.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
SOSTENENTE PIANOS,
With the Perfect Check Repeater Action,
Patented 1862, 1868, 1871, 1873, and 1879, throughout Europe and America.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Paris, Nov. 4, 1878.
"I have attentively examined the beautiful pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist.
"CH. GOUNOD."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Paris, Sept. 8, 1878.
"We, the undersigned, certify that, after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, we find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the house of Brinsmead."
NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,
D. MAGNUS,
Chevalier ANTOINE DE KONTSKI, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"I have pleasure in expressing my opinion that the Paris Exhibition Model Grand Pianofortes of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons are unsurpassed. The tone is deliciously sweet, sustained, and extraordinarily powerful; the touch responds to the faintest and to the most trying strain on it, and the workmanship is simply perfect. W. KUHE.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Illustrated London News."
"The French papers have been unanimous in their expressions of admiration of these splendid instruments. The grands especially have enchanted the Parisian professors and amateurs of music by their noble sonority, their enormous power, and the sympathetically voice-like quality of tone. The touch is so beautifully light, elastic, and certain, that many pianists of every nation, from the Abbé Liszt downwards, who have tried these instruments, have highly complimented the enterprising manufacturers on their success."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Daily Chronicle."
"In tone the instrument is exceedingly rich and sweet, and in touch the very perfection of lightness. Messrs. Brinsmead may certainly be congratulated upon their success."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Morning Advertiser."
"The Legion of Honour.—In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.
"Daily News."
"A new Pianoforte, recently manufactured by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, claims notice, not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but especially for some ingenious mechanical novelties, the most important being the addition of a third pedal, by means of which the sound of any note or notes may be almost indefinitely prolonged at the will of the player. Thus bass notes may be sustained after being struck by the left hand, which may then be taken away, and with the right hand, may execute the most brilliant staccato passages, thus giving almost the effect of four hands. The patent 'check-repeater action,' speciality of Messrs. Brinsmead, enables the performer to command with ease the most rapid reiteration of the same note; the facility of the key movement in general being such that glissando passages can be executed with such perfect ease to render them practicable with the lightest touch. The volume of tone is intensified by a peculiar construction of the sounding board, another improvement being the system of bridging, by which the vibrations are increased and rendered sympathetic. The Pianoforte is capable of all degrees of delicacy and power. Its massive structure, rendering it less liable to get out of tune than usual: and the instrument is altogether calculated to extend the reputation of its makers."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
PIANOS
may be obtained of all the principal Musicsellers.
Prices from 33 guines to 500 guineas.

LEIGHTON, BROS.

THE KNIGHT'S RETURN FROM VICTORY.

Two weary, anxious months have passed,
Since, knell-like, wailed that trumpet-blast,
Which called a chief to deadly strife,
And left at home his mourning wife.
Some vague accounts of battles fought,
By rumour borne, her ears have caught;
But of her knight no single word,
If dead or living, has she heard.

But, hark! O joy! a clarion's swell,
Now merry as a marriage-bell!
Out runs the lady as the knight
Springs from his war-horse with delight.
What heeds she now of war's alarms?
Is he not safe within her arms?
She holds him for a minute's space
Clasped tightly in a mute embrace;

Then to her lips quick questions rise,
Her kisses stifling his replies.
Their son, with martial zeal on fire
Cheers frantically his hero-sire;
The squire meanwhile, quite debonair,
Blows kisses to some damsel fair.
But why with weak words try to tell
What Art above has told so well?—J. L.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1879.

The attempted assassination, a few days ago, of the Czar of Russia and his Suite is already known pretty nearly all the world over. Naturally enough, the news has carried with it into Royal circles something approaching to consternation. The contemplated outrage—as atrocious a one as modern times have registered—was evidently conceived more than three months' back, and the preparations for executing it must have required the co-operation of several persons. Happily, though skilfully planned, what seemed to be a mere accident frustrated the plot. The Emperor's Baggage Train usually precedes that in which he travels by some half hour or so; but, in the present instance, the Personal Train took the lead, leaving the Luggage Train to follow. The explosion took effect upon the second Train, and was of a nature which would most probably have accomplished the object of the conspirators but for this casual alteration of customary arrangement. We need not detail the circumstances which environed the main fact—they are now known to everybody. They have excited public horror everywhere, more especially as the criminals contrived to escape. The Police knew nothing about it, notwithstanding the increased power for the detection and prevention of such offences given to them by the military Governors and martial law, under which the population had been placed. It seems to have been the work of desperate, but not uneducated, Nihilists, and to have been associated, more or less, with revolutionary designs. Such, at least, is the impression made upon the mind by present appearances. Further investigation may possibly destroy the authenticity of the inference.

The question naturally forces itself upon public notice, What is to be done to remedy the state of things out of which this and previous outrages have been evolved? It is clear that mere suppression, even of the most extended and stringent character, has failed to do, and must fail to do, what has been expected of it. The domestic state of Russia presents a problem insoluble to the highest statesmanship for immediate purposes, and demanding for its entire disappearance a generation or two—possibly more. The very framework of society is essentially unsound. There is disaffection in every class—official, noble, literary, military, and mercantile. The peasantry are said to be untainted by the disease, but the peasantry hitherto, perhaps, owe their freedom from infection to their isolated position rather than to political and moral health. Special opportunities rarely fail to disclose special susceptibilities. No one can predict what may, or may not, happen to the Russian Empire in the future. Scourging does not answer; exile to Siberia is not followed by any marked improvement. Corruption and oppression go hand in hand, and something approximating to anarchy disintegrates all social classes. There is no solid basis of law, no clear and ever-flowing fountain of justice. Force and fraud have now the reins of dominion in their hands, and it is as uncertain in Russia itself as elsewhere whether the Imperial system, as it now exists, can long hold together.

One cannot attribute the present pervading disaffection to the disposition of the Czar Alexander II. Personally, he is a man whose amiability of temper, associated with his prerogative of unlimited authority, cannot but command public reverence. It is not so much against him, as the representative of a certain system of government, but it is against that system of which he is the representative that the hidden currents of revolutionary desire chafe and break. He has done much in his day to adorn his position. Such works as are especially associated with his name are rather of a peaceful and benevolent than of a fierce tyrannical order. Putting him out of the way by assassination would not change the social or constitutional condition of the Empire. He is to be compassionated rather than condemned. He is restricted by traditions, customs, conflicts of feeling, and varieties of desire and purpose, which it is practically impossible for him to break through. He may or may not have the "courage of his convictions," but neither that courage nor the want of it can greatly interfere with the inexorable and indefeasible force of tendencies characterising the state of modern Russia. That force is (if we may so express it) a violent effort of human society to throw off ill humours threatening dissolution. It is a process which probably all great communities, at some stage or other of existence, are destined to pass through. It is a disease. Its operation is not only unpleasant, but dangerous. Indeed, it seems to be an inevitable forerunner of that kind of national development in the after issues of which mankind have reason to rejoice.

History teaches us that no Empire founded upon a reversal of natural law and justice can long endure. The Empire of Russia is like a palace built of snow. Eternal severity and winter darkness may bind its parts together in solid consistence; but when light comes, and, with light, warmth, it crumbles into ruins and soon disappears. Russia has rushed too precipitately, perhaps, into the light and heat of Western ideas. The despotism which has served her for awhile, and which all classes of the population accepted, is not proof against the penetrating rays of truth and justice. All public authority concentred in the hands of one man, and all religious reverence directed towards him, must needs give way, sometimes sooner, sometimes later, before the diffusion of knowledge. The crisis is not an altogether unfamiliar one, and to meet it the means employed must be those prescribed by reason instead of tradition. A million and a half of men under arms does not constitute safety, nor does the deep drain of material resources which such an army necessarily involves constitute strength. Perhaps, in the present case, the surest way of hastening Imperial convalescence would be to put a decisive stop to aggressive foreign policy, to reduce the military machine to such proportions as internal order only requires, and to give practical assurance to Europe and the world that Russian statesmanship will henceforth occupy itself exclusively in devising and enforcing a policy aiming at the vital interests of the Russian people. Political development and organisation will come in due time, and in their own place. They would, perhaps, be less profitable now than we are apt to imagine. What is especially needed is the creation and growth—fostered, of course, by every consistent means—of moral force. The cup must be cleansed inside before it can be cleansed outwardly. But, undoubtedly, some bold example must be given by the ruling authority of Russia, illustrative of the sacrifices it is resolved to undergo for the sake of rescuing the Empire from the disintegration by which it is at present menaced.

THE COURT.

The Queen has recovered from her late indisposition, and takes her customary out-of-door exercise. Prince Leopold arrived at Windsor Castle the end of last week from Darmstadt, and Princess Louise of Lorne left the castle for London. Princess Beatrice came to London on Saturday last, returning to Windsor the same day. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Strathearn arrived at the castle from Cumberland Lodge, where they had been on a visit to Prince and Princess Christian. The Queen, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service on Sunday in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. James Fleming, B.D., Residentiary Canon of York, Vicar of St. Michael's, Chester-square, officiated. Princess Christian visited her Majesty in the afternoon.

The Queen held a private Investiture of the Order of the Bath on Monday, when the following Knights Commanders of the order were severally introduced by the Lord Chamberlain, and were knighted, and invested by her Majesty with the insignia of their respective Divisions in the Second Class of the Order, viz.:—Commissary-General Edward Strickland, Lieutenant-General Sir Samuel James Browne (had been knighted previously), Major-General Michael Anthony Shrapnel Biddulph, Sir Henry Drummond Wolff (Civil), and Rear-Admiral Francis William Sullivan. Colonel Owen Tudor Burne was then introduced by the Lord Chamberlain, attended by the Registrar of the Order of the Star of India carrying the insignia, and received the honour of knighthood, and the Queen invested him with the ribbon and badge, and delivered to him the star of a Knight Commander of the order, after which twenty-four Companions of the Bath were introduced and received from her Majesty their decorations in the Military and Civil Divisions of the Third Class of the order. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold were present with the Queen during the ceremony. The Duchess of Wellington, Lady Abercromby, and Lady Elphinstone, Lady in Waiting on the Duchess of Connaught, with the Gentlemen in Waiting and the Master of the Household, were in attendance. A guard of honour of the Grenadier Guards, with the band of the regiment, was mounted in the quadrangle of the castle. Luncheon was served in the Waterloo Gallery. Levée dress was worn by the Gentlemen in Waiting. Major-General Henry Wellington Palmer, Lieutenant-Colonel Sydenham Malthus, and Lieutenant-Colonel Philip Edward Victor Gilbert were unable to attend her Majesty's commands. General Sir Charles Ellice, Lieutenant-General Lord Chelmsford and Lady Chelmsford, Colonel Sir Evelyn Wood and the Hon. Lady Wood, Lieutenant-General Sir Samuel Browne, Rear-Admiral Sir Francis Sullivan, Major-General E. Newdigate, and Colonel R. T. Glynn (24th Foot), arrived at the castle. The Queen's dinner party included the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold, Lady Abercromby, the above visitors, Major-General Sir Michael Biddulph, Lord Elphinstone, and Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Ponsonby.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught, after skating with Princess Beatrice on Tuesday, left the castle for Forest Lodge, Farnborough. The Queen conferred decorations on the officers and men now present in England who have specially distinguished themselves by acts of bravery in the Afghan and Zulu wars. Her Majesty decorated with the Victoria Cross Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel William Knox Leet, 13th Light Infantry; Captain and Brevet Major Edward P. Leach, R.E., Lieutenant Reginald Clare Hart, R.E., and Corporal W. Allan, second battalion, 24th Regiment. The Queen then conferred the Distinguished Service Medal on four other soldiers. The ceremony took place in the corridor of the castle, the recipients of the honours being named to her Majesty by the Lord in Waiting and by Lord Chelmsford. Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, with Lady Chelmsford and Colonel Sir Evelyn and the Hon. Lady Wood, were present at the ceremony; and the ladies and gentlemen in waiting were in attendance. Her Majesty's guests left the castle in the afternoon.

The Queen has appointed Major-General Sir Michael Biddulph to be one of the Grooms in Waiting to her Majesty, in the Room of Rear-Admiral Sir John Edmund Commerell.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales closed their week of entertainment to a large party of guests with a ball at Sandringham House yesterday week. The invitations included the tenantry upon the Royal Norfolk estates, as well as those of Holkham (Earl of Leicester's), Houghton (Marquis of Cholmondeley's), Raynham (Marquis of Townsend's), Melton Constable (Lord Hasting's), Gunton (Lord Suffield's), Castle Rising (the Hon. Greville Howard's), and other principal estates in Norfolk. The band of the Norfolk Artillery Militia was in attendance. The Prince and Princess, with Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg, and Prince Louis of Battenberg, attended Divine service on Sunday in St. Mary Magdalene's Church, Sandringham Park. The Rev. F. Hervey and the Rev. A. Robins, Rector of Holy Trinity, Windsor, officiated. On Monday the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg and Prince Louis of Battenberg, left Sandringham for Marlborough House. Their Royal Highnesses, upon their arrival at St. Pancras Station, drove direct to the Agricultural Hall at Islington and inspected the Smithfield Club Cattle Show. The three Princesses of Wales remained at Sandringham. On Tuesday the Prince presided at a meeting of the council of his Royal Highness held at the office of the Duchy of Cornwall, Buckingham-gate. His Royal Highness, with the Princess, visited the Duchess of Cambridge at St. James's Palace. In the evening their Royal Highnesses went to Her Majesty's Theatre. The Prince has sent presents of game for the use of the patients in the several metropolitan hospitals.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh attended the Ashford Cattle Show on Tuesday, and his Royal Highness presided at the annual dinner in the evening. The Duke and Duchess, accompanied by their children, arrived at Charing-cross station at eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning from Eastwell Park, on a visit to London for a few days. Their Royal Highnesses drove at once to Clarence House.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Prince Leopold paid a visit to the tapestry works at Windsor on Tuesday, and inspected the various panels in hand, and also paid a visit to the stained glass works.

Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Commanding in Chief the Southern District, and Countess Dornberg returned to Government House, Portsmouth, on Saturday last from a visit to the Prince and Princess of Wales at Sandringham.

The Empress Eugénie arrived at Camden House, Chiselhurst, from Madrid, on Wednesday.

Lord Berriedale attained his majority on Sunday, which event has been celebrated by the Earl of Caithness, on his estates in Caithness-shire.

MR. GLADSTONE AT GLASGOW UNIVERSITY.

The series of political electioneering speeches delivered by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, as candidate for Midlothian, at several places in and around Edinburgh, were described last week, and were the subjects of some of our Illustrations. Mr. Gladstone's visit to Glasgow, on the Friday (yesterday week) had been arranged for his installation as Lord Rector of the University, to which office he was elected by the matriculated students two years ago. He came from Taymouth Castle, Perthshire, where he had been the guest of Lord Breadalbane during a few days of repose after the great oratorical exertions he made at Edinburgh. The University installation ceremony took place in a vast circular building of glass, called from its founder the Kibble Palace of Arts, which stands in the midst of a public garden at the west end of Glasgow. The platform, fronting the eastern entrance, is raised eight or ten feet above the floor; and there are seats, on one level, for several thousand persons. Upon this occasion the meeting was held at noon, and the hall was densely crowded, the audience being estimated at nearly 6000. The students, to the number of 2000, filled the central area or inner circle: they were divided into two parties—the Liberals, wearing red caps, to the right of the platform, and the Conservatives, in blue caps, to the left. They were all very noisy, shouting different party cries, cheering, hissing or groaning, and singing parody songs of a satirical or defiant purport. The calm array of plaster statues and groups of sculpture, with shrubs and hot-house plants, surrounding this excited crowd of youngsters, had a rather singular effect. In the outer ring spaces were marked off for the members of the General Council, for such of the general public as could procure admission tickets, and for representatives of public bodies. The platform was occupied by members of the Senatus Academicus and the University Court in their robes and by prominent citizens. A space in front of the platform was set apart for the distinguished ladies of Mr. Gladstone's party and for the noblemen and gentlemen who were to receive the degree of Doctor of Laws.

When Mr. Gladstone arrived, preceded by the Bedellus, bearing the University mace, and by Principal Caird, the cheering was tremendous. Among the noblemen and members of Parliament who attended were the Earl of Breadalbane, Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., Mr. W. H. Gladstone, M.P., Sir E. Colebrooke, M.P., Mr. Parker, M.P., Colonel Mure, M.P., and Dr. Cameron, M.P. There were also present the Countess of Rosebery, the Countess of Breadalbane, and Mrs. and Miss Gladstone. The honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred upon the Earl of Airlie, the Earl of Rosebery, the Earl of Glasgow, the Bishop of Durham, Lord Moncrieff, Lord Young, Sir Alex. Grant, Professor Balfour (of Edinburgh), Mr. A. C. Ramsay (President-elect of the British Association), Professor Lister, Mr. Cochran Patrick, and Mr. John Morley. The degree of LL.D. was also conferred upon Mr. Gladstone, who then delivered his inaugural address. He was attired in the official robe and scarf, as he appears in our front-page Engraving.

There were, he said, two leading characteristics of the age—the conflict between material and mental interests, and the controversies respecting the Christian belief. The first of these, in the triumph of mere money-making over intellectual development, had sent to the Universities of the country a group of youths who either gave themselves up to luxurious lounging or became amateur gymnasts. It had further created a hybrid class styling themselves "men of business," but who, knowing nothing of business, for the sake of gain lent the influence of their names to commercial speculations as decoys to the unwary. Addressing himself to the law students, he observed that it had been charged against the legal system that the expense of its administration was so great as to practically exclude the less wealthy classes from the benefits which law is intended to offer. To the theological students the right hon. gentleman said in the Church of England there was a latent feeling that the higher aspirations of our nature were secondary, or unreal, in comparison with the visible and experimental world. The assailants of the Christian belief were so numerous, so talented, often of such high character, that, in view of the combination of these antagonistic forces, a "change of front" had become essential among the thoughtful upholders of Christianity. The highest study of all, in a secular sense, was man, in all his various phases; and history, as the record of man's actions, was the philosophy of human nature. In conclusion, he urged them not too narrowly to confine themselves to one subject of study, which had the effect of making a man dogmatically perverse, and to abhor the prevalent spirit of self-sufficient presumption, for "ignorance often may be innocent; pretension is always despicable."

The presentation of prizes to the 9th Middlesex Volunteers took place yesterday week at the Eyre Arms. The South Middlesex, the London Scottish, and the 7th Surrey, held their annual prize distributions last Saturday, at Beaufort House, Walham-green; Westminster Hall, and the Cannon-street Hotel respectively. A silver cup, value £30, given by the ladies of St. James's, Westminster, to the H company of the Queen's (Westminster), was won, on the 4th inst., by Captain Shipway. On the 3rd inst. the Mayoress of Peterborough presented to the successful competitors the prizes won during 1879 by the members of the 6th Northamptonshire. At the close of the distribution, in the name of the corps, Quartermaster-Sergeant Craig presented to Captain Commmandant Walker the Earl Spencer Challenge Cup, won by a team of the Peterborough Corps three years in succession at the annual prize competition of the Northamptonshire Battalion of Rifle Volunteers. Colonel Fremantle, commanding Coldstream Guards, will present the prizes to the successful marksmen of the 17th Middlesex (Bloomsbury) at the Freemasons' Tavern this (Saturday) evening.

A little volume on Calderon, by E. J. Hasell, is perhaps the most thoroughly satisfactory contribution yet made to Blackwood's Foreign Classics for English Readers. Mr. Hasell, a writer hitherto entirely unknown to us, possesses every qualification for his task, including the paramount one of a thorough sympathy with his author. He is evidently perfectly at home with Calderon, and feels none of that estrangement from the great representative of Catholic and chivalric ideas which must have affected one more deeply imbued with the modern spirit. At the same time, he does not, like Schlegel, make his admiration for Calderon the apology of a disguised polemic against the living modern drama, or recommend the transplantation of metrical forms and dramatic rules, excellent in their place, to a theatre and an age for which they are unsuited. To this capital quality of discriminating enthusiasm he adds lucidity of exposition, judgment in selection, and such talent as a translator that his versions compare well with the accompanying specimens from Fitzgerald, Trench, M'Carthy, and even Shelley. We should be glad to see him return to Calderon's autos, which, as he (or are we right in guessing "she?") justly observes, "require a volume to themselves."

SKETCHES OF GIPSY LIFE: INTERIOR OF VAN NEAR LATIMER-ROAD, NOTTING-HILL.

GIPSY LIFE NEAR LONDON.

Another Sketch of the singular habits and rather deplorable condition of these vagrant people, who hang about, as the parasites of civilisation, close on the suburban outskirts of our wealthy metropolis, is presented by our Artist, following those which have appeared in the last two weeks. Mr. G. Smith, of Coalville, Leicester, having taken in hand the question of providing due supervision and police regulation for the gipsies, with compulsory education for their children, we readily dedicate these local Illustrations to the furtherance of his good work. The ugliest place we know in the neighbourhood of London, the most dismal and forlorn, is not Hackney Marshes or those of the Lea, beyond Old Ford, at the East-End; but it is the tract of land, half torn up for brick-field clay, half consisting of fields laid waste in expectation of the house-builder, which lies just outside of Shepherd's-bush and Notting-hill. There it is that the gipsy encampment may be found, squatting within an hour's walk of the Royal palaces and of the luxurious town mansions of our nobility and opulent classes, to the very west of the fashionable West-End, beyond the gentility of Bayswater and Whiteley's avenue of universal shopping. It is a curious spectacle in that situation, and might suggest a few serious reflections upon social contrasts at the centre and capital of the mighty British nation, which takes upon itself the correction of every savage tribe in South and West Africa and Central Asia. The encampment is usually formed of two or three vans and a rude cabin or a tent, placed on some piece of waste ground, for which the gipsy party have to pay a few shillings a week of rent. This may be situated at the back of a row of respectable houses and in full view of their bedroom or parlour windows, not much to the satisfaction of the quiet inhabitants. The interior of one of the vans, furnished as a dwelling-room, which is shown in our Artist's Sketch, does not look very miserable; but Mr. Smith informs us that these receptacles of vagabond humanity are often sadly overcrowded. Besides a man and his wife and their own children, the little ones stowed in bunks or cupboards, there will be several adult persons taken in as lodgers. The total number of gipsies now estimated to be living in the metropolitan district is not less than two thousand. Among these are doubtless not a small proportion of idle runaways or "losels" from the more settled classes of our people. It would seem to be the duty of somebody at the Home Office, for the sake of public health and good order, to call upon some local authorities of the county or the parish to look after these eccentricities of gipsy life.

NORDENSKIÖLD'S ARCTIC VOYAGES.

An interesting book, recently published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co., by whose permission we borrow some of the Engravings for this Number of our Journal, is the volume narrating the "Arctic Voyages of Adolf Erik Nordenskiöld, from 1858 to 1879." The last and most renowned achievement of this eminent Swedish explorer was accomplished in the summer of this year. It was the successful navigation, in a small steam-vessel called the Vega, of the entire North-east Passage from Europe, round the coast of Siberia, and through Behring's Strait, to the Pacific Ocean. The importance of this great feat of maritime enterprise may not be confined to increasing our geographical knowledge, but may possibly extend to the opening of new routes for commerce. The narrative given in the volume now under our notice, which is compiled by Mr. Alexander Leslie, of Aberdeen, has been brought down to Sept. 2, when the Vega safely arrived in the Japanese harbour of Yokohama, and the gratifying news soon reached us by telegraph, though we had already heard of her passing Behring's Strait in July. She had been frozen in, from the end of September, 1878, on the shore of the Chukchi peninsula, part of North-eastern Asia. About forty pages, at the end of the present book, contain the partial and fragmentary accounts of this last expedition which have as yet come to hand, but they will be read with much interest till the exploring party shall hav returned to Europe and delivered a complete report. Th larger portion of the narrative here presented relates to preceding Swedish expeditions, in 1858 and 1861 to explore Spitzbergen, in 1868 to try an approach to the North Pole, in 1870 to the coast of Greenland, in 1872, and the next year, again to the northward of Spitzbergen; followed by two visits to the Siberian river Yenissej, in 1875 and 1876. A biographical memoir of Adolf Erik Nordenskiöld is prefixed to these accounts of the successive voyages of scientific discovery or survey in which he has been employed during twenty years past. He is now forty-seven years of age, and is a native of Helsingfors, the capital of Finland, but preferred the Swedish to the Russian public service and citizenship. Having received a scientific education and gained some repute as a mineralogist, he was appointed to join the private expeditions of Otto Torell, in 1858 and 1861, at the suggestion of Professor Sven Lovén, to examine the geology of Spitzbergen. The Government expedition of 1864 was placed under the personal direction of Nordenskiöld, with the assistance of a competent sailing-master. The voyage of the iron steamer Sofia, in 1868, was of greater importance, as it reached the highest north latitude—81 deg. 42 min.—that has yet been attained in the seas immediately north of Europe. The naval officer in command of that ship was Captain Baron von Otter, now the Swedish Minister of Marine. A liberal and public-spirited citizen, Mr. Oscar Dickson, contributed largely to the funds required for this and several later expeditions. It was proved by that of 1868 that there was no possibility of sailing due north from Spitzbergen to the Pole; so the object sought in 1872 was to proceed in that direction, over the packed ice, in sledges, carrying also boats in order to cross the intervening fissures and pieces of water. The question of using Esquimaux dogs or Lapp reindeer to draw the sledges was determined by an experimental trip in Greenland, which yielded some valuable incidental results of surveying the interior of that ice-bound country. Reindeer were chosen for the Spitzbergen attempt of 1872, and this particular enterprise, though unsuccessful, forms one of the most interesting parts of the history to be here perused. Most of the Illustrations we have selected for our paper belong to the incidents of 1868 and 1872 ventures on the northern coasts of Spitzbergen. Wild reindeer were found and hunted on the shores of Lomme Bay, an inlet of the Hinloopen Strait, which divides West Spitzbergen from the North-east Island. They differ in some features from the Lapland and Norway reindeer, and it is supposed that they came from the Samoyede peninsula, crossing the sea by drifting ice and intervening islands. Some of these animals have their ears cropped, which has been thought to be an artificial mark done in previous captivity on the mainland; but reasons are here given for not admitting this supposition. Boat parties, which were often compelled to lift their heavy-laden boats out of the perilous water and drag them long distances over the ice, had much occupation in the frost-bound channels and firths of the Spitzbergen Archipelago. The Illustration of "Bed-time during a Boat voyage" shows how the men were "cabined, cribbed, confined" by their narrow sleeping accommodation on board one of the boats that appertained to the Sofia in 1868. The expedition of 1872 comprised in its service three ships furnished by the Swedish Government—namely, the Baltic mail-steamer Polhem, built of iron, the brig Gladan, and the hired steamer Onkel Adam from Gothenburg acting as tender. Two or three scientific men—A. Wijkander, physicist, F. R. Kjellman, botanist, and Dr. Envall, medical officer—accompanied Professor Nordenskiöld upon this occasion. The Onkel Adam carried forty trained reindeer, with four Lapp drivers, to draw the sledges. On Sept. 3 the three vessels were at the mouth of Wijde Bay, a deep inlet of the northern coast of West Spitzbergen. Finding it impossible to sail northward or eastward, they settled in winter quarters at Mussel Bay, where the ships remained until Midsummer, 1873. A convenient wooden house, 50 feet long and 38 feet broad, was erected for the dwelling of the men, who numbered in all sixty-seven, under the naval command of Lieutenant Palander. For the purpose of meteorological, astronomical, and magnetic observatories, separate sheds were put up, one of which appears in the Illustration. It was very slight shelter from the cold for Professor Wijkander; but warmer houses were afterwards built of snow. It had been intended that two of the vessels should be sent home in September, only the sudden closing of the ice shut them up. The reindeer unfortunately escaped their keepers, during a violent snowstorm, and could never be recaptured, except one poor beast, which got some accidental injury. The supply of provisions was hardly enough for the party, even with rations reduced to two-thirds; and they were unable to grant hospitality to fifty-eight distressed walrus-hunters, led by the veteran Mattilas, whose vessels had been caught in Hinloopen Strait. Lieutenant Palander, however, went to visit those ships, which were Norwegian, and gave them as much relief as he could spare. They were, however, released by a change of wind in the middle of November, but the Swedish ships could not get away. A large stock of moss, which had been brought as food for the reindeer, was now utilised by the men for their own sustenance; it was picked clean, boiled, dried, ground, and mixed with rye-flour, making a tolerable dough for bread, though with a bitter taste. The cold was not generally extreme, seldom reaching twenty degrees below freezing point, and the maximum fall, on Feb. 20, was to thirty-eight degrees. Violent storms, which sometimes came on, were accompanied with warmer weather. In November, they enjoyed a mild temperature and brilliant moonlight; but this was followed by continual and total darkness till the sun returned on March 13. The south-east wind, on Jan. 8, drove the ice out of Mussel Bay, and again on the 29th. There was not, however, any safe opportunity of putting to sea. Whether in open water, or beneath the ice, dredging was constantly practised in the manner that is seen in the Engraving, to collect specimens of marine plants and animals. The sledge-party, with Nordenskiöld himself, started on April 24, crossing the Hinloopen Strait and proceeding north-east over the ice between the coast of the other large island, there broken with gulfs and inlets, and the clusters of small islets lying outside. Having reached latitude 80 deg. 40 min., they turned to the south-east and struck the coast of that large island, across which they marched to Hinloopen Strait, and so came back over this to Mussel Bay. The Austrian expedition of the Tegetthoff, under the command of Lieutenant Julius Payen, was about to perform, next year, a much greater geographical exploration, by the discovery of Franz Joseph Land, twenty degrees farther to the north-east. Spitzbergen, however, especially its remoter portion, has been made better known to us through the repeated voyages and laborious overland journeys of Professor Nordenskiöld. His remarks upon the condition of the inland ice-fields, with their singular clefts and canals, sometimes partly filled with snow, one of which is the subject of an Illustration, merit some regard. The experiences of the distressed Norwegian walrus-hunters, after leaving Hinloopen Strait, were still rather deplorable. They were obliged, after all, to leave their four vessels at Grey Hook, on the opposte side of Wijde Bay; and old Mattilas, who had braved the Arctic seas of forty-two years, chose to stay there during the winter with one companion, while the rest of them were taken home by another ship. The stout old man and his attendant died of scurvy in that forlorn situation, and so did fifteen others at a different place on the Spitzbergen shores. The Polhem, with Nordenskiöld and most of his party, returned safely to Europe in the following summer. They fell in with the English yacht Diana, belonging to Mr. Leigh Smith, who visited their winter quarters at Mussel Bay. We must reserve for a second notice the account of Nordenskiöld's voyages, in 1875 and 1876, along the coast of Siberia, and that of 1878, passing round Cape Chelyuskin, the most northerly promontory of Asia, on Aug. 19, when the two ships Vega and Lena fired a salute in honour of this achievement of maritime enterprise. The Siberian seas and rivers present many features of geographical importance and novelty of aspect, which will be found worthy of study in the later chapters of this book. It is furnished with several useful maps or charts.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

M. Brisson, in the sitting of the Chamber of Deputies on Thursday, the 4th inst., proceeded to interpellate the Government on its internal policy. M. Waddington thanked the speaker for having furnished the Ministry with an opportunity for making a complete explanation. The debate resulted in the numbers, on a vote of confidence being taken, showing for the Government 243, against 107—a majority of 136; but the Right and a portion of the Left abstained from voting. Yesterday week the Senate, by 161 to 58, passed the Colportage Bill, which abolishes the censorship. In the Chamber on Saturday a bill was brought forward for the total abolition of shooting licenses, and the substitution of a tax on guns used for sporting purposes. Notwithstanding opposition from the Ministry, the House decided to take the measure into consideration. In the Senate on Monday M. Jules Simon presented the report of the Committee on the University Bill, but it will not be discussed till January. Considerable progress was made with the Budget, the reduction made by the Chamber in the episcopal stipends being disagreed to, with the approval of the Government.

An election took place on Sunday of a deputy for Cambrai. M. Cirier, a moderate Republican, defeated M. Jules Amigues, a Bonapartist, by 9978 to 8347.

Railway and telegraphic communication with Paris was last week seriously interrupted by the snow. There was another heavy fall of snow in Paris on Monday, the street traffic being almost entirely suspended. The Paris Municipality has voted 500,000f. to the poor in consideration of the severe weather, as also 200,000f. for the redemption of pledged bedclothes.

In consequence of the bad weather the fête at the Hippodrome, Paris, for the benefit of the sufferers by the floods in Murcia has been put off until Thursday, the 18th inst., and the issue of the journal which was to have been specially published in connection with the fête has also been postponed to the same day.

Prevost, the Paris policeman who murdered a jeweller named Lenoble, and robbed him of his stock in trade, and who also admitted the murder of a woman named Adéle Blondin, from whom he had stolen some valuable securities, was tried at the Paris Assizes on Monday. Owing to the full confessions made by the prisoner the inquiry was completed in one sitting. He was found guilty without extenuating circumstances, and sentenced to death.

The Annuaire de Statistique informs us that out of the 37,000,000 inhabitants in France, there are 2613 men between ninety-five and one hundred years of age, and 194 over one hundred years of age.

The Treaty of Commerce between France and Switzerland is to be prolonged until June, 1880.

SPAIN.

A ball in honour of the King and Queen, at which their Majesties were to be present, was given yesterday week at the French Embassy at Madrid. Queen Isabella during her stay in Madrid received visits from a large number of persons. The Archduchess Elizabeth, mother of the new Queen, has taken her departure for Vienna. The Empress Eugénie has paid a visit to King Alfonso. The Princess of the Asturias, the Archduke Renier, and the Austrian Archduchesses have left Madrid for Toledo. Lord Napier of Magdala, the British Ambassador Extraordinary on the occasion of the Royal marriage, has been invested with the Grand Cordon of the Order of Charles III. The special Envoys of other foreign Powers have also received decorations. The Ambassadors Extraordinary who attended the Royal marriage have left Madrid.

A Ministerial difficulty having arisen, the King intrusted Señor de Posada Herrara with the task of forming a new Cabinet; but, he not succeeding in so doing, the King summoned Señor Canovas del Castillo, who counselled his Majesty to intrust the formation of a Ministry to Señor Ayala. But that gentleman having declined to form a Ministry on account of the state of his health, Señor Canovas del Castillo was again summoned to the palace on Tuesday morning, and accepted the task of constituting the new Cabinet. It has been constituted as follows:—Señor Canovas del Castillo, Premier; Count Toreno, Minister for Foreign Affairs; Señor Echeverria, Minister of War; Admiral Polo, Minister of Marine; Señor Bugallal, Minister of Justice; Señor Romero y Robledo, Minister of the Interior; Señor Lasala, Minister of Public Works; Señor Elduayen, Minister for the Colonies; Marquis de Orovio, Minister of Finance.

Nearly three thousand men have been sent to reinforce the army in Cuba. An official despatch from the Governor-General of Cuba announces that an important insurgent leader has surrendered to the Spanish authorities, together with seventy of his followers. The despatch adds that the insurrection may now be considered as almost crushed.

The waters of the Guadiana have risen considerably, and fresh inundations are apprehended.

ITALY.

The modifications in the Budget for 1880, presented yesterday week by Signor Magliani in the Chamber of Deputies, show an increase of 13,000,000 lire over the original estimates, 8,000,000 lire of which are due to retrenchments and 5,000,000 lire to the surplus of revenue. In the Chamber on Monday Signor Maurigi put a question to the Government about the recognition of Roumania by Italy. Signor Cairoli stated the reasons which had induced the Government to take this step, and said that on the Roumanian question they had been throughout in accord with the Cabinets of Germany, France, and England.

The Budget Committee of the Chamber of Deputies has elected Signor Crispi as its President.

Leo XIII. has given 5000f. to be distributed among the seminaries of Mantua, San Miniato, Montefiascone, Ceneda, and Osimo, as having more specially need of assistance, and has sent a donation of 2000f. to the Institute of the Concettini, founded by Pius IX.

The first jubilee of the dogmatic definition of the Immaculate Conception was solemnised in Rome last Monday in the Titular Churches of the Virgin and in certain others, such as the Gesù, the Santi Apostoli, and St. Peter's.

Signs of activity were on Sunday shown by Vesuvius.

SWITZERLAND.

The Federal Assembly has elected Dr. Welti, of the Canton Aargau, as President, and M. Anderwelt, of the Canton Thurgau, as Vice-President of the Swiss Confederation for 1880.

The State Council has sanctioned the issue of a loan of 35,000,000f. for the conversion of the Swiss floating debt.

HOLLAND.

The Second Chamber has rejected two motions brought forward by the Clerical party proposing that the introduction of the new law on primary education should be postponed until after the revision of the electoral law, or until a decision has been arrived at respecting the financial proposals before the House.

GERMANY.

The Emperor has conferred the Order of Louisa upon the Czarevna, Grand Duchess Marie of Russia.

In a debate on the Budget in the Lower House of the Prussian Diet last Saturday, Herr Windthorst, the leader of the Centre or Catholic party, said that he and his friends had formerly been confronted by a Ministry decidedly hostile to their views, but were now in presence of a Cabinet which desired to deal with them in a friendly manner. Ministers must be allowed time to develop and explain their views. He was sorry that this should proceed so slowly, but he trusted the Government would take the Centre's complaints into consideration. In conclusion he said:—"We shall as heretofore, when occasion arises, bring our complaints forward, and we hope at no distant date to obtain our rights. We abandon none of our principles."

On Tuesday the second reading of the bill for the purchase of the railways by the State was discussed, and it was stated by the Minister of Commerce that the Government were ready to lay bills before the Chamber during the present or ensuing Session for providing the guarantee stipulated by the Committee. The first clause, enacting the purchase of the specified lines, was passed by 226 votes to 155.

A Berlin telegram in the Daily News says that the famine in Upper Silesia is very serious, and that there are more than 150,000 sufferers, most of whom are Poles.

Severe weather is reported from all parts of Germany. In Alsace and Lorraine the military have been called out in large numbers to clear the railway lines of snow.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath yesterday week voted, by a two-thirds majority, the clause of the Army Bill fixing the number of men at 800,000 for ten years. The second clause of the bill, respecting the number of recruits, which the Government wanted fixed for ten years and the Constitutional party for three years, failed to pass in consequence of the two-thirds majority not having been obtained.

On Monday the Committee of the Upper House of the Reicherath unanimously adopted a resolution in favour of restoring paragraph 2 of the Army Bill, fixing the war strength of the army for a period of ten years, which had been struck out by the Lower House.

In consequence of serious disturbances which have occurred amongst the students at the Technical High School in Vienna, the Minister of Public Instruction has issued a notification threatening to take severe measures against the implicated parties, since the gentler means to which the professors have resorted have proved ineffectual.

Owing to the fall of great masses of snow from the hills, the rivers in many districts of Hungary have overflowed.

RUSSIA.

The Emperor Alexander returned to St. Petersburg on Thursday, the 4th inst., and was received with great enthusiasm by large crowds which had assembled all along the route from the railway station to the Winter Palace, whither his Majesty drove in an open sledge, followed by a suite of mounted officers. A guard of infantry, two deep, lined the streets through which the Czar passed. On his way he went into the Kazan Cathedral, and remained for a few minutes in prayer, and immediately on his arrival at the palace a thanksgiving service was held in the chapel. At night, the Emperor visited the theatre, and met with a most enthusiastic reception. The National Anthem was sung, and the ballet had to be interrupted. Many congratulations upon his escape have been sent to the Emperor. The first received by the Emperor at Moscow from abroad came from the German Emperor, and the second were from Queen Victoria. Several arrests have been made in Moscow. On Tuesday week an excited crowd assembled round the house whence the mine was fired at the train which was supposed to contain the Emperor. The crowd broke the windows of the house, entered it, and began to destroy everything, until they were stopped by the police. Some further discoveries have been made by the police relative to the escape of the Czar. Three mines filled with powder and nitro-glycerine have been found near the Odessa station. It appears that the mine which was exploded near Moscow was made on the wrong side of the railway; it demolished the down line, on which there was nothing running, but left uninjured the up line, on which the train was travelling, though some of the carriages were thrown off by the concussion. On Tuesday the Emperor held the annual review of the troops at St. Petersburg to commemorate the institution of the Order of St. George. His Majesty was received by the men with enthusiastic cheers. A dinner was given in the Winter Palace, at which the Emperor proposed the health of the Emperor William, the oldest Knight of St. George, who, he said, had borne the cross of the order for sixty-five years. The toast was received with much cheering. His Majesty afterwards complimented the young soldiers of the army on the courage they had displayed in the last war; and, in conclusion, expressed the hope that Russia would be able to develop her resources in the paths of peace, and have a happy and a glorious future.

Prince Gortschakoff arrived at St. Petersburg on Thursday afternoon. The Embassies there have received a notification of the resumption by Prince Gortschakoff of his duties at the Foreign Office. The Emperor has thanked M. de Giers for the able and indefatigable manner in which he has conducted the affairs of the Foreign Office during the Chancellor's absence.

SERVIA.

Unanimous assent to the establishment of freedom of the press has been given by the Government, and a bill enunciating that principle will shortly be presented to the Skuptchina.

ROUMANIA.

The bill for the purchase of the railways by the State has been read a first time in the Chamber of Deputies by a large majority. The Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is being drawn up by a committee.

BULGARIA.

Prince Alexander issued a decree last Saturday dissolving the National Assembly, in consequence of the Liberal leaders not being able to form a new Ministry. On Monday he published a decree confirming the appointment of the following Ministry:—Bishop Clement, of Tirnova, Premier and Minister of Public Instruction; M. Matchawitz, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and temporarily of Finance; M. Greeoff, Minister of Justice, and temporarily of the Interior; General Parenzoff, Minister of War.

EGYPT.

A Standard telegram from Cairo states that, according to information received from Massowah, King John is marching forward with the main Abyssinian army and forty guns. He is determined to occupy the districts of Senaar and Galabat and the Blue Nile territory. He declares that European intervention will not prevent his enforcing his just claims, including an indemnity for past Egyptian aggression.

A Daily News telegram from Alexandria says that the second Cleopatra's Needle, erected twenty-two years B.C. opposite the Temple of Augustus Cæsar in Alexandria, was successfully lowered last Saturday, and preparations are being made for its shipment to America.

AMERICA.

In the Senate Mr. Beck has introduced a bill for the repeal of the laws restricting the purchase of foreign-built ships, and Mr. Voorhees a bill protesting against the reduction of the legal tender circulation, and favouring the unlimited coinage of silver. The bill introduced in the House of Representatives for refunding the debt by the issue of Four per Cent Bonds has been presented to the Senate. The bill was prepared in the Treasury Department.

In the House of Representatives on Tuesday Mr. Frost, of Missouri, introduced a joint resolution sympathising with the Irish in their efforts to ameliorate the condition of their country, and wishing them success in their endeavours to obtain for themselves and their posterity just laws and self-government. Mr. Gillette, of Iowa, introduced a similar resolution, requesting President Hayes to communicate with the English Government, in the hope that some arrangements might be effected enabling the Irish peasants to own the soil they cultivated.

The appointment of Mr. Macrary, former Secretary for War, as Judge of Iowa has been confirmed.

The elections of State officers by the Legislature of Virginia have resulted in a majority of 26 for the party favouring the readjustment of the State Debt. The vote was taken by a joint ballot of both Houses of the Legislature.

The result of the Louisiana State elections shows that the Democratic party have obtained a majority of 20,000 votes. A new constitution was adopted by a large majority.

A mass meeting of Irish sympathisers, including among its promoters some of the most influential citizens, was held at St. Louis on Monday evening. The speakers referred chiefly to the hardships arising from the Irish land laws and the action of the landlords.

CANADA.

The Citizen, of Ottawa, contradicts the statement that Sir Alexander Galt, in his capacity as Canadian Minister at London, would be a member of the Dominion Cabinet.

The Dominion Government has arranged for the distribution of food among the Indians in the North-West.

THE BRAZILS.

The Senate has rejected the Electoral Bill. Both Houses of the Legislature have been prorogued until April 15 next.

AUSTRALIA.

We learn from Melbourne, Dec. 5, that the Legislative Assembly has voted the third reading of the Government bill for the reform of the Constitution by 48 against 43, or one less than the absolute majority required by the Constitution of Victoria. The Government, however, declared that, in consequence of there being a vacancy in the Assembly, the requisite statutory majority had been obtained. The fate of the bill is still undecided.

INDIA.

The Times correspondent at Cabul telegraphs that an imposing parade of all the troops at Cabul was held on Monday on the plain near the cantonment. Five thousand men were assembled under arms. Their appearance was excellent, and made an evident impression on the numerous Afghan spectators, including all the sirdars of note now at Cabul. A Standard telegram says that news has been received that the rebels are again collecting in force, and a despatch in the Daily News says that "tribal gatherings on the Ghuznee road and in the Logar Valley have stopped the supplies." Two brigades will march immediately towards Maidan, under the command of Generals Baker and Macpherson respectively. Three of the Afghan Ministers were deported on Monday.

The Times correspondent at Candahar, telegraphing on Monday, says that a rumour is current in the city that Ayoob Khan, with twelve regiments of infantry and three of cavalry, has marched from Herat with a view to drawing us out of Candahar. It is thought probable that he is acting under compulsion, or is partly, perhaps, buoyed up by vain hopes of Persian assistance. Mir Afzul makes no sign, but the people of Pakwa, the north-east district of Farah, have shown their opinion of him by driving his son, who came to collect revenue and raise horsemen, out of their country. Everything is ready at Candahar for our advance if necessary. The troops are in splendid health, and the condition of the transport service is equal to carrying the whole division to any point on the Herat road. The Durani chiefs, apart from the clique of the Barakzai sirdars and their followers, are said to be well satisfied with the existing régime.

The Embassy from the King of Burmah has (according to a Standard telegram from Thyetmyo) been informed that the Viceroy is seriously dissatisfied with the position and treatment of the English Resident while he was at the Burmese Court.

MAGAZINES.

The most remarkable article in Macmillan is a very interesting one by H. T. Finch, on the development of the perception of colour in man and animals. Anatomically, this proves to be connected with the structure of the retina, the inner layer of which consists of a multitude of minute nerves, designated as "rods" and "cones;" the former giving sensibility to light, the latter to colour. The perception of colour is found to exist in the ratio of the development of the latter, from the mutable chameleon, whose retina consists entirely of cones, to the owl that has hardly any, while brightness of tint is usually proportionate to this sensibility. Mr. Leland concludes his lively sketch of the Russian gipsies, Mr. C. S. Maine advocates the establishment of a national Conservatoire of Music, and Mr. Torrens, M.P., discusses the question of the metropolitan water supply.

The Atlantic Monthly, besides much varied matter of interest, has the first part of a striking story "Thirty-seven Hundred and Fifty-eight," and some reminiscences of John Brown, which show that the modern Spartacus had studied the career of the ancient one. Scribner has a lively sketch of Victor Hugo from personal acquaintance, the continuation of Mr. Henry James's "Confidence," and copiously illustrated papers on coffee culture in Brazil, and the capital of New York, which seems not unlike the Manchester Townhall, although the style of architecture is different. The Melbourne Review has several articles on the weighty practical questions which now agitate the colony, some written from a democratic, others from a Conservative point of view.

Mr. Justin McCarthy's "Donna Quixote" reaches its conclusion in Belgravia, and it remains to be seen whether the historian and the senator will not now absorb the novelist. The number is also remarkable for the conclusion of Madame Villari's story, "The Professor's Declaration; an excellent paper on Alfieri; Mr. Julian Hawthorne's graceful memorial sketch of the late lamented Jerrold Dixon, Mr. Austin Dobson's clever "Sonnet in Dialogue," and Miss Robinson's exquisite little poem, "A Pastoral of Parnassus," which would, we venture to suggest, be improved by the omission of the last stanza. The same gifted young lady contributes an admirable translation of the lyrical dialogue between Phædra, her Nurse, and the Chorus, near the beginning of the "Hippolytus" of Euripides, to the University Magazine; which has further a free metrical version of some of Krilof's fables, after Mr. Ralston's prose rendering; and a good portrait and memoir of Mr. Alma Tadema. The most striking contribution to the number, however, is the conclusion of "Ichabod." The character from whom this remarkable story derives its appellation comes nearer to the creation of a new type than any personage in recent fiction—out of Mr. George Meredith's pages, at least. Time's brace of stories are continued with unflagging interest; but the only serious contributions of importance are Mr. Haviland Bell's pretty and suggestive "Child's Biography," and Mr. Lucy's estimate of the strength of the various sections of the Home-Rule party in the next Parliament. Mrs. Linton's powerful, but over-coloured, fiction is concluded in the Gentleman's Magazine, which also publishes a statement by Mr. Arthur Arnold of the Irish land question from the Irish point of view, effective, and presenting several points worthy of consideration; but too evidently composed as an electioneering manifesto. Mr. Proctor defends the reality of Professor Draper's much-contested discovery of oxygen in the sun. The most interesting contributions to the Month are an account of Charles I.'s abortive wooing of a Spanish Princess, and a contemporary narrative of the adventures and misfortunes of twelve English Jesuit students in James I.'s reign on their way from St. Omer to Seville. The Biograph contains an unusual number of short biographical notices. Temple Bar and Tinsley are entertaining, but not remarkable.

The works issued by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin deserve, on account of their number and value, a paragraph to themselves. Their Art Magazine, Family Magazine, and Quiver come out in new and improved forms. They also publish a work on Ferns, by James Britten, with coloured plates, painted from nature by D. Blair; a New and Revised Edition of Old and New London; a re-issue of their Technical Educator; Longfellow's Poetical Works, Illustrated; Science for All, Illustrated; Familiar Wild Flowers, with Coloured Plates; European Ferns, with Coloured Illustrations from Nature; the Illustrated History of the Russo-Turkish War; and an Illustrated Book of the Dog.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of Good Words, London Society, St. James's Magazine, Tinsley's Magazine, the Argosy, the Churchman's Monthly Magazine, the New Monthly, St. Nicholas, Charing-Cross, Science Gossip, Men of Mark, the Theatre, Greenhouse Favourites, Heath's Fern World (Part 12, completing a valuable and interesting volume), Kensington, Golden Hours, Peep-Show, Familiar Wild Flowers, Haydn's Dictionary of Popular Domestic Medicine, Haydn's Bible Dictionary, Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, Josephus, Science for All, Mission Life, Excelsior, Kind Words, Christian Age, Golden Childhood, and the Animal World. The Fashion Books received are Le Follet, Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, Myra's Journal of Dress and Needlework, Myra's Mid-Monthly Journal, the Ladies' Treasury, Weldon's Ladies' Journal. We have also received Monthly Parts of All the Year Round, Once a Week, Leisure Hour, Sunday at Home, Sunday Magazine, Gardener's Magazine, Gardening Illustrated, Day of Rest, Weekly Welcome, Social Notes, Young People's Paper, Sunday Reading for the Young, the Christian Age, the Girls' World, and the Boys' Own Paper.

A continuance of the favourable results apparent in nearly every official statement since Midsummer is shown in the Board of Trade returns for last month. The total declared value of the exports was £17,051,655, against £15,961,669 in November, 1878, and £16,753,364 in November, 1877.

A Parliamentary paper recently issued shows that the total amount of the National Debt on March 31, 1879, was £777,548 495; and deducting £12,460,000 for loans recoverable and £3,806,360 for Suez Canal Shares, the net value of the Debt is £761,222,195. The total Funded Debt amounted to £769,430,593 13s. The Unfunded Debt consisted of Terminable Annuities, £37,664,369; Exchequer Bills, £5,162,800; Exchequer Bonds, £15,276,300; Treasury Bills, £5,431,000; deficit to Savings Banks and Friendly Societies accounts at Nov. 20, 1878, £4,503,433.

At the annual meeting of the Liverpool Council of Education (the Mayor in the chair, and Messrs. Rathbone and Torr, members for the borough, being among those present), contributions to the amount of £3000 were announced for the founding of six new scholarships connecting the elementary with the secondary schools. Two are to be associated with the name of the late Roger Lyon Jones, and one each with the names of Messrs. Torr, A. Balfour, Samuel Smith, and S. Williamson. The scholarships of the council are of the value of £18 per annum, and are tenable for three years, this amount providing for clothes and books as well as school fees.

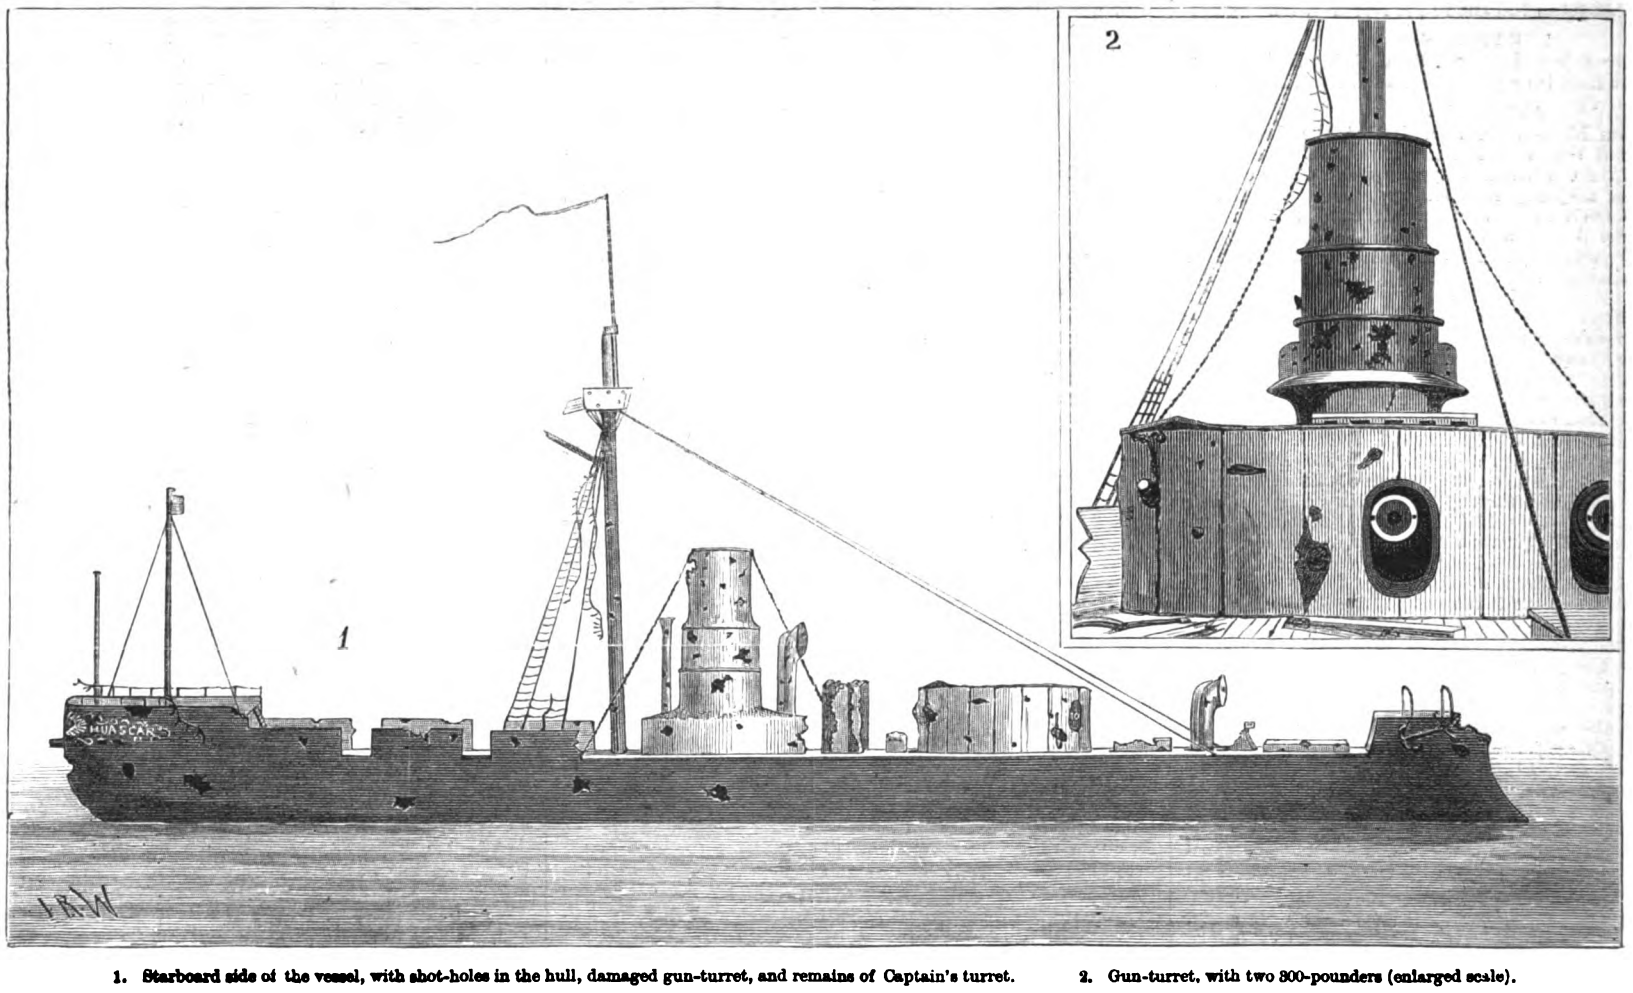
THE LATE MR. DELANE.

The ability and discretion with which the editorship of the Times was conducted by this gentleman during the long period of thirty-six years were testified by an interesting memoir of him which appeared, on the 25th ult., in that great daily journal of English and foreign affairs. It seems fitting that his Portrait should be here given as that of a faithful and efficient literary indicator of the course of public opinion, who strove to watch the fluctuating movements of thought and feeling in English society, and to furnish the means and opportunities for their timely expression, while maintaining a general tendency to the practical development of Liberal-Conservative principles. This is what the Times has done, upon the whole very fairly and honourably, since the Reform Act of 1832, and it has well earned the gratitude and confidence of all who are not furious sectarians or fanatics on one side or the other by its constant endeavours to hold an equal balance of judgment, and to admit the free play of conflicting views and sentiments, upon most social and political questions. Mr. Delane, as the chief editor and director, never himself wrote a leading article; but it was his business to collect and hold in hand a sufficient number of competent writers, men occupying various positions in the world and cherishing different ideas and predilections, whom he could alternately employ, as occasion might suggest, to set forth, with perfect sincerity and fidelity, their own convictions at the convenient season for such utterance. It was by the working of such an organisation, not implying the sacrifice of individual truthfulness or earnestness in any one instance, that the Times was enabled to afford, through occasional shifting of its numerous and diverse contributors, a true and adequate representation of all tolerable shades of public opinion. The usefulness and beneficial effect of this national institution, as the Times may justly be considered, which performs a function something like the "judicious bottle-holding" that Lord Palmerston once described, will not be underrated by cool and impartial observers of recent European history. The late Mr. Delane was eminently qualified for the work intrusted to him by the sagacious proprietors of that powerful organ of social sentiment, and his diligent service, from 1841 to 1877, rendered it the instrument of safe progress in every department of affairs. There is little to be noticed here of his personal biography. John Thaddeus Delane, born in October, 1817, was son of Mr. William Delane, sometime a country solicitor in Berkshire, but afterwards financial manager of the Times for the late Mr. Walter. He was educated first by a private tutor in Lincolnshire, subsequently at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; studied medicine or surgery a little at the London hospitals, then studied law, and was called to the Bar, then served two Sessions of Parliament in the reporters' gallery, and in 1839 became sub-editor of the Times under Mr. Barnes, whom he succeeded two years afterwards in the post of editor.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. T. Rodger, of St. Andrew's.

THE HUASCAR AFTER FIGHTING.

The naval warfare between the rival Spanish South American Republics of Chile and Peru has been much more eventful than the military operations on land, in which Bolivian troops assist the Peruvian army, but which seem to be equally unsuccessful on the part of these Northern States. By the latest news the Chilian army is advancing from Pisagua to Noria. The capture, in a fierce battle fought on Oct. 8 in the Bay of Mejillones, of the most formidable ship of the Peruvian fleet, the ironclad monitor and ram Huascar, decided the maritime superiority of the Chilian forces. This ship was commanded by Vice-Admiral Don Miguel Grau, a native of Peru, and a very brave and skilful officer, highly esteemed by the officers of our own Royal Navy who had made his acquaintance when they served on the Pacific station. Admiral Grau behaved with extraordinary courage and fortitude in his personal conduct, when already severely wounded, during the protracted fighting against the two Chilian ironclads, the Almirante Cochrane and the Blanco Encolada. He was killed by a cannon-ball, which struck and completely smashed the turret on the deck of the Huascar, where the captain or commander took his post to observe and direct the combat. We have been favoured with two sketches, by Dr. E. H. Neill, to illustrate the damaged condition of the Huascar, and of her gun-turret, after the action, some accounts of which have been published. She was taken into the port of Antofagasta, almost in danger of sinking. The Huascar was a vessel of 1250 tons, with iron plating 4½ in. thick amidships, but diminishing to 2½ in. thickness at the bow and stern; she was armed with two Armstrong rifled guns, carrying 300-lb. shot, in her turret, and with two 40-pounders on deck. Her officers and crew mustered 210 men, of whom eighty-three survived the conflict, and were taken prisoners, twenty-seven were found dead on board the ship, and it is supposed that sixty were blown to pieces or hurled overboard by successive explosions. A more desperate sea-fight has not been known for a long time. The two Chilian frigates, which were of larger size, with nine-inch armour-plating, and carried together six 300-pounder guns, in casemates, did not sustain much injury. They fired into the Huascar, sometimes, at thirty or forty yards distance, though beginning at a longer range, the position of the ships being often shifted. The Huascar received twenty-eight large balls, some of which pierced the strongest part of her sides. Five balls passed through the 4½-inch iron plating, close to the water-line, on the starboard side, which is shown in our Illustration; four went through near the poop, and one through the part occupied by the engines, but did not injure these. The gun-turret, which was protected by 5½-inch iron, was hit several times; and two balls passed through it, "cutting up the iron like cheese." One ball, going through diagonally, traversed seven inches of iron, bending the plate, loosening the rivets, lifting the roof-plate above, and finally, striking the pivot of one of the guns, burst into pieces, which killed nearly all the men in the turret. As for the hexagonal turret occupied by the commander, a little aft of the gun-turret, it was literally knocked to pieces, and the inside was set on fire, though its walls were composed of eight-inch teak with 3½-inch iron plates outside, and another plate of half-inch iron inside; the plates were torn into pieces like cardboard, and the teak was splintered into innumerable fragments, large and small. The bodies of the officers and men killed here were frightfully mutilated; only the foot and leg of Admiral Grau remained.



It may be recollected that the Huascar once had a fight with H.M.S. Shah, having been seized by a rebel faction in one of the Peruvian revolutions, and having done some injury to British property on the coast.

The twelfth anniversary of the opening of the French Hospital was commemorated last Saturday evening, when the Committee entertained Mr. Eugène Rimmel, the honorary secretary, to whom they presented a chronometer as a testimonial, and an address recording their appreciation of his services. The annual festival will be held on Jan. 31, under the patronage of the French Ambassador.

THE LATE MR. ROEBUCK, M.P.

The death of this veteran Parliamentary politician, who formerly held a conspicuous and influential position between the Whig governing party and that of more unsparing Radical or Democratic Reformers, was announced in our last week's publication. He was seventy-eight years of age. His father was in the Indian Civil Service at Madras; his grandfather was a physician and man of science at Sheffield. John Arthur Roebuck himself was born at Madras, but was brought up in Canada until he came to England, at the age of twenty-two, and prepared for the Bar, to which profession he was called in 1831. He was elected M.P. for Bath in the first House of Commons after the Reform Act of 1832, and attached himself to Lord Brougham, and subsequently to Mr. Joseph Hume, always displaying his distrust of the Whig Ministry. He nevertheless showed equal dislike of the Ultra-Democratic or Chartist section of the Reform party, and claimed a right to think and speak for himself. He appeared as professional advocate for the Canadian House of Assembly to oppose the restrictive measures adopted by Government after the French Canadian rebellion of 1838. The acrimonious and sarcastic censures uttered by Mr. Roebuck brought him not a few personal enemies, and he fought two duels, which were happily bloodless—one with Mr. Black, editor of the Morning Chronicle, the other with Lord Powerscourt. He lost his seat for Bath at the election of 1837, but regained it in 1841. He wrote, in those years, a series of pamphlets on the politics of the day, and a "History" of Earl Grey's Ministry of 1832. In 1847 he again lost his seat, being defeated at Bath by Lord Ashley, the present Earl of Shaftesbury; but he was elected for Sheffield in 1849, and took an active part in the following Session of Parliament, originating one of the most remarkable debates of modern times. The conduct of Lord Palmerston in regard to Greece had been condemned in the House of Lords, on the motion of Lord Stanley, by a majority of thirty-seven. It became a question whether the Ministry would not resign, and Mr. Roebuck gave notice of a resolution approving of the whole foreign policy of the Government, which was carried. Mr. Roebuck took a very decided position in regard to the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill in the Session of 1851. He characterised it as "one of the meanest and pettiest and most futile measures that ever disgraced even bigotry itself." Mr. Roebuck in 1854 spoke in defence of the war with Russia, declaring its object to be "to stop the Emperor in his career of spoliation." In the debate on that war Mr. Roebuck had his greatest party triumph. At the time Parliament assembled the campaign had been opened nine months, and the country had been horrified and enraged by news of the state of the army before Sebastopol. It was everywhere admitted that the moment Parliament should meet the whole subject must be brought under its consideration. This was done in the House of Commons by Mr. Roebuck, who moved for a Committee of Inquiry into the condition of the army before Sebastopol, and into the conduct of those departments of the Government whose duty it had been to minister to the wants of that army. The speech of Mr. Roebuck was exceedingly brief, owing to the physical weakness under which he was labouring. The question being put, the number of ayes was 305, and the noes 140. By this blow the coalition Cabinet of Lord Aberdeen fell. Mr. Roebuck had no place in the new Cabinet, but became Chairman of the Committee appointed as the result of the division. In 1857 Lord Palmerston, having suffered a defeat by a coalition of the Tories and of the Radicals on what was called the Chinese Lorcha question, dissolved Parliament. During the next few years Mr. Roebuck showed a growing divergence from his chief Liberal supporters. In 1862 Mr. Roebuck gave great offence to the working classes by repeating at Salisbury a description he had previously given of the working men of our northern towns. They earned great wages, but they spent them all; they beat their wives and caressed their bulldogs. He took up with great impetuosity the cause of the Southern States of America, then at war with the North. At the election of 1865, however, he was returned at the head of the poll. The action taken by Mr. Roebuck as a member of the Commission on Trade Unions, and the course taken by him in respect to the Irish Church Question, further alienated many of his friends in Sheffield, and at the General Election in 1868 he lost his seat. From 1868 to 1874 Mr. Roebuck was not in the House, but at the last general election he was returned at the head of the poll. The state of his health after that time did not admit of his taking a very active part in politics, and only on very rare occasions was he present in the House. He attended during some of the debates on the Eastern Question, and supported the policy of the Government. Mr. Roebuck paid his last visit to Sheffield in July, when he opened the new block of asylum buildings erected by the Sheffield Licensed Victuallers' Association.

POLITICAL.

Mr. Gladstone's electioneering visit to Midlothian must rank as one of the most remarkable political demonstrations of the Victorian era. We can, indeed, recall no such prolonged and enthusiastic greeting having been extended to any contemporary or predecessor of the right hon. gentleman. The people rose at him. Edinburgh's exuberant welcome was equalled in heartiness by Glasgow's reception of the ex-Premier on the evening of Thursday week, when Conservative and Liberal students of the University combined to form a gigantic torch-light procession in honour of Mr. Gladstone all the way from the railway station to the residence of Sir James Watson, the Glasgow host of the right hon. member. Mr. Gladstone's address on the morrow, as Lord Rector of Glasgow University, was conceived in the loftiest spirit, and formed an acceptable break in the series of political orations delivered by him with inexhaustible eloquence and energy. But the break was of the shortest duration. In the evening Mr. Gladstone addressed a large public meeting in St. Andrew's Hall, the Earl of Breadalbane presiding, and Dr. Cameron, M.P., Mr. George Anderson, M.P., the Earl and Countess of Rosebery, Lord Colin Campbell, M.P., and Mr. Adam, M.P., being among the company on the platform. Here, the failure of the Prime Minister to dissolve Parliament, the underhand acquisition of Cyprus, the large increase of India's burdens immediately after her Majesty had been named Empress of India, the unjustifiable war against Afghanistan, and the slaying of ten thousand Zulus without cause, were made the grounds of a renewed attack upon the Government, Mr. Gladstone being cheered to the echo when he said, in conclusion:—

> I cherish the hope that
> "When the hurly-burly's done,
> When the battle's lost and won."
> I may be able to bear home with me at least this consolation—that I have spared no effort to mark the point at which the roads divide:—The one path which plunges into suffering, discredit, and dishonour; the other, though slowly perhaps, but surely, leads a free and high-minded people towards the blessed end of prosperity and justice, of liberty and peace.

The Town Council's address was thereafter presented in the City Hall, and duly acknowledged by the right hon. gentleman. If anyone rashly supposed that Mr. Gladstone's vocal store of vituperation had been exhausted, he must have been speedily undeceived on reading the vigorous philippic delivered against the Ministry for "boast and brag" at Motherwell, where the Liberal candidate for Midlothian stopped on Saturday, en route to Dalzell Castle on a visit to Major Hamilton; and on further reading the final fusillade of epigrammatic speechlets fired off by Mr. Gladstone at Carlisle, Preston, Wigan, Warrington, and Chester on his triumphal return with Mrs. and Miss Gladstone to Hawarden Castle.

The Marquis of Salisbury, speaking at Watford on Tuesday, confined himself to chewing the cud of agricultural topics. It is the Conservative demonstration on the 20th inst. at Leeds which may be looked forward to with interest as being likely to yield the first Ministerial replies to the Midlothian attacks; and, in the New Year, the Liberals of Birmingham are preparing a counter-blast, in which Sir William Harcourt, as well as Mr. Bright and his colleagues, will probably take part. In Westmorland, Mr. Forster has been striving to show himself more familiar with the hills and dales of the county than the men of Westmorland themselves in urging them to choose Sir Henry Tufton at the general election; and Sir Wilfrid Lawson has humorously supported the same candidature. The death of Mr. Roebuck has elicited from numerous sources warm praise of the manly independence of his career, and of the political services rendered by him. With regard to the succession to his seat for Sheffield, Mr. Waddy, forsaking Barnstaple, has lost no time in proclaiming his merits from the house-tops, and the Conservatives will indubitably suffer in not prevailing upon Mr. Mark Firth to enter into the contest, for the princely munificence of Sheffield's most liberal and open-handed citizen would assuredly have outweighed the claims which Mr. Stuart Wortley can produce for the support of the constituency. To return to London, on Tuesday Sir Arthur Hobhouse and Mr. John Morley made a practical beginning of their candidature for Westminster, in the Liberal interest, by explaining their views to a considerable audience which assembled in St. James's Hall under the chairmanship of Lord F. Cavendish, M.P.

The late Miss Fanny Hersee has bequeathed a legacy of £250 to the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the principles of the Established Church.

On the 3rd inst. the Bishop of Ripon consecrated a new church in lieu of Christ Church, Darley-street, Bradford, which had been pulled down in the course of the town improvements. It has cost about £11,250, and has been built from the plans of Messrs. Mawson.

A letter has been addressed by the Bishop of London to the clergy of his diocese in which he trusts that Sunday, May 2, 1880, may be set apart for collections in aid of the general objects of the fund with which his Lordship's name is associated.

The Rev. Henry Stebbings, D.D., F.R.S., Rector of St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, E.C., has been presented with a silver salver by a number of his friends, in recognition of his long and devoted services as Chaplain to University College Hospital from the foundation, in 1834, until his retirement, in 1879.

A new font, designed by Mr. Joseph Clarke, has been placed in St. John's Church, Moulsham, bearing the following inscription:—"To the glory of God, and in memory of Carew Anthony St. John Mildmay, M.A., Archdeacon of Essex and Rector of Chelmsford, a friend and benefactor of this parish, 1800-78."

The New Testament Company of Revisers assembled on Tuesday in the Jerusalem Chamber for their ninety-fourth session. The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol presided. The company proceeded to consider the final suggestions of the American Committee, their second revision of the Epistle to the Romans.

At the monthly meeting of the committee of the National Society, the Archbishop of Canterbury having called attention to the objections which had been taken to the society's old reading-book for Standard V., the secretary stated that the sale of the book had been closed on Sept. 20 last; that the old series was being superseded by an entirely new series, which had been agreed upon as early as May, 1878; and that there is every probability that in a few months many copies of the old book for Standard V., now to be found in schools, will have ceased to be available for use.

A reredos, designed by Mr. Newman, of Tooley-street, has been erected at the Church of Holy Trinity, Penge. It contains a representation of the Last Supper, beautifully carved in Caen stone, and surmounted by a cross. It is a gift of Mr. Spencer Phillips, of Trematon Lodge, Anerley, in memory of his wife. A stained window, by Messrs. Clayton and Bell, representing the Saviour before Pilate, and the Crucifixion, has also been given by Mr. C. Green, of Gloster Lodge, in memory of his wife, the sister of Archdeacon Hone. A new organ has likewise been erected by Messrs. Jones and Son, of Fulham-road.

Colonel R. Preston has resigned the military secretaryship to the Commander-in-Chief in India.

At the first meeting of the newly-formed School Board for Birmingham the resolution for the admission of the Bible was carried after a long debate.

The annual dinner of the friends of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools for Orphans and Necessitous Children will take place next Tuesday at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon-street, the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, M.P., in the chair.

A fine dry dock just completed by the Southampton Dock Company, was opened yesterday week, the first vessel to enter being the Royal Mail steamer Nile. The dock, which is one of the largest in England, is 450 ft. long, 56 ft. wide, and will take 25 ft. of water over to the blocks.

The magisterial examination into the charge of using seditious language at a recent meeting in Balla, and of endeavouring to seduce the police from their allegiance, which the Irish Executive has brought against Thomas Brennan was concluded last Monday, when the defendant was committed for trial, bail being accepted.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"Original Compositions for the Pianoforte," by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy (Novello, Ewer, and Co.). This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners-street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the classes just specified, including the eight books of "Lieder ohne Worte." Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.: hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co. are continuing their valuable series of Music Primers, a recent addition being "The Sol-Fa System of Teaching Singing as Used in Lancashire and Yorkshire," by James Greenwood. This forms an interesting pendant to the previous number of the series—the treatise on The "Tonic Sol-Fa" by Mr. Curwen, who has done so much for the extension of this system. Mr. Greenwood's little book comprises a large amount of information as to time, changes and signature of key, together with many exercises for sol-faing, in the ordinary notation. The same publishers have issued a cheap and handy edition of Franz Abt's cantata "The Silver Cloud." The composer has long been known as a prolific and successful producer of vocal music, and the present work will not derogate from his reputation. It is written for female voices, solo and choral; and comprises recitatives, an air, a duet, and choruses, divided among the three characters—the Fairy Queen (soprano), Zephyr (mezzo-soprano), and Ariel (contralto), and Fairies, Fays, &c. The vocal effects are well contrasted by a picturesque pianoforte accompaniment. The text is written by Mr. Edward Oxenford, whose name is well known as a provider of words for vocal music. "The Silver Cloud" is well adapted for drawing-room use.

Messrs. R. Cocks and Co.'s recent issues of vocal music comprise the following pieces:—"The Trysting Tree," a pleasing and melodious song, by A. Scott Gatty; "Opposite" (two editions in C and E flat), and "There's a Rose looking in at the window," by J. V. Roberts, each also of a pleasing and flowing character. In Mr. Roeckel's song just referred to, the objectionable consecutive fifths in the third bar of the symphony might easily have been avoided.

Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co. have lately issued several new songs, from among which may be specified—"Naseby Fight, a Song of the Ironsides," a good specimen of the declamatory school, by George Fox; "The Little Gold Locket," the characteristic words and music of which are both from the well-known pen of Mr. Arthur Matthison; "Rest," a pleasing song by C. H. R. Marriott; and "The Flying Dutchman, Legend," a setting by L. Bordese, in the dramatic style, of some effective lines by Mr. A Matthison.

Messrs. Metzler and Co. have recently issued a new edition of "Hemy's Royal Modern Tutor for the Pianoforte," of which, we believe, something like a quarter of a million copies had previously been sold. We have already spoken of the comprehensive nature of this well-compiled work, which, moderate in extent and in price, includes a complete course of instruction in the elements of musical science and the mechanism of pianoforte-playing in all the varied uses of the keyboard; added to which there is a collection of popular and operatic national airs, preludes, &c.

"Four Mazurkas for the Pianoforte by Stephen Heller" are published by Messrs. Forsyth Brothers, and serve to show that the composer's store of charming and graceful thoughts is not yet exhausted; notwithstanding the large number of his productions, this being classed as his op. 148. Although Heller's music frequently gives signs of his partiality for that of Chopin and Schumann, there is always, as in these mazurkas, a distinct individuality which stamps them as Heller's, and raises them far above most of the pianoforte music of the day. The same publishers have also brought out a new edition of Mr. Charles Hallé's "Impromptu" in B minor for the pianoforte, revised by the composer. The few productions of Mr. Hallé—including that now referred to—are sufficient to prove that, had he devoted more of his attention to composition, he might have been as eminent in this respect as he has long been as an interpreter of the works of others.

From Messrs. Forsyth we also have "A Vocal Tutor, by Henry Hiles"—a work well calculated to promote the development of the voice and the command of executive difficulties. Within the space of little more than forty pages, Mr. Hiles has comprised a large amount of useful information as to the production of vocal tone and the method of practising scales and other passages, the diligent use of all which can scarcely fail to ensure the progress of the student.

THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

The eighty-second cattle show of the Smithfield Club was opened on Monday in the Agricultural Hall; and the Prince and Princess of Wales were among the distinguished visitors present on the first day. The Prince had five entries of Devons. The Queen had but one entry. Rivalry between these illustrious cultivators was fully kept up as to the shorthorn classes, in which his Royal Highness gained a second prize, but did not extend to the Herefords, an excellent collection of fifty-three animals, in which a steer, bred at the late Prince Consort's show farm, and sent by her Majesty, was so fortunate as to be "highly commended." The winner of the Champion Plate at Bingley Hall secured the silver cup, value £50, for the best steer in any class, with one fatal exception, and there its career of triumph ended, for in this instance the court of final appeal conferred the Champion Plate, worth a hundred guineas, given by the Agricultural Hall Company for the best beast in the show, upon the shorthorned heifer Priory Princess, bred by Mr. James John Ratcliffe, of the Priory, Beech Hill, near Reading. The victor, like the Birmingham champion, is a roan of magnificent dimensions. Priory Princess likewise obtained the first prize in her class (32).

The Champion Plate, value £50, to the exhibitor of the best pen of three sheep or lambs in the show, went to Mr. H. Humphrey, of Ashington, Pulborough, Sussex, for a fat wether sheep of the Southdown breed, twenty months old, which also took the first prize in the class and £5 breed cup. The other chief prize-winners were as follows:—Silver cup, value £40, for the best Devon beast, Mr. John Walter, M.P. Silver cup, value £40, for the best Hereford beast, Mrs. Sarah Edwards, of Conterceil, Leominster. Silver cup, value £40, for the best shorthorn beast, Mr. Richard Stratton (Wild Flower). Silver cup, value £40, for the best Sussex beast, Mr. John Kirkpatrick, of Blythe. Silver cup, value £40, for the best Scotch beast, Sir William Gordon Cumming. Silver cup, value £40, for the best cross-bred beast, Lord Lovat. Silver cup, value £50, to the exhibitor of the best steer or ox in any of the classes, except Class 31, Mr. Henry D. Adamson, of Aberdeen. Silver cup, value £50, to the exhibitor of the best heifer or cow in any of the classes, except Class 32, Mr. Stratton, Newport, Monmouthshire (Wild Flower). Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Leicester sheep, Messrs. John Green and Son, of Silsden, near Leeds. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Cotswolds, Mr. Robert Jacobs, of Signet-hill, Oxon. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Lincolns, Mr. Thomas Close, jun., Stamford, Northampton. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Southdowns, Mr. H. Humphrey, of Arlington, Sussex. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Hampshire or Wiltshire Downs, Mr. Alfred Morrison, of Tisbury. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Shropshires, Lord Chesham. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Oxfordshires, Mr. William Cooper, of Dunstable. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of cross-breds, Mr. David Butler, of Corsten, Forfarshire. Silver cup, value £10, for the best pen of Cheviots or other mountain breeds, Mrs. Maria Langdon, of North Molton, Devon. Silver cup, value £20, for the best pen of Kentish Ryeland, Dorset, or any other pure breed not above specified, Mr. John S. S. Godwin, of Hadlow, Kent. Silver cup, value £15, for the best pen of pigs of any white breed, the Earl of Radnor. Silver cup, value £15, for the best pen of pigs of any black breed, Mr. William Wheeler, of Long Compton. Silver cup, value £15, for the best pen of pigs of the Berkshire breed, Lord Chesham. Silver cup, value £15, for the best pen of pigs of any other breed, Mr. Tom Coate, of Newton, Dorset.

Colonel Kingscote, M.P., on Tuesday presided at the annual meeting of the members of the Smithfield Club, at which the Duke of Hamilton was elected President for 1881.

An interesting paper, on Art Vestiges in Afghanistan, the results of some recent explorations in the Jellalabad Valley, was read by Mr. William Simpson on Wednesday evening to the Society of Arts.

A meeting was held on Tuesday at the Westminster Palace Hotel, the Provost of Eton presiding, when it was resolved to erect a memorial in Eton College chapel to those officers, educated at Eton, who had fallen in the late campaigns.

On Monday afternoon the theatre of the London Institution was crowded with members and visitors, for the most part ladies, who had come together to hear the Rev. H. R. Haweis give a lecture on the Origin and Influence of Music.

Russell-square inclosure will be opened to the public every Saturday and Sunday (weather permitting) from two till five o'clock up to April 1, and during the summer months will remain open till eight o'clock every Monday and Wednesday, in addition to the above-mentioned days.

Last week 2470 births and 1888 deaths were registered in London. Allowing for increase of population, the births exceeded by 12, and the deaths by 86, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The annual death-rate from all causes rose to 27·2, a higher rate than has prevailed in any week since April 1 last.

City-road Wesleyan Methodist Chapel, which was founded by John Wesley in the year 1777, was seriously injured by fire on Sunday morning. The Morning Chapel, in which the fire originated, was entirely destroyed, and the larger adjoining building much damaged. Some memorials of great interest to Methodists suffered from the flames.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed will present to their admirers next Wednesday a Fire-Side Fancy for Little Folk, entitled "A Christmas Stocking," by Gilbert A'Beckett, music by King Hall; and on Boxing Day Mr. Corney Grain will give for the first time his new musical sketch, composed for the holidays, entitled "Master Tommy 's at Home."

A sale of fancy and useful articles, in aid of the French Mission, and to defray the debt of the Salle Evangélique, will take place on Dec. 22 and two following days at the Young Men's Christian Association, 48, Great Marlborough-street. A concert of sacred music will be given by Mrs. Sharpe and other ladies. Contributions will be received till Dec. 22 by the lady patronesses:—Mrs. Broun, 9, Abercorne-place, St. John's-wood; Mrs. Weatherley, 51, Gordon-square; Mrs. Sharpe, 12, Devonshire-place, Portland-place; Miss Waring, 49, Clifton-gardens, W; Mrs. Rieu, 28, Woburn-square; and Madame Barbier, 10, Charlotte-street, Portland-place.

The new London School Board held its first meeting yesterday week. Sir Charles Reed was re-elected chairman and the Rev. J. Rodgers vice-chairman. A letter was read from Sir Charles Reed, stating that, in consequence of the state of his health, he had, under medical advice, gone with his family to the South of France, where they intended to remain till after Christmas. The business transacted was of a routine nature, and related chiefly to the constitution of the several standing committees.—A committee, with Mr. S. Morley, M.P., as chairman, and Mr. John Holms, M.P., as vice-chairman, is being formed for the purpose of urging upon the London School Board the advisability of securing the entire services of its chairman by the payment of a salary.

The distribution of prizes to the students of the Royal Academy took place on Wednesday last at Burlington House. The chair was taken by the president, Sir Frederick Leighton, who delivered an eloquent address on the position of art past and present. The following is the list of prize-winners, the biennial gold medals being this year included:—For an historical painting, gold medal and scholarship of £25, tenable for two years, H. H. Le Thangue. For landscape painting, the Turner gold medal, Henry Gibbs; extra silver medal George Francis Miles. For a painting of a figure from life, silver medal, C. Knighton Warren. For a painting of a head from life, silver medal, William Henshall; extra silver medal, Henry D. Chadwick. For a copy of an oil painting, silver medal, Sidney John Hayes. For a drawing of a figure from life, first silver medal, C. Knighton Warren; second silver medal, Sidney Hodges Hayes; £10 premium, W. Manning Griffenhazen. For a model of a statue or group: first silver medal not awarded; second silver medal, David John Wade. For a design in architecture: gold medal and scholarship of £25, Frank. F. Baggallay; extra silver medal, J. Howard Ince; travelling studentship, Robert W. Gibson. For an architectural drawing, first silver medal, Fredk. Millar; second silver medal, not awarded. For perspective and sciography: silver medal not awarded.

"FROZEN OUT."

The ornamental waters of our London Parks, converted into ice-fields by the severe frost of last week, have been crowded with skaters, to the estimated number, in all, of more than a hundred thousand, men, young ladies, and boys, frankly enjoying a healthy winter exercise, and frequently exhibiting a high degree of skill in the art, with little risk of drowning, or even of a chilling immersion. Some few accidents have been reported, but the ice has in general been safer than it is usually found to be in December. There is, however, one class of bipeds, habitually resorting to the artificial lakes and trim basins in those demesnes of public "pleasaunce," whose comfort must have suffered a lamentable interruption. The stately swans and the lively and eager tribe of ducks, some of which, the Muscovy breed especially, are among the prettiest of aquatic birds, have been shut out of their favourite element by this forbidding frost. We do not know whether sufficient compensation is regularly provided for the loss of their ordinary means of picking up a livelihood from the insects and other stray morsels of food in the water. But visitors to the Park will do them a seasonable kindness by scattering a handful of crumbs.

COLONEL W. P. COLLINGWOOD.

Among the officers who have earned fresh honours in the Zulu War is Colonel William Pole Collingwood, of the 21st Regiment (Royal Scots Fusiliers), whose portrait is engraved for this publication. He is the second son of the late Henry J. V. Collingwood, Esq., of Lilburn Tower and Cornhill House, Northumberland; his mother being a daughter of Sir T. Haggerstone, Bart., of Ellingham, in the same county. He entered the Army in 1847, as an Ensign in the 37th Regiment, with which he served in suppressing the Ceylon rebellion next year. In the Crimean War, being then a Captain of the 21st Fusiliers, he served at the siege of Sebastopol, and in the Kinburn expedition. He commanded a battalion of the Land Transport Corps in the Crimea, for a twelvemonth; and when the Spartan was wrecked on the coast of Africa, in July, 1856, he was in command of the troops on board. For his conduct upon that occasion, Captain Collingwood, with the officers and men under him, received the high approbation, strongly expressed in general orders, of H.R.H. the Commander-in-Chief, as well as of Lord Panmure, the Secretary of State for War, and of Colonel M'Murdo, Director-General of the Land Transport Corps. "The courage and discipline which animated all ranks on that fearful night" were specially commended. Captain Collingwood was then rewarded with the brevet rank of Major; he attained substantial promotion to that grade in 1867, was made Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel next year, and in May, 1874, became full Lieutenant-Colonel, and Colonel in October, 1877. He went out to South Africa, in command of the 21st Fusiliers, on board the City of Paris, when the reinforcements were sent to Lord Chelmsford after the disaster of Isandhlwana. That ship was in imminent danger of being lost at the entrance to Simon's Bay on March 21, when Colonel Collingwood's spirit and ability in command, as on the former occasion in 1856, helped to save the lives of troops and crew. In the campaign that ensued in Zululand, he was placed in command of the second brigade of Major-General Newdigate's division; and, when that brigade was broken up, Colonel Collingwood, with his staff, was appointed Commandant of Fort Marshall and Fort Newdigate, keeping open the communications between the front and rear and the Rorke's Drift post, and guarding the district around, to the end of the war. His five years' command having expired, Colonel Collingwood has now been placed on half pay.

The portrait is from a photograph by G. West and Son, of Gosport.

THE LATE M. MICHEL CHEVALIER.

This eminent French political thinker, and teacher of economic science applied to the actual business of nations at the present day, has recently died, at the age of seventy-four; and his former intimate association with Mr. Cobden in the advocacy of free trade, and in promoting the Commercial Treaty which Mr. Gladstone succeeded in passing in 1860, merit a place in the remembrance of Englishmen. Michel Chevalier was the son of a shopkeeper at Limoges, who found means to send him to the Polytechnic School, which he quitted for the Ecole des Mines, where he earned an appointment as civil engineer in the Department of the Nord. He was in early life one of the most prominent members of the St. Simonian sect, under the government of the Père Enfantin, and was elected to the dignity of Cardinal in the brotherhood. The principles of that society, founded by the Comte de St. Simon, a benevolent and enthusiastic philanthropist of the Revolutionary era, were a mixture of Socialism with something like Comtism, hostile to existing institutions of State and Church, rejecting the Christian creed, discrediting marriage and the rights of property, but undertaking to construct a New Moral World by a system of organised community of wealth and willing co-operative labour. This mystical fraternity, which had its head-quarters at Ménilmontant, in Paris, was broken up by a State prosecution under Louis Philippe's Government. M. Michel Chevalier, as one of its leaders, was sentenced to a year's imprisonment for seditious and subversive writings. But, at the end of six months, he was released by M. Thiers, then Prime Minister, to assist in studying the commercial and industrial effects of the construction of railways. For this purpose, he was sent by the French Government to England and to the United States of America; and the book he published on his return laid the foundations of the system that was adopted by the Ministry of the day. That plan was based on initial assistance by the Government to independent working companies, with a reversion of the whole property to the State after a certain term of years, and the result will be that the French nation will finally own the whole of the railways within its territory. M. Chevalier, in 1838, published his views on "the material interests of France." In 1840 he was appointed Professor of Political Economy in the College of France, and afterwards entered the Chamber of Deputies, where he sat until 1846. At this time he acknowledged the general wisdom of Free Trade, but doubted its applicability to France. Released from the trammels of party or place, he joined M. Bastiat in an effort to organise public opinion in support of what was in effect a French "League," and the then recent success of "Cobden and Bright" gave the allies high anticipations of victory. The Revolution of 1848 deprived him of his official appointments; but they were restored by the Emperor Napoleon III., who was partial to the views of Michel Chevalier, and who was readily persuaded by him, in 1860, to adopt Free Trade as the means of promoting French material prosperity and gaining the political support of the working classes. M. Michel Chevalier thus became a Councillor of State and Senator of the Empire. He was well known, in our own country, to many of the Liberal party and of what used to be called "the Manchester School." When the Social Science Congress held its meeting at Dublin, this esteemed French colleague was appointed President for the year. He was author of many essays and treatises, one of which, on the probable fall in the value of gold and its effects, was translated into English by Mr. Cobden. A learned historical work on Mexico, by Michel Chevalier, has also appeared in our language.

The Portrait is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company.

THE RUSSIAN CORVETTES AT SPITHEAD.

The two Russian cruiser corvettes, the Rasdoynik, Captain Jitkoff (flying the broad pennant of Commodore P. Novossilski), and the Nayesdnik, Captain Kologeras, with Vice-Admiral Popoff, of the Imperial Russian Navy, have been the objects of much curiosity and attention, both at Portsmouth and at Ryde. These vessels are of a new class, designed and constructed under the superintendence of Admiral Popoff. They are at present bound for Brest and Madeira in the first instance, and will then proceed to Rio, whence they will sail for China, the one by the Cape of Good Hope and the other by way of Cape Horn. The Illustration we give is from a sketch taken at the end of Ryde Pier. The Rasdoynik is 240 ft. in length, with a beam of 30 ft. 2 in., and her draught is 13 ft. 6 in. forward and 15 ft. aft. Her displacement is 1335 tons. She is built entirely of iron, and is cased with wood to the extent of six inches, like our own vessels of the Volage and Boadicea classes, to enable her to be copper or zinc bottomed. The Nayesdnik, on the other hand, is a composite ship, having the frames only of iron, the hull itself being constructed of planking. In all other respects, however, they may be regarded as sister-ships. The engines are by Bird, of St. Petersburg, and are of 250 nominal and 1500 indicated horse power. Each ship carries three steel 6-in. pivot breechloading guns of the Krupp pattern, but manufactured at the Obookoff works in Russia, and four steel breech-loading broadside guns of ten centimètres calibre. These latter, which fire a shot of 4 lb., are intended as torpedo guns and for saluting purposes. The heavy guns, which fire projectiles of 160 lb., are arranged fore and aft along the middle line on the upper deck, and can be trained to fire across either beam or to give certain degrees of forward fire. A couple of Palmenkranz guns, which are substantially the same as the Nordenfelt machine guns, are fitted on the bridge, and below these, on a platform outside the ship, are fittings for a gun of a novel character. This is a steel breechloading piece about three feet in length and an inch and a half in calibre, mounted upon a swivel, and a man placed at the rear can sweep the horizon with it as readily as with a rifle. It can discharge from eight to ten steel shells per minute, and is fatal at 2400 ft. The cartridge contains a percussion cap like small-arm ammunition. Each corvette also carries four Harvey torpedoes, spar torpedoes, ground mines, and Whitehead torpedoes.

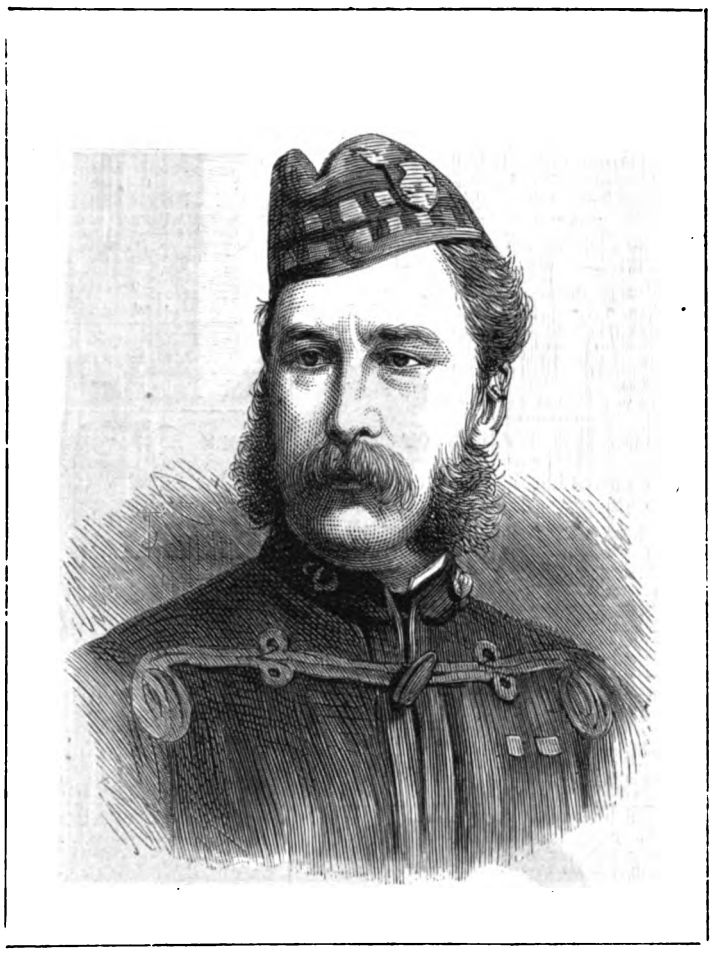
For two or three weeks we have had occasion to praise Christmas and New-Year's Cards, forwarded to us by various firms. Quite equal, if not superior, to the best of these for variety and chaste elegance of design are the cards issued by Messrs. Marcus Ward and Co. The charming nature of these seasonable and inexpensive gifts is rendered more apparent by their being arranged in an elegant scrap-book. From this firm we have also received a Sacred Calendar, with a text of Scripture for each day; a Shakspearean Calendar; and a Motto Calendar, for men of business.

Messrs. Letts, Son, and Co., of King William-street, have sent some specimens of their excellent Diaries for 1880, the series now embracing 156 varieties. The ones sent are No. 51 Diary, a folio volume, with a page for every day in the year, interleaved with blotting-paper, and three handier-sized diaries; The Scribbling Journal, Tablet Diary and Blotting-Pad; two Registered File Boxes, Metallic Diary for the Pocket; and their Housekeeper, enlarged, and Family Washing-Book. This is the seventieth year of publication by this firm.

Mr. Harding, of Piccadilly, publishes sets of Fox-Hunting, Horse-Racing, and Hunting-Field Christmas and New-Year's Cards. These spirited chalk sketches depict, we are assured, actual incidents which have occurred in the hunting-field and on the turf.



We have also received Suttaby's Christian Remembrancer Pocket-Book for 1880; and the Gardener's Year-Book and Almanack.

NEW BOOKS AND PUBLICATIONS.

BOOKS FOR PRESENTS AND SCHOOL PRIZES.

Second Edition, crown 8vo, with Seventy-seven Illustrations, cloth, 7s. 6d.,

A SHORT HISTORY OF NATURAL SCIENCE, and of the Progress of Discovery from the Time of the Greeks to the Present Day. For the Use of Schools and Young Persons. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of "Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students," &c.

"In the present edition I have endeavoured to supply many important omissions, especially as regards 'Sound,' which had been before entirely neglected, and to which a new chapter (XXX.) is now devoted. I have also added some new matter, in the thirty-eighth chapter, upon the Botany of the Nineteenth Century. Lastly, besides many minor additions, I have given, in a new concluding chapter, a brief sketch of some of the latest advances in science."—Extract from Preface.

Sixth thousand, crown 8vo, with 74 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.,

THE FAIRYLAND OF SCIENCE. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of "A Short History of Natural Science," "Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students," &c.

"Altogether, with its attractive illustrations and brightly written pages, is one of the pleasantest volumes for intelligent boys and girls that has been produced this season. But, indeed, a book so instructive and entertaining deserves a welcome at all seasons, and is likely to secure a permanent reputation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, cloth, 6s.,

ADVENTURES IN THE AIR: being memorable experiences of Great Aeronauts. From the French of De Fonvielle. Edited and Translated by J. S. KELTIE.

"Will be doubtless read with delight by many a boy, while readers of more advanced years will find it full of instruction and recreation, the style being as easy and pleasant, as the subject matter is solidly entertaining."—London Quarterly Review.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.,

THE HEROES OF YOUNG AMERICA. By ASCOTT R. HOPE, Author of "A Book about Boys," "A Book about Dominies," &c. With Map and Illustrations.

Every page of the book relates some marvellous incident, and boy-readers will accept the volume as a rare and valuable addition to their store of knowledge. It is capitally illustrated by a large number of wood engravings as exciting as the text."—Art Journal.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.,

STUDIES IN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By JOHN DENNIS, Editor of "English Sonnets: A Selection from 1547," &c.

Contents: Pope—Defoe—Prior—Steele—The Wartons—John Wesley—Southey—English Lyrical Poetry—English Rural Poetry—The English Sonnet.

"One of the best books upon poetry which we have had for a very long time."—Westminster Review.

"A charming, useful, and well-written book, which all those who wish to learn anything of the literature of their own country will do well to read."—Publishers' Circular.

Post 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.,

DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE. Adapted for Home Education and for Schoolmistresses and Pupil-Teachers. By ROBERT JAMES MANN, M.D., late Superintendent of Education at Natal.

"In a series of short and easy lessons he discusses, in a clear and taking manner, almost every question on which the least experienced head of a family would require information—air and ventilation; food, cookery, and drink; heat, clothing, and washing; health, home, and money; and he never fails in being equally lucid, accurate, and practical. There have been many similar works, but after testing this, the latest of them, on a number of salient points, we have no hesitation in recommending it as in every respect worthy of confidence."—Examiner.

Post 8vo, cloth, 335 pp., 2s. 6d.,

DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE (Standard 5 of the Whitelands series of Standard Reading Books for Girls). Edited by Rev. J. P. FAUNTHORPE, M.A., Principal of Whitelands Training College. Dedicated, by permission, to his Grace the Duke of Westminster, K.G.

"It is a thoroughly eminent and comprehensive manual, and contains more information than half a dozen primers of health or social science. It would be a useful book to add to village lending libraries, or to give as prizes in Sunday schools, or as presents to young servants. It is, indeed, a pity that this, or some other book of the same sort, is not more commonly in use in so-called ladies' schools and private school-rooms. If mistresses as well as maids knew and acted up to the wise lessons contained in this little book, the price of which is only half-a-crown, there would be a marked increase in the domestic happiness of that large part of the community who cannot afford to pay accomplished cooks and experienced housekeepers."—Saturday Review.

18mo, cloth, 2s. 6d.,

SIMPLE LESSONS. Chiefly intended for Home Use and Elementary Schools. By Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, G. PHILLIPS BEVAN, F.G.S., Dr. MANN, F.R.G.S., J. C. BUCKMASTER, B.A., Mrs. BENJAMIN CLARKE, J. J. POPE, R. A. PROCTOR, B.A., Rev. F. O. MORRIS, M.A., Rev. G. HENSLOW, F.L.S., Rev. T. E. CRALLAN, M.A. Contents: Our Bodily Life—How and Why we Breathe—Food—Drink—Cookery—Plain Needlework—Clothing—Air and Ventilation—The Sicknesses that Spread—Weather—Astronomy—Birds—Flowers—Money.

THE SIMPLE LESSONS are also published separately, 3d. each, or 16s. per 100 assorted. The set of 14, in card case, 3s.

"It would be difficult to award too high praise to this little volume. It consists of a series of leaflets, now bound up together, teaching the simple facts of domestic economy and elementary science. Each series is contributed by a writer of acknowledged eminence in his own department. These 'Simple Lessons' are chiefly intended for elementary schools. But, if the knowledge of the children is not to put the parents to shame, it is no less desirable that the book should circulate throughout the cottage homes of England. We can imagine no better present for the wife of an artizan."—Academy.

Fcap folio, 12s. 6d.,

AN ATLAS OF ANATOMY; or, Pictures of the Human Body. In 24 Quarto Coloured Plates, comprising 100 separate Figures, with Descriptive Letterpress by Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, Member of the London School Board, Author of the Physiological Sections of "Simple Lessons for Home Use," &c.

"It is hoped that this work, being issued at a comparatively low price, may be found useful both to science teachers and to students of all kinds. To the private student whose access to anatomical preparations and physiological laboratories is limited such a book is indispensable. Again, children, with their keen interest in the facts of Nature, and with their fresh, undistracted minds full of curiosity about what is around them, are almost always found to take a deep interest in the wonderful structure and functions of their own bodies. Thus this volume would generally be found an acceptable gift to an intelligent youth of twelve or fourteen, and would afford him useful instruction for his adult life."—Extract from Preface.

Folio, price 7s. 6d. each,

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL and COMFORTING.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly-nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath. Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per bottle. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants. It is perfectly harmless, and delicious as sherry. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London. Retailed everywhere.

BREIDENBACH'S PHLOMIS (Sweet Scented). Beautifully fragrant and lasting. 2s. 6d. to 40s. Bottle. BREIDENBACH'S MACASSARINE, invaluable for preserving the growth of the Hair. 1s., 2s. 6d., 5s. Bottle. Of all Chemists and the Makers, 157a, New Bond-street.

SOZODONT.—The Peerless liquid Dentifrice. Its use imparts the most fragrant breath; it beautifies, cleanses, and preserves the teeth in a surprising manner. It gives a delightfully fresh taste and feeling to the mouth, removing all Tartar and Scurf from the Teeth, completely arresting the progress of decay, and whitening such parts as have already become black by decay or neglect. Impure Breath, caused by Bad Teeth, Tobacco, Spirits, or Catarrh, is neutralised by Sozodont. The price of the Fragrant Sozodont is 3s. 6d., put up in large bottles, fitted with patent sprinklers for applying the liquid to the tooth-brush. Each bottle is inclosed in a handsome toilet box. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers, and by JOHN M. RICHARDS, Great Russell-street, London. Observe the Name SOZODONT on the label, box, and bottle.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO has been proved, by its unparalleled success of fifty years, to be the best Dentifrice for procuring White and Sound Teeth, Healthy Gums, and Fragrant Breath, being perfectly free from all deleterious and acid compounds, which give a temporary whiteness to the teeth, but ultimately ruin the enamel. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Each Box bears a 3d. Government stamp.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR. If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots where the glands are not decayed. Ask any Chemist for "The Mexican Hair Renewer," price 3s. 6d. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

ALEX. ROSS'S SKIN-TIGHTENER or TONIC.—The application of this removes wrinkles and crow's-feet marks, giving a youthful appearance. Harmless 3s. 6d.; secretly packed for 54 stamps.—21, Lamb's Conduit-street, Holborn, London.

CARLSBAD SPRUDEL-PASTILS for INDIGESTION, OXYREGMY, HEARTBURN, STOMACH COMPLAINTS, FLATULENCY, &c.

CHRISTMAS GIFT-BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

Messrs. George Routledge and Sons have this year prepared for the gratification of deserving and intelligent boys and girls some delightful illustrated books, suitable to different ages and various tastes. The first we shall notice is Spindle Stories; or, New Yarns Spun from Old Wool, by Ascott R. Hope. The materials of fiction called "old wool" are those, so familiar to the childhood of many past generations, which bear the names of Humpty Dumpty, the Four and Twenty Blackbirds, Jack and Jill, the Lion and the Unicorn Fighting for the Crown, Baby Bunting, Little Boy Blue, and the Mouse that Ran up the Clock. But Mr. Hope has extended those merry little bits of nursery rhyme into short prose tales which are not devoid of spirit. The illustrations are drawn by Mr. C. D. Murray, and engraved on wood by Mr. J. D. Cooper; there is a coloured frontispiece to each of the stories.

Little Robin's Picture-Book, with four hundred woodcuts, is almost nothing but a picture-book, as there are scarcely a couple of lines of reading on each page. The Oscar Pletsch Picture-Book is made up of some of that graceful artist's groups of children and other pleasing figures, with accompanying verses or comments in easy prose. Tiny's Natural History, in Words of Four Letters, by A. L. Bond, with boldly designed engravings, is a very good book for small readers; and so is Little Rosebud's Picture-Book, which has great variety of subjects, full of interesting suggestions. There is also Little Poppy's Picture-Book, on the same plan; and The Cat and The Dog Picture-Book, which may be read aloud to very little children, while showing them all the pictures. We can recommend all these for the entertainment of that portion of the British public which has lately emerged from babyhood. Girls somewhat older, from seven or eight to twelve years of age, should have The Children of the Village, by Miss Mitford, with the pleasant original Illustrations drawn by several competent artists. The yearly volumes of Routledge's Every Boy's Annual, Every Girl's Annual, and Little Wide-Awake, respectively edited by Mr. Edmund Routledge, Miss Alicia Leith, and Mrs. Sale Barker, are magazines of ample entertainment, mixed with useful instruction, for the juvenile mind. From the same publishers we have also received an attractive folio, the Imperial Natural History Picture-Book, and one styled the Nursery Picture-Book, which are suited to the capacities of infants below six or seven years of age. The Day Dawn Library is a pretty case of decorated cardboard, which contains ten slim books, each of sixteen pages, and each in its own strong cover displaying a brightly coloured picture outside—"Red Rover," "Kind Little Heart," "The Household Fairy," and other promising subjects being the subjects of which they treat. If any young lady of tender age would like a compact little volume, size three inches by five, with a small picture and a small piece of reading, generally in verse, on every little page, she has only to ask for Birdie's Book, and she will like it when she has got it.

Messrs. Strahan and Co. publish a Grand Annual for the Young, which is, take it for all in all, the richest store of mingled literary and graphic amusement provided at this season for our junior friends. It is a thick square volume of more than seven hundred pages, full of brisk short stories, some romantic and fanciful, humorous or grotesque, some very like the realities of life, domestic or adventurous, pathetic, moral, or laughable, with stirring passages of true history, such as the lives of the Ancient Mariners, interesting views of natural science, descriptive astronomy, geography, and zoology, the fables of Krilof and other followers of old Æsop in that line, and many pleasing compositions in verse, including songs with music. Mrs. R. O'Reilly's "Grig, or the Handy and Willing Boy," in nine chapters; Mr. Julian Hawthorne's "Yellow-Cap," which runs through twelve; the "Serpent-Charmer," by Louis Rousselet; and Mr. Charles Camden's tale of the preparatory school for little boys known as "Miss Lamblon's," with some contributions by George Macdonald, Matthew Browne, Richard Rowe, and L. G. Séguin, are among the contents of this "Grand Annual;" and it is quite worthy of the reputation of Good Words for the Young. Its illustrations, to the number of five hundred at least, are ingenious and characteristic. It will last the boy or girl who gets it a good long time, and will be treasured for several years to come. We may here also notice, though not exclusively or especially intended for youthful readers, the annual volume of Messrs Strahan's Day of Rest, which forms what is meant to be "a family year-book of Sunday reading." It contains some tales of a religious aim and tone, biographical and historical sketches of the same tendency, lessons of practical morality and piety, comments on Scripture, essays and sermons, to which the Very Rev. Dr. C. J. Vaughan, Dean of Llandaff and Master of the Temple, is a frequent contributor. Mrs. John Hunt is the author of "The Wards of Plotinus," a story of the early Christians in Pagan Rome. There are 300 engravings, amongst which are Mr. F. Barnard's "Illustrations of the Pilgrim's Progress."

Messrs. Griffith and Farran bring forth a seasonable drollery entitled The Royal Umbrella, which is a burlesque extravaganza story, in the manner of Thackeray's "The Rose and the Ring," illustrated with four designs by Linley Sambourne. The author is Major Alfred Harcourt, of the Bengal Staff Corps. For the practical guidance of juvenile mechanics and miniature shipbuilders, there are two very serviceable handbooks of technical workmanship, published by this firm at the venerable corner of St. Paul's-churchyard. These are, The Boy's Own Toy-Maker, by E. Landells; and Model Yachts: How to Build, Rig, and Sail, by James E. Walton, a professor of some authority.

The Little Folks' Holiday Album (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin) is made up of short pieces from the Little Folks' Magazine of the past twelvemonth, which are judiciously varied and mixed, and accompanied by many Engravings. The bound yearly volume of The Weekly Welcome (S. W. Partridge and Co.) contains a large store of interesting and edifying matter, with a great many illustrations. We have also to notice The Family Friend, the Band of Mercy Advocate, from the same publishers; and the Friendly Visitor, the Children's Friend, and the Infants' Magazine, from Messrs. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday, all very prettily bound in blue.

A very old favourite of youth, Peter Parley's Annual, is published as usual by Mr. Ben George, with nine coloured pictures; it contains stories of adventure, and passages of national history, or the lives of active men, to engage the boyish fancy, with a few descriptive chapters.

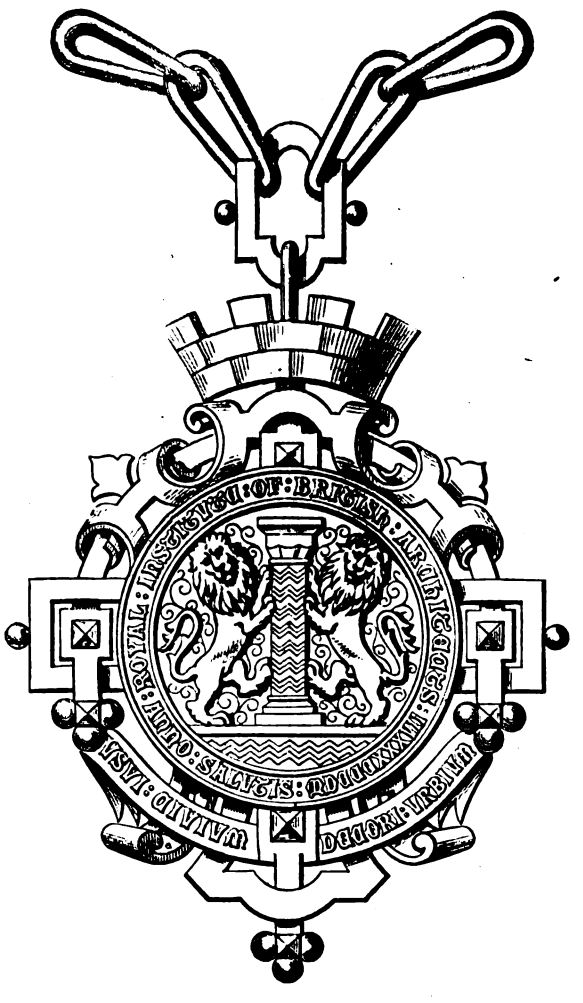
Boys will also like, it is to be hoped, the first volume of Messrs. Cassell's series entitled Heroes of Britain in Peace and War, compiled by Mr. Edwin Hodder. It relates the achievements of philanthropists, missionaries, geographical and scientific explorers, Howard, Clarkson, Moffat, Livingstone, and Cameron, and Sir John Franklin; of brave life-boat men, colliery miners, and savers of life, as well as of soldiers and sailors down to the Crimean War; and it has a number of striking Illustrations of these subjects.

We should decidedly recommend, for young people, the Rev. Dr. Macaulay's collection of historical narratives called All True. It presents not only "wonders of nature and Providence," and "incidents of Christian history and biography," and of missionary enterprise, but a healthy admixture of "records of peril, adventure by sea and land, and remarkable escapes and deliverances." This miscellany, arranged by the judicious Editor of The Sunday at Home, the Leisure Hour, and the Boy's Own Paper, is published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, the proprietors of those excellent periodical magazines.

The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge present a series of short moral tales, by Miss F. Scarlett Potter, Mrs. F. A. Owen, and L. E. Campbell, each neatly done up in a green paper cover, with a coloured picture, making a small limp book handy for little children.

The Religious Tract Society publish another of their pleasant books of illustrated geographical description, by the Rev. Dr. Samuel Green; Pictures from Bible Lands, drawn with pen and pencil. It treats of Damascus and the Lebanon; the Hauran, or lands beyond the Jordan; Northern Syria, Cyprus, and Asia Minor, Nineveh and Babylon, and parts of Greece. The views of places are generally good. The Religious Tract Society has also published, for children, Harrison Weir's "Pictures of Birds and other Family Pets," with twenty-four colour-printed drawings by that artist.

Messrs. Dean and Son present young people with "The Golden Days of Childhood" and "The White Cats of York," which are attractive coloured picture-books.



Messrs. Sampson Low and Co., in their "International Series of Toy-Books," give us three of Asbjörnsen's Norwegian fairy-tales, also with coloured engravings. We notice "The Chatterbox," edited by the Rev. J. Erskine Clarke, and "The Prize for Girls and Boys" (W. Wells Gardner and Co.)

Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co. have produced the "Warwick House" series of Toy-Books, of which there is an indestructible edition at double price, comprising the Babe's Alphabet, A B C Wonders, an A B C of Animals, and one or two books of nursery stories or of nursery rhymes. These are thin quartos in stiff paper covers, and contain many pictures, both plain and coloured. Aunt Fanny's Toy-Books, which are of similar form, consist of several favourite childish tales, with ample illustrations.

Messrs. G. Watherston and Co. present a narrative ballad set to music, that of Squire Fox, telling what he did with the ducks and a certain goose; the pictures are very droll.

The books which consist each of a separate and distinct original story must be reserved for another notice.

ROYAL INSTITUTE OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.

BADGE AND CHAIN FOR THE ROYAL INSTITUTE OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.

A badge and chain for the President has been presented to the Institute by Professor T. L. Donaldson, the first President and founder of this Association. In preparing the design Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, to whom the order was intrusted, have introduced as its special feature the carved column with the lion supporters found over the principal doorway of the Temple at Cumœ, which is supposed to be the most ancient example of architectural heraldry. This is surrounded by a graceful Elizabethan border, and depends from a chain of massive twisted links. On the back of the badge is engraved the following inscription:—"In commemoration of the gracious presence of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, K.G., at the festival of the Institute on the 23rd April, 1879. Charles Barry, F.S.A., president. Presented by Professor Thomas Leverton Donaldson, past president."

A BOG-TROTTER'S CABIN IN IRELAND.

The agricultural disadvantages of Connaught are not to be denied, and we hear without surprise of the distressed condition of small farmers in that part of the island. West of the Shannon, in the counties of Roscommon, Mayo, and Sligo, a climate excessively moist, and a thin loamy soil upon a rocky substratum, render the husbandman's toil often deplorably fruitless. There are, nevertheless, in Roscommon especially, many tracts of the richest pasture. That county, about sixty miles in length by forty miles in breadth, contains above 600,000 acres, of which nearly 150,000 are uncultivated, some being actually under water. The Shannon, which forms its eastern boundary, spreads into wide loughs, above the town of Athlone, and farther north by Carrick and Boyle, flooding much land which could perhaps be reclaimed. In the western district, the superabundance of water on the surface of the land being confined by the low ridges of rocky hills, extensive bogs have been formed, one of which is that around Ballintober, on the high road and railway from the town of Roscommon to Castlereagh and Mayo. Here are still to be found some of the genuine "bog-trotters," a class of peasants living in squalid poverty by the scanty produce of small plots of ground and the keeping of pigs or cows, with little chance of earning wages by field labour, where no farmer has capital to give them employment. Our Artist's sketch of one of their wretched cabins, with the poor man and his children waiting for their dinner of potatoes to be boiled over a turf fire, outside the dwelling, by the comfortless care of the wife and mother, is a sorry picture of Irish rural life. There are probably a hundred thousand people in Ireland whose condition is not much better. It is not to be amended by shooting or defaming the landlords of other more productive estates.

SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

So little has the Winter Exhibition of this society, which claims to consist only of "sketches and studies," now become distinguishable from the summer show of finished drawings, that, although there are few works of very ambitious and elaborate character in the exhibition now open, and although it does contain a proportion of evidently bonâ fide sketches and studies, yet it seems to us that this is, on the whole, the best display that has been seen in Pall-mall East for years. Whether the society had become conscious of the impression abroad that its prestige was waning, or sensitive to rivalry existing and impending elsewhere, certain it is that it has made an unusual effort. Every member and associate is represented on this occasion, with the exceptions of Messrs. Boyce, Lockhart, and Shields. Some of the elder ones are in their best form, or, indeed, apparently rejuvenescent; and several of those recently elected justify a choice which seemed for a while questionable or disappointing.

A very interesting accession to the society has been made by the addition to the select list of honorary members of Princess Louise. The public has long been aware that her Royal Highness, like her sister the Crown Princess of Germany and other members of the Royal family, has rare artistic endowment. But few persons coming upon the three small sketches in one frame at the head of the room—so adequate in colour and effect, so assured of hand, even relatively to the high standard of this gallery—would imagine that they are the work of an amateur, and an amateur whose time must be so largely occupied by the duties of a Royal station. They are three of the fine views commanded from the Citadel of Quebec, including the Plains of Abraham, with their heroic memories of Wolf and Montcalm. And there are other interesting memorials of the Princess's stay in Canada—to wit, a view of the courtyard of the same citadel after sundown (148), "Fishing on the Ristagouch" (51) in quaintly shaped canoe-like boats, and "Lumber Village on the Ottawa" (257). Still higher skill in the rendering of physiognomical character is displayed in the study, "Laril, a half-bred Indian Boatman" (158), in which the modified Indian type—the tense peering eyes, the thin bronze-like rigidity of the weather-worn face, telling of energy and Stoicism—are as keenly observed as they are faithfully recorded. There are besides sketches from "Muncaster, Cumberland" (263) and in the "Woods—Rosneath, Dumbartonshire" (408). Another contribution by an honorary member—Mr. Ruskin—doubly interesting in regard to its authorship and its subject, in view of the recent report of the threatened "restoration," of the west front of St. Mark's, Venice, is a study of the northmost portal of that front (28). We recognise at once the delicately sensitive, appreciative eye that dwells on every atom of the rich and fanciful sculptural ornament and every changeful hue of the matchless wealth of colour in variegated marbles and mosaics. Yet, to be frank, this is essentially an amateur performance. The want of thorough or professional training is but too apparent in the inability to deal with the subject as a whole, or even to clearly realise its details. Thus, in the mellowed harmony of St. Mark's colouring, we feel no crude lilac tints obtruding as here; and from this representation of the details of form, though we receive an impression of elaborate beauty, we are not enabled to understand the structural or exact character of the relief intended. We feel bound to call attention to the finical yet futile elaboration of this study, because so much of Mr. Ruskin's teaching has been devoted to inculcating the necessity of studying the minutiæ of nature and art with disproportionate attention as we think.

In reviewing this collection generally the first notice is due to those contributions which conform to the professed scope of the exhibition by being more or less of a preliminary nature, done for future guidance. The instructiveness of an artist's rudimentary work, showing as it does at once his mental and material processes, is exemplified in two studies of men's heads in pen and ink, and some touches with the brush (120 and 125) by Sir John Gilbert. It will be observed in these that the President conceives his subject as a mass. He does not allow himself to be cramped by insistance on a severe outline like the early masters; but in multiplication of lines suggestive of contour and modelling he finds free play for that fertility of picturesque invention to which, in the domain of illustrative art in black and white, we and other publications have been and are so greatly indebted. In the sketch illustrative of the parable of "The Wise and Foolish Virgins" (409), wherein, by the ingenious and original device of stairs with a return flight, the descending foolish and the ascending wise virgins are brought parallel to the spectator, we find a feeling for classical composition at which Sir John seldom aims. An advanced drawing representing "Gipsies" (189), with a knight in full panoply and his squire under a marl bank, is in the artist's usual "romantic" style, and the background, crested with stunted oaks, contains those fine tertiary low-toned greens for which his landscape-painting is remarkable.

Mr. Holman Hunt sends a lifesize head-study in chalk of a woman of Bethlehem (104), evidently faithful in character, firm, yet more free in execution than might be expected, but so rigidly prosaic that the face seems hard as a wood carving. There are two smaller characteristic heads in chalk by Mr. H. S. Marks. Mr. Henry Wallis is another artist who affords us interesting glimpses into the incipient stages of his work in two expressive drawings in black and coloured chalks. In one we see the poor of a congregation that remains "Nearest the Door in the Cathedral of Bruges" (264): only so many backs are visible, but they are all bowed low in prayer. The other shows a peasant couple making their "Announcement of Marriage in the Townhall of Bruges" (258). There is humour in the slight touch of curiosity or badinage that peers through the business-like air of the clerks whose heads are seen over the desk of the bureau, and the face of the future wife is very sweet. We fail to see the point or the raison-d'être of Mr. Wallis's larger completed drawing, "Luca Signorelli" (122)—so far, at least, as regards the introduction of this particular master. The portly, smiling figure of the mighty precursor of Michael Angelo serves as little more than a set-off to the foreground incident—pretty enough in itself—of the fopling boy-pupil bearing a portfolio, and turning upward his head (not, by-the-way, very well foreshortened) laughingly to the pair of childish girls, who, leaning over an adjacent wall and shaking a tree in full spring blossom, liberate the shower of rosy petals that falls around him. The artist also sends a view in Delft and other Dutch subjects, which appear to miss the aspect of the country and to be a little florid in colour; nor does one often meet so many fat vrouws even in Holland. Mr. Carl Haag has several studies, all of them—with one or two exceptions, as that of "A Young Zulu" (328) equipped for war with shield and assegais—of Oriental subjects, and all as characteristic and powerful in colour and effect as usual, the effect being often enhanced by an opposition of yellow light and cold reflection which, though it may appear forced in this climate, is probably authorised by the stronger illumination and clearer skies of the East. Among them are comprised "A Group of Cairene Musicians" (296); "The Camel which leads at Festival Processions" (22), with its sumptuous trappings, and bearing pannier-wise a couple of objects which, seen from below, look like spheres, but are, if we mistake not, kettledrums; "Chusna—a Fellaheen Girl" (186); and "An Egyptian Mother" (42) bearing her baby on her shoulder, after the fashion of the country.

Mr. Dobson, R.A., strikes us as having surpassed recent works in two female bust studies, as they may be denominated, though they are really finished pictures within their intention. The artist may be asked to vary his model occasionally, yet it must be admitted that his favourite type is quite appropriate in this sweet, rather pale rustic child's head, called "Daisy" (198), while as regards execution, bearing in mind the difficulties of the lifesize scale, of which this is the unique example here, it is perhaps the most advanced piece of flesh-painting in the room. Mr. Dobson's art is entirely unaffected, simple, sincere; and when we find a very similar type with Oriental accessories, entitled "Zoteide," in the smaller drawing numbered 347, we must be content to find also the same purity of feeling, and even greater beauty of colour and tone. Mrs. Allingham is a large and welcome exhibitor of numerous interesting studies and drawings, all of them gems; all of them—while delightfully indicative of womanly sympathies—approaching very near to the works of the late Frederick Walker in felicitous grace of sentiment and charming delicacy of execution. If we are compelled to pass by several studies of landscape and seaside flowers, done obviously for the love of the things and conscientiously for self-improvement, we must pause at "The Goat Carriage" (144), with the little darlings inside, to whom the boy is showing seaweed; and at No. 173, where two pretty girls are reading their novel or magazine in the shadow under a boat's flank on the Dover shingle, whilst their little brother plants his flag on a sand citadel; and at this little picture of the poor old dame at her straw plaiting (314). Mr. Alma-Tadema has finished even more exquisitely than he is wont to do, a small drawing of "An Old Bachelor" (356). The luxurious Roman grey-beard is sipping his after-dinner wine from a tassa with little of the Horatian geniality. He reclines on a bronze couch of his handsome triclinium (similar to that in the Naples museum), and is relieved against a bas-relief on the wall—where, however, painted decoration would have been usually found. Before him is a table sprinkled with rose-leaves, and immediately in front of this a marble water-tank, like that of the atrium, into which falls a jet of water from a pedestal, surmounted with lighted lamps, like those of the lararium. The objects introduced are archæologically correct individually, but as some would be found separated more or less widely in a Roman house, there is in their collocation a disregard of Roman usage.

It is pleasant to see how many members are in force who have been long-standing favourites with the public. E. Duncan is fresh as ever in his familiar "Sheep-washing on the Thames" (33), and he even seems to have struck a new vein in the idyllic view of "Stocksey Castle, Shropshire" (194), with a beautifully treated rainbow effect. What delightful repose is there in E. Fripp's Berkshire view (163) on a clear September morning with the fields ripe for harvest! T. M. Richardson is quite poetical for the nonce in "Warkworth Castle" (207) seen through tender sunny haze. It is many a day since T. Danby did anything so solid in painting and rich in colour as "Up in the Hills" (36). A large Venetian drawing by Oswald Brierly worthily occupies the place of honour which his Armada picture filled last year, and it naturally bears a stronger impress of reality. It represents "Una Burasca," or storm—usually a squall which from the Dolomites or Alps sweeps down on the lagoon. Under the lowering clouds, staggering under the fierce wind, the flock of picturesque Venetian craft barozzi, peate, or pescherecce, drive before us, the bellying sails displaying the "butterfly colours" of their painted emblems and decorations. More than ordinarily admirable, too, is S. Read in his drawing of the magnificent high altar of the cathedral of Avila (43), its east end covered with a gorgeous framework of paintings, and colossal grilles screening its side chapels. The painting throughout is excellent, and the graduation of light from its focus on the officiating priests is as ably managed as it is well conceived. Another fine Spanish subject by Mr. Read, pitched in a more Rembrantesque key, is "The North Transept of the Cathedral of Burgos" (58), with its stately staircase and grandiose though mixed and licentious architecture. Long ago Mr. Street, we believe, recommended the architecture of Burgos to our artists. A. P. Newton seems to us less hard than usual, and nearer to nature. In his large effective drawing from Skye of "Loch Corruisk" (153) the tones of solemn, shadowy colour in the savage mountain just after sundown are artistically rendered. The sketch of a team of horses taken by Brittan Willis "while the Waggoner and Wood-Cutters were at Dinner" (390) reveals how skilful is the draughtsmanship that is concealed, or rather enshrined, in the beautiful colouring and finish of the artist's completed drawings—of which there are several of choice quality on the screens and elsewhere. Accepting the pallid colouring of "Harvesting—Devonshire" (211), by Alfred Fripp as an effect of sunny vapour, the extraordinary delicacy of the execution throughout is well worthy of the visitor's scrutiny: note especially the minute figures in the mid distance. Equal delicacy and a very wide range of colour and effect, with poetical feeling, are brought by Alfred Hunt, now as always, to subjects of broadly diverse character. Among them is his often-painted "Whitby" (82), vaguely discernible through sea-mist suffused with the afterglow; also "Capel Curig" (17) and "Ben Sleoch" (106). Sketches, apparently done on the spot of "Corte" (159) and "Venice" (387), betray something of that confused duplication of detail and accentuation of points of colour, on account of which, as rendered only more apparent by additional studio elaboration, the artist has been reproached. We need hardly say that their so generally equable merits are displayed by Messrs. C. Davidson—see No. 230; Birket Foster—"On the Coquet at Warkworth" (199); F. Tayler—"Study for a Picture of Grouse Hawking" (17[illegible]; E. A. Goodall—views at Venice and Naples; Basil Bradley—"Grouse Shooting in Connemara" (73); G. Dodgson—"In Knole Park" (383); F. Powell—"A Calm" (349); E. K. Johnson—"An Intruder" (143): a pony strayed into a garden; T. R. Lamont—"Finished Sketch for Picture, 'The Prince's Choice'" (254), which, though very pretty in its way, smacks of the "Book of Beauty" and fairy extravaganza, in comparison with the stereoscopic reality of this artist's "At Work on Shore" (241); R. Barnes—"More Free than Welcome" (305), which we shall engrave, and therefore have an opportunity of noticing further; J. D. Watson, H. Moore, F. Smallfield, P. J. Naftel, S. P. Jackson, G. H. Andrews, Collingwood Smith, J. J. Jenkins, R. Thorne Waite, and others equally well known.

A few works by members of more recent accession are still unnoticed. The only thing that could be said against some of the able cattle-pieces by Otto Weber is that they look too clean; but this objection cannot be urged against No. 113, "Highland Cattle," which is altogether admirable, especially in colour. We must remark that Miss Clara Montalba is in danger of falling into mannerism from the very daring of her temperament in execution, and her contentment with colours which go well together, though they may have little relation to natural truth. Thus, in "Blackfriars Railway Bridge" (271) we have the dull reds of the lowered tan sail of a barge and of the pillars of the bridge massed together, and foiled by a general tone of negative olive ranging almost from white to black, and pervading river, sky, and houses alike—a contrast of colour which all ladies know to be agreeable (eminently so for dark complexions), but which, we submit, does not, as regards the olive scale, represent London under any conditions of fog. Besides, the same scheme of colour serves equally for London, the mouth of the Thames, and Venice. How clever Miss Montalba is in composition as well as colour and handling is shown further in the view (7) of Blackfriars Bridge proper, with the dome of St. Paul's rising above the massive dwarf pillars; and in "A Thames Quay" (247), with boys bathing. Much is to be expected evidently from Tom Lloyd—see his striking little drawing "Summer" (361); Walter Duncan gives promise as a poetical colourist; observe 345 and 395; Albert Goodwin advances steadily, though a little "out" in his colouring occasionally; there is much fidelity to nature in A. Hopkins's "Fishing Cove" (274), and W. M. Hale's "Beach at the Mumbles (62). We must also commend to the visitor E. F. Brewtnall's "Winter" (13), A. H. Marsh's "Wayfarers" (6), R. V. Macbeth's "Landing Sardines" (59), Mrs. H. C. Angell's vigorous flower studies, and the contributions of Messrs. N. Taylor, J. Parker, E. Buckman, C. Rigby, E. Radford, and H. M. Marshall.

A notice of the Institute's Exhibition is unavoidably deferred until next week.

The annual exhibition of the works by students of the Female School of Art, Queen-square (under the superintendence of Miss Louisa Gann), which took place on Friday and Saturday last, showed highly creditable success. The chief prize-winners of the school are the following:—For the National Competition South Kensington, a gold medal for painting in oils from nature, Miss C. M. Wood; silver medal, Miss Nisbet; bronze medal, Miss West; a Queen's prize, Miss M. E. Carter. For studies from the antique, bronze medal, Miss M. Dickson; Queen's prize, Miss Edith Gibson. For modelling from the antique, three Queen's prizes to Misses Canton, Jacobs, and Walter. Besides the medals and two Gilchrist scholarships of £50 taken by Miss Payne and Miss Spiller, forty-one awards and thirty-three prizes were won by the school in the third grade. The Local Queen's Scholarship of £30 for one or two years was gained by Miss Florence Reason; the subscribers' scholarships of £20 and £10 by Miss Wood and Miss Christmas; the Princess of Wales' scholarship by Miss Wood; and the Queen's gold medal for a head from life in chalk by Miss Christmas.

An art gallery and museum in permanent connection with the Bradford Free Library has been opened to the public free.

MUSIC.

The supplemental winter performances at Her Majesty's Theatre have offered nothing calling for special comment since our last notice, having consisted of repetitions of operas cast mostly as before. The series is to close this (Saturday) evening, with "Oberon," for the benefit of Madame Pappenheim; those of Madame Marie Roze and Mdlle. Minnie Hauk having been announced, respectively, for the preceding Thursday and Friday. On January 10 the theatre will reopen for Mr. Carl Rosa's new London season.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

As already briefly recorded, the forty-eighth season of this society opened with a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" yesterday (Friday) week, when the oratorio was given, as frequently before, with the copious additional accompaniments written for the society by its conductor, Sir M. Costa, who occupied his accustomed position on this occasion. The principal soprano solo music—including the florid air "From mighty kings," was brightly sung by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington—some portions thereof having been assigned to Miss Julia Wigan; and the contralto solos were well rendered by Miss Julia Elton. Mr. E. Lloyd created a marked effect by his fine delivery of the difficult airs, "Call forth thy powers" and "Sound an alarm." Mr. Bridson was efficient in the bass solos, and some subordinate tenor passages were smoothly given by Mr. M. Smith.

The chorus-singing was distinguished by the powerful effects peculiar to these performances. Among the several impressions produced in this respect were those which followed the delivery of the opening lament, "Mourn, ye afflicted children," "O Father," "Hear us, O Lord," "See the conquering hero" (the solo portions by the three ladies named above), and the grand jubilation "Sing unto God." The spirit-stirring march was also one of the effective pieces. Mr. Willing presided, as usual, at the organ.

The annual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" is to take place on Dec. 19.

The London Ballad Concert of last week again included Mr. Sims Reeves's fine singing, in this instance displayed in three Shaksperean songs—Arne's "Blow, blow, thou winter wind" and "Under the greenwood tree," and Stevens's "Sigh no more, ladies," in each of which the singer was enthusiastically applauded. Several new songs were sung with great effect—Marzials's "Timothy's welcome," by Madame Antoinette Sterling; Lady Arthur Hill's "Time was," by Miss M. Davies; and M. Watson's "The gallant Vaquero," by Mr. Maybrick—various other pieces having been given by some of the singers named, by Misses A. Marriott and M. M'Kenzie, Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. Santley, besides part-songs by the London Vocal Union and brilliant pianoforte solos by Madame Arabella Goddard.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert included the first performances here of M. Saint-Saëns's third pianoforte concerto, and his orchestral "Poème Symphonique," entitled "Le Rouet d'Omphale." The concerto contains some effective writing, especially for the solo instrument, but is generally somewhat vague and diffuse in structure and development. The best of its three movements is the finale, which is spirited and well sustained. The whole work was finely played by the composer, who conducted the performance of the other piece. This is also in three divisions, these being, respectively, illustrative of Omphale's fascination of Hercules, of his struggles against the bondage, and of her derision of his vain efforts. There is much fanciful and ingenious writing, with some skilful instrumentation, in each movement; and the work, as well as the concerto, was much applauded. Madame Sophie Löwe sang, with refined expression, an air by Mozart and two lieder by Schubert. Schumann's symphony in D minor, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser" completed the programme. Mr. Manns conducted, with the exception above specified.

The South London Choral Association gave its third concert at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday) week, when the effective singing of its advanced members was successfully manifested in various choruses, and other part-music. Vocal solos were contributed by Miss A. Marriott, Mr. B. McGuckin, and Mr. Santley, and pianoforte pieces by Mr. Brinley Richards. Mr. L. C. Venables conducted, and Mr. W. H. Harper was the accompanist.

The third concert of the ninth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society took place on Thursday evening, when Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was given, the solo singers announced having been Misses Anna Williams and C. Clelland, Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. H. Kearton, and Herr Henschel.

A full rehearsal of the recently established Guildhall Orchestral Society is to be held on Monday evening. The band is now complete in every department, numbering upwards of ninety performers, Mr. H. Weist Hill, the eminent violinist, being the conductor. Under such able direction there is every prospect of artistic prosperity for the society, the financial scheme of which is aided by the sum of two hundred guineas contributed by the Corporation of the City of London towards the expenditure of the season 1879-80. By permission of the City Lands Committee of the Corporation of the City of London, the practices are held at 15, Aldermanbury, where the orchestral members meet on Monday evenings and the vocal members on Tuesday evenings.

THEATRES.

We regret to find that, owing to Mr. Toole's serious indisposition and his son's death, this great comedian is not enabled to appear in his proper characters at the Folly. "A Fool and His Money" was accordingly substituted on Saturday last for "Paul Pry" and "Trying a Magistrate." Mr. Sidney Grundy led off the evening with a new and pleasing little drama, entitled "After Long Years," translated from the French of MM. Scribe and Camille. The story is exceedingly interesting, and full of incident. When the performers are less imperfect in their parts, the piece, skilfully conducted as it is, will probably become popular.

Mr. George Rignold's benefit at Drury Lane took place on Friday and Saturday evenings, when, in addition to "Henry the Fifth," he played the sailor William, in Douglas Jerrold's famous nautical drama of "Black-Eyed Susan," and played it exceedingly well. Miss Braybrooke Henderson supported the pathetic part of Susan. Mrs. William Rignold, as Grace Darling, sang "All in the Downs," in an impressive manner. Mr. John Ryder was the Admiral.

At the Lyceum on Wednesday the Belford benefit attracted a considerable audience, to witness Mr. Henry Irving as Digby Grant, in Mr. Albery's "Two Roses." The "Trial from Pickwick" was also performed. Miss Ellen Terry delivered an original address.

"Les Cloches de Corneville" attained its 600th night at the Globe on Tuesday.

On Monday the Olympic was closed for cleaning and redecoration; to be reopened on the 18th, under the direction of Mr. John Hollingshead, with a new comedy, called "Such a Good Man," by Messrs. Walter Besant and James Rice. Mr. Burnand is also engaged to burlesque "The Hunchback" for the holidays.

Mr. John Daly Besemeres, author of "Broken Toys," "Young Husbands," "The Times," and "Old Salt," died recently, at the age of fifty-seven, in Islington Infirmary. Mr. Besemeres was hon. secretary of the Urban Club, when it was originally established, and resigned the office for a colonial appointment in Calcutta. Besides the above-named pieces, he contributed several to the Court Theatre.

A paper was read on Monday night at the Geographical Society in which Mr. Wilford Scawen Blunt gave an account of a journey which he and his wife, Lady Anne Blunt, the granddaughter of Lord Byron, made last winter from Damascus southwards to Jof and Jebel Shamaar in company with Mahomed, the eldest son of the Shyekh of Palmyra, who was making his way to Nejd, the cradle of his family, to obtain a wife among his own tribe.

The arrivals of both live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool last week from the United States and Canada were numerous, while the individual consignments were also larger than recently. With live stock on board five steamers arrived, bringing collectively 660 head of cattle and 2862 sheep. The seven steamers conveying fresh meat brought 6996 quarters of beef, 2332 carcases of mutton, and 125 dead pigs. Six barrels and six cases of turkeys, seven cases of poultry, and two cases of game were brought from that country.

The Gazette contains a notice that the Queen has directed letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal appointing Mr. W. H. Smith, Admiral Sir Astley Cooper Key, Rear-Admiral the Earl of Clanwilliam, Rear-Admiral Sir J. E. Commerell, and Sir Lopes Massey Lopes, Bart., to be Lords of the Admiralty. The Gazette also announces that Mr. George Earle Welby, Mr. Francis Henry Carew, and Mr. George William Buchanan, now third secretaries, are appointed second secretaries in her Majesty's diplomatic service. Mr. George Greville, now a third secretary, is appointed a second secretary in her Majesty's diplomatic service.

Lord Sondes has granted to his tenants on his estate at Faversham a reduction of £10 per cent from the rent of the past year. Should any of them hesitate to accept consideration in this form, his Lordship is willing to expend the amount on any suitable improvement to buildings or otherwise that may be suggested to him.—Lord Braye has intimated to all his tenants that he will return 10 per cent to them on their January rents. To certain tenants he has made larger reductions.—Sir Arthur Guinness, M.P., has issued a circular to his Mayo tenantry granting a reduction of 30 per cent to tenants under £20, and 20 per cent to tenants between £20 and £50. He severely condemns the land agitation, and says it has caused much perplexity to landlords who desire to assist their tenants.

NOVELS.

Whoever is in the mood for reading a beautifully written, clever, vehement book, in three very nicely-printed volumes, illustrated withal, will perhaps venture to take in hand Under Which Lord? by E. Lynn Linton (Chatto and Windus), with the proviso, however, that something very much more serious than mere amusement is desired, and that polemics will not be too heavy an entertainment. For, indeed, a snake lurks in the grass, or, in other words, a religious controversy is concealed within the pages of what is in appearance an ordinary, but in subject and treatment as well as in literary merit, a very extraordinary, novel. The intention of the writer, if the work has been read with understanding, is to indict, try, judge, condemn, and sentence to perpetual contempt, hatred, obloquy, and ignominy priests of the Ritualistic persuasion, with all their abominations, as many excellent persons consider them to be, of the confessional, vestments, choral services, and other means of captivating and capturing more or less simple souls by working upon the senses and sensibilities. The indictment is strong, the persecution is relentless, the defence is burked, the judgment is by no means free from partiality, the sentence is extremely severe. The story is, to all intents and purposes, an exposure of the character and proceedings attributed to a man who is evidently meant to be a typical representative of the ritualistic priesthood, and who, had he properly discharged the functions of his office, should have been a good shepherd to his flock, but "the same is a thief and a robber," literally as well as figuratively. The indictment against the priest is that "for his personal ends—whether connected with the Church or no, still personal"—he brought about a separation between a loving wife and an equally, or even more, loving husband; that he swindled that wife of her worldly wealth, and robbed that wife and that husband of their only child; that he was responsible for two premature deaths, for numerous "perversions," for the "destruction" of several honest men, and for the disturbance of a whole village; that he brought a blight upon the fair fame of virtuous women; and that, after all, he was false to his own principles; the judgment pronounces him guilty upon all points of the indictment; and the sentence, implied rather than pronounced, is that he be gibbeted before the eyes of Mrs. Lynn Linton's multitudinous readers and admirers. Novelists, when they desire to present a contrast and point a moral, naturally and justifiably take extreme cases, for the sake of sheer impressiveness; but in the novel under consideration the practice and the right have been pushed to the utmost limit—so diabolical a sample of the priesthood and so angelic a sample of the agnostic brotherhood are almost too much for moderate powers of conception. And yet the priest, the vicar, the "honourable" as well as "reverend" gentleman, who is chosen as the incarnation of Ritualistic priestcraft, displays many admirable qualities, and, if he had set up for a man of business, or merely a man of the world, instead of parading himself as a man of God, might not have come out very disadvantageously from a comparison with the highly intellectual, noble, simple, but somewhat impracticable atheist, who is plainly intended to obtain the readers' suffrages The death of that amiable but not altogether convincing atheist is described in a singularly touching and beautiful scene, specially noteworthy even in a book where beautiful and powerful scenes, depicted with much grace and happiness of expression, are by no means to seek It is, on the whole, a very painful story, but to show on how slight a chance the principal catastrophe depends, it will be sufficient to mention that the Jesuitical Vicar might have spread his toils in vain if, at the very beginning of the narrative, an old gentleman had not made a most injudicious will, or if a late subaltern in the army had not, contrary to the habits of such persons in general, taken to scientific and intellectual pursuits, or, finally, if the late subaltern and his wife had happened, as very often does happen, to have a large family instead of one daughter Lest, therefore, the novel should create unnecessary alarm in the minds of timid readers, it may be well to remind them that few priests, however designing, wicked and, in fact, Ritualistic, are likely to find so lucky a combination of circumstances as that which the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Lascelles found at Crossholme, where the Lady of the Manor, the lay-rector, absolute mistress of her own property, having but one child, a girl of nineteen, who was a "natural nun," whilst the girl's father was a pronounced atheist, had begun to suffer from a "nameless yearning," a "secret pining" which, she sometimes thought, "came from an unregenerate heart and the want of vital religion." Nobody need fear that so favourable an opportunity is often offered to the dangerous Ritualistic priest for inserting the "thin end of the wedge." The title may be interpreted in two or three ways, but it has a vague suggestive effect.

Intellectual and literary fireworks are perpetually going off with a brilliant flash and a startling bang, to the mingled admiration and bewilderment of the reader, from the beginning to the end of The Egoist: by George Meredith (C. Kegan Paul and Co.), a work bearing an outward resemblance—so far as its three volumes and the division of them into chapters, wherein the characters are introduced, described, and commented upon by the author, themselves for the most part contributing to the development of the story by means of dialogue, are concerned to the customary novel, but in other respects as different from as it is superior to the sort of composition suggested by the familiar term. The author calls his very striking and even masterly production "a comedy in narrative;" and the description may be cheerfully accepted, though the expectations aroused by the description may not be such as the narrative is calculated to satisfy, unless the popular idea of comedy be first corrected by a careful study of the author's "prelude" or preliminary remarks and by recollections of the ingenious essay in which he not very long ago propounded his views upon the subject. For, though there is a constant scintillation of wit playing about all over the pages, there is seldom anything said or done which will cause a laugh, although a great deal is said and a great deal done which produces a sense of enjoyment too subtle and too refined to be expressed in the form of common laughter. The author is a poet and a philosopher, and his poetical and philosophical faculties continually reveal themselves throughout his work—the former in exquisite descriptions, for which mere prose seems to be too common-place a vehicle; and the latter in a variety of shrewd hints and acute observations. Little or no regard appears to have been paid to such matters as the professed teller of stories would consider of the highest importance; no attempt is made to lure the reader on by the usual methods, by thrilling incidents, by rapid action, by apparently inextricable complications, by romantic situations, by the emotions of fear or hope, by the suggestion of a mystery, or even by the course of a delicate intrigue. There is scarcely any story, as the term is generally understood; there is little or nothing beyond the author, in the character of a singularly able anatomist, conducting, to the accompaniment of an eloquent commentary, full of truth and satire, the moral dissection of a born "egoist." Nor is the "egoist" in himself an interesting personage, though it must be allowed that some of the human tests applied by the analyst to discover the egoistical poison lurking in the system of the "subject" are extremely attractive. They are, of course, chiefly young women; but there are also an officer of Marines and his son, who, especially the latter, give a very pleasant flavour to an otherwise somewhat disagreeable dish. Of Vernon Whitford, too, excellent use is made to relieve with genial light the depressing effects of egoistical shade. The egoist, Sir Willoughby Patterne, a young, wealthy baronet—at whom, of course, all marriageable young women's caps are set, or presumed to be set, should they only come within the range of his influence—is dissected by the author with rare skill, if with somewhat tedious detail, and it is well shown how, in the search for a wife as well as in other matters, the most excellent qualities and impulses may underlie and be crushed out by that overpowering egoism which is the incessant scourge of its possessor. The effect of it is exposed at the very outset when the same Sir Willoughby, who was moved by an apparently generous motive to invite his brave relative to his house, promptly makes himself "not at home" at the bare sight of that relative's "ungentleman-like" exterior. And it is shrewdly insinuated that the apparent generosity was itself nothing more than a consequence of the selfish pleasure derived from the credit done to the name of Patterne. This illustration will suffice to indicate the sort of "egoist" conceived by the author. As for the style of writing, it is that of a master; there may be sometimes a little of the darkness which characterised the sayings of the Delphic oracle, but it is a darkness illuminated by glorious gleams, like showers of stars on November nights.

The glorification of true love, for the delight and encouragement of romantic readers, the condemnation of mercenary, or, as some persons would put it, eligible marriages, and the stultification of deceitful schemers appear to be the main and, let it be admitted, the commendable purpose of the three volumes entitled A Doubting Heart, by Annie Keary (Macmillan and Co), a novel which death unfortunately prevented the author from completely finishing, and of which the little that remained unfinished has been supplied by the friendly and competent hand of a clever and graceful writer, Mrs Macquoid Alma Rivers loves Wynyard Anstice, and he loves her; but Wynyard is not a "good match;" and, even if Alma would take him and poverty, it is more than probable that her mother, not to say her family, would strongly object, would place every obstacle in her way, and would certainly make things very uncomfortable for her. So she determines to "sell herself," as she bitterly expresses it She finds out, however, that she cannot hold to her determination. Meanwhile, Wynyard becomes, or is believed to have become, the heir to a title and great wealth. This becomes known to her before the news reaches him; and, lest he should suppose that she had not "been on the point of yielding before the change came which made her yielding no longer a proof of disinterested love," what does she do? She gets his letters, one of which, no doubt, as she thinks, is to apprise him of what has befallen him, into her hands and hides them away. The act is about as mean as any act could be, and it is hardly consistent with the idea we have been led to form of her character; she may have been vacillating, but she has hitherto shown a tendency rather towards nobility, or at any rate towards plain dealing, plain speaking, and common sense, than towards paltriness and folly. For, of course, her conduct is exposed, and she loses her lover. Such is the very slight foundation upon which the whole romance must be considered to rest, since with the discovery of her one base action the tale is at an end, the hero being a fortunate gentleman with two strings to his bow and with so happy a disposition, apparently, that he could content himself with either. The quantity of labour and material employed upon the development of so simple a plot is prodigious, and recalls to mind the saying about the mountain and the mouse; but the episodical scenes and characters are very skilfully and pleasantly sketched, the style of writing is always agreeable, and if there is no stirring action, the tone is as pure as it is quiet, as wholesome as it is domestic.

CHURCH AND MOSQUE AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

The strange and picturesque juxtaposition of Asiatic and European types of social life in that fantastic old capital city, the head of the Levantine world, sitting upon the Bosphorus, just now, in a mood of extreme perplexity, between its foreign guardians and its diversity of hostile subject races, has often been remarked. Constantinople, during nearly a thousand years, was the official metropolis of a great Eastern Empire styling itself Roman, but drawing its vital strength, or rather its moral support, which does in the long run constitute the strength of a Government, from the Greek Orthodox Church. The Turkish dominion of four centuries past has only been that of military conquest, with no impression of the ideas and manners of the ruling nation upon the majority of the populations, Sclavonic, Greek, and others, subdued by its iron rod in Eastern Europe. Since the decay of the Sultan's power, beginning with that corruption which sooner or later ruins the fabric of despotism, foreigners of Western Christendom have come to share with Greeks, Armenians, and Jews, the most lucrative sources of private gain, as traders, contractors, or money-dealers, in this overgrown city. It has become, as Cobbett once said of another great capital, "the Wen" of the whole Eastern world, at least of all the Mohammedan nations as far as the Tigris, and of the dependent provinces and tribes, sucking up their resources of every kind, and imparting political disease and chronic misery to them all. The social aspects of Constantinople are such as might be expected from this state of affairs in the Turkish Empire. Religious animosity is cherished on both sides, Moslem and Christian, as the means by which rival nationalities, and competing classes of jobbers or intriguers at the Porte, still carry on their accustomed strife with each other. If there is peace, or rather an enforced truce, between the inhabitants of the three distinct city quarters, Stamboul the Turkish city, Galata the Greek quarter, and Pera the Frankish or European place of residence, there is no effective goodwill, and no love lost between them. It is a lamentable state of things, to be sure, in one of the most ancient existing seats of what we call civilisation. It seems to prove that, so long as religion is held a monopoly in the hands of any priests or mollahs, prelates or imams, or any clerical or ecclesiastical corporation, there will be a sad distance between religion and charity. Such reflections are not unlikely to occur to the English visitor in Constantinople, when he sees the Moslem worshippers coming out of their Mosque on a Friday, and on Sunday meets the Christians leaving their respective churches, with little mutual respect, it is to be feared, for one another's earnest faith.

Shortly after noon on Monday the quick express-train from Ipswich left the rails, near Manningtree, on the Great Eastern Railway. The stoker was killed and the driver severely injured, as were the guard and several of the passengers.

OBITUARY.

THE DUKE OF PORTLAND.

The Most Noble William John Cavendish Scott-Bentinck, fifth Duke of Portland, a family trustee of the British Museum, and one of the coheirs to the barony of Ogle, died on the 6th inst., in his eightieth year. He was born Sept. 17, 1800, second and last surviving son of William Henry Cavendish, fourth Duke, F.R.S., F.S.A., by Henrietta, his wife, eldest daughter and coheir of General John Scott, of Balcomie, in the county of Fife, and inherited the family honours (his eldest brother, William Henry, Marquis of Titchfield, having died in 1821) at the decease of his father, March 27, 1854. From 1824 to 1826 he sat in the House of Commons as member for Lynn. He was never married, and, having survived his three brothers, one of whom was the well-known politician, Lord George Bentinck, he is succeeded by his cousin, William John Arthur Charles James Cavendish Bentinck, Lieutenant Coldstream Guards, born Dec. 28, 1857, who is only son of the late Lieutenant-General Arthur Cavendish Bentinck, by his first wife, Elizabeth Sophia, daughter of Sir St. Vincent Hawkins-Whitshed, Bart. Hans William Bentinck, founder of the ducal house of Portland, was the youngest son of Hendrik, Lord of Dippenheim, in the Dutch province of Overyssel. He commanded the Dutch regiment of Horse Guards under William III, and fought as Lieutenant-General at the battle of the Boyne. The wealth of his descendants has been acquired by a succession of heiresses, one of whom, Lady Margaret Cavendish Harley, only child of Edward, second Earl of Oxford, and grand-daughter and heiress of Henry Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, brought to her husband, the second Duke of Portland, Welbeck Abbey, Notts, and the very valuable London estate of the younger branch of the Cavendishes, together with Bothal Castle, Northumberland, the ancient seat of the Lords Ogle. The surviving sisters and coheiresses-general of the nobleman whose death we record are Charlotte, Viscountess Ossington, and Lucy, Dowager Lady Howard de Walden.

VISCOUNT CHETWYND.

The Right Honourable Richard Walter Chetwynd, sixth Viscount Chetwynd in the Peerage of Ireland, died on the 7th inst. He was born Dec. 14, 1800, the only son of Richard, fifth Viscount, by Charlotte, his wife, daughter of Thomas Cartwright, Esq., of Aynho, Northamptonshire, and at the death of his father, Feb. 27, 1821, succeeded to the family title, which had been conferred in 1717 on Walter Chetwynd, of Ridge, in the county of Stafford, Ambassador at Turin, and subsequently Master of the Staghounds. He was educated at Westminster, and served for a time in the 52nd Regiment and the Grenadier Guards. He married, first, Aug. 30, 1822, Mary, daughter of Robert Moss, Esq., brother of Dr. Charles Moss, Bishop of Oxford; and secondly, Sept. 24, 1861, Mary, sole surviving daughter of the late John Hussey, Esq., of Lyme Regis, Dorset. By the former, who died Dec. 5, 1857, he had five sons and five daughters. His eldest son and successor, Richard Walter, now seventh Viscount Chetwynd, was born July 26, 1823, and married, March 16, 1858, Harriet Joanna, daughter of Walter Campbell, Esq., of Sanderland, N.B., by whom he has one son and two daughters.

SIR EDWARD BOROUGH, BART

Sir Edward Richard Borough, Bart., J.P. and D.L., some time Major of the Royal Dublin City Militia, and for many years an Army agent in the City of Dublin died on the 4th inst., in his eightieth year. He was born June 20, 1800, the eldest son of Sir Richard Borough, first Baronet, by Anna Maria, his wife, daughter of Gerard, first Viscount Lake; was educated at Westminster, and at Christ Church, Oxford, and succeeded to the title at the death of his father, Jan. 22, 1837. He married, May 12, 1831, Lady Elizabeth St. Lawrence, youngest daughter of William, second Earl of Howth, and by her, who died April 12, 1863, had two sons and five daughters. Richard, the eldest son, died at Sebastopol Nov. 13, 1855, and William, the second, was accidentally drowned on April 5 in the following year. Of the daughters, the eldest is Lady Campbell of Garscube, the third the wife of Arthur Fludyer, Esq, and the youngest, Emily Georgiana, the wife of Captain M. Studholme Brownrigg. Sir Edward's eldest sister, Amabel Elizabeth, married, first, Thomas William, fourth Earl of Pomfret, and, secondly, the late Rev. William Thorpe, Minister of Belgrave Chapel. The baronetcy becomes extinct.

THE HON. OCTAVIUS DUNCOMBE.

Colonel the Hon. Octavius Duncombe, of Waresley, Huntingdonshire, J.P. and D.L., and High Sheriff in 1866, Colonel of the Cambridgeshire Militia, and Chairman of the Huntingdonshire Quarter Sessions, died on the 3rd inst., at his residence, 84, Eaton-square. He was born April 8, 1817, the youngest son of Charles, first Lord Feversham, by Charlotte, his wife, only daughter of William, second Earl of Dartmouth, and entered the 1st Life Guards in 1835, from which regiment he retired in 1842. He sat in Parliament as Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire from 1841 to 1859, and from 1867 to 1874, always acting with the Conservative party. He was one of the original directors of the Great Northern Railway, and for five years had been the chairman. He married, March 31, 1842, Lady Emily Caroline Campbell, eldest daughter of John Frederick, first Earl Cawdor, by whom he leaves issue, two sons and three daughters.

THE HON. SWYNFEN CARNEGIE.

Admiral the Hon. Swynfen Carnegie, C.B., Knight of San Fernando of Spain, and of the Medjidie, died on the 29th ult., at his residence in Pelham-crescent, Brompton. He was born March 8, 1813, the youngest son of William, seventh Earl of Northesk, G.C.B., third in command at Trafalgar, by Mary Ricketts, his wife, niece of Admiral Earl St. Vincent, and was educated at the Royal Naval College. He entered the Navy in 1826, and attained the rank of Admiral on the retired list in 1876. He was for some time Comptroller-General of the Coastguard, and served in the Black Sea during the Crimean War from 1854 to 1856. From 1841 to 1847 he was M.P. for Stafford in the Conservative interest, and held office as a Lord of the Treasury in 1846, and as a Lord of the Admiralty in 1859. He married, Sept. 29, 1858, Louisa Albertina, eldest daughter of Adrian John Hope, Esq., and was divorced from her in 1872.

THE VEN. ARCHDEACON COTTON.

The Venerable Henry Cotton, D.C.L., formerly Archdeacon of Cashel, died at Lismore, in the county of Waterford, on the 3rd inst., in his ninetieth year. He was born March 31, 1790, the third son of the Rev. William Cotton, Vicar of Chicheley, Bucks, by Charlotte Elizabeth, his wife, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Barrett, Vicar of Stanton Harcourt, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1811. He was the author of many valuable works, of which the most important is the "Fasti Ecclesiæ Hibernicæ," an account of the succession of the Prelates and members of Cathedral bodies in Ireland. He was formerly Archdeacon of Cashel and treasurer of Christ Church, Dublin, and Rector of Thurles. He married, May 29, 1818, Mary Vaughan, daughter and co-heiress of Dr. Laurence, Archbishop of Cashel, by whom he had a large family.

SIR W. BOXALL.

Sir William Boxall, R.A., D.C.L., the eminent portrait-painter, and some time director of the National Gallery, died on Saturday morning last. He was born near Oxford, in June, 1800, and received his first education at the Abingdon Grammar School. A natural taste for drawing led to his coming to London and gaining admission to the schools of the Royal Academy. About 1827 he went to Italy, studying there two years, and laying the foundation for that knowledge of the Old Masters, without which he could not have been appointed Director of the National Gallery. His first important pictures were "Milton's Reconciliation with his wife," exhibited in 1829, and "Lear and Cordelia," engraved in Finden's Gallery. After painting these, his attention was chiefly confined to portraiture, but it was not till after middle life that his best portraits were executed. Among his most interesting and artistic portraits are those of Allan Cunningham (1836), Copley Fielding (1843), Walter Savage Landor (1852), Mr. Coleridge (1855), Mrs. Hanbury Leigh (1856), David Cox (1857), Mr. Frederick Huth (engraved) and Miss Hosmer (1859), John Gibson the sculptor, the painter's intimate friend, and of whom he was executor, now in the diploma collection of the Academy, and Mr. Alderman Sadler (1864) and Mrs. Peto (1866). The later portraits are singularly refined in expression and feeling; but their execution has a certain broken, timid, indeterminateness. Sir William was elected an Associate of the Academy in 1852 and a full member in 1863; he was appointed Director of the National Gallery in 1865; in 1870 the honorary degree of D.C.L. was conferred upon him by the University of Oxford, and in 1871 the honour of knighthood was conferred upon him. During his directorship of the national collection (a post he resigned in 1874) were purchased the "Suermont Rembrandt," "Christ Blessing Little Children," the rightfulness of the ascription of which to Rembrandt has been questioned, and the "Entombment" by Michael Angelo. A Portrait of Sir W. Boxall was given in our Number of July 12, 1863.

The deaths have also been announced of—

Lieutenant-Colonel H. J. Guyon, late 31st Bengal Native Infantry, on the 29th ult., at Bath, aged seventy-four.

Major Ashton C. Warner, Chief Constable of Bedfordshire, formerly of the 20th Hussars, on the 29th ult., aged forty-four.

Lady Lucy Louisa Maria Rabett, widow of Captain George Rabett, R.N., and sister of Edward, late Earl Winterton, on the 29th ult., at Ryde, aged sixty-seven.

Thomas Kingdon, Esq., Recorder of Bristol since August, 1874. Deceased was unable to preside at the last quarter sessions. He was called to the Bar in 1848.

Nicholas Segar Parry, Esq., on the 7th inst., at Little Hadham Place, Herts, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. He was thirty-seven years Master of the Puckeridge Hounds.

John Menzies, Esq., of the firm of Messrs. John Menzies and Co., wholesale booksellers and publishers, Edinburgh, suddenly, on the 7th inst., in the seventy-second year of his age.

Captain John Orr, on the 7th inst., in Edinburgh, at the age of ninety. He was the only survivor of the officers of the 42nd Regiment who were at Waterloo. On Oct. 14 he was presented with an address and a purse of 300 guineas from former pupils of the Scottish Naval and Military Academy, of which he was for many years superintendent.

Edward Shipley Ellis, Esq., J.P., chairman of the Midland Railway Company, on the 3rd inst., in The Newarke, Leicester. He was eldest son of the late John Ellis, Esq., J.P., of Belgrave, Leicestershire, M.P. for Leicester, and first chairman of the Midland Railway Company, by his first wife, Martha, daughter of John Shipley, Esq., of Uttoxeter. Mr. Ellis was a Quaker. He was formerly Mayor of Leicester.

Colonel William Burney, K.H., a Peninsula and Waterloo officer, on the 1st inst., at Elgin-crescent, Kensington Park, aged eighty-seven. He entered the Army in 1808, and served in the Peninsula, including the defence of Cadiz, the battle of Fuentes d'Onor, and the retreat from Burgos. He also served in the campaign of 1814 and 1815, and was wounded at Quatre Bras. He was engaged during the first Burmese war.

Granville Harcourt Vernon, Esq., for fifty years Chancellor of the Diocese of York, on the 8th inst., at his seat, Grove, near Retford, in his eighty-seventh year. He was the son of Edward Vernon, Lord Bishop of York, and uncle of Sir William Vernon Harcourt, M.P. For a number of years he represented East Retford in Parliament in the Liberal interest, and for half a century held the office of Chancellor of the Diocese of York.

John Unthank, Esq., late Master of the Supreme Court, Queen's Bench Division, on the 3rd inst., at 59, Westbourne-terrace, Hyde Park, in his eighty-second year. He was born at Norwich, the son of Mr. Unthank, a solicitor of eminence, and agent to Mr. Coke, of Holkham, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. Subsequently, in 1842, after having long practised as a special pleader with considerable success, he was called to the Bar and joined the Northern Circuit; and in 1859 became Master of the Court of Queen's Bench. He married, in 1860, Mary, sister of Professor Monier Williams, of Oxford.

In a letter to Sir Julius Vogel, the Lords of the Admiralty have declined to undertake to provide a dépôt of provisions and other stores at the Crozet Islands, remarking that they cannot too earnestly urge on all who have any interest in the mercantile marine of Great Britain that ships should not be encouraged to run so far south as these islands, for by so doing the masters not only endanger the lives and property in their charge, but most probably lengthen the voyage considerably.

CHESS.

M (Porsgrund, Norway).—The problem by Mr. Lloyd was incorrectly printed in the fourth volume of the Chess World. The following is the true problem:—White: K at K R 3rd, Q at Q B 5th, Kt at K sq. Black: K at K B 5th, Pawns at K 6th and 7th. White to play, and mate in four moves. We do not know the author's address, but perhaps the foregoing will serve your purpose.

J G B (Hartford).—We cordially congratulate you upon the success of your latest enterprise. The promised letter goes by the next mail.

A A (Preston).—Too old-fashioned in style. The problem with its solution looks like an excerpt from the Sanscrit MS. in the British Museum.

J P (Bedford).—There is no Pawn on Kt 4th in the original diagram.

W F (Harrogate).—The publisher, to whom we have handed your letter, will supply the required Number.

V S (Merthyr-Tydfil).—After being touched the Pawn must be advanced and promoted according to the announced purpose of the player.

SHADFORTH (Bournemouth).—Thanks; the problem is incurable, we fear.

J R (Brighton).—Your solutions were acknowledged last week. Only solutions received on the Friday are acknowledged in our Issue of the following week.

BISHOPSTOWE (Torquay).—There is no objection to the use of postal cards, but incorrect solutions are not noticed.

N F (Clifton).—The game and the problem are both acceptable. We are glad to see your name on the roll of our correspondents again.

G J (Newport).—If found correct the problem shall appear.

B A (Buralem) and S H B (Wakefield).—We are obliged for the reports of your respective meetings and the games accompanying them.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 1865 received from D Bell, H J Baker, J Nepveu, R Sarsfield, Solvist (Penge), and Carrie.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 1866 received from A H Tengue, J Nepveu, R Sarsfield, A F Carlson (Bjuf), Medlagos, C J Stephen, J Tucker, W J C B, P le Page, Carrie, and Bryanston Chess Club.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 1867 received from H B, Julia Short, Norman Rumbelow, E Redman, Carrie, R H Brooks, R Sarsfield, East Marden, Thorpe Reading-Room, C J Stephen, Ernest, Rudolf Bohm, jun., W S L, Dr F St, Problematicus, H A Moes, Shadforth, J E M F, An Old Hand, R Jessop, G L Mayne, T Barrington, H Langford, Elsie, D W Kell, L S D, E Eisbury, Nerina, M O'Halloran, D Templeton, H Brewster, B L Dyke, Ben Nevis, S Farrant, Lorna, H Barrett, T Greenbank, R Ingersoll, Kitten, Helen Lee, L Sharswood, N Cator, F R Jeffrey, C Darragh, G Fosbrooke, B Arnold, C S Coxe, W Warren, and Frances R.

PROBLEM No. 1869.

By J. G. FINCH.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

A Game played in the Correspondence Tourney between England and America; Mr. E. H. HEATH, of Epsom, on the one side, and Mr. D. C. ROGERS, of Detroit, on the other.

(Evans's Gambit.)

WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. R.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to B 4th	B to B 4th

14. Q to Q 2nd	B to B 2nd
15. Kt to Kt 3rd	P to K B 3rd
16. Q R to K sq

As might be expected to occur in a game played by correspondence, the moves on both sides, down to this point, are all "book." Here or on the fifteenth move, however, White's best continuation is B to B 3rd. In any case, the Q B sq. is a better post for the Rook than the one chosen.

16.	P to B 5th
17. B to B 2nd	P to Q Kt 4th
18. Kt to Q 4th	R to Q Kt sq
19 P to K B 4th	P to Kt 5th
20. B to R sq	P to B 6th
21. Q to Q 3rd	B to Kt 3rd
22. R to Q Kt sq

It is apparent here that the Q R has served no useful purpose at K square.

Well played. This effective stroke must have been overlooked by Black when he played his Bishop to R 3rd.

It does not matter how he plays now; the result is only a question of time.

and Black resigned. It is but fair to state that the second game, played concurrently, was won by Mr. Rogers.

The Chessplayers' Chronicle (Dean and Son, Fleet-street) for December has a very able analysis of an original variation in the Four Knights' game contributed by the editor, the Rev. C. E. Ranken, besides the usual number of games and problems and the news of the month; and the Huddersfield College Magazine gives an account of the match between Messrs. Barnes and Delmar, illustrated with diagrams and two of the games. In our Paris contemporary, La Stratégie, the last chapter of M. Delannoy's "Souvenirs" is mainly devoted to clever descriptions of Irish scenery and character, and the incidental novelette is brought to a happy conclusion.

After a successful season, another tourney has been organised among the members of the Lima Chess Club; and we are pleased to learn that, notwithstanding the war with Chili, the club is progressing. The officers elected for the next year are:—President, M. Duclos; secretary, M. Vargas; committee, Messrs. Salcedo, Limpricht, and James Bishop.

A problem tournament is announced in connection with the Fifth Congress of American Chessplayers to be held in New York next year. The competition is open to composers of all nations, without entrance-fee, and each competitor is required by the conditions to contribute four original unpublished problems—one in two moves, two in three moves, and one in four moves, all direct mates. Competing sets will be received up to March 1, 1880, and they must be sent, under the usual conditions of mottoes and sealed envelopes, to Mr. F. M. Teed, 62, Liberty-street, New York. Three prizes, of 100, 50, and 25 dollars respectively, are offered by the management for the best sets of four, and the proprietors of the Turf, Field, and Farm (New York) offer a prize of 25 dollars for the best single problem.

A match between the clubs of Wakefield and Dewsbury was played at the Strafford Arms, Wakefield, on Saturday last. There were nine players on each side, the best of three games being the goal, and Wakefield won by thirteen points to six. Among the champions of Dewsbury was Master Harry Jackson, a very promising young player, who contributed two wins and a draw to the score of his party.

At the "Three Crowns," Dowgate-hill, a match was played on Wednesday last between the Excelsior and Barclay Clubs. The Excelsior, as becomes its name, attained the highest score—eight games to five and one draw.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Aug. 4, 1879) of Mrs. Mary Charlton, late of Priory House, Dudley, Worcestershire, who died on Oct. 19 last, was proved at the Worcester district registry on the 15th ult. by Edwin Fisher Smith, Edwin Dudley, and Henry Edmunds, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £90,000. The testatrix devises her residence, Priory House, with the lands and appurtenances, to James Payton Badley; and she bequeaths £10,000 to the Dudley-Guest Hospital, founded by her late brother; £1000 each to the Dudley Dispensary and the Wolverhampton Orphan Asylum; £300 each to the Birmingham and Midland Eye Hospital, the General Institution for the Blind, Edgbaston, the General Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, Edgbaston, and the Birmingham and Midland Counties Middle Class Idiot Asylum at Knowle; £500 to the Vicar and Churchwardens of St. Thomas's, Dudley, upon trust, to distribute the dividends and income at Christmas in every year, in money, fuel, clothes, or otherwise, at their discretion, among the necessitous and deserving poor of the said parish; and numerous other pecuniary legacies, all free of legacy duty. As to the residue of her real and personal estate, she gives one moiety to her cousin, William Shenstone, and the other moiety to Thomas Gilbert.

The will (dated June 4, 1879) of Mr. Henry Padwick, late of No. 4, Hill-street, Berkeley-square, who died on Sept. 23 last, was proved on the 1st inst. by Mrs. Susan Padwick, the widow and sole executrix, to whom he devises and bequeaths all his real and personal estate absolutely. The personal estate is sworn under £60,000.

The will (dated Dec. 4, 1874) with a codicil (dated Dec. 24, 1877) of Colonel Crawford Hagart, formerly Adjutant-General at Bombay and late of The Cleave, Torquay, Devon, who died on Sept. 1 last, was proved on the 27th ult. by Mrs. Grace Murray and Lieutenant-Colonel John Gordon Graham, the surviving executors, the personal estate in the United Kingdom being sworn under £25,000.

The will (dated June 5, 1871) with a codicil (dated Aug. 18, 1879) of Mr. Thomas Harvey Kearsley, formerly of Fulwood, Aigburth, near Liverpool, but late of No. 38, Green-street, Grosvenor-square, who died on Oct. 29 last at Sunninghill, Berks, was proved on the 24th ult. by Hickson Ferguson and Walter John Coulson, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £20,000. The testator leaves to his wife his furniture and effects and £700 per annum for life; and the residue of his property to all his children; and he declares that the provisions made by his will are in addition to those made by his marriage settlement, which he confirms.

The will (dated July 24, 1876) of Mr. Wallace Bruce Black, late of Rochester, manufacturer, who died on Oct. 29 last, was proved on the 1st inst. by Mrs. Sarah Ann Black, the widow, Francis John Dawson, and David Thomas Smith, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £18,000.

The will (dated Aug. 30, 1878) with a codicil (dated Nov 1, 1879) of Miss Phœbe Elizabeth McKenzie, late of No. 3, Pembury-road, Lower Clapton, who died on the 4th ult., was proved on the 28th ult. by Daniel King, Robert Harris, Thomas Boone Nelson, and Mrs. Sarah King, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £14,000. The testatrix bequeaths £1100 perpetual 4 per cent debenture stock upon trust for Elizabeth Watts for life, and then to be divided between the Royal Alfred Aged Merchant Seamen's Institution, Leadenhall-street, and the Royal Hospital for Incurables, West-hill, Putney-heath; £500 each to the said Royal Alfred Aged Merchant Seamen's Institution and the Asylum for Fatherless Children, Reedham, near Croydon, and other legacies. The residue of the personalty she divides between the Orphan Working School, Haverstock-hill, the Home for Little Boys, Farningham, the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, Victoria Park, and the City of London Truss Society.

The will (dated Sept. 8, 1879) of Mrs. Lavinia Louisa Laura Colcman, late of No. 5, Portland-terrace, Brook-road, Upper Clapton, who died on Sept. 30 last, has been proved by Frederick Youle, the sole executor, the personal estate being sworn under £10,000. The testatrix bequeaths her four pictures by Raffaele and four enamel paintings to the National Gallery, Trafalgar-square.

The will (dated July 1, 1870) with a codicil (dated May 2, 1879) of Miss Ann Woollaston Burnaby, late of Evington House, Evington, Leicestershire, who died on the 1st ult., was proved on the 22nd ult. by Thomas Fowke Andrew Burnaby and Charles Sherard Burnaby, the brothers, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £6000. The testatrix bequeaths £2000 upon trust as an endowment fund and towards maintaining Divine worship according to the ritual of the Church of England of the church at Lound, in the parish of Sutton-cum-Lound, Notts, and she requests that the Vicar will reside at Lound; £100 upon trust to apply the income towards the repairs of the said church, and £100 towards the endowment fund of the National Schools at Evington.

IN "NOTES on CONSUMPTION and WASTING DISEASES SUCCESSFULLY TREATED with HYDRATED OIL, with Cases showing the immediate increase in weight by it," see Book published by Diprose, Bateman, and Co., Lincoln's-inn-fields.

G. OVEREND DREWRY, M.D., Physician to the National Free Dispensary for Consumption and Wasting Diseases, Gower-street, W., Author of "Common-Sense Management of the Stomach," &c., referring to cases treated at the National Free Dispensary for Consumption and Wasting Diseases, says that "'Hydroleine' (or Hydrated Oil) produces an effect such as neither cod-liver oil nor any preparation of it with which I am acquainted even faintly approaches, and patients are unanimous in their statement that the appetite is much increased by taking 'Hydrated Oil,' and that, so far from possessing the unpleasant taste of ordinary cod-liver oil, the taste of 'Hydrated Oil' is agreeable rather than the reverse, and is described by some as resembling Devonshire cream. These, I submit, are very important points in cases usually attended by great irritability of stomach. The general improvement in strength shown within a fortnight was in many instances surprising, even to myself, who had seen already in private practice many startling results from its use. My experience, however, shows that in cases where cod-liver oil or an emulsion of it has been depended upon, increase of weight is rarely obtained."—Page 16.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil).

Equal to Ten times the quantity of Cod-Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil).

Easier to administer than Cod-Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

entirely supersedes plain Cod-Liver Oil.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

may be relied upon to increase weight.

TRY YOUR WEIGHT.—HYDROLEINE

(Hydrated Oil) has proved of the highest value as a food in consumption and all wasting diseases, invariably producing increase in flesh and weight. This preparation of Hydrated Cod-Liver Oil is tonic, digestive, and ten times more strengthening and nourishing, as well as far more pleasant to taste, than plain cod-liver oil. Hydroleine may be described as partially digested oil, which will nourish and produce increase of weight in those cases where oils or fat, not so treated, are difficult or impossible to digest. All tendency to emaciation and loss of weight is arrested by the regular use of Hydroleine, which may be discontinued when the usual average weight has been permanently acquired. Of all Chemists, 4s. 6d.; or sent direct, carriage paid, to any address in England for 54.—Address Hydroleine Company, 48S, Oxford-street, London.

READ the following Extracts from a few among the hundreds of letters received, showing that HYDROLEINE will nourish, and cause young or old to increase in weight where plain cod-liver oil will not; the original letters, with many others, may be seen at our Office.

MR. JAS. STEWART, CHEMIST, of Dalkeith, writing April 26, 1877, says:—

"I weighed only 116 lb. on March 26, took the Hydroleine very irregularly I must confess, and on April 19 weighed 120 lbs. I found it very pleasant to take, never experienced the least approach to eructation, and rather think it acted very much as a tonic."

WRITING of Hydrated Oil on May 14, 1877, Mr. KENNETH M'DONALD, of Dunkeld, says:—

"I had been taking cod-liver oil all winter myself, and thought I would first experiment on myself with the Hydroleine, and I must say, whether it is that or not, I am much better; in fact, all right again, and I certainly give it the credit, and will recommend it to all in preference to the ordinary oil—it is much easier taken."

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

can be taken by the most delicate stomach.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

is immediately assimilated.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

produces rapid increase in flesh.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

is pleasant to take.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

is certain in result.

IN "NOTES on CONSUMPTION and WASTING DISEASES successfully treated with HYDRATED OIL," by G. Overend Drewry, M.D., he says:—"To brain-workers of all classes 'Hydrated Oil' is invaluable, supplying, as it does, the true nerve food. There are many in these days of feverish work and continued strain who insensibly are drifting towards degeneration of nerve tissue, without the evidence of any special disease, excepting nervous irritability and sleeplessness. In these cases I have found "Hydrated Oil" act like a charm, tranquillising and restoring tone to the nervous system with startling rapidity. It is an exceedingly difficult preparation to make, but from many hundred samples examined by Dr. Bartlett and myself, I am in a position to say that in the 'Hydrated Oil' all the chemical changes necessary to transform the oil from its original state to one of partial solubility in water are perfectly produced. The unstable nature of such a combination is one of its most valuable characteristics, and it frequently happens that changes of temperature and exposure to light cause a certain small separation of watery extractives from the essential hydration, which is, however, invariably permanent to the requisite extent. This is of no consequence, sufficient combination being again produced instantaneously by shaking the bottle."—Page 36.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil) has been favourably received by all classes of people, as well as by the press, as the following extracts will show:—

MRS. ELLEN COOKE, Weston-super-Mare, in a letter dated May 24, 1879, says:—

"I think the last bottle you sent me has saved the life of a little boy three years old."

MR. J. H. GREGORY, Master of Caxton Workhouse, Cambs., writing on March 12, 1879, says:—

"The effect of the bottle I received from you was so marvellous, as I increased nearly 4 lb. in weight, and felt better in every way."

MRS. MARYATT, Bayswater, W., writing on Jan. 22, 1877, speaks of the Hydrated Oil in the following terms:—

"My little boy (aged five and a half years) is so extremely fond of it that he will take it just as it is, without the ginger or orange wine, and will smack his lips after it. As for myself, I can never sound its praises too loudly. I consider it a perfect life-giver."

MR. JOHN MILTON, writing from Liverpool on May 7, 1877, says:—

"Five weeks ago a small pamphlet was handed to me descriptive of your Hydroleine, and since that time my wife has been taking just one bottle a week, with certain benefit."

MR. A. BOYCE, Chemist, Hayward's-heath, writing on July 9, 1877, says:—

"I have given it to several consumptive cases, and am pleased to inform you with very good result. The effect of it on two persons (children) have had a wonderful effect. I am trying to make it known every where I can."

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

is not a secret preparation.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

is used by the nervous.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

is harmless as cream.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

has the formula on every bottle.

HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil)

is used in wasting diseases.

ALL persons taking HYDROLEINE are particularly urged to keep an ACCOUNT from WEEK to WEEK of their WEIGHT, that the gain and improvement may be shown. The HYDROLEINE COMPANY, having devoted special attention to perfecting a process by means of which uniformity in the production of HYDRATED OIL is secured, desire to direct the attention of the medical profession and the public to this preparation, to distinguish which the name of HYDROLEINE (Hydrated Oil) has been registered under the Trade-Marks Acts. Ask your Chemist for it. If your Chemist has not the "Hydroleine" in stock, a bottle will be sent from the Factory (carriage paid) to any part of England, on receipt of Post-Office Order, 5s., payable to the Hydroleine Company, 48S, Oxford-street, London.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.

Happy Days! There is something of regret and gloom in the first appearance of grey hairs; our prospects are often blighted by their premature appearance. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER happily affords a safe and sure means for restoring them again to the freshness and beauty of youth. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER is no new low-priced article.

It is the old-established standard and reliable article known and spoken most highly of in every civilised country. Every good thing for the hair that the most scientific men of the Old and New World can suggest are combined in Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. It requires only a few applications to restore grey hair to its youthful colour and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. Dandriff is quickly and permanently removed. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.

There are two special qualities which determine and fix the superiority and excellence of Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER:—First—Its prompt, quick action, and the new growth, life, and vigour that it is sure to give to the hair, never failing by a few applications TO RESTORE GREY OR WHITE HAIR TO ITS YOUTHFUL COLOUR, imparting to the hair a delightful aroma, fresh, delicate, and unchangeable in any climate. Second—Its easy application without any previous preparation of the hair; without that sticky and disagreeable sulphur odour found and complained of in other preparations. It never stains the skin or linen. It retains the hair in any desired position, and is cooling and cleansing to the scalp.

FLORAL BELL,

FRAGRANT ELIXIR OR

LIQUID DENTIFRICE.

The admiration of the world, "THE FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE." Language fails to give expression to the beauty or the utility of a beautiful set of white teeth. With no other charm the possessor may well feel proud. Dentists, chemists, and physicians all recommend and use the FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is truly unequalled for cleansing, preserving, and beautifying the teeth, giving them a pearl-like whiteness and hardening the gums. It removes all tartar hardens the enamel, arrests decay, and imparts to the breath at all times a most delightful fragrance.

A few drops on the brush night and morning is all sufficient. Tooth pastes and powders are discarded after a trial of FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is purely vegetable, which may account for the absence of froth in your mouth during its use. A chemical that produces froth may be necessary in soap to cleanse the skin, but all chemicals are certain destruction to the teeth. The enormous and constantly increasing sale for this article enables the proprietor to offer it at the very low price of Two Shillings and Sixpence in large Bottles. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Wholesale Depôt, 114 and 116, Southampton-row, London.

"AND TEETH LIKE ROWS OF PEARLS."
JEWSBURY and BROWN'S Exquisite Compound,

THE ORIENTAL TOOTH-PASTE.

The celebrated original and only genuine Oriental Tooth-Paste is signed "JEWSBURY and BROWN, Manchester. Established 50 years." PEARLY WHITE and SOUND TEETH, a healthy action of the gums, producing that firmness and rosy brightness of colour so essential to beauty, and fragrant breath, are all insured by the use of this most perfect Dentifrice. Pots, 1s. 6d.; double, 2s. 6d. All Perfumers and Chemists.

DOES YOUR HAIR TURN GREY?

Then use HERRING'S PATENT MAGNETIC BRUSHES and COMBS, Brushes, 10s. and 15s. each. Combs, 2s. 6d., 5s., 7s. 6d., 10s., 15s., and 20s. each. Pamphlets upon application.—4, Great Marlborough-st., W.; 93 and 95, City-road; and of all Perfumers.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored

by this valuable specific to its original shade, after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Used as a dressing, it causes growth and arrests falling. The most harmless and effectual restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials post-free.—R. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

GOLDEN HAIR.—ROBARE'S

AUREOLINE produces the beautiful Golden Colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all Perfumers. Wholesale, HOVENDEN and SONS, 6, Great Marlborough-street, W.; and 93 and 95, City-road, E.C. London: Pinaud and Meyer, 37, Boulevard de Strasbourg, Paris; 31, Graben, Vienna; 44, Rue des Longs Chariots, Brussels.

THE ALBION MILK AND SULPHUR SOAP, the health ambrosia of the skin.

THE ALBION MILK AND SULPHUR

SOAP.—Testimonials, analytic and professional:—"The materials are choice."—Lancet. "In fact, the purest and most purifying of soaps."—Dr. E. Wilson, Ph.D., F.C.S. "Its emollient qualities are truly excellent."—A. W. Fortune, F.C.S. "It is the most agreeable and delicate preparation for the skin I know."—James Startin, Surgeon of St. John's Hospital, London. "It is specially nice for children."—Dr. Evans, State Apothecary, Dublin. "When the skin is fretted, I recommend it with entire satisfaction."—G. de Gorrequer Griffith, Senior Physician to the Hospital for Women and Children. Of all Chemists, in Tablets 6d. and 1s. Refuse all substitutes. A necessary caution, as some proprietors are giving an enormous percentage to wholesale and retail houses to push their dark and inferior soap.

THE ALBION MILK AND SULPHUR SOAP.—A Christmas Present.—A box of thirty-six tablets sent free to any address for 12s.; to Scotland or Ireland, 13s. Post-Office Orders to M. Hopewell, the Albion Sanitary Soap Company, 532, Oxford-street, London.

ALLEN AND HANBURYS' "PERFECTED" COD-LIVER OIL

is not only freer from taste and smell than any oil ever before offered to the public, but it does not give rise to the nausea and eructations which render the use of ordinary oil, even of the finest quality, so repulsive. It is the pure oil, made at A. and Hs.' own factory in Norway, and prepared by an entirely new and special process. It presents in the most effective condition all the invaluable properties of the remedy. All who have difficulty in taking Cod-Liver Oil should insist on having A. and Hs.' "PERFECTED" OIL. Sold only in Impl. ½ Pts., 1s. 6d.; ¼ Pts., 2s. 6d.; Pts., 4s. 9d.; Qts., 9s. Trade mark a plough. Of all Chemists. One pint free to any address in the United Kingdom for 8s.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1879.

The news from Afghanistan is of a decidedly serious tenour. General Roberts, unable to cope advantageously with the increasing and advancing forces of what we are compelled to designate "the enemy," after three days' fighting, each more severe than the last, but each resulting in the victory of our troops, has deemed it prudent to abandon the Bala Hissar, and to concentrate his force within the Sherpur cantonments. He is drawing reinforcements from the line of his communications at Gundamuk and Jellalabad, and troops are being dispatched by the Viceroy of India to fill up the vacancies thereby caused. "Excitement among the tribes," says Lord Lytton, in one of his telegrams, "is expected to spread." We should be sorry to draw from these items of intelligence more gloomy inferences than they will fairly warrant. The Indian Forces in Afghanistan, British and Native, will doubtless be able to maintain the defensive against all assault. They are from five to seven thousand strong; they are within lines which may be rendered all but impregnable; they are well provisioned for four or five months; their line of communication is not yet closed; reinforcements may be expected to reach them within a comparatively brief interval, and General Roberts may then deem it safe and expedient to resume the offensive, and, possibly, to disperse the gathering force of hostile tribes. But what a prospect do these facts bring before us of the future task of the Indian Government in the pacification of Afghanistan! What draughts upon the resources of our Eastern dependency! What ever-recurring uncertainty in the condition of its new conquest! Scarcely a week ago all was reported quiet, and—we grieve to say it—British vengeance upon the perpetrators of the Cabul massacre was being carried into effect without mercy. Now the seeds have been sown of interminable enmities, and the blood upon our hands, in view of many of the Afghan Tribes, can never be washed off. We may subdue the country, we cannot govern it. We may hold it by military force, but we cannot administer its civil affairs. The country will be a constant drain upon India, and, ultimately, upon England. It is time that we understood the nature and extent of the policy which dictated the invasion of Afghanistan. At present, we confess, we cannot see into the heart of it, and hence, perhaps, it appears to us to bode ill for the prosperity of British India.

There is news, too, of fighting in another quarter of the globe. Things are not yet settled in South Africa, though, for the present, Zululand remains quiet. Moirosi's Mountain stronghold has been captured by the Colonial Forces under Colonel Bayley. The chief himself was killed and about seventy of his followers. The loss on our side was, happily, small, and, as a result of the affair (which appears to have been skilfully conducted, but the difficulties of which seem also to have been greatly exaggerated), is spoken of in South Africa as bringing to a close "Frontier Native Disturbances." This may be true, so far as the Cape Colony is concerned. But the Transvaal is still agitated by the repugnance of the Boers to British Rule, and Secocoeni awaits upon the Frontier the operations of Sir Garnet Wolseley, which are likely enough to find a similar termination to those of the Colonial Troops against Moirosi.

In fact, mischief seems to be in the air all over the world. Nearly everything, in its turn, gives cause of offence. One is reminded by the state of nations of that constitutional ill-health of the body which renders the most insignificant abrasion of the skin a festering sore, and which neutralises the most efficacious remedies that can be applied. The temper of humanity just now, at least so far as it can be discerned from the policy of Governments, is out of joint. There is a dislocation somewhere which makes even healthy movement painful. Repose—if repose can be anticipated—is the only influence that can cure the pervading and increasing evil. We are all getting touchy. In one way or another, we all appear to be intent upon straying from the straight path. France, Spain, Austria, Germany, Russia, Turkey, and even Belgium are passing under what the population of each regards as a crisis. We are not without our own troubles, and, in the anticipation of most, we have not yet seen the worst. Of course, a severe winter—of which, it may be, we have only yet received an earnest—should it set in and last long, will find out our weak places, and aggravate our sufferings. Such disturbing processes are part of the discipline of States. They are not altogether novel; they are not even extraordinary; they make a large portion of the history of every sublunary community. But they do not always assume an epidemical form. Now they are here, now there. Lately, however, it has been difficult to say where they are not. That they have checked much evil which would have otherwise ensued we do not doubt. That they have succeeded in instilling some useful lessons may also be believed. But even such convictions as these scarcely reconcile even the uncomplaining to passing and active evils.

Amid all that is sombre about and around us one fact is calculated to encourage us—we had almost said to cheer us—we mean the unquestionable revival of trade. To what extent this bright phenomenon may reach—how much of it may be evanescent, or how much is solid and permanent, we will not presume to say. Dum vivimus, vivamus is not an inapt motto for our present commercial condition. We have to make the best of what is given to us—to strike the iron while it is hot. Without doubt, even trade will be called upon to struggle with difficulties and to face renewed dangers. But "while there is life there is hope." A long period of insensibility has come to a close. Even winter itself has not proved the fallaciousness of our hopes. If we might but see "peace and goodwill" among men, we might draw nigh to Christmastide with tranquil anticipations.

THE COURT.

The Queen, at a private investiture of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, held last week at Windsor Castle, knighted Colonel C. K. Pearson, and invested him with the ribbon, badge, and star of a Knight Commander of that order; and Major-General Crealock received from her Majesty the insignia of Companion of the same order. After the ceremony the Queen's dinner party included Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, the Marchioness Dowager of Ely, the Hon. Horatia Stopford, the Hon. Emily Cathcart, Lord Elphinstone, Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Ponsonby and the Hon. Lady Ponsonby, General Sir Daniel Lysons, Major-General Hope Crealock, Major-General F. Marshall, Colonel H. Rowlands, Colonel Sir Charles Pearson, Colonel W. E. M. Reilly, Lieutenant-Colonel E. J. England, Lieutenant Colonel C. M. Clarke, Captain Bradshaw, R.N., and Captain Campbell, R.N.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh arrived at the castle yesterday week on a visit to her Majesty. Prince Alfred, and Princesses Marie, Victoria, and Alexandra of Edinburgh had previously arrived. The Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, came to London in the afternoon, and visited the Duchess of Cambridge at St. James's Palace. Her Majesty travelled from and to Windsor by special train on the Great Western Railway. The Duke of Cambridge arrived at the castle. Her Majesty's dinner party included the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, the Duke of Cambridge, the Marchioness Dowager of Ely, Lady Emma Osborne, Baron and Baroness Königsegg, Lord Elphinstone, and Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Ponsonby.

The Queen, with the Duchess of Edinburgh and Princess Beatrice, walked out on Saturday. The Duke of Edinburgh and Prince Leopold came to London. The Duke of Cambridge and Prince Alfred and Princesses Marie, Victoria, and Alexandra of Edinburgh left the castle for London. The Prince and Princess of Wales and Princess Louise of Lorne, with the Duke of Edinburgh and Prince Leopold, arrived at the castle in the evening.

Sunday was the eighteenth anniversary of the death of the lamented Prince Consort, as well as the first anniversary of the death of her Majesty's beloved daughter, Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse. The Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Strathearn, Prince and Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, Princess Louise of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold went to the Royal Mausoleum at Frogmore, where a special service was performed in the morning by the Dean of Windsor. Sir George Elvey and the choir of St. George's Chapel were in attendance. A cast of the recumbent statue of the Grand Duchess of Hesse and her daughter Princess Marie, by Mr. Bohm, had been placed in the mausoleum. By her Majesty's commands, the mausoleum at Frogmore was opened from one to half-past three p.m., for the members of the household and the servants resident within the castle and their families to visit it. Her Majesty's permission to visit the mausoleum was extended to many of the residents in Windsor and its neighbourhood, and also to various tradesmen in the town, with their families. The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh left for town shortly after two o'clock. The Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Louise of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service in the afternoon in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. T. Teignmouth Shore, Incumbent of Berkeley Chapel, Mayfair, officiated. The Dean of Windsor dined with her Majesty and the Royal family.

The Prince and Princess of Wales left the castle at twenty minutes past ten on Monday morning for London. The Queen held a Council, at which were present Prince Leopold, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the Earl of Beaconsfield, the Right Hon. R. A. Cross, and the Right Hon. W. H. Smith. The Earl of Beaconsfield, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, and the Right Hon. R. A. Cross had audiences of her Majesty. General Guzman, Minister from Guatemala, was introduced to an audience of the Queen, and presented his credentials; and the Hon. C. Vivian was also introduced to an audience and kissed hands on his appointment as Minister-Resident at Berne. Her Majesty's dinner party included Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Louise of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, the Marchioness Dowager of Ely, the Earl of Beaconsfield, Lord Elphinstone, and Rear-Admiral Sir E. Commerell.

Princess Louise of Lorne and Prince Leopold came to London on Tuesday and visited the Westminster Hospital. Their Royal Highnesses returned to the castle to luncheon.

The Queen, accompanied by the members of the Royal family, has taken her customary out-of-door exercise, and has visited the Dean and Mrs. Wellesley and Lord Rokeby at the Deanery, Windsor.

The Earl of Beaconsfield left Windsor Castle on Wednesday.

The Empress Eugénie, who arrived at Windsor Castle on a visit to the Queen on Tuesday evening, went with her Majesty and Princess Beatrice to the Royal Mausoleum at Frogmore on Wednesday morning, and afterwards left the castle for Chiselhurst.

The Queen, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and Princess Louise left Windsor Castle at ten o'clock on Thursday morning for Osborne, where the Court will remain for the Christmas holidays.

Mr. Belt has submitted to the Queen a bust of the late Prince Louis Napoleon; and Mrs. Butler the sketch of her picture of the defence of Rorke's Drift.

The Marchioness Dowager of Ely has succeeded Lady Abercromby as Lady in Waiting; and Mr. J. F. Campbell, of Islay, has succeeded Colonel the Hon. C. Lindsay as Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

The Queen has telegraphed to Sir F. Roberts requesting him to make known to the troops engaged in the action before Cabul her admiration of their gallantry, and her sympathy for the officers and men wounded in action.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, before leaving Marlborough House for Windsor Castle, where they arrived on Saturday evening, received the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and Prince Alexander of Hesse at luncheon, and, accompanied by Princess Louise of Lorne, Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg and Prince Louis of Battenberg, went to the Lyceum and the Prince of Wales's Theatres. The Princess and Prince Louis of Battenberg were present one afternoon at the Maskelyne and Cooke entertainment at the Egyptian Hall. The Prince was also present at a meeting of the Council of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, at their offices in Hanover-square. The Prince and Princess, who arrived at Marlborough House from Windsor Castle on Monday morning, left in the afternoon for Eastwell Park, Kent, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh. The Prince has sent presents of game for the use of the patients in the Norwich, Great Yarmouth, and other Norfolk Hospitals. Colonel Teesdale has succeeded Lieutenant-Colonel Clarke as Equerry in Waiting.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, during their short stay in town, went to St. James's Theatre, and the Duchess inspected the needlework at the Ladies' Work Society in Sloane-street. The Duke and Duchess, after visiting the Queen at Windsor, left Clarence House on Monday for Eastwell Park, where they have been entertaining company during the week.

Prince and Princess Christian returned to Cumberland Lodge yesterday week from visiting Mrs. Gerard Leigh at Luton Hoo. During the visit Prince Christian, with a large party, had excellent shooting; and Mrs. Leigh entertained her Royal guests one evening with private theatricals, at which many of the county families were present.

The Duchess of Connaught, accompanied by the Duke of Connaught, distributed the annual prizes to the successful competitors of the London Irish Rifles (the 28th Middlesex). The ceremony took place yesterday week at St. James's Hall. Among the prizes were a diamond ring and a gold brooch and earrings, given by his Royal Highness. The Duke wore his uniform as Honorary Colonel of the regiment. A guard of honour, consisting of one hundred rank and file, under the command of Captain Inglis, was in attendance. The Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold were on Saturday installed as Knights of Malta at the Masonic Rooms of the "Supreme Council of the 33rd Degree." Prince Leopold has consented to preside at the ninety-second anniversary festival of this institution, to be held in May next.

The Duke of Cambridge returned to Gloucester House yesterday week from visiting Lord and Lady Alington at Crichel, Dorset.

Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar and Countess Dornberg, with Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg and Prince Louis of Battenberg, attended a fancy-dress ball yesterday week at the Assembly Rooms, Southsea. The company numbered 500, and the dresses were rich and picturesque.

His Excellency the Turkish Ambassador and Mdlle. Musurus returned to the Embassy on Saturday last from spending a few days with Earl and Countess Delawarr at Buckhurst. His Excellency the German Ambassador and the Countess Marie Münster have returned to the Embassy on Carlton House-terrace from visiting the Earl and Countess of Rosslyn at Easton Lodge, Dunmow. The Duke and Duchess of Bedford and the Ladies Russell have returned to Woburn Abbey.

Countess Cowper gave a county ball at Panshanger on Thursday night. The Earl and Countess of Rosslyn gave a ball on the 10th inst., at Easton Lodge, Essex, in celebration of the eighteenth birthday of Miss Maynard, Lady Rosslyn's eldest daughter, who on this occasion made her début. Above 300 invitations were issued. The band of the 2nd Life Guards was in attendance.

The marriage of Viscount Lewisham and Lady Mary Coke, youngest daughter of the Earl of Leicester, was solemnised on Thursday morning at Holkham church.

It is announced from Dublin that the Lords of the Treasury have sanctioned the scheme submitted to them by the chiefs of the several divisions for the reorganising of the official staff of the Chancery and Law Offices.

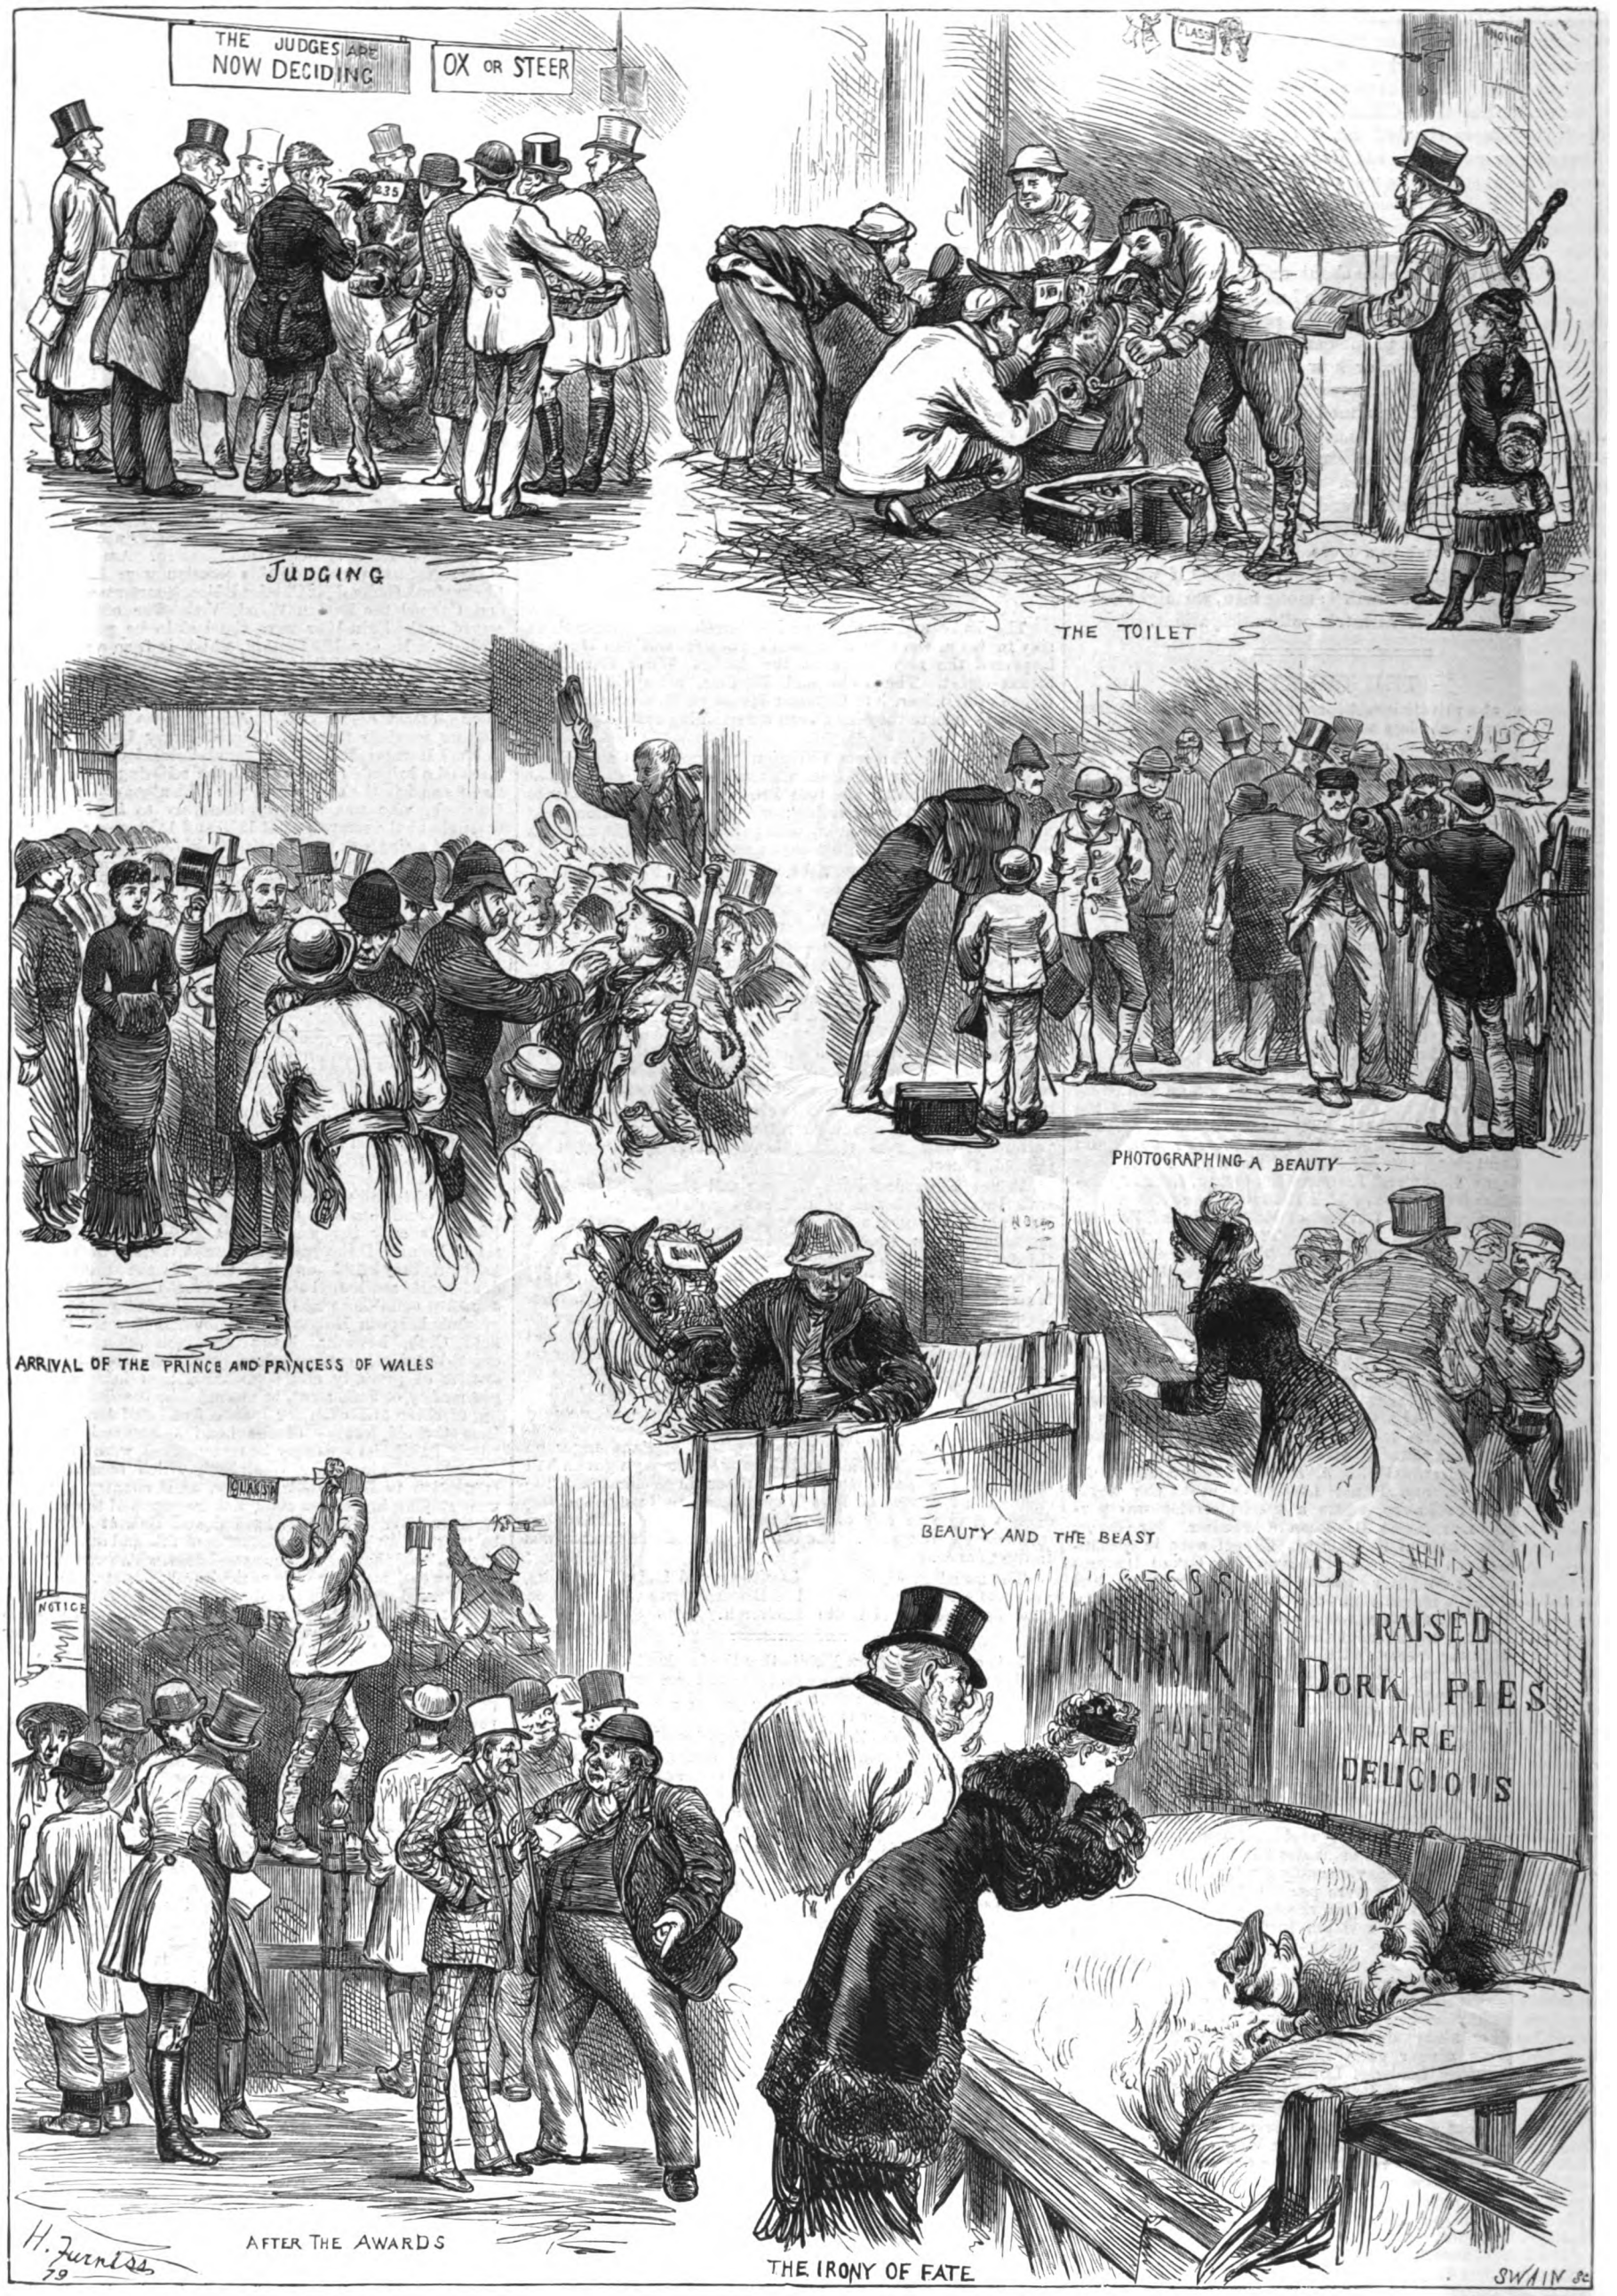
The report by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank was issued on Wednesday night. It states that during the year there has been realised from the assets of the bank £4,850,000, and from calls made on contributories £4,450,000, together £9,300,000. There have been paid in dividends to creditors £7,396,940. They will soon make a further payment, bringing the dvidend up to 15s. per pound.

It is stated that the Attorney-General has granted his fiat for a writ of error in the case of the Tichborne Claimant, upon doubts whether the Court had the power to pass a sentence of penal servitude upon each separate count of the indictment, and whether the sentence ought not to have been one of seven years' penal servitude. This period has now expired, and if the point of law should be successful, the Claimant will be at once restored to liberty.

At Wednesday's meeting of the School Board for London a letter was read from Sir Charles Reed, who is still on the Continent, thanking the board for having re-elected him as chairman. The organisation of the Bye-laws and the Industrial Schools Committees again engaged a good deal of the time of the Board. The result was the passing of a resolution suspending for six months action on the resolution agreed to at the previous meeting, and authorising the constitution in the meantime of the two Committees in the ordinary way and with their former duties. A gift of £200 from Mrs. Charles Buxton and Mr. Sydney Buxton towards a scholarship for boys was announced. The clerk of the Clothworkers' Company had written that it was the intention of that Company to continue the grant of four scholarships of an average value of £30 per annum, tenable for four years; and he hopes before midsummer to be able to announce the grant of an annual scholarship of the same value for the benefit of girls. The Board adjourned over Christmas, till the 7th of next month.

THE QUEEN AND HER OFFICERS.

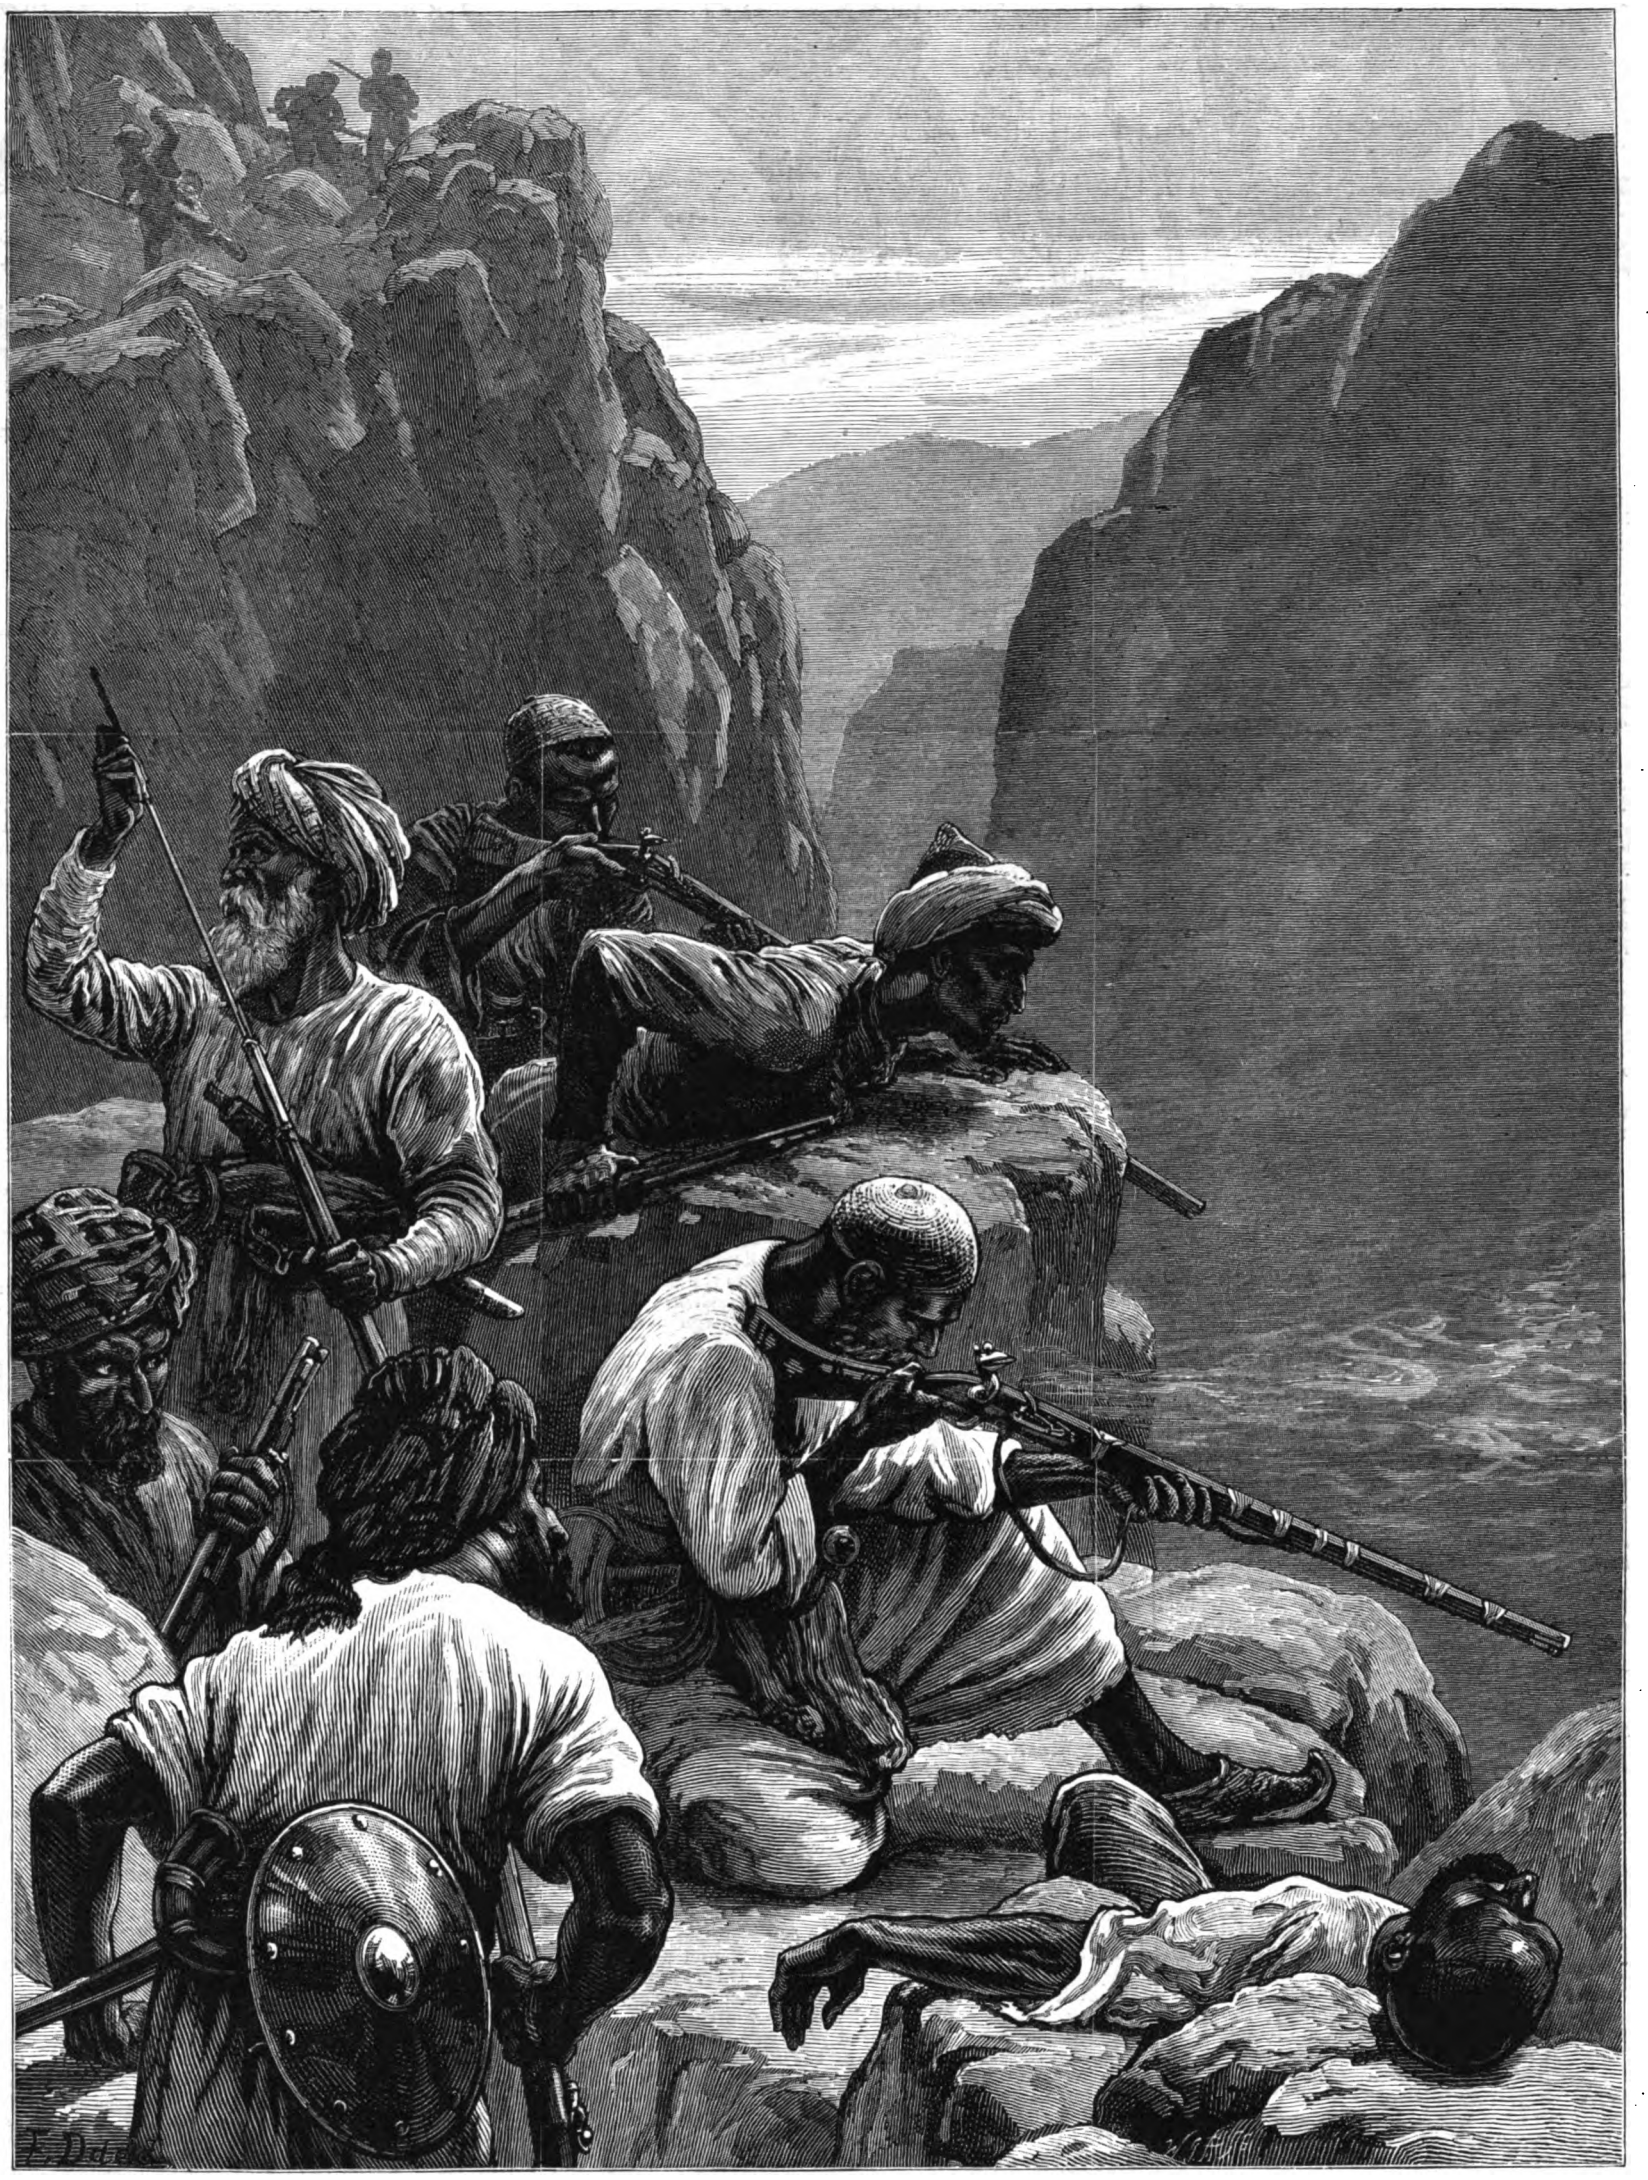
Our front-page Engraving is an Illustration of the scene in the White Drawing-Room of Windsor Castle on Monday week when her Majesty personally decorated with the insignia of her Order of the Bath six newly-appointed Knights Commanders and twenty-four Companions of that Order, most of whom have earned these honours by their conduct and service in the late Afghan and Zulu Wars. The Knights were Commissary-General Sir Edward Strickland, Lieutenant-General Sir Samuel Browne, Major-General Sir Michael Biddulph, Sir Henry Drummond Wolff (Civil Service), Rear-Admiral Sir Francis Sullivan, and Colonel Sir Owen Tudor Burne. The gentlemen invested with the dignity of C.B. were Colonel Glyn, 24th Regiment, Colonel Elgee, R.A., Colonel Walker, Scots Guards, Colonel C. K. Pearson, late 3rd Buffs, Lieutenant-Colonel A. H. Lindsay, R.A., Colonel Blyth, late 40th Regiment, Colonel R. B. Chichester, Colonel W. Stirling, R.A., Deputy-Surgeon-General Hendley, Captain Eyre Massey Shaw, London Fire Brigade, Major-General Newdigate, Captain R. Bradshaw, R.N., Colonel Drury Lowe, 17th Lancers, Colonel Whitehead, 58th Regiment, Captain Fletcher Campbell, R.N., Lieut.-Colonel Welman, 99th Regiment, Lieut.-Colonel Pemberton, 60th Rifles, Lieut.-Colonel Tatton Butler Brown, R.A., Lieutenant-Colonel Parnell, 3rd Buffs, Lieutenant-Colonel Mansfield Clarke, 57th Regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel J. North Crealock, 95th Regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel Harness, R.A., Commissary E. W. H. Webb, and Surgeon-Major Cuffe. Two others, Major-General H. W. Palmer, 90th Regiment, and Lieutenant-Colonel Gilbert, 13th Regiment, were kept from attending by illness. The Queen was accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein. Among the guests of her Majesty present on this occasion were Lord and Lady Chelmsford, General Sir Charles Ellice, Quartermaster-General, and Colonel Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C. The officers who had served in the Zulu War were the last to be presented to her Majesty. In our Illustration, which is from a sketch by an eye-witness, Colonel Pearson, who commanded the garrison in the defence of Ekowe, is seen kneeling before the Queen, who is in the act of fastening the Cross of the Order of the Bath to the breast of his coat. Among those who appear here waiting for their turn are Colonel Drury Lowe, Lieutenant-Colonel Harness, R.A.; Lieutenant-Colonel Clarke, who commanded a brigade from the time the relieving force for Ekowe was formed to the end of the war; Lieutenant-Colonel North Crealock, who was Military Secretary to Lord Chelmsford throughout the campaigns of 1878 and 1879, never absent from his chief a single day; Commissary Webb, and Surgeon-Major Cuffe, whose services in Zululand have not been forgotten. The Queen was attended by the Duchess of Wellington and Lady Abercromby, with the Gentleman in Waiting and the Master of the Household. On the next day, her Majesty personally decorated with the Victoria Cross three other officers, Lieutenant-Colonel W. Knox Leet, 13th Light Infantry; Captain E. P. Leach, R.E.; and Lieutenant Reginald Hart, R.E., with Corporal W. Allan, 24th Regiment, and gave medals to four soldiers.



THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

Smithfield, to the younger generation of Londoners and Christmas visitors to London, is little more than a name. They have read in history that the Protestant Martyrs were burned there, in the cruel reign of Queen Mary, and they may have heard likewise, from their fathers, how, in the kind reign of our beloved Queen Victoria, cattle and sheep were sold there, and slaughtering was practised by the butchers in yards and sheds around this East Central place of metropolitan traffic. But it is only the middle-aged man who has a personal remembrance of the great live-meat market that used to be held in Smithfield on the site of the present greater dead-meat market, before the City Corporation provided a more suitable place for that business in the open grounds between Holloway and Camden Town. The Smithfield Club, however, being an association of graziers, cattle-breeders, cattle-dealers, and carcase-butchers, with owners of property and commercial men interested in this commodity of flesh meat, to promote the breeding and fattening of sheep and oxen for human food, still derives its name from the old locality of the London wholesale trade. Its yearly Exhibitions, as may be remembered, were formerly held in Baker-street, at the West End, which seemed a sort of concession to fashionable society, as if country squires who were staying in London could not be expected to come far out of their way. The great Agricultural Hall at Islington was built partly for the accommodation of this and other periodical or occasional shows, as of horses and dogs, which would be attractive to gentlemen from the agricultural districts. Here it was, in the usual course, on the Monday and following days of last week, that the eighty-second annual cattle show of the Smithfield Club was held; and our readers cannot wish us to repeat the stereotyped phrase, "with success equal to any that has preceded it." The truth is, that any comparison would be more or less fallacious without a most precise and accurate knowledge of technical and statistical details, which we have no pretension to understand; so, leaving all that to him whose "talk is of bullocks," we simply invite the reader, in company with the Artist of our Sketches, to stroll through the Cattle Show for a few minutes, and to observe the humours and manners of people there assembled. They are portrayed in a variety of acts and attitudes; dressing up the beauties of the show with an elaborate toilet; admiring, judging, photographing, almost fondling, those magnificent confections of living flesh and fat, "bovine, ovine, and porcine," as a certain reporter used to say; the beasts have their glory and the profitable brutes their praise. "Breeding in all its branches" is to be the honoured toast of the evening, notwithstanding any little disappointment "after the awards;" and it is not till the Christmas week that the butcher's knife will inflict "the irony of fate" upon the proudest specimens of thriving animal gluttony that wallow in the pens and stalls of this most pleasing and promising Exhibition. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, following the example of his late Royal Highness the Prince Consort, visited the Smithfield Cattle Show; and we hope that the well-managed farm at Sandringham will be prosperously conducted in this and all other departments of stock and produce.

Intending exhibitors from the United Kingdom to the Melbourne International Exhibition are reminded that the last day for receiving entries is Dec. 31, at the offices at the Agent-General for Victoria, 8, Victoria-chambers, Westminster.



The First Lord of the Admiralty presided on Tuesday evening at the festival of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools, held at the Cannon-street Hotel. The result of an appeal made by the right hon. gentleman was a list of subscriptions amounting in all to over two thousand guineas, including fifty guineas contributed by himself.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

We regret to say that very bad news of the British Army in the occupation of Cabul has reached us this week. A formidable rising of the people around Cabul, joined with the late Ameer's troops which had rallied at Ghuzni, has recaptured the commanding positions on the heights above the capital, fighting several days against detached British forces, which were not, upon the whole, sufficient to resist their junction and further progress, obliging General Sir F. Roberts, last Sunday, to abandon the city, and to collect his small army in the Sherpur cantonments, two miles out of Cabul; but there seems to be no fear that he will be unable to defend himself in this position. The city population is supposed to have risen against the British authority, as none of our troops remained in the city, and the fortified precinct of the Bala Hissar was abandoned before.

The following communication, by telegraph, dated last Monday from Cabul, has appeared in the Times, and seems the clearest attempt to summarise the important events of the last few days:—

"General Roberts has known for some time that he had to face the likelihood of several gatherings of malcontents. One of these, which had its origin in the neighbourhood of Ghuzni, and was supported by the preaching of some noted fanatical mollahs, took substance near Maidan. Another was in Kohistan, a third in Zaimukht, and the last in Logar. As these gatherings menaced the peace of the country, General Roberts determined to take action. General Baker, therefore, marched on the 9th with four mountain guns, five troops of the 5th Punjaub Cavalry, 450 men of the 92nd Highlanders, and 450 men of the 5th Punjaub Infantry, taking such circuitous routes, by Char-Asiab and across the Cabul river, as would place him behind the Ghuzni gathering at Maidan and cut off the retreat upon Ghuzni. General Macpherson, with a squadron of the 9th Lancers, a squadron of the 14th Bengal Lancers, four guns, a mountain battery, the 67th Regiment of Foot, 900 men of the 3rd Sikhs, and the 5th Goorkhas, marched in the direction of Urghundeh on the Ghuzni road, with orders, by an appearance of timidity and hesitation, to draw on the Ghuzni insurgents, who were known to have a desire to make a junction with the Kohistan people. He was then to interpose between the two bodies and prevent their junction, and either defeat the Ghuzni insurgents or drive them back on General Baker. On the 10th inst. General Macpherson had an action with the Kohistan insurgents, whose movements for a junction were quicker than those of the Ghuzni men. He easily drove them back northward, with only Colonel FitzHugh wounded. He was then joined by General Roberts, who upon his arrival ordered that General Macpherson should move the next day along the road towards Urghundeh, and that Brigadier-General Massy, with a small force of Horse Artillery and Cavalry, should co-operate with him by the valley road. The Ghuzni insurgents, if not beaten by General Macpherson and Brigadier-General Massy, would then be thrown back. Brigadier-General Massy, who advanced too confidently through a difficult country, intersected with watercuts and studded with walled villages, suddenly found himself confronted by the Ghuzni insurgents in great force. Loth to retire as prudence dictated, he opened fire with his guns, but without checking the advance of the enemy. The cavalry charged in order that time might be given for the guns to be extricated, but the enemy were too numerous and the charge was repulsed. A second desperate charge was attempted, with a similar result. In attempting to withdraw the guns they got into difficulties, were upset in the watercuts, and passed for some time into the hands of the enemy. The gunners and cavalry retreated, covered by the 14th Lancers. General Roberts, who had ridden out from the camp, rallied a portion in the direction of Dehtimozang, and Captain Deane, a volunteer on the Staff, rallied some others. Colonel Macgregor, Chief of the Staff, met the latter party, and under his direction and guidance the guns, which, fortunately, the enemy could not carry away, were recovered. No words of praise are too great for this action. The enemy, triumphant from Brigadier-General Massy's mishap, had in the meantime marched towards Cabul, and would have entered the city but that General Roberts, with great forethought, had guarded the Dehtimozang defile with two companies of the 72nd Regiment, who were reinforced by the cavalry he had rallied. General Macpherson, hearing Brigadier-General Massy's guns, had forthwith altered his route accordingly and pressed the enemy's rear, without, however being able to bring them to close action. The insurgents, finding themselves between General Macpherson and General Roberts, betook themselves to the hills about the city. General Macpherson encamped for the night at Dehtimozang. In the meanwhile excellent arrangements were made for the defence. Sherpur is much denuded of troops. General Roberts returned from Dehtimozang in the evening, riding through the city, which was perfectly tranquil.

"On the 12th inst. General Macpherson was instructed to dislodge the enemy from the position which they had taken on the hills above the city, and from which they had made during the night several determined attacks upon the hills commanding the Bala Hissar, which post, however, was gallantly held by a picket of the 72nd Regiment. The possession of this hill would give the insurgents ready access to the city. General Macpherson's attack was directed from this picket hill against a very steep conical hill called Taktishah, which was held in great force by the enemy. The attacking force, which was commanded by Colonel Noel Money, consisted of 200 men of the 67th Regiment, 150 men of the 3rd Sikhs, a wing of the 5th Goorkhas, and two mountain guns. The ground to be covered by the attacking party was very extensive, and the progress of the troops was slow, owing to the nature of the ground and the determined resistance of the enemy. Night approached before the final assault could be made, and the importance of success was so great that General Roberts ordered the attack to be suspended for the night, the troops holding the ground they had gained, and he also made arrangements for renewing the attack yesterday. This he was enabled to do by the arrival of the Guides and the return of General Baker late at night. Accordingly yesterday morning General Baker marched, with 500 men of the 92nd Guide Infantry, 200 men of the 3rd Sikhs, the 5th Punjaub Cavalry, four mountain guns, and Craster's Battery, with orders to ascend the ridge, of which Taktishah is the culminating point from Benishahr, and aid Colonel Money by a strong flank attack. General Baker found the enemy in great force at and about the point of ascent, also on the ridge itself. A column of attack was immediately formed, two companies of the 92nd Highlanders, under Major White, leading the way, and advanced with the greatest determination, only halting occasionally for breath. The enemy receded before this steady advance, and would not wait the final assault. As the Highlanders approached the summit they streamed away, and Colonel Money occupied it unopposed a few minutes before the Highlanders could reach it. Meanwhile large numbers of the tribesmen and Sepoys who had spent the night in the neighbouring villages attacked General Baker's troops left at the foot of the heights and spread themselves over the country as far as Siahsung. These were not finally dispersed until General Baker was rejoined by the troops from the hills and until the cavalry were dispatched in several directions from Sherpur. In this service all the cavalry had an opportunity of distinguishing themselves. The Guide Cavalry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, made two very effective charges. The city remained quiet, but the outskirts and General Baker's rear had to be cleared, the latter by some companies of the 5th Punjaub Infantry, for on the smallest success the population would have joined the insurgents. The combination against us, which is, doubtless, strong, and received some encouragement from the unfortunate event of Thursday, has met with a severe check from our successes yesterday, and will probably soon collapse, and the bodies still in arms against us will be promptly attacked and our future position improved by certain measures of severity and precaution which recent events have suggested. The troops are in excellent spirits and ready for any work."

The loss during last week in the various affairs up to Friday night were forty-two killed, of whom six were officers, and seventy-six wounded, of whom nine were officers. Among the officers killed are Hardy, R.H.A.; Batson, Hearsey, and Ricardo, of the 9th Lancers. The wounded officers were Cleland, Mackenzie, Chisholm, and Trower, of the 9th Lancers; Lieutenants Fasken and Cook, of the 3rd Sikhs; Colonel Fitzhugh and Major Cook, V.C., of the 5th Goorkhas; and Lieutenant Ferguson, of the 72nd Highlanders. On Saturday the additional losses were nineteen killed, including Captain Spens and Lieutenant Gaisford, 72nd Highlanders; eighty-eight wounded, including Captain Gordon, 92nd, Captain Battye, Guides, and Lieutenant Egerton, 72nd.

A despatch to the Viceroy from General Roberts on Sunday reported continuous fighting. The enemy were still advancing in great force, and General Roberts had decided to collect his forces within the Sherpur cantonment, giving up the heights above the city. General Gough, from Gundamuk, and General Arbuthnot, from Jellalabad, have been ordered up to Cabul. Reinforcements are being dispatched to replace the troops at those points, but it must be some days before any reinforcements can reach General Roberts. The brigades which he has ordered up to his support are at Gundamuk and Jellalabad, and comprise the 6th Carabineers, I Battery C Brigade R.H.A., 9th Foot, 51st Light Infantry, a mountain battery, the 10th Bengal Lancers, 24th, 39th, and 45th Native Infantry, 2nd and 4th Goorkhas; but it will be impossible to move these troops forward until reinforcements have arrived to take their places. However, the Sherpur cantonments are intrenched, and Sir F. Roberts has, or had, five months' supplies within them.

By the latest news to the hour of this writing, dated Wednesday evening from Calcutta, we learn that the telegraphic communication of the Indian Government with Cabul is interrupted near the Jugdulluk Pass, between that city and Jellalabad; and General Gough reports that the tribes along that road are now obstructing his advance. Orders have been given to keep in India the 1st battalion of the 5th Regiment, the 59th, and the 73rd, which had received their leave to come home. The Queen has sent a message of approval and encouragement to the army in Afghanistan.

Our Illustratrations this week comprise a view of the Lahore gate of the Bala Hissar, the fortified precinct of Cabul; one of the interior of the late British Residency, from a sketch by Surgeon W. A. Simmonds, and one of a party of Afghan hillmen attacking a convoy, upon which they fire down from the rocks above the road.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The resignations of M. Le Royer, the Minister of Justice, and M. Rene Goblet, under Secretary of State for the same department, were announced yesterday week in the Journal Officiel.

Both Chambers met on the 11th inst. In the Senate Marshal Canrobert made a personal explanation in reply to some recent attacks on the occasion of his re-election. He said that as a soldier and Marshal he had no right to be hostile to the Government, but owed obedience to the laws; and that though as a honest man he had a political opinion and cherished recollections of a family which had undergone many misfortunes, he enforced that opinion on none, and should not tolerate opposition to the Government under his orders as Marshal. He hoped the army would never meddle with politics; for if it ever did so, it would speedily destroy both itself and the country. He had been denounced as one of the coup d'etat, but he was wholly ignorant of the preparation or execution of that step, and so far from ordering the people on the boulevards to be fired upon, he stopped the firing. The firing was an absurdity, and no General would ever have ordered it. It was doubtless the work of young conscripts. The vote for a new professorship of the history of religions at the Collége de France was opposed by M. Laboulaye, but agreed to by 140 to 124; and after a discussion on Congregational schools, in which M. Jules Ferry denied that the Government made war against Catholicism, the Budget votes were completed. In the Chamber of Deputies M. Lepère submitted a vote of 5,000,000f. out of this year's surplus for the aid of the sufferers from the deficiency of the crops and the exceptional severity of the present winter. The proposition was discussed at once and adopted, with three dissentients. The Chamber of Deputies agreed last Saturday to the proposal for the rebuilding of the General Post Office at Paris. The Chamber also agreed to suspend the prosecution of M. Baudry d'Asson for his speech at the Legitimist banquet, and to a repayment of 64,000,000f. to the Bank of France out of the year's surplus; but rejected a proposal to pay 3,500,000f. to the bank as partial compensation for its enforced advance of 16,000,000f. to the Commune. The Budget Committee contended that the bank had received indirect compensation to the amount of 1,500,000f. per annum by a reduction of the bank-note stamp duty, and the Chamber adopted the view of the Committee. On Monday an unexpected question arose concerning Roumania in the Chamber, on M. Louis Legrand asking whether the Government were prepared to recognise its independence. Mr. Waddington reminded the House that it was the French Plenipotentiaries who were chiefly instrumental at Berlin in obtaining for Roumania an increase of territory in compensation for the loss of Bessarabia. She was now engaged with other Powers in negotiations which he hoped would soon end in the recognition of Roumanian independence. The Chamber subsequently voted the credit of 80,000,000f. asked for by the Government for the construction and repairing of country roads.

During the coming recess a new Cabinet will practically be formed, through the process of filling up the posts left vacant. Lockroy's interpellation of the Government on the subject of the amnesty was on Tuesday made in the Chamber of Deputies, and resulted in the "order of the day" being voted by 250 members against 50.

The French Society of Water Colour Painters opened on Wednesday evening an exhibition of oil paintings.

Baron de Bourqueney, a Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour, and formerly Receiver-General of Finances, died a few days since at the age of eighty-eight. He was the brother of Count de Bourqueney, and Ambassador under the Empire, and the second French Plenipotentiary at the Congress of Paris in 1856.

M. Claude Etienne Minié, the inventor of the rifle which bears his name, died in Paris on Sunday. He was born in Paris in 1804, and took part as a private soldier in several campaigns in Algeria. His good conduct brought him promotion, and it was as captain in a battalion of chasseurs that he conceived the idea of improving the muskets used in the army. He became an instructor of musketry at Vincennes, and in this capacity introduced fresh changes into the construction of fire-arms. He retired in 1858.

SPAIN.

Last Saturday the King and Queen, while driving in the Atocha-street, at Madrid, met a priest, who was taking the last sacraments to a dying man. Their Majesties immediately alighted from their carriage and lent it to the priest, following on foot, amid the acclamations of the populace.

Señor Canovas del Castillo, the new Premier, gave explanations in the Chamber of Deputies, on the 11th inst., as to the causes of the recent Ministerial crisis. At the conclusion of his remarks the Constitutional minority asked for further information on the subject. Señor Canovas del Castillo stated that he was obliged to go to the Senate, but would return immediately in order to reply to the interpellation. Against this course the Constitutional Deputies protested, and considerable excitement arose, in the midst of which the President put on his hat and declared the sitting of the Chamber closed. All the groups of the Opposition have decided not to enter the House again until explanations have been given by Señor Canovas del Castillo. He declines to offer an apology, maintaining that he has not committed any breach of privilege. Delegates have been nominated by the Committee of the Senators and Deputies appointed at the recent meeting of the members of the Opposition to propose to the various sections of the Ministry a definite plan of action to be followed by them in the present difficult situation.

Bad news, it is stated, has been received from Cuba. The Minister of War has received the resignations of several Generals. The new Colonial Minister has, by telegraph, informed the Commander-in-Chief in Cuba that the Government will dispatch from Spain the means required to effect the complete suppression of the insurrection, and will also carry out the economical reforms in Cuba in such a manner as to reconcile all interests.

PORTUGAL.

A despatch received from Lisbon, dated Sunday, states that the King and the Royal family, with the Austrian Archduke Regnier and the Archduchess, have gone by rail to the ancient Palace of Villa Vicosa.

ITALY.

In Monday's sitting of the Chamber of Deputies Signor Baccarini, Minister of Public Works, brought in a bill to authorise extraordinary expenditure to the amount of 12,000,000 lire, for the purpose of immediately executing works of a local character in communes where the inhabitants are in a state of poverty. The Committee on the bill for increasing the military expenditure have approved the principle of the measure. Signor Villa, the Minister of Justice, in reply to a question with regard to the reported sale by the Vatican of the majolica collection at the Castelgandolfo Palace, said that the Government had ordered the seizure of the plates in question, considering that they had a full right to take that step.

Signor Depretis has been re-elected at Stradella.

GERMANY.

Count Schouvaloff arrived at Berlin on Thursday, the 11th inst., on his way to St. Petersburg. Early in the afternoon he was received by the Emperor, and subsequently paid a visit to the Crown Prince of Germany. The Count left Berlin early last Saturday morning on a visit to Prince Bismarck at Varzin.

Lord Dufferin, who spent Sunday and Monday with Prince Bismarck at Varzin, left Berlin on Monday night in company with Count Schouvaloff for St. Petersburg.

By a considerable majority, the Federal Council on Tuesday adopted the bill fixing the legislative period of the German Reichstag at four years, and providing that the Budgets for the Empire shall only be presented every two years.

In the Lower House of the Prussian Diet on the 11th inst. the resolutions were agreed to which the Committee had moved as a rider to the Railway Bill. Yesterday week the Railway Purchase Bill was read the third time in the form in which it passed the second reading. During the debate Herr Bitter, Minister of Finance, stated that he had no intention of going to the Dutch and English markets to obtain greater facilities for the sale of Prussian Consols. Prussia did not want that, for by taking such a course she would fall back into the class of States which did not find in their own country the strength to maintain their credit.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Austrian Army Bill was on Saturday last unanimously passed by the Upper House of the Austrian Reichsrath in the form in which it was originally presented by the Government.

The Hungarian Government on the 11th inst. introduced in the Lower House of the Diet a bill proposing to cover a portion of the deficit for 1880 by raising the sum of 14,000,000 fl. by the issue of 15,000,000 fl. of the 140,000,000 fl. of the Gold Rente, or by a partial issue of the same and the sale of the railway shares at present invested in the name of the Government. At yesterday week's sitting the Government stated that they had taken steps to relieve the sufferers by the inundations. A telegram from Pesth states that by the overflowing of the Köros several towns are laid in ruins, and the inhabitants have taken to flight. In the comitat of Behar 10,000 persons have been rendered homeless.

On Tuesday afternoon both Delegations met at Vienna for the first time, the Austrian at one p.m. and the Hungarian at six. The business in both was the election of the Presidents, the Bureaux, and the Committees. In the Austrian Delegation Chevalier Schmerling was elected President by thirty votes against Prince Czartoryski, who received twenty-nine. In the Hungarian Delegation Cardinal-Archbishop Haynald was unanimously elected President. Count Andrassy, the Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says, has, at his own request, been elected a member of the Hungarian Delegation, and proposes to support the Government policy in the Transleithan Delegations. In both Delegations the new Minister of Foreign Affairs presented the Estimates, which are within a fraction of the same amount as those voted for the current year—4,000,000 fl. for Foreign Affairs, 93,000,000 fl. for the Army, 8,000,000 fl. for the Navy; in all, together with pensions, the Ministry of Finance, and the Court of Accounts, 108,500,000 fl., or about £10,500,000.

RUSSIA.

Arrests continue to be made in St. Petersburg, and it is said that a person in custody was found to be in possession of a detailed plan of the Winter Palace. Several reports were published last Saturday morning of a plot to destroy the life of the Czar by blowing up the Winter Palace at St. Petersburg. The Berlin correspondent of the Standard, however, is of opinion that the story has been concocted "for export purposes exclusively." Any one (the correspondent says) acquainted with the Winter Palace—a structure about three times as large as Buckingham Palace—would smile at the idea of the building being blown up except by enormous quantities of explosive material. In keeping with this amusing detail is the statement that the conspirators, humanely tempering rigour with leniency, gave the Emperor a chance of escape by suggesting the surrender of his authority to a Parliament. An authoritative statement which has been published at St. Petersburg asserts that the reports in some of the foreign newspapers that renewed attempts against the life of the Czar had been made or were in contemplation are partly gross exaggerations and partly absolute inventions. It is admitted, however, that in their search for the authors of the attempt to blow up the Emperor's train at Moscow the police have made numerous arrests leading to discoveries which point to the conclusion that fresh crimes are meditated by the Nihilist conspirators.

The Daily News publishes a letter from its special correspondent with the Russian expedition in Central Asia giving some further information respecting the defeat at Dengil Tepé. One indication of the loss of prestige which it has entailed has been shown by the capture of a convoy of more than forty camels by the enemy's cavalry only twenty versts from Tchikislar. A few days after the Russians fell back on Chatte the village of Avasi, near that place, was sacked and burned. More than 160 men and women were killed, and the children carried off as slaves.

ROUMANIA.

The bill for the purchase of the Roumanian railways by the State is being discussed by the Senate in committee.

On Sunday the Senate voted the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne by 31 votes against one.

AMERICA.

The House of Representatives at Washington have adopted a resolution for the appointment of a committee to consider matters relating to the projected interoceanic canal.

A telegram from Philadelphia states that General Grant arrived there on Tuesday morning, and was enthusiastically received. A long procession was formed to precede him to his residence. The day was observed as a holiday, and a grand banquet was to be given in his honour in the evening.

The ex-Confederate General William Mahone, leader of the Debt Readjustment party in Virginia, has been elected United States Senator for Virginia.

CANADA.

A telegram from Ottawa states that Mr. Hugh Nelson has been appointed a member of the Dominion Senate.

Intelligence received at Victoria, British Columbia, states that the Indians at Kamloops are much excited in consequence of several murders having been committed by half-breed outlaws. The Indians have barricaded themselves in a log-house, where they are besieged by settlers. A police force from Victoria has started for Kamloops. An Indian rising is apprehended.

SOUTH AFRICA.

News has been received from the Cape to Nov. 25. Moirosi's mountain was successfully stormed and taken on Nov. 20, after having been shelled for three days. The enemy's loss was great, and amongst the killed was Moirosi himself; he was shot through the neck, and his body was found in a cave. Our casualties were two whites wounded and two natives killed.

The attack on Secocoeni's stronghold was to take place on the 28th ult.

INDIA.

Lord Lytton was fired at by a drunken East Indian as he was riding into Calcutta on the evening of the 12th inst. Two shots were fired at his carriage and one at the carriage which followed. No one was hurt, and the assassin was arrested by the Viceroy's Staff. A Reuter's telegram states that he is a Eurasian, belonging to a respectable family, and was formerly in the Government employ. He had been recently discharged from the Allahabad Lunatic Asylum.

Particulars of the fighting with the tribes near Cabul are given in another column.

AUSTRALIA.

We learn through Reuter's agency that on the 10th inst. the Hon. James Watson, the Colonial Treasurer, made his financial statement in the New South Wales Legislative Assembly. After showing that the large accumulated surplus accruing from the revenue of previous years had been absorbed to the extent of £1,500,000 during the last Session for public works, comprising buildings of great general importance, such as had been formerly provided for by loans, he proceeded to state that there remained a balance of nearly £1,000,000, which it was proposed to reduce, by other works and services of a similar nature, to £600,000. The Treasurer next pointed out that in consequence of the temporary falling-off of the land sales, which he had not anticipated when making his last financial statement, there would be a diminution of income for 1879 of £200,000, which he proposed to charge against the remaining balance of the surplus of previous years. With regard to the revenue and expenditure for 1880, he estimated that the income would fall short of last year's receipts by £220,000, principally because a continued reduction of the sale of land by auction must be anticipated. To meet the deficiency and to provide for contingent and unforeseen charges, the Treasurer proposed to increase the direct and indirect taxation by over £400,000 annually, of which £350,000 would be received next year. A part of his scheme was to reimpose the stamp duties, which had been in operation for nearly ten years prior to 1875 There would be, however, a slight modification in these duties embodying the principle of an income tax in the form of stamped receipts, which would admit of expansion as the necessities of the State required increase of revenue. Mr. Watson further proposed to raise the duties in the present tariff as follows:—Spirits, 2s. a gallon; sparkling wines, 4s. a gallon; still wines, 1s. a gallon; manufactured tobacco, 6d., and leaf tobacco, 3d. a pound; all beer and porter, 3d. a gallon. The excise duties on tobacco manufactured in the colony would also be raised by 3d., and those on all kinds of beer and porter by 3d. a gallon. Apart from the falling-off in the land sales, the revenue was at present in a more healthy condition than could be expected, considering the depression in trade and commerce during the last two years. As a revival in trade was now taking place, he (Mr. Watson) felt justified in speaking hopefully of the future. The taxation in New South Wales was considerably less than in any other Australian colony. It was not the intention of the Government to float any portion of the last authorised loan for some time, as a balance of £1,200,000 of previous loans was still to be negotiated. The Treasurer concluded his statement by declaring that the cash balances standing to the credit of the Government, on all accounts, exceeded £3,000,000. Mr. Watson's speech and his financial proposals were favourably received by the House.

In consequence of the result of the vote in the Melbourne Legislative Assembly on the Constitutional Reform Bill, the Government have decided to abandon the measure, and have at the same time recommended the Governor to dissolve the Parliament. His Excellency has acquiesced.

The Official Gazette of Copenhagen publishes a Declaration, signed by the representatives of Great Britain and Denmark, providing for the mutual protection of trade marks.

Reports have reached Athens from Corfu that two Englishmen, who lately left the island for Epirus, have been captured by brigands, who demand a ransom of £4000.

Prince Charles has telegraphed to M. Gueschoff, the President of the Provincial Assembly of Eastern Roumelia, inviting him to accept a Ministerial post in Bulgaria.

A famine is reported to have broken out in the province of Van, in Armenia, and the inhabitants are emigrating. Subscriptions have been opened by the Patriarch for the sufferers.

Tuesday's Gazette contains the terms of the treaty concluded between Great Britain and the Swiss Confederation for the extradition of criminals.

News has reached New York by way of Colorado that a fight occurred on the 15th inst. between a hundred Apaches and a party of Mexicans from Chihuahua, in which eighty of the Indians were killed and wounded.

According to accounts given in Havannah newspapers which have been received at New York, the revolution in San Domingo has been successful; business was thriving, and heavy shipments of tobacco were being made to Germany.

The ship Norval, Captain Halliday, sailed from Plymouth yesterday week for Sydney with 386 emigrants, of whom there are 45 married couples, 86 single men, 124 single women, 50 boys, 36 girls, and 6 infants. There are 187 English, 20 Scotch, 177 Irish, and 2 foreigners.

The King of the Belgians, it is announced, again offers a prize of 25,000f. or £1250, open to writers of all nationalities, for an essay on "Means for the Improvement of Harbours on Low and Sandy Coasts," such as those of Belgium. Foreign writers must send in their essays to the Ministry of the Interior at Brussels on or before Jan. 1, 1881.

A mail for the Australian and New Zealand Colonies will be made up for dispatch by the Colonial Line steam-ship City of London, leaving Plymouth for Adelaide, Melbourne, and Sydney, on Monday next. Letters must be posted at the usual hour on Saturday, and must be specially directed per steam-ship City of London, viâ Plymouth.

News from the West Coast of Africa states that two towns were burned and destroyed by the British expedition which recently proceeded up the Niger. The expedition, which was under the command of Captain Burr, R.N., consisted of a force of bluejackets and marines and a detachment of Houssas. The good effect of the punishment (a telegram says) was stated to have been felt at once, as oil and produce were coming down the river in large quantities.

The Intelligence Branch of the Quartermaster-General's Department has issued two excellent maps—the one of Sekukuna's territory and the surrounding country; the other, upon a larger scale, of Secocoeni's territory, including the rugged range known as the Lulu Mountain. These maps are of great value and interest at the present time, when the next mail will probably bring news of the attack upon Secocoeni's fortress by Colonel Baker Russell's force.

The Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph has received news that the Persian Government has decided to send an extraordinary mission to Europe, which is to proceed by way of Constantinople to Vienna, and thence to Berlin, Paris, and London, the object being to obtain a recognition of the Persian Attrek frontier, which is threatened by Russia. The Berlin correspondent of the Standard says that reinforcements are being constantly sent to Turkestan in preparation for the campaign to be begun early in the spring. The attack upon Merv, which was to have taken place this summer, is to be carried out as soon as the season permits.

POLITICAL.

The theory has been broached that the Dissolution of Parliament is near at hand because of the earlier issue than usual of certain Treasury notifications to expedite the preparation of the Estimates. A week o'ershadowed by the gloomy news of reverses at Cabul is hardly the time to give credence to the notion. It was officially notified in the London Gazette of Tuesday last that Parliament would assemble "for the dispatch of divers urgent and important affairs" on Thursday, Feb. 5 next; and, whatever, backstairs gossip may be published by oracular morning or evening prints, it appears pretty clear now that the Earl of Beaconsfield and his colleagues have resolved to ascertain the tone of St. Stephen's ere determining the date of their appeal to the country. Meantime, there are not lacking lively indications that the politically active constituencies have carefully weighed their representatives in the balance, and have formed a rough-and-ready idea of the real weight and value of their Parliamentary action. Hon. members who can stand the test of the rigid analysis of the great divisions of the present Parliament, published in the Daily News of Tuesday, may presumably feel sufficiently certain of the re-election their political fidelity entitles them to. But this seasonable list may not improbably make many backsliders shake uncomfortably in their shoes. It would be invidious to particularise these gentlemen, and it might, moreover, be deemed cruel when their sins are on the eve of finding them out.

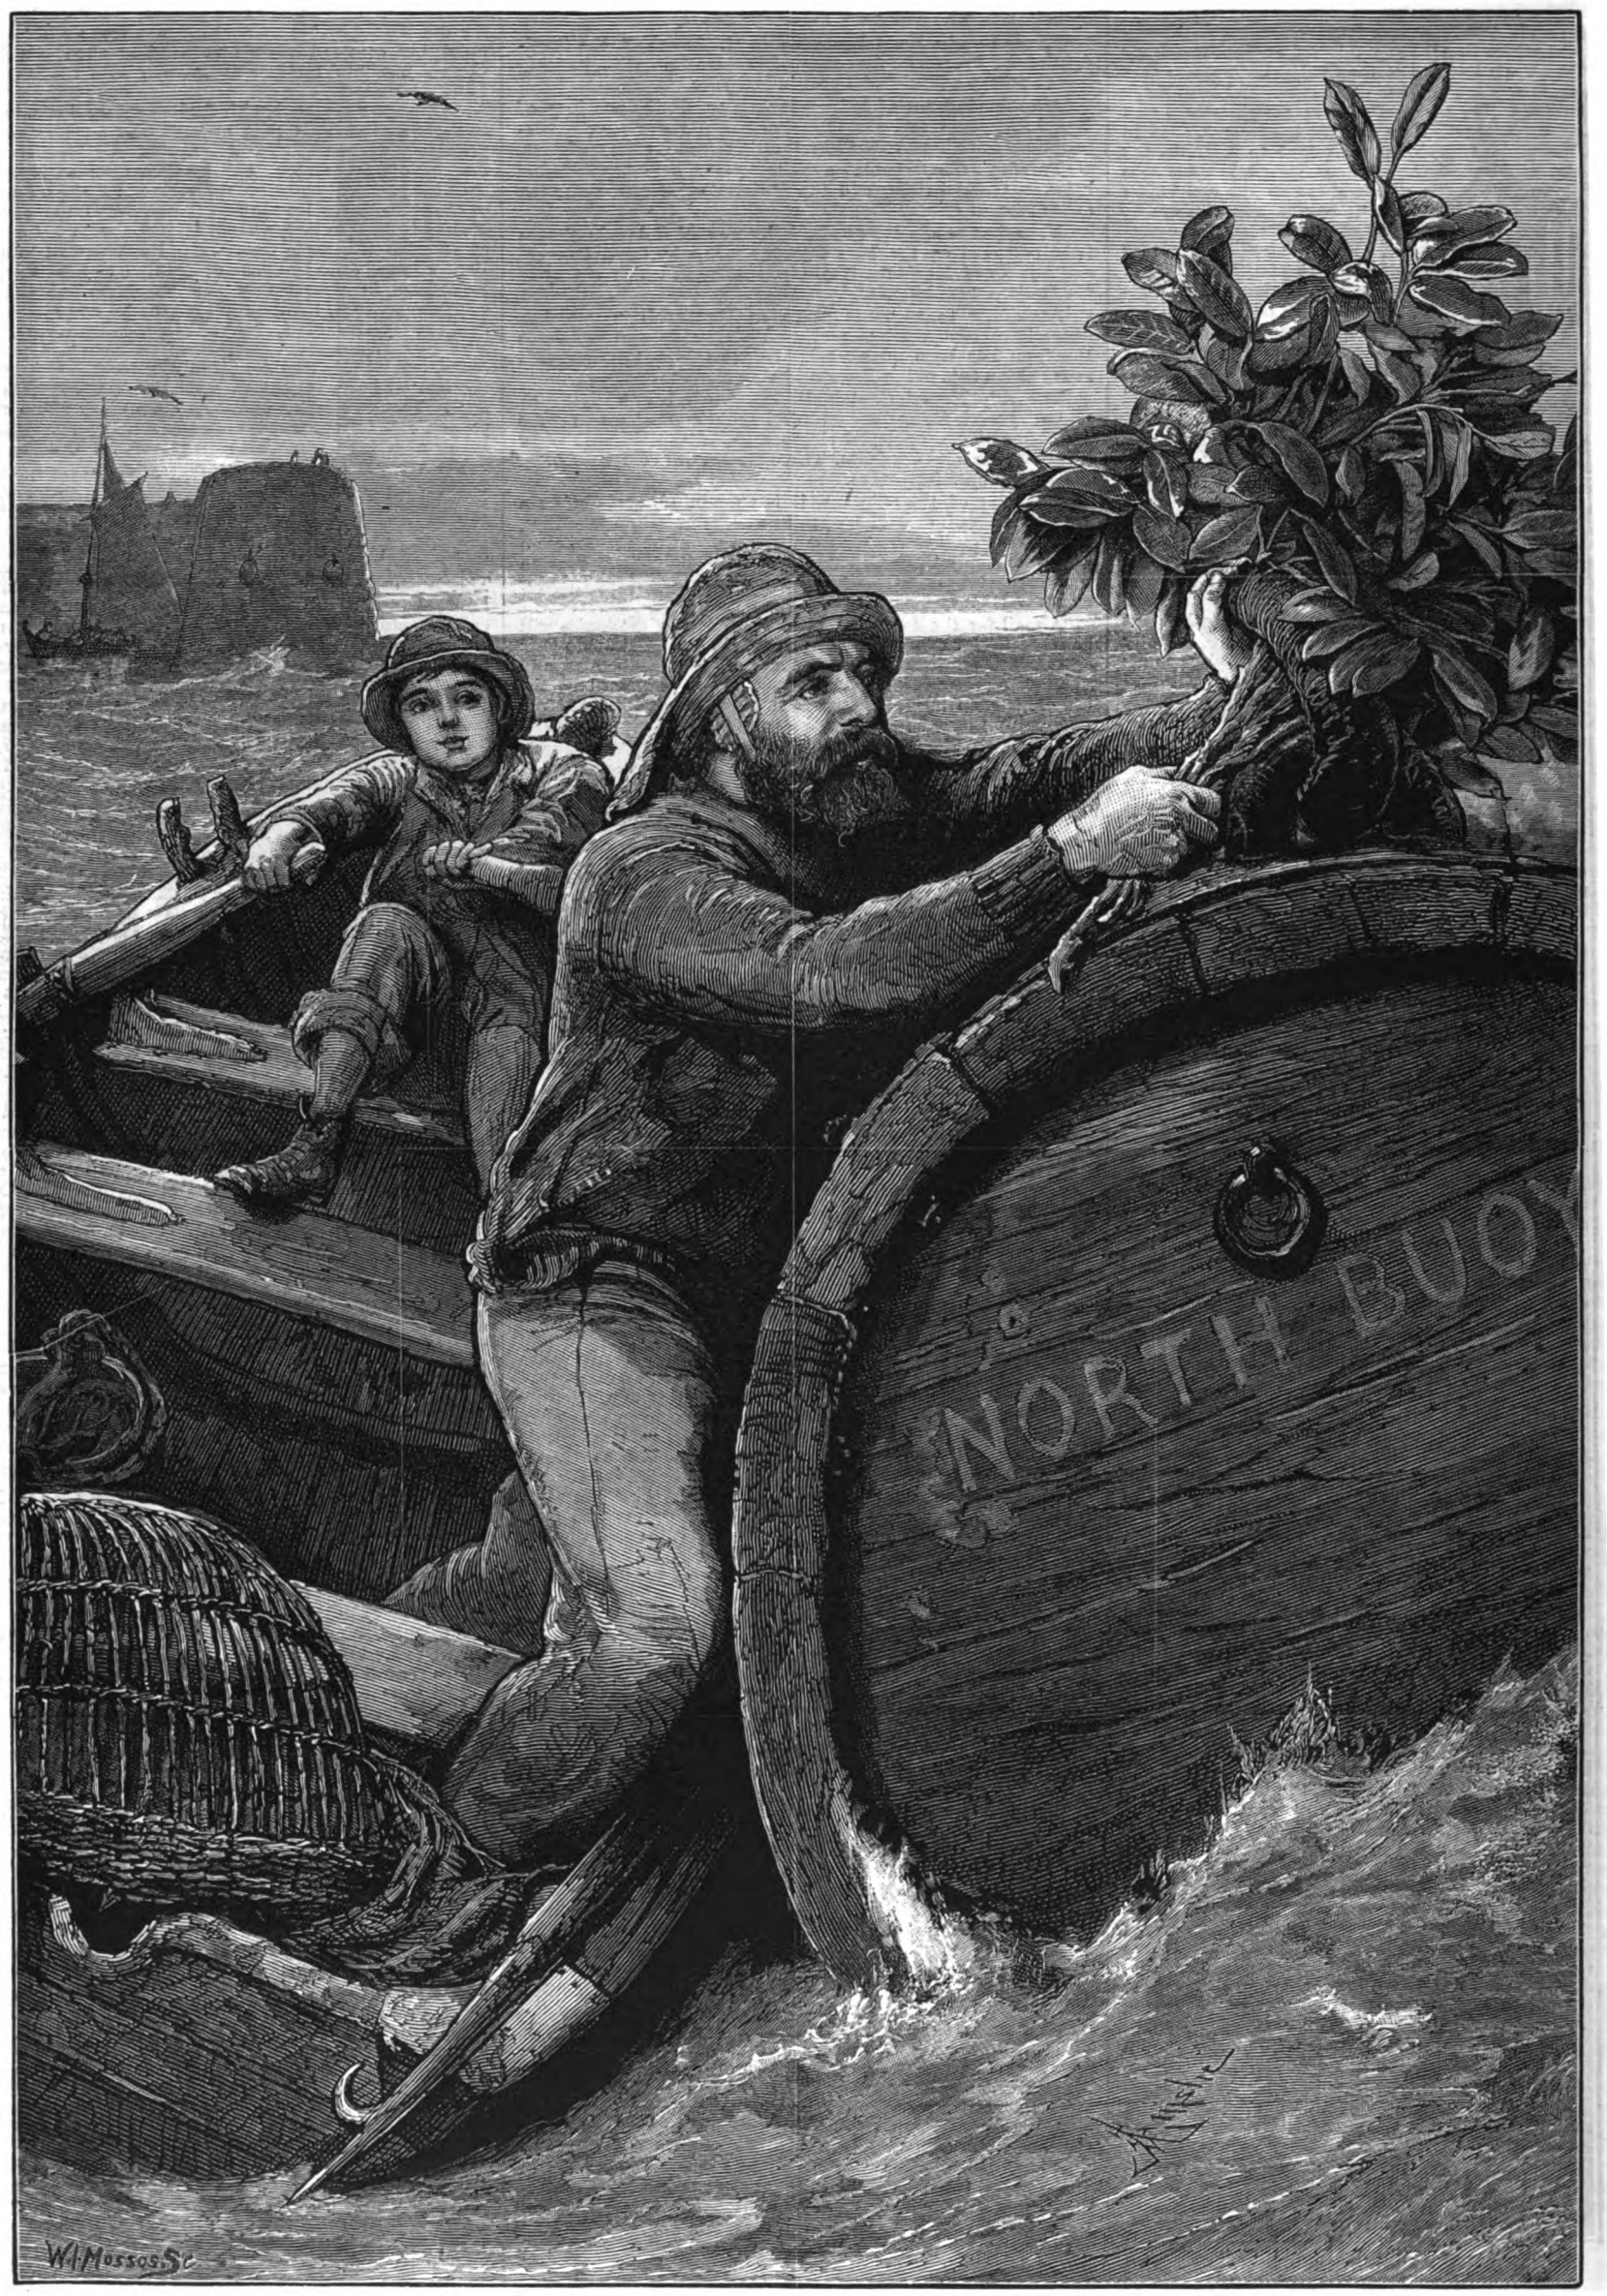
The election of a member for Sheffield in the place of the late Mr. Roebuck on Monday next is looked forward to with more than local interest; but if Mr. Waddy, Q.C., should be chosen in preference to Mr. Wortley, and Alderman Sir Robert Carden should slip into his seat for Barnstaple, the balance of parties will be the same as regards the practical point of the division list. The polling at Donegal, on the other hand, has resulted in the gain of a seat for the Liberals, the late Conservative member, Mr. Wilson, having been succeeded by Mr. Lea, who had a majority of 683 over Mr. M'Corkell, the Conservative candidate. This apparent gain, however, has to be qualified by the proverbial uncertainty of the Irish vote in the House of Commons.

The unanimity with which the majority of Ministers have avoided war topics and turned to agriculture (the Duke of Richmond has followed the Marquis of Salisbury's example in this respect) may be regarded as so far satisfactory that it possibly indicates a willingness to turn the sword into the ploughshare. We must not halloo, however, until we are out of the wood of the forthcoming Conservative demonstration in the provinces. If Ministerial utterances at this meeting be as moderate in tone as the compact and sensible speech made by Mr. W. H. Smith on the 11th inst. at the Rev. G. Blencowe's Zulu lecture in Pimlico, it would be most in accord with the fitness of things. The First Lord of the Admiralty, whilst disclaiming Ministerial responsibility for the Zulu War, said it was undesirable we should extend our responsibilities in that part of the world, and repeated the Chancellor of the Exchequer's dictum that our colonial brethren must learn that they must, as a rule, depend upon themselves for defence against internal enemies. Albeit, Sir W. Hart Dyke, the Conservative whip, spoke of himself at Tunbridge on Tuesday as a "stormy petrel," he had not a word to say as to when the Dissolution wind would set in. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, addressing his constituents at Carlisle the same day in company with his colleague, Mr. Robert Ferguson, confidently said the issue of the Donegal election foreshadowed the result of the General Election. Speaking also on Tuesday in Dublin, Mr. Parnell (who leaves for the United States to-day) did not trouble himself on this point, but confined himself to bringing about a union of the Central Tenants' Defence Association with the Irish National Land League.

Mr. Walter approaches his Parliamentary duties in a manner so devoutly impartial that he may well have been astonished yesterday week, when his support of the Ministry met with marked disfavour at a Berkshire meeting at Newbury, and even his justification of his votes did not shake off a resolution of dissatisfaction with the representation of the county. Mr. Massey seemed to be far more at home with his constituents at Tiverton the same day, when the practical mind of Mr. Baxter was exercised at Brechin, by-the-way, on the land laws, in reforming which he advocated the abolition of primogeniture, the limitation of entail and settlement, and a cheap system of transfer. In Scotland, too, Professor Blackie, in the course of a lecture on Saturday, put his foot down, and stoutly said he would vote for the Conservatives if the Liberal Party sought to disestablish the Church of Scotland. Various election movements are afoot within the metropolitan radius, the most noticeable being a meeting of Mr. Boord with his Greenwich constituents on Monday, when he was accompanied by Baron Henry de Worms, the second Conservative candidate.

CHRISTMAS DECORATIONS.

The two contrasted scenes of Morning and Night, Sea and Land, Outdoor and Indoor, rude and luxurious, manly and childish industry for the preparation of Christmas Festival Adornments have little else in common but that they might be supposed to occur on the same day of a cherished anniversary, the observance of which is equally popular with all classes of English folk. Indeed we may postulate, as an acknowledged condition of our social life, that Christmas Decorations are likely to find place at this season as well among the seafaring coast population as with the children, parents, and domestic servants of a comfortable family mansion.



DRESSING UP AN OLD BUOY.

It was not an Old Boy, but an Old Buoy—a wooden-headed fellow, who was, though of unsteady habits, and too often half-seas-over, still employed and allowed to keep his place, as a sort of sentinel, at the north entrance to a certain harbour in the Channel Islands. This rather doubtful character, with his rolling gait and frequent fits of bobbery among his nautical companions, did not claim any high degree of social respectability; but it was contrived by charitable neighbours on shore that he, too, should keep Christmas with the rest of them. He did not indeed go to Church that day, but stayed outside, like an old Heathen as he was, to worship Father Neptune with the Tritons and Mermaids and other Porpoises, when their congregation drew near from the misty offing. But there was a Missionary of Christmas observance who put forth to the seasonable reclamation of this bewildered outcast. It was Tom Tug, the harbour-master's boatman, accompanied by his son Little Jemmy, whose puny hands can already wield a pair of oars, if not making sea-way, at least so as to keep the boat close alongside of the Old North Buoy. Our Artist chanced to be a witness of this quaint and kindly performance. The honest alacrity of the good seaman, as he grappled his familiar customer, while fending off the boat with knee and elbow from harmful collision, was pleasant to see. It was a still and calm December morning, but the under-swell from the Atlantic lifted the Old Buoy and the small boat together, as if gently dandled in the lap of irresistible might. There was, to the mind of an unaccustomed landsman, something impressive and solemn in this peculiar situation. So the lonely old weather-beaten guardian of a safe channel for ships that would sail or steam that way received his Christmas greeting, with a garland of evergreen laurels to crown his rugged brow, looking forth on the Bay of Biscay and the Western Ocean.

DRESSING UP THE BLACK OLD BOY.

In the large household establishment of Mr. and Mrs. Jacob St. Vincent, who came to England with £250,000 from sugar-planting or trading and money-dealing in the West Indies, old Peter, the favourite negro footman, always held a privileged place. He had lived sixty-eight years, from the date of his birthday in the old times of legal slavery, a faithful dependent on the family of his present master, whose father, the late Sampson St. Vincent, of Muscovado Vale, in Trinidad, reared this valuable black human chattel from a well-assorted pair of bond-servants on that estate. Peter's mother, a fine healthy young woman, having been the wet-nurse by whose assistance Master Jacob's pining infancy was kept alive, it was not unnatural that, as Mr. Jacob grew up to a prosperous manhood, there should be a kindly mutual attachment between Peter and his respectable master. The era of colonial slave emancipation passed over their heads, altering the relations of a million other negroes, male and female, both field hands and house servants, to their former proprietors, some of whom, in spite of large pecuniary compensation, professed themselves ruined by the change. Peter, then a fine strong young man, but still called a "boy," as is customary with negro personal attendants, remained quite unconscious of his new social rights as a free citizen, or at least perfectly indifferent to the opportunity he now had of going out into the world to shift for himself. He never thought of leaving Mr. Jacob, nor did Mr. Jacob and Mrs. Jacob, herself the daughter and heiress of a wealthy planter, ever think it possible that honest Peter could wish to leave them. And so it has come to pass, now that the rich West Indian family have removed its abode to Porchester-terrace, Bayswater, the good old black "boy" is still an inmate of their comfortable London house. The pretty little Miss, their only child, who from her babyhood has loved Peter as dearly as sweet Eva St. Clare loved her worthy "Uncle Tom," in Mrs. Stowe's most touching story, is determined that Peter shall accept a Christmas gift from her hands, to ornament his person as he waits at the dinner-table. He is busied with his twofold office, as footman and butler, aided by the London housemaids, to set the glasses and bottles in readiness, while his mistress is coming down stairs to look after some final preparations for her expected party of guests. This is the moment when good little Marie St. Vincent, calling her old negro friend and servant, who would kiss the stool that raises her feet to enable her to reach him, is about to fasten a beautiful bouquet of flowers in the breast of his livery coat. Here is a pleasing example of Christmas Decorations, with a touch of that kindly good nature that "makes the whole world kin."

ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

No gift of the Christmas or New-Year season of friendly tokens and graceful presents would be more acceptable, to any young lady who cultivates the taste for poetry and the charming accomplishment of singing, than the volume issued by Messrs. C. Kegan Paul and Co., which we are about to mention. It is Songs from the Published Writings of Alfred Tennyson, Poet Laureate, set to music by various composers. The editor, Mr. W. G. Cusins, has performed his office with discriminating care and knowledge of the composer's and musician's art. Ten of the forty-five songs here presented have already been given to the world, in company with their music, by Messrs. Novello, Boosey and Co., Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co., L. Cock, and J. Williams, the publishers. Thirty-five are new and original, having been composed expressly for this occasion. Among the contributors to these are Sir Julius Benedict, M. Gounod, Herr Joachim Raff, Signor Ciro Pinsuti, Messrs. Arthur Sullivan, G. A. Macfarren, H. Leslie, W. G. Cusins, J. L. Hatton, and others of good repute. The music is all written in the treble clef; only a few pieces have been set as part-songs. No lady's drawing-room should be without this delightful volume, close beside her indispensable pianoforte.

An interesting topographical subject is treated with an historical and descriptive commentary by Mr. Andrew Lang, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. It is no less than Oxford, the town and the University, which theme is worthy beyond question of the publication (by Messrs. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday) that now claims our notice. This combines Mr. Lang's pleasantly written chapters, in about sixty folio pages, with ten fine etchings, by Kent-Thomas, Brunet-Debaines, and Toussaint, and fifteen vignette engravings, which represent picturesque views of the old Colleges and their precincts, and some of the churches and streets of Oxford. The text alone is quite deserving of a separate perusal; the etchings have much artistic merit, being equal to those which generally appear in the Portfolio, under Mr. P. G. Hamerton's direction.

The translation, by Mr. C. Rollin-Tilton, of that entertaining traveller Edmondo de Amicis on Morocco, its People and Places, published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, forms a handsome volume, with a large number of wood engravings from the original French designs. It is full of lively and piquant descriptions, moving figures, and groups of men and women and beasts, very different from those of any European country, with habits, manners, and sentiments of a genuine Oriental character, the romantic diversity of which is rather stimulating to our starved fancy in this age of monotonous and uniform Western civilisation. Signor De Amicis, whom we believe to be a Piedmontese, unites some of the Italian with French literary talents in his agreeable, forcible, animated vein of light narrative and discourse upon what he sees in foreign lands. His frank cheerfulness, as well as the quickness of his observation, makes him a very pleasing writer. The illustrations are of corresponding vivacity and power.

The same publishers offer, to the lovers of contemporary art-studies, a newly-opened range of critical and biographical disquisition, that which deals with American Painters, by the pen of Mr. G. W. Sheldon. Some forty of these artists, from Frederick E. Church, Sanford Gifford, and Bierstadt, to Asher Durand, Appleton Brown, Alexander Wyant, and others probably of high merit in their different ways, are here introduced. We recollect having seen pictures by Church and Bierstadt at South Kensington Exhibitions; but most of those just named are known to us only by report, and by the fine engravings in this new book, which comes to England from Messrs. Appleton and Co., of New York. It is, in some respects, the most interesting work upon a national school of art, more especially of landscape-art, that we have lately received. Mr. Sheldon has a noble appreciation of the genius and spirit of all these true masters of the interpretation of nature's beauty and sublimity in their own vast and glorious Western land. He writes of them and their subjects, without any "spread-eagle" flights of exaggeration, with perfect soberness and earnestness, but with a generous sympathy which his readers can hardly resist. His instructive explanations of their technical methods, of the drawing and colouring, and of the peculiar effects of atmosphere, light, and vegetation in that country; the characteristics of its scenery, for instance, on the shores of the Hudson, in the Adirondacs, and in many woodland, mountain, lake, and riverside places, will gratify the intelligent mind. There is equal good taste and right feeling in his accounts of the personal history of the American living artists. The illustrations, which are very finely drawn, engraved, and printed, to the number of eighty-three, present two specimens of each painter, for the most part, though in a few instances but one example; and these are quite sufficient to justify the writer's commendation of their works.

We have, upon former occasions, expressed our sincere approval of Cassell's Magazine of Art, Illustrated, the volume of which is now before us. Its contents are of an entertaining variety; but all contributing to a general and comprehensive acquaintance with the arts of design, both pictorial and decorative, the lives and works of those who practise them, especially in England and in the United States, and the available subjects and materials. The wood-engravings are in great plenty and of good quality. A work of substantial value, in which the study of natural history is presented, though by a strict scientific method, under a very attractive aspect, has been lately issued by Messrs. Cassell. It is Animal Life, Described and Illustrated, by Dr. E. Perceval Wright, Professor of Botany at the Dublin University and sometime Lecturer on Zoology there. His accounts of zoological classification, and the precise connotation of distinctive features in every species, follow the course of the best manuals for advanced students, but are frequently accompanied by lively extracts from the narratives of observant travellers and other naturalists, illustrative of the habits of animals. The volume is complete in itself, consisting of more than six hundred pages, one third part of which is devoted to mammalia, above two hundred pages to birds, reptiles, and fishes, and the remainder to insects, mollusca, and the lower or simpler forms of animal life. There are engravings, fairly drawn, on almost every page. This work is of a higher scope than the Rev. J. G. Wood's "Illustrated Natural History," published five years ago by Messrs. Routledge, which has its merits as a popular compilation. Science for All, edited by Dr. Robert Brown, is a volume also published by Messrs. Cassell, to which many competent authors have furnished brief explanations of physical, astronomical, geological, and other natural phenomena, assisted by copious illustrations.

That renowned weekly issue, Vanity Fair, of characteristic grotesque or burlesque portraits of our notable contemporary personages, converts itself, at Christmas, into a volume called The Vanity Fair Album. The eleventh of such volumes, which is now before us, leads off with a good portrait of Mr. Gladstone, and contains those of twenty or thirty other statesmen, or members of Parliament, with Marshal MacMahon and M. Jules Grévy, late and present heads of the French Republic, Prince Napoleon and M. Louis Blanc, and with about twenty Englishmen and Frenchmen whose social distinction is owing to other than political exertions. Among the last-mentioned are Victor Hugo, Ernest Rénan, Alexandre Dumas, Gounod, Mr. Herbert Spencer, and several officers lately commanding in the Zulu War. Mademoiselle Sarah Bernhardt is the solitary "woman of genius." The accompanying notices, by "Jehu Junior," are generally flippant, vulgar, and offensive—not less offensive in the patronising tone of praise, than in their silly affectation of scorn for those whom this literary "Pyke or Pluck" has not the sense or the heart to understand.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Earl of Beaconsfield has written to the Lord Mayor to say that he will have pleasure in allowing his name to be added to the Sir Rowland Hill Memorial Committee.

The directors of the London and Westminster Bank will recommend to the proprietors, at the meeting in January, the registration of this bank as a limited company under the powers of last Session's Act.

Yesterday week at the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works, upon the application of the Sunday-School Union, a site upon the Victoria Embankment was granted for the erection of a statue to the memory of Robert Raikes, the founder of Sunday schools.

An important, though not highly respected, limb of the law—one of its executive—is dead. John Calcraft, for many years the executioner at Newgate and Horsemonger-lane Gaols, died last Saturday evening. He was born in 1800, and was by trade a shoemaker.

The sale of the valuable and extensive library (first portion) of the late Dr. Laing, of Edinburgh, was concluded yesterday week by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge, at their rooms, Wellington-street, Strand; the eleven days' sale realising £13,288.

The memorial recommending the London School Board to secure the full services of its chairman, by the payment to him of a salary as provided for under the Education Act, has already received a large number of influential signatures. The memorial lies for signature at the offices of Mr. Edmund Johnson, 1, Castle-street, Holborn.

A continuation of the Saturday Evening Free Lectures at the Society of Arts, John-street, Adelphi—viz., a lecture on Shakspeare's "Merchant of Venice," by Mr. Francis Storr, B.A., was given last Saturday evening. The next lecture is by Sir Arthur Hobhouse, on "The Social and Political Condition of India."

At a meeting of the Statistical Society at King's College on Tuesday night a paper upon the value of money was read by Mr. R. H. Patterson. He considered that the value of money had increased, and the scarcity of gold would make itself felt on a return to prosperity in trade. Mr. T. Brassey, M.P., occupied the chair. A discussion followed.

At the invitation of Baroness Burdett-Coutts, nearly 500 cabmen, coachmen, and carters, and their wives, sat down to tea at Tolmer's-square Institute, near Euston-road; and were afterwards addressed by Colonel Burdett, Bishop Claughton, Colonel Sir E. Henderson, the Rev. Arthur Hall, and others, on the duty of the kind treatment of animals.

The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that the total number of paupers on the last day of the first week in December was 89,789, of whom 46,673 were in workhouses, and 43,114 received outdoor relief. Compared with the corresponding weeks in the years 1878, 1877, and 1876, these figures show an increase of 7611, 7801, and 6980 respectively. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 717, of whom 550 were men, 140 women, and 27 children.

Another step has been made in the progress of electric light. On Monday night the Victoria station of the Metropolitan District Railway was brilliantly illuminated by ten electric lights, replacing twenty gas lamps which had previously only dimly lighted the station. The important point connected with the experiment is that these electric lights are maintained by the same engine and apparatus which, stationed at Charing-cross, subserve the purposes of forty lights on the Embankment and ten on Waterloo Bridge.

At a recent meeting of the Chapter of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem in England, at St. John's-gate, Clerkenwell, it was unanimously resolved to confer the medal awarded by the Order for deeds of gallantry in saving life on land on Mr. Arthur H. Stokes (one of her Majesty's sub-inspectors of mines), Charles Maltby, John Hancock, Thomas Davis, and John Davis, for their brave conduct in rescuing in July last Dennis Bagshaw, who was imprisoned for five days by a sudden fall of "shale," or old workings, from the roof of the Black Engine Mine, Eyam, near Sheffield.

Seeing so much distress amongst the poor this inclement weather, the Consolidated Soup and Food Company, 23, Castle-street, Finsbury, have arranged to give, gratuitously, about 1000 gallons of soup to deserving charities. They will be ready to send it out on Monday next, 22nd inst., and the two following days. Application should be made at once by clergymen, and secretaries of institutions, either personally or by letter, so that they may inquire into each case, and apportion the quantity to their requirements.

The Amateur Orchestral Society, of which the Duke of Edinburgh is president, will give their first concert of the season in the Albert Hall this (Saturday) evening, in aid of the funds of the German Hospital at Dalston. Besides several orchestral performances by the society, there will be solos by Miss Minnie Hauk, Madame Norman-Néruda, Mdlle. Marie Breidenstein, Herr Henschel, and Mr. Charles Hallé. Sir Julius Benedict will preside at the piano. The concert will be under the patronage of the Prince of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, who have promised to be present on the occasion.

The general meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society was held on the 11th inst. at the society's house, Hanover-square, under the presidency of the Duke of Bedford. Referring to the success attending the competition for the society's scholarships and certificates, the council in their report expressed a belief that if masters of schools were aware of the advantages offered by the society to scholars there would be a more general attempt in country schools to teach the principles of agriculture. It was stated that good work had been done by the society's laboratory during the year in detecting adulterations in feeding stuffs and manures.

The Westminster scholars, according to ancient custom, presented their annual Latin comedy on Thursday week, the piece selected for the present year being the "Trinummus" of Plautus. It was repeated on Tuesday and Thursday this week.—Doctors' Day at the Merchant Taylors' School was on Tuesday celebrated in the customary manner, and in the evening the company dined together in their hall in Threadneedle-street, Lord Chelmsford, Lord Hampton, and Sir Henry Drummond Wolff being amongst their guests.—The St. Paul's School Choral Society gave on Tuesday evening its annual concert, in the presence of a large number of ladies and gentlemen. The Dulwich College concert will be given next Monday.

WINTER EVERGREENS.

With the musical cry of "Holly, holly, O!" that now is heard in our southern suburbs, comes the hearty one also of "Winter evergreens," telling, as it told in the time of Gay—who wrote, "when they are bawl'd through all the town, then judge the festival of Christmas near"—that the end of the year is now at hand. The winter evergreens that then were sold were holly and ivy, fir-boughs and laurel, which still continue to be brought round to us, the latter being emblematic of peace and festivity—"now with bright holly all the temples strow, with laurel green and sacred mistletoe." In these more modern days, however, mistletoe—for obvious reasons, as its use has changed—is no longer in favour for church decoration.

The decking of houses at Christmas, with, as Stowe said, "whatever the season of the year afforded to be green," is, as we know, an ancient custom; and the legendary lore connected with it is so familiar to most of us that it need not here be dwelt on. The holly is, of course, in chief request, through the glow of its scarlet berries, and many writers make allusion to it. Thus, Evelyn, when recording with pride that long holly hedge of his at Say's Court, speaks of it as "blushing with its corals," and says, "we still dress up both our churches and houses on Christmas Day with its cheerful green and its rutilant berries;" and in a carol which is in the Harleian MSS. we read, "holly hath berries as red as any rose;" and it is the cheery influence of this very brightness—contrasting, as it often does, with the brilliant white of the snow surroundings—that makes the holly so welcome at this time of year. "What," asks Southey, "when bare and wintry woods we see, is then so cheerful as the holly-tree;" and his last wish is, "that in my age as cheerful I might be, as the green winter of the holly-tree." Holly and ivy have long held their sway, in cottage and in hall. "Even the poorest cottage," says Irving, "welcomed the festive season with decorations of holly;" and Scott describes the baronial hall as "dressed with holly green." So, too, George Wither, in the carol he wrote in the seventeenth century—"Each room with ivy-leaves is drest, and every post with holly;" while Wordsworth, alluding to its use in churches, says of them—"Green with fresh holly, every pew a porch."

Some writers, misled by the mistaken bracketing in books of the word "holme" with "evergreen-oak," have affirmed that the holly was not in use in olden days; but "holme" was, in fact, then the name that the holly went by, and the evergreen oak, as we know it now, had nothing to do with holly. At Candlemas it is the custom to remove all the Christmas decorations in houses and in churches. "Down with the holly, ivie, all, wherewith ye drest the Christmas hall;" "for," as Herrick goes on to say, "how many leaves there be, so many goblins you shall see;" and, with respect to churches, there are but few country parishes without this superstition—that "where a leaf or a berry is left in a pew on Candlemas Day there will be a death that year in the family who there sat in it." The name "holly" is, it is asserted, but a corruption of "holy" tree, and that it was so called from its use in churches.

The holly is common throughout the Midland districts and in many other parts of England, and some of the largest clusters of it are to be found in Staffordshire, at Medwood Park, and in Warwickshire, at Sutton; the trees growing in the latter locality being of immense size, and therefore almost berryless; for hollies, to berry well, have to be kept within certain bounds, or their flowers, which are white and waxen, will not show in April.

Of cultivated hollies, the named varieties now number 200, and it is said that there is not a bad one amongst them—whether of the red, the white, or the yellow-berried, the gold or the silver, the edged or the blotched, the hedgehog sort or the laurel-leaved. The best, however, of the scarlet kinds, are the Minorca and the Fœmina, which are handsome trees, and berry profusely; and next to those, Shepherd's, the Grecian, the Madeira, and the Scotch; whilst, of the yellow-berried sorts, the finest are the Lutea and the Flava. A curious kind is the one called Tortuous, and the best of the variegated is the Golden Queen; though there are others almost as beautiful—namely, the Painted Lady, the Milkmaid, and the Silver Queen. There are also some weeping hollies—the prettiest of which is the Pendula variegata—and some small ones that are suited for rockeries. The holly, like most things, has its uses; for its leaves, boiled down to make "holly tea," have been found to relieve the gout, and an infusion of the bark has cured intermittent fever; whilst the wood is selected by turners for divers purposes. It is also, being of an ivory-white, when peeled, extensively employed in the manufacture of "Tunbridge ware," and when dyed it will pass for ebony; its branches supply materials for sticks and whips, and birdlime is made from their glutinous substance; and though no shrubs are more exempt than the holly from insects, the caterpillar of that beautiful butterfly, the azure-blue, finds in its tough leaves its choicest food.

With our Christmas holly we want ivy, too; as, apart from the time they have so long been associated, there is no better addition to the scarlet berries than linking lengths of ivy; especially if, amongst the common kind, trailers from the woods of the wild "ground" sort are here and there interspersed. Of this small sort there is but one kind, but of the larger ivy there are many varieties grown—thirty, or more—both plain and variegated; and, as the latter include some that are striped or margined with a golden-yellow, or a creamy-white, their sprays add greatly to the leafy beauty of Christmas garlands. Most ivies are of quick growth, but the quickest is the large-leaved Irish. So far from making houses damp, as most folks think, ivy—which Loudon says is "the one and only thing that should be placed against them"—will keep them dry, the rain-drops falling from its glossy leaves; and this the birds well know, as they can nestle there in the wettest weather, and have a snug, warm place to sleep in. Ivy is eagerly eaten by sheep—and mistletoe too—and old shepherds have a liking for its branches in the fold. Its flowers do not show till the autumn, when, unlike the holly, it forms a happy hunting-ground for the Quaker and the Carpet moths, and a multitude of insects; wasps, too, and oftentimes, "a lonely bee, long roving here and there to find a flower," who are then attracted by the store of honey that is to be found in the nectaries of its pale-green blooms. The berries, on which so many birds feed, do not, however, ripen till the following spring, when the dulcet song of the black-cap, on his return here in April, will very soon tell of their whereabouts.

Ground-ivy, which blossoms in April, is used in the country for coughs and colds; and the leaves of the larger kind are of service for the eye, the ear, and the chest, and—following the advice of Gerarde—"for weak and aching backs." In Germany they were used as a preventive against the wasting away of children, and an extract from the berries, and a gum from the stalks, have also been credited with beneficial properties; and the latter, as the leaves, too, forms the basis, in England, of a "certain cure for corns;" and ivy-berries, crushed to powder, were given, in vinegar, during the great plague in London, with advantage, it is said, to those who were affected. The leaves bitter ale, and improve its flavour, a fact, it is reported, some brewers are aware of. In ivy there is always a charm; whether clinging "to withered tree, to old, grey stone," greening with its beauty—as at Horton and at Isleworth—the grey church towers, or massing into majesty such ruins as Kenilworth, where it holds the stone together, and serves to link the memories of the past.

"A Christmas Day, without a mistletoe, is most unlucky." So runs the rural saying in those districts where most farm-houses are, and where "the bush" invariably hangs all the year between the hams and flitches. As the mistletoe is found chiefly on apple-trees, its growth is greatest in the cider counties. Next to the apple, it grows most on the poplar, where its bunches show like the nest of some monster bird; and it also is found on the pear and the willow, as well as on the maple, the ash, the thorn, and the lime, on which—by squeezing the bruised berries within the bark—it readily can be propagated. In Scotland the mistletoe—as holly and ivy, in America—is almost unknown. In France it is most abundant on the almond-tree; and in Spain, and about Jerusalem, it infests the olive. Its use with us is confined to Christmas customs; but a few centuries ago its branches were carried on New-Year's Day, by young men and maidens, from house to house, as a seasonable gift of friendship; and at the present day the same custom obtains in some parts of France. Bird-lime is generally made from the holly, but it can also be made from the mistletoe berries, those berries so dear to blackbirds, fieldfares, and thrushes; and it is the larger species of the latter bird—the missel thrush—that is credited with the cause of the increase of its growth on trees. The wood, and the leaves of it, have both been used in the treatment of epilepsy and convulsive diseases, but they are not so used at the present day. As the mistletoe absorbs, as a parasite, the sap of the tree it grows on, it is not liked by those dwelling in cider districts, who say of an orchard where that plant abounds, "There is too much mistletoe in it for it to do much good."

In the time of the Druids, mistletoe—called "all heal"—grew on the oak, and it was from that tree they always cut it; but now, to find it growing there is a very rare thing indeed—so rare, that such oaks have the name given them of "mistletoe oaks," and there are, if we mistake not, but eight such oaks in England, of which the three finest are in Herefordshire—at Tedstone Delamere, in the forest of Deerfold, and at Eastnor Park. Then, there is one near Plymouth, and one in Surrey—at Burningfold Farm, Dunsfold; and the other three are to be found, respectively, at Frampton-on-Severn, in Gloucestershire; at Sudbury Park, Chepstow, and at Hackwood Park, Basingstoke; and those, we believe, complete the list.

The supply of English holly for the London markets is chiefly derived from Kent; but a good deal of it comes from Guildford, as also mistletoe; and in a profuse year a large quantity of it is obtained from the apple-orchards of Worcestershire, Herefordshire, and Gloucestershire, though the greater part of what is grown there is, after supplying the home county towns, sent off to Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester. Holly, on the spot, is sold very cheaply, and hence the profit to the retailer well repays his trouble. The average price at market in an ordinary season is for common holly from 6d. a bundle to £5 per ton; and for variegated from 5s. to 6s. per bundle to £20 per load. Mistletoe fetches from 6d. a branch to £6 per ton, though a well-berried, handsome bush will sell at 10s. The foreign holly comes from the orchards of Normandy and Brittany, and it is also sent from the Channel Islands, Guernsey and Jersey. The largest lots go to the Borough Market and to Covent Garden, and are thence distributed. The winter evergreens are supplied from the cuttings of suburban shrubberies; the ivy, from gardens; and the "Christmas-trees," from fir-plantations, and from the London nurserymen. Holly this year is well berried. Let us hope its coral will soon shine on happy faces; and, though the passing year has been a long and dreary one, and winter comes thus early, yet, as Cowper says, "let the months go round, a few short months, and all shall be restored." Then, leaves will unfold again, and flowers merge on "from bud to beauty."

SHELSLEY BEAUCHAMP.

NEW BOOKS.

Obstacles, even impossibilities, never stop translators, and one cannot be surprised, therefore, at the feat performed in The Odyssey of Homer, done into English prose by S. H. Butcher, M.A., and A. Lang, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.), for the pair of excellent scholars have at least given themselves a chance of telling "that half of the truth" about Homer which consists in the bare interpretation of his words, without any attempt to reproduce the magic of his numbers, and which the interpreters who employ verse for their purpose cannot possibly convey, without modification or amplification, or even travesty, whilst they sing his song to a measure unknown and uncongenial to his muse. There are some excellent remarks upon this point in the preface with which the translators introduce their work. As for the translation itself, what can be said? It is the old story of mingled success and failure; some passages so excellent as to be beyond praise, some not only unsatisfactory, but, to speak with proper deference and under correction, misrendered to an extent which would be surprising in a schoolboy. Yet, where there is so much evidence of a general superiority, it would savour of petty hypercriticism to dwell upon small details. Attention, however, may be drawn, by way of example, to that passage in the Sixth Book, where Odysseus is likened to a hungry lion, driven by the needs of his belly "to make assay upon the flocks, even within a close-penned fold," as the translators have it, whereas the meaning clearly is that, as the words in the ordinary sense imply, the wild beast would be so reckless in his extremity that he would attempt to run down his prey, even within the walls of a homestead, as famine-stricken wolves will do in our day. The whole point is lost by the translators' version, which, moreover, necessitates a forced and unusual interpretation of a common word. There is another passage, in the Twenty-second Book, where Athene assumes the appearance of a swallow, which seems to have been even more erroneously taken. What, however, are a few blemishes among so many beauties? And what matters it, when the performance, as a whole, is so good, if, as at the ninth line of the First Book, "but" be persistently given as the equivalent of a certain word which clearly requires rather something expressive of consequence or resumption. As for the constant epithets, as they may be called, the epithets, that is, which recur over and over again in connection with the names of persons, and which appear to be as merely conventional as our own, when we speak of a "noble" lord, or an "honourable" member, or a "learned" counsel, or a "venerable" archdeacon, they are, no doubt, among the greatest difficulties encountered by translators of Homer, but they need not cause any more hesitation on the ground of their apparent inapplicability under certain circumstances than is exhibited by the newspaper reporter who, undeterred by incongruity, has no scruple about announcing that "the 'reverend' gentleman was fined five shillings for being drunk," when, as occasionally happens, so great a misfortune overtakes a clergyman who has, or is believed to have, been previously overtaken by liquor.

Among the works which the late Afghan war has brought forth, none is more important or valuable than the reprint of Major-General Sir Vincent Eyre's little book entitled "The Kabul Insurrection of 1841-42." During that terrible campaign the author was a Lieutenant of Artillery, and went through all the trying scenes in Kabul itself, as well as the horrors of the Khoord Kabul massacres. He was there wounded, and became one of the prisoners of Akbar Khan, and had to undergo months of suspense with our other unfortunate countrymen, never knowing at what moment their lives might be sacrificed. But Sir Vincent Eyre has lived to earn a high reputation for gallantry by his rescue, during the Indian Mutiny, of a number of civilians who were shut up in the now famous "House of Arrah." They had been beleaguered for some days by a large band of mutineers; and when Eyre heard of it he made a movement with a mere handful of troops, and defeated the enemy, thus saving the lives of about seventy Europeans from certain death. Sir Vincent has retired from the service, and Messrs. Allen and Co. prevailed on him to undertake a new edition of his book, in which he has been assisted by Colonel Malleson, who now fills the place left vacant by Sir John Kaye as the historian of India. The original edition of this book was the first record of the events written by a military man, and one who had performed a part in them; hence its claims to faithfulness. When Akbar Khan carried off his prisoners, after the dreadful massacres of the Khoord Kabul and Jugdulluk, he led them to Badiábád, in the district of Lughman, where they were kept three months. At this place the supply of stationery was small, but the author managed to jot down an account of events while they were still fresh in his memory, and where he could correct details by a reference to his fellow-prisoners, all of whom had been actors in the scenes. From this explanation it will be seen that the account possesses a high claim to accuracy, and something of the quality of a special correspondent's letters from having been all but written on the spot. It was sent down along with Lady Sale's Journal to General Pollock, who had by that time reached Jellalabad. He forwarded the MS. to England, where it was published, and Sir Robert Peel, who delivered some speeches in Parliament on the Afghan war of that time, made long extracts from it. The authenticity and historical character of this book will thus be understood. Anyone wishing to get an account of the first Afghan war, of a handy size and in a readable form, will find it here. Sir Vincent can use the pencil as well as the pen; and a sketch made by him of the Khoord Kabul appeared in the Illustrated London News during the late Afghan war. An outline sketch of this subject is given with the work, as well as a view of the city of Cabul, from a sketch by the author.

Amateur theatrical performances have long been a favourite amusement, and they are best managed by the organisation of regular acting clubs. One of the most eminently successful of these institutions is the "University Amateur Dramatic Club" of Cambridge, founded in 1835 by Mr. F. C. Burnand, B.A., of Trinity College in that University, who has since won a good share of popular favour by his literary contributions both to the press and to the stage, for the gratification of the general English public. Mr. Burnand has been induced, at the approach of the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation, to gather up his records and personal reminiscences of the early doings of "The A. D. C., Camb.," with continuation to the Lent Term of 1864, in a very pleasant and amusing volume, of which Messrs. Chapman and Hall are the publishers. It may serve as a really useful guide, in many details of management, to others who may undertake the formation or direction of societies of this kind, especially among the members of colleges and public schools, or those of military garrisons, or any local community of gentlemen brought into mutual acquaintance by their official or professional duties. We heartily wish that all such Dramatic Clubs, great and small, wherever a company of educated Englishmen can be found to engage in them, may be animated by the spirit of thorough good-fellowship which Mr. Burnand's lively pages reflect at the present reading.

In Alice, and other Fairy Plays for Children (Sonnenschein and Allen) Mrs. Freiligraph Kroeker has happily solved the problem of transferring Mr. Lewis Carroll's unique humour and fancy from the closet to the stage. "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking-Glass" have been skilfully blended into a single play without damage to any of the familiar favourites in the action of either story, and, with the addition of capital illustrations and music, the success is perfect. The other miniature dramas in the volume are equally well adapted for the juvenile theatre.

An acknowledged want is very well supplied in Mrs. Berens's Myths and Legends of Ancient Greece and Rome (Blackie and Son), a volume of Messrs. Blackie's excellent school series. Elegantly printed, and tastefully illustrated with engravings after the antique, this pretty little volume is something more than a popular account of Greek and Roman mythology, for it also conveys, as claimed by the authoress, "a clear and succinct idea of the religious beliefs of the ancients," and "a picture of old Greek life, its customs, its superstitions, and its princely hospitalities. All the stories are exceedingly well told, and young readers will find the book thoroughly attractive.

The Townhall at Dunstable was destroyed by fire on Wednesday morning.

A peer of the realm succeeds Mr. Clerk-Maxwell as Professor of Experimental Physics at Cambridge. The qualifications of Lord Rayleigh for the position were so evident that on the day of election he was the only candidate proposed. The new Professor, then the Hon. J. W. Strutt, graduated at Trinity College as Senior Wrangler and first Smith's Prizeman in 1864. He was an additional examiner for the Mathematical Tripos in 1876.

As Lord Fermoy was entering the Limerick County Club last Saturday night, a man, named James O'Shea, approached him and struck him a blow with a stick. Lord Fermoy fell, and his assailant fled. Some members of the club, however, who witnessed the assault, pursued him. After a sharp chase they caught him, and handed him over to the police. O'Shea had been, it appears, dismissed from his Lordship's service. It is stated that his Lordship has almost recovered from the effects of the assault. O'Shea was tried on Wednesday and sentenced by Baron Dowse to five years' penal servitude.

Besides Galignani's Messenger, there are two other newspapers printed in Paris for English readers. The Boulevard, issued once a week, is what is known as a society paper, and is very good of its kind. In the Parisian, also a weekly, we have a newspaper proper, giving all the French political news; Parisian social, artistic, and theatrical gossip; a weekly review of music and the drama in Paris, current literature, the latest fashions, special articles on living celebrities by well-known writers, and a summary of news from the United States and Europe. Special attention is devoted to art, literature, and biography, and every week a story by a French or an English author is given. This enterprising paper gives this week a special double Christmas number, containing new and original stories and novelettes by James Payn, Henry James, Jun., Frederick Locker, Alphonse Daudet, Jules Claretie, and others.

THE CHURCH.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.

Bird, S. W. E., to be Vicar of St. Mary Magdalene, Launceston.
Chalmers, W.; Canon of Melbourne.
Collyns, J. M.; Rural Dean of Daventry.
Dawson, J. Myers; Incumbent of St. Mary's Episcopal Church, Arbroath.
Hale, W. F.; Assistant-Curate of the United parishes of St. Katherine Cree and St. James, Aldgate.
Kearney, Neville; Incumbent of Croghan, diocese of Elphin.
Leonard, A. A.; Inspector of Schools for the Diocese of Llandaff.
Royds, Gilbert Twemlow; Rector of Haughton.
Simpson, R. J.; Incumbent of Curzon Chapel.
Toulon, J. S.; Prebendary of Ferring in Chichester Cathedral.
Wilson, C. H.; Vicar of Dilton Marsh-with-Chapmanslade, Wilts.—Guardian.

The Rev. William Rogers, Rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, was entertained yesterday week by a committee of his parishioners at a dinner at the Albion, and presented with his portrait, in recognition of his exceptional services to the parish and to education.

A handsome monument of Gothic design, executed by Mr. Forsyth, in various marbles and alabaster, surmounted by a richly carved stone canopy, has been erected in Cheriton church, Pembroke, to the late Captain the Hon. Ronald Campbell (Coldstream Guards). He served in the Zulu war as staff officer to Colonel Sir Evelyn Wood, and fell on the Zlobane Mountain, on March 28 last, in the performance of a most gallant deed. His portrait has appeared in this Journal.

A handsome stained-glass window has been placed in the east end of St. Mary's Church, Warwick. The subjects illustrated are, in the centre lights, the Supper at Emmaus and the Sermon on the Mount; and in the side lights, events from the life of Christ; in the tracery pieces are figures of apostles and prophets. The glass is executed in the fifteenth-century style of work in keeping with the architecture of the chancel. The window was executed by Messrs. Heaton, Butler, and Bayne.

St. John's Church, Brighton, which was erected about forty years since by the Rev. H. M. Wagner, the late Vicar of Brighton, was reopened yesterday week, after having been closed for about eighteen months for repairs. The building, which is in the Grecian style of architecture, and has been restored in harmony therewith, will seat some 1600 persons. It was formerly noted for the elaborate ritual with which the former Incumbent, the Rev. A. A. Morgan, conducted its services. Since then the present Vicar of Brighton, the Ven. Archdeacon Hannah, has constituted it the centre of a district parish, with the Rev. R. H. Raines as successor to Mr. Morgan as its Vicar. The district is a poor one, and the Bishop of Chichester, who preached the sermon at the reopening services, commended it to the consideration of the wealthy.

The Bishop of Rochester has issued a long pastoral letter to his clergy on lay work. He says that within a triangle of which Woolwich is the apex, and Putney and Streatham the extremities of the base, there is a population of 1,300,000 with only 332 clergy. The parochial system he considers to be, under such circumstances, not so much destroyed as submerged, and new and living instrumentalities are needed to overtake the arrears of work; but the Church may, he considers, have yet greater triumphs before her than any she has yet achieved if "she will consent to doff the somewhat chilly sedateness she has inherited from generations of high-backed pews, and if, with teaching that the working classes can understand, and services that they can follow, and hymns that they can grasp, and music that they can sing, she will try to persuade them into the fold of Christ." His Lordship dwells on a number of schemes for the effectual carrying on of lay agency, the only actually new one being that of lay preachers.

"CHARACTER SKETCHES FROM DICKENS."

A clever artist and humourist, Mr. Frederick Barnard, has made a series of drawings, each of a single figure, giving his conception of several leading characters in the popular stories for which all the world is so grateful to Charles Dickens. These designs are reproduced, by Mr. T. Robertson, in lithographic plates of a large size, suitable for framing to be suspended on a wall, which Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin have published, and one of which, "Mr. Pickwick," they have allowed us to copy in our page Engraving. The subjects are six in number, "Mrs. Gamp," "Alfred Jingle," "Bill Sykes," "Little Dorrit," "Sidney Carton," and "Mr. Pickwick." It is not the best selection that could have been found, Sidney Carton being an insignificant type of character, and Miss Dorrit, the Marshalsea prisoner's daughter, of less originality than pathetic interest from her situation. The ruffianly force and grim ferocity of Sykes, the housebreaker, who becomes the murderer of Nancy, in "Oliver Twist," may be considered to have got an adequate representation at the artist's hands. As for Mr. Pickwick, the first and best creation, some think, of the gifted author, we could have wished to see him in a more dignified plight. Mr. Barnard, however, presents to us a correct Illustration of one of the undeniable incidents of Pickwickian experience, which will be in the recollection of every reader. It is above forty years since that droll story was told, and those who read it in their youth have it still fresh in their minds to this day. The good old gentleman, being one of the guests of Mr. Wardle at a picnic party in the pleasant fields of Kent, has been too easily persuaded to drink a glass of cold milk punch, "and another glass, just to see whether there was any orange-peel in the punch, because orange-peel always disagreed with him," and then another glass, "in honour of the unknown punch compounder," besides remembering the health of present and absent friends. It is a little too much for him, as his expressive countenance already betrays.

The emigrants from the Mersey last month were 10,141, an increase of 6253 on the figures for November last year.

The Victoria Cross has been awarded to Captain (now Major) Edward Pemberton Leach, Royal Engineers, for his determination and gallantry in an action with the Shinwarris, near Maidana, Afghanistan, on March 17, 1879.

St. Patrick's Church, Ballymena, beautifully situated within the demesne of Old Waveney, which was completed and opened for Divine service in 1855, was completely destroyed by fire on Saturday last.

The Rev. T. W. Sharp, one of her Majesty's inspectors, gave an address at the annual gathering of the students of the British and Foreign School Society's College in the Borough-road, yesterday week, and it was announced that the trustees of the Protestant Dissenters' Charity School having discontinued the school the funds belonging to it, more than £6000 will be devoted to granting exhibitions for the students of the college.

The fifth anniversary festival of the Dairymen's Benevolent Institution was held on the 11th inst., at the Freemasons' Tavern, Mr. H. W. Neville in the chair. Covers were laid for 300. In proposing the toast of the evening, the chairman said the most recent Parliamentary returns showed that the metropolitan dairymen were more than 6000 in number. The list of the night's subscriptions announced amounted to £560, including 100 guineas from the chairman.

Extra Supplement.

"INTERRUPTED!"

Here is a "parlous" conspiracy of knights and gentlemen-at-arms, in the troublous times of the Tudors, with the frequent treasonable plotting, which has its compromising documents kept in those unlocked caskets that lie upon the table and the floor. These have been secretly brought to the rural mansion of Sir John Fastness, Knight, an elderly magnate of the shire and disappointed ex-courtier, who became a leader of the rebellious faction. How unfortunate that his fair young wife should have risen from her couch, uneasy at her lord's protracted sitting in the hall after supper, and, ignorant of the arrival of his visitors, should come to see if he has not fallen asleep over a tumbler of wine! Let us invoke the spirit of Sir Walter Scott to report the scene which must have ensued, and the excuses, inquiries, and false explanations.

The Post Office London Directory for 1880, which is the eighty-first annual edition of this great and useful work of topographical and personal reference for the vast and diverse population of our enormous metropolis, has been published by Messrs. Kelly and Co., its proprietors, with their usual punctuality. It is a volume of more than 2560 pages, not including those filled with advertisements, or the several index lists and catalogues; but the work may be had in two volumes, if desired, though few persons would object to its thickness as inconvenient for use; and the binding of strong leather is calculated to stand the daily wear of any number of hands. The correctness, completeness, and clear methodical distribution of this magnificent Directory have often been deservedly praised.

Messrs. Marcus Ward and Co. have published their "Concise Diaries" for the New Year. These diaries are exceedingly convenient for the pocket, as they are divided into four parts, being one for each quarter. The cases are of fine russia leather, with numerous pockets.

The London Stereoscopic Company have provided in their guinea box of ingenious and playful apparatus, for the amusement of Christmas, New-Year's Eve, and Twelfth Night parties; with a great variety of optical, photographic, electrical, and other surprising effects, as is the way of "Science in Sport."

Tom Smith and Co., of 69, Wilson-street, have issued their Christmas crackers, all of which, they state, are of original design. These novelties for the season, which will be sure to create great amusement and prove the fun of the party, consist of tête-à-tête crackers, magic flowers, Cetewayo's luggage, the honeymoon cosaques; surprise bonbons, containing costumes of England, France, America, Germany, Russia, and Spain; and crackers for Leap Year.

The British Almanac and Companion for 1880, originally started by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, is still most useful and instructive. The "Companion" for next year presents distinct and brief treatises upon the Royal Mint, Cyprus, Temperance Refreshment Houses, South Africa, the heliograph, the deaf and dumb, the rating of chronometers, the progress of London, and the London School Board. The art-exhibitions, music, scientific inventions, Parliamentary legislation, and social events of the past year are carefully recorded.

Whitaker's Almanack for 1880 is the most comprehensive and precise, in its collection of interesting and important statistical information, of all the shilling almanacks; but its merits are generally acknowledged, and do not stand in need of fresh recommendation.

Punch's Almanack for the coming year is full of fun and cheerfulness. The illustrations, sporting and social, show the easy superiority which marks English draughtsmen and engravers in this style of art, as compared with the rough work of their Continental rivals. The coloured frontispiece is by Mr. Charles Keene's design, "The Seven Ages at Lawn Tennis," a very pleasant fancy. Judy's Almanack is as amusing as ever. Among others are the following, the titles of which indicate their character:—The Farmer's and Country Gentleman's; the Gardener's Year Book and Almanack; and Blackwood's Shilling Scribbling Diary, interleaved with blotting-paper.

Second Edition, crown 8vo, with Seventy-seven Illustrations, cloth, 7s. 6d.,
A SHORT HISTORY OF NATURAL SCIENCE, and of the Progress of Discovery from the Time of the Greeks to the Present Day. For the Use of Schools and Young Persons. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of "Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students," &c.
"In the present edition I have endeavoured to supply many important omissions, especially as regards 'Sound,' which had been before entirely neglected, and to which a new chapter (XXX.) is now devoted. I have also added some new matter, in the thirty-eighth chapter, upon the Botany of the Nineteenth Century. Lastly, besides many minor additions, I have given, in a new concluding chapter, a brief sketch of some of the latest advances in science."—Extract from Preface.

Sixth thousand, crown 8vo, with 74 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.,
THE FAIRYLAND OF SCIENCE. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY, Authoress of "A Short History of Natural Science," "Botanical Tables for the Use of Junior Students," &c.
"Altogether, with its attractive illustrations and brightly written pages, is one of the pleasantest volumes for intelligent boys and girls that has been produced this season. But, indeed, a book so instructive and entertaining deserves a welcome at all seasons, and is likely to secure a permanent reputation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, cloth, 6s.,
ADVENTURES IN THE AIR: being memorable experiences of Great Aeronauts. From the French of De Fonvielle. Edited and Translated by J. S. KELTIE.
"Will be doubtless read with delight by many a boy, while readers of more advanced years will find it full of instruction and recreation, the style being as easy and pleasant, as the subject matter is solidly entertaining."—London Quarterly Review.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.,
THE HEROES OF YOUNG AMERICA.
By ASCOTT R. HOPE, Author of "A Book about Boys," "A Book about Dominies," &c. With Map and Illustrations.
Every page of the book relates some marvellous incident, and boy-readers will accept the volume as a rare and valuable addition to their store of knowledge. It is capitally illustrated by a large number of wood engravings as exciting as the text."—Art Journal.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.,

"One of the best books upon poetry which we have had for a very long time."—Westminster Review.
"A charming, useful, and well-written book, which all those who wish to learn anything of the literature of their own country will do well to read."—Publishers' Circular.

Post 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.,
DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE. Adapted for Home Education and for Schoolmistresses and Pupil-Teachers. By ROBERT JAMES MANN, M.D., late Superintendent of Education at Natal.
"In a series of short and easy lessons he discusses, in a clear and taking manner, almost every question on which the least experienced head of a family would require information—air and ventilation; food, cookery, and drink; heat, clothing, and washing; health, home, and money; and he never fails in being equally lucid, accurate, and practical. There have been many similar works, but after testing this, the latest of them, on a number of salient points, we have no hesitation in recommending it as in every respect worthy of confidence."—Examiner.

Post 8vo, cloth, 335 pp., 2s. 6d.,
DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE (Standard 5 of the Whitelands Series of Standard Reading Books for Girls). Edited by Rev. J. P. FAUNTHORPE, M.A., Principal of Whitelands Training College. Dedicated, by permission, to his Grace the Duke of Westminster, K.G.
"It is a thoroughly eminent and comprehensive manual, and contains more information than half a dozen primers of health or social science. It would be a useful book to add to village lending libraries, or to give as prizes in Sunday schools, or as presents to young servants. It is, indeed, a pity that this, or some other book of the same sort, is not more commonly in use in so-called ladies' schools and private school-rooms. If mistresses as well as maids knew and acted up to the wise lessons contained in this little book, the price of which is only half-a-crown, there would be a marked increase in the domestic happiness of that large part of the community who cannot afford to pay accomplished cooks and experienced housekeepers."—Saturday Review.

18mo, cloth, 2s. 6d.,
SIMPLE LESSONS. Chiefly intended for Home Use and Elementary Schools. By Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, G. PHILLIPS BEVAN, F.G.S., Dr. MANN, F.R.G.S., J. C. BUCKMASTER, B.A., Mrs. BENJAMIN CLARKE, J. J. POPE, B.A. PROCTOR, B.A., Rev. F. O. MORRIS, M.A., Rev. G. HENSLOW, F.L.S., Rev. T. E. CRALLAN, M.A. Contents: Our Bodily Life—How and Why we Breathe—Food—Drink—Cookery—Plain Needlework—Clothing—Air and Ventilation—The Sicknesses that Spread—Weather—Astronomy—Birds—Flowers—Money.
THE SIMPLE LESSONS are also published separately, 3d. each, or 16s. per 100 assorted. The set of 14, in card case, 3s.
"It would be difficult to award too high praise to this little volume. It consists of a series of leaflets, now bound up together, teaching the simple facts of domestic economy and elementary science. Each series is contributed by a writer of acknowledged eminence in his own department. These 'Simple Lessons' are chiefly intended for elementary schools. But, if the knowledge of the children is not to put the parents to shame, it is no less desirable that the book should circulate throughout the cottage homes of England. We can imagine no better present for the wife of an artizan."—Academy.

Fcap folio, 12s. 6d.,
AN ATLAS OF ANATOMY; or, Pictures of the Human Body. In 24 Quarto Coloured Plates, comprising 100 separate Figures, with Descriptive Letterpress by Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, Member of the London School Board, Author of the Physiological Sections of "Simple Lessons for Home Use," &c.
"It is hoped that this work, being issued at a comparatively low price, may be found useful both to science teachers and to students of all kinds. To the private student whose access to anatomical preparations and physiological laboratories is limited such a book is indispensable. Again, children, with their keen interest in the facts of Nature, and with their fresh, undistracted minds full of curiosity about what is around them, are almost always found to take a deep interest in the wonderful structure and functions of their own bodies. Thus this volume would generally be found an acceptable gift to an intelligent youth of twelve or fourteen, and would afford him useful instruction for his adult life."—Extract from Preface.

Folio, price 7s. 6d. each,

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots where the glands are not decayed. Ask any Chemist for "The Mexican Hair Renewer," price 3s. 6d. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants. It is perfectly harmless, and delicious as sherry. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London. Retailed everywhere.

SOZODONT.—The Peerless liquid Dentifrice.
Its use imparts the most fragrant breath; it beautifies, cleanses, and preserves the teeth in a surprising manner. It gives a delightfully fresh taste and feeling to the mouth, removing all Tartar and Scurf from the Teeth, completely arresting the progress of decay, and whitening such parts as have already become black by decay or neglect. Impure Breath caused by Bad Teeth, Tobacco, Spirits, or Catarrh, is neutralised by Sozodont. The price of the Fragrant Sozodont is 3s. 6d., put up in large bottles, fitted with patent sprinklers for applying the liquid to the tooth-brush. Each bottle is inclosed in a handsome toilet box. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers, and by JOHN M. RICHARDS, Great Russell-street, London. Observe the Name SOZODONT on the label, box, and bottle.

BREIDENBACH'S PHLOMIS (Sweet Scented). Beautifully fragrant and lasting. 2s. 6d. to 10s. Bottle. BREIDENBACH'S MACASSARINE, invaluable for preserving the growth of the Hair. 1s., 2s. 6d., 5s. Bottle. Of all Chemists and the Makers, 157B, New Bond-street.

CHAPPELL & CO.'S PIANOFORTES AND HARMONIUMS.

(PIANOFORTE FACTORY, CHALK FARM-ROAD.)

SHOW-ROOMS, 49, 50, 51, & 52, NEW BOND-STREET, LONDON.

CHAPPELL and CO.'S THREE-YEARS' SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTES.

CHAPPELL and CO. let the undermentioned PIANOFORTES on HIRE, and the Instrument becomes the property of the Hirer at the expiration of the third year, provided each quarterly instalment shall have been regularly paid, on the following terms:—

At £3 3s. per annum; £2 2s. per quarter.

A PIANINO, by CHAPPELL and CO., in Solid Mahogany or Walnut Case, 6¾ Octaves, with Check Action. Cash price for this Instrument, 20 guineas.

At £10 10s. per annum; £3 12s. 6d. per quarter.

AN ELEGANT PIANINO, in best Walnut and Rosewood, with ornamented Fret, 6¾ Octaves, Check Action, and three strings—throughout the treble. Cash price, 27 guineas. Model B in the Catalogue.

At £12 12s. per annum; £3 4s. per quarter.

A HANDSOME COTTAGE PIANOFORTE, by CHAPPELL and CO., in Rosewood, 7 Octaves. Cash price, 32 guineas. No. 2 in Catalogue.

At £14 per annum; £3 10s. per quarter.

A HANDSOME COTTAGE PIANOFORTE, by CHAPPELL and CO., in Walnut Case, 7 Octaves. Cash price, 35 guineas. No. 2 in Catalogue.

At £16 per annum; £4 per quarter.

THE ENGLISH MODEL PIANOFORTE, by CHAPPELL and CO., in very handsome Rosewood, 7 Octaves. Cash price, 40 guineas. Ditto, ditto, in Walnut Case, £4 10s. per quarter. Cash price, 45 guineas. No. 4 in Catalogue.

At £20 per annum; £5 per quarter.

THE FOREIGN MODEL OBLIQUE PIANOFORTE, by CHAPPELL and CO., in Rosewood Case, 7 Octaves, Check Action, and three strings. Cash price, 50 guineas. Ditto, ditto, in elegant Walnut, £5 10s. per quarter. Cash price, 55 guineas.

The above Pianofortes are exchangeable during the first quarter.

Residents abroad can be supplied with Pianofortes on this system, the hire being paid annually in advance instead of quarterly.

THE THREE-YEARS' SYSTEM IS APPLICABLE TO EVERY DESCRIPTION OF PIANOFORTE BY THE BEST MAKERS.

CHAPPELL and CO.'S STUDENT'S PIANOFORTE. Five Octaves, F to F, Check Action, Trichord Treble. Price FIFTEEN GUINEAS. The compass is quite sufficient for classical music—the whole of Mozart's and contemporaneous works being written within the five octaves F to F, the piano of that date not exceeding that compass.

For practice in Schools or Colleges they will be equally welcome, as more economical than using larger and more expensive instruments.

CHAPPELL'S ENGLISH 20-GUINEA or SCHOOL-ROOM PIANOFORTE, with Check Action, in Canadian Walnut, Mahogany, also in Solid Oak or White Ash, 22 guineas; and in elegant Rosewood or Walnut Case, 27 guineas. This instrument combines good quality of tone and excellence of workmanship. It has the merit of standing well in tune, and is capable of enduring hard school practice without going out of order.

PREPARATIONS FOR TESTING THE THUNDERER'S THIRTY-EIGHT TON GUN AT WOOLWICH.

THE THUNDERER GUN EXPERIMENTS.

Since Tuesday of last week, a series of experiments has been going on, day after day, with some interruption, at the proof butts in the Government Marshes adjoining the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich. The disastrous explosion of a 38-ton gun in one of the turrets on board her Majesty's ship Thunderer in the Sea of Marmora occurred on Jan. 2 last. The committee of investigation into the cause of the explosion assembled at Malta on the 24th of the same month. The period since has been occupied in considering the committee's report, and in preparations for carryng out their recommendations. The explosion had been caused, in the committee's opinion, by the gun having been inadvertently double loaded—first with a cartridge of 85 lb. of powder and a Palliser shell of 700 lb., and then with a similar cartridge and a common shell of 587 lb—the ignition of the foremost charge occurring at a part of the gun where the thickness of metal was inadequate to endure the strain. The Lords of the Admiralty on May 1 assented to the recommendation that the second 38-ton gun should be taken from the Thunderer's turret and subjected to a series of tests, in order to show that the accident was due not to any defect in the manufacture of the guns, but to circumstances entirely under the control of the gunners. One of the opposing theories was that the wad which is used to keep the projectile from slipping had by some means become displaced, causing the shell to jam, and so making the gun burst.

The committee have made some progress with their experiments. The programme arranged by the Admiralty is to be carried out free from material variation. Among the spectators were General Gordon, C.B., Royal Artillery, President of the committee; Admiral H. Boys, Director of Naval Ordnance; Colonel Inglis, Royal Engineers; Colonel Maitland, Royal Artillery; Colonel W. H. Noble, Royal Engineers, Inspector of Works, Royal Arsenal; Lord Charles Beresford, M.P., Commander Royal Navy; Major F. Ellis, R.A., Secretary of the Experimental Branch; Captain O'Brien, R.E., Assistant-Inspector of Works, and others. The 38-ton gun was seen peeping from a cell in a mound facing the proof butts. It was mounted upon an ordinary naval carriage and platform, and all the arrangements were made to approximate as nearly as possible to circumstances on board ship. There was not much room to spare inside the cell, which was only about 10 ft. square at the front and some 30 ft. long, just sufficient to allow for the recoil. The interior is faced with balks of timber, overlaid with heavy pigs of iron and several feet of concrete, upon which earth is heaped until a hillcock is formed 35 ft. in height and 200 ft. in circumference. When at the final round the gun is double loaded and bursts as predicted there need be no fear of consequences to the spectators. One of the new bays at the old butts was used for the first time, and the improvements under the direction of Colonel Noble were considered highly satisfactory. The usual preparations were made for taking exact records of velocities, pressures, and other circumstances, and a novelty was observed in the shape of a wooden screen in front of the sand bank, the object being to preserve a vertical face to the sand, and thereby it was hoped to counteract a tendency of the projectiles to turn upwards.

The experiments hitherto made have been chiefly designed to try whether or not the gun would burst with a considerable vacant space left between the powder-cartridge and the shot or shell, as some persons were of opinion that, in the gun which did actually burst on board the ship, this derangement had accidentally taken place by the shell having slipped forward. It is now proved, however, that with an interval of six feet between the greatest charge of powder and the heaviest shot there is no injury to the gun, and the space will be increased to eight or ten feet, with little apparent probability of bursting. The committee will finally try if they cannot burst this gun by firing it with a double charge of powder and shells, as they suppose the other gun to have been twice loaded in the case of that lamentable disaster a twelvemonth ago.

THE SYDNEY EXHIBITION.

The opening, on Sept. 17, of the International Exhibition at Sydney, New South Wales, has already been the subject of an Illustration in this Journal, from a Sketch by our Special Artist. We now present a view of the "Garden Palace," as it is popularly called, erected for the Exhibition, with the buildings provided to shelter the machinery and live stock, and with the beautiful shores of Sydney Harbour extending some miles beyond. The portraits of Lord Augustus Loftus, now Governor of New South Wales, who performed the opening ceremony, the Earl of Belmore, a former Governor, who is President of the Exhibition Commission in London, Sir Daniel Cooper, Bart., Vice-President, and Mr. P. A. Jennings, Executive Commissioner at Sydney, appear in this Number.

We have on two previous occasions described the Exhibition Palace, which is situated in that portion of the Sydney public park known as the Inner Domain, overlooking the Botanic Gardens and the harbour, the rear being towards Macquarie-street. The building consists of a nave 800 ft. long, a transept 500 ft. long, two aisles, with annexes and galleries, four towers, and a central dome, which is 210 ft. high and 100 ft. in diameter, roofed with iron; it is lighted by twenty-six windows, in a lantern, and by a skylight at the foot of the lantern. It covers about one-third of the space occupied by the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park at the Exhibition of 1851. The interior is coloured with yellow and light-blue, and with lines of red. The general plan of the edifice is apparent in our View presented this week; the front elevation was shown in a former Illustration. It will be observed that the rear range of building is one storey high; the front part, facing towards the north-east, has two storeys, and the towers are of three, rising at each of the four sides, there being one at each end of the nave and one at the end of each transept. With reference to the site of the Palace, it may be well to mention that Government house, distinguished by the flag, is seen at the extreme left of our View, to the west, in which direction also lies the town of Sydney; along the shore to the right-hand of the Palace are Farm Cove, Watson's Bay, and other conspicuous inlets, with Garden Island, Shark Island, and Clark Island; but the opposite land is the north shore of the harbour, as far as North Head and Bradley's Head, where lies the entrance from the open sea.

The distinguished persons connected with this Exhibition, whose portraits we give, must be noticed more particularly. The Governor, Lord Augustus Loftus, is the fourth son of the second Marquis of Ely, and was born in 1817, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. Entering the diplomatic service, he acted as Chargé-d'Affaires at Berlin in the years 1853, 1855, 1857; was appointed Envoy at Vienna in March, 1858; transferred to Berlin in December, 1860; to Munich in 1862; returned to Berlin in 1865; was accredited to the North German Confederation in 1868, and appointed Ambassador at St. Petersburg in July, 1871. He was appointed Governor of New South Wales in January of this year, and arrived at that Colony in the first week of August. He married, in 1845, the second daughter of Admiral H. F. Greville.

The Earl of Belmore (Somerset Richard Lowry-Corry) son of the third Irish peer of that title, was born in 1835, was educated at Cambridge, and was elected a representative peer to sit in the House of Lords in 1857. He was Under-Secretary for the Home Department in 1866 and 1867 under Lord Derby's Government, and in January, 1868, was appointed Governor of New South Wales, where he resided till 1872. He married, in 1861, a daughter of Captain John Gladstone, R.N. Lord Belmore has done useful service in Parliamentary inquiries and legislative measures for the better regulation of railways, the improved auditing of public accounts, Irish University and intermediate education, and in the suppression of abuses in the Polynesian labour traffic. He was President of the London Commission this year for the Sydney Exhibition, and a member also of the Royal Commission for the Sydney and Melbourne Exhibitions, of which the Prince of Wales is President.

Sir Daniel Cooper, Bart., K.C.M.G., formerly Speaker of the New South Wales House of Assembly, was born in that colony in 1821, but received his education in England. He returned to New South Wales in 1843, and in 1849 was elected one of the Legislative Council. In 1856, when a Parliamentary Constitution was set on foot, he entered the Assembly, and was chosen its Speaker, to which office he was several times reappointed after general elections of the Assembly. He promoted the construction of the first railway, from Sydney to Paramatta, and was one of its directors. He also supported the establishment of the Sydney University and the Grammar School, being at one time a member of the Senate of the former and a trustee of the latter; and he established a scholarship at the University and contributed liberally, with others, to the ornamentation of the great hall, which is one of the largest and handsomest belonging to any University. In 1861 Sir Daniel, for the benefit of his health and the education of his family, came to England, where he has resided since, making periodical visits to Australia; but he has never been idle. During the late Sir Charles Cowper's illness he helped him in the duties of Agent-General, and at his death temporarily filled the office of Agent-General. At this period he negotiated with the other Agents-General to duplicate the telegraph cables to Australia, which failed for the time, but has lately led to a successful agreement. He also, with Sir Julius Vogel, negotiated for the laying of the telegraph cable between Sydney and New Zealand, and also the present packet contract between Sydney, New Zealand, and San Francisco. Sir D. Cooper, in 1862, represented his colony at the International Exhibition, and he has occupied the same position at each International Exhibition in Paris, Vienna, Philadelphia, and Paris again. For some years he was connected with the Society of Arts and the Royal Horticultural Society, and aided much in the Grand International Horticultural Show of 1866, of which he was the treasurer. He has laboured to improve the warehousing and sale of Australian wool in London; and has, almost single-handed, caused improvements to be made and reductions in charges which must cause a saving of many thousands a year to the Australian sheep farmer. He was knighted in 1857, and raised to the baronetcy in 1863.

Mr. Patrick Alfred Jennings, C.M.G., was born in 1831, at Newry, in Ireland, the son of a merchant in that town. He went to Australia in 1852, and was tolerably successful at the gold-fields, where he was among the first to introduce quartz-crushing machinery. He afterwards engaged in pastoral enterprise in the Riverina district of Victoria. In 1866, he accepted a nomination to the Legislative Council of New South Wales. This he resigned in 1870, to become representative of the Murray district in the Assembly, where he sat in two Parliaments, taking a leading part in the discussion of fiscal affairs between New South Wales and Victoria. He was a Commissioner to represent New South Wales, Queensland, and Tasmania, at the Philadelphia Centennial Exhibition of the United States, in 1876. In December, 1878, he was to have taken office in the proposed Robertson Ministry, but there was a change of political conditions. He has been, during some years, Vice-President of the New South Wales Agricultural Society, and his active exertions this year, as Executive Commissioner of the present Exhibition, have contributed greatly to its success.

Our Portrait of Lord A. Loftus is from a photograph by C. Roesch, of St. Petersburg; that of Lord Belmore, from one by Mr. Chancellor, of Dublin; and that of Sir Daniel Cooper, one by Mr. T. Fall, of Baker-street, London.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

As a winter exhibition, nominally of "sketches and studies," which does not pretend to show the members' principal work of the year, this present collection may be regarded as rather above than below the average, though the improvement is not nearly so marked as at the parent society's gallery farther east in Pall-mall. Two innovations, both of them highly judicious as we think, have to be noted in the personal constitution of this society and the arrangement of its exhibition. One of these is the removal of the distinction between "members" and "associates," every artist elected into the society being now a "member"—a liberal step warmly to be commended to the elder society. Every accepted artist should, we think, be admitted to the deliberations (for is there not "wisdom in the multitude of councillors?") the rights and privileges of the artists who have elected him into their body. The differences in the degrees of talent of these water-colour painters is not in general so great as to necessitate an invidious distinction which seems to have originated in a somewhat ostentatious imitation of the Royal Academy constitution, nor does the system of succession at the Old Society seem to be worked even on a fair or defined principle. We have known artists remain for very many years on the Associate list, while others much more recently elected, and most certainly not of superior merit, have been promoted to the full honour of membership. The other innovation at the Institute is the appropriation of the small room at the end of the long gallery for the display (in the winter gatherings at least) of drawings in black and white. The Institute, like the elder society, comprises several first-rate draughtsmen for the wood engraver, and this collection of genuine "studies and sketches" in black and white is not only very interesting in itself, but serves to show the strength of the younger body as regards the essentials of draughtsmanship and design.

Among the absentees from this exhibition is the worthy president, Mr. Louis Haghe, and we regret to hear that this may be attributed to serious illness.

We cannot do better than commence our observations in detail than with Mr. T. Collier's large and noble drawing "A Deer Park in the Southern Downs" (271), an extensive view of this truly magnificent scenery with the lines, graceful as grand, of its great rolling masses, and a shadowy wood stretching through the prodigious hollow that sweeps free as a huge sea trough, far away from our feet, and to the mountain waves that it feeds and flings up right and left towards the heavens. By much the finest work the artist has done, this drawing, without reminding us so much of David Cox as Mr. Collier did formerly, yet recalls the simple broad unity and power of the early masters of water-colour. Mr. J. D. Linton's "Flag of Truce" (68) is distinguished by his able painting of characteristic heads, and the elaboration he imparts so conscientiously and only too equally to all textures; but otherwise it is not a happy example. In a courtyard just within the walls of a beleaguered city of the Low Countries apparently, and in the seventeenth century, a mounted trooper bearing the white flag is receiving the message to the besiegers from the city magnates, who stand at a portal to the right. This is, of course, the natural reading of the incident; but the expressions of these ancient personages seem so denunciatory and irate, as well as resolute, that one might suppose that the flag of truce had come from the besiegers with unacceptable terms. There is indeed, as usual, some ambiguity in the dramatic expressions: the attitudes of the trooper, horse, and attendant are awkward, and the composition straggling. In another drawing of a girl holding, rather stiffly, a tumbler of forget-me-nots (245), the execution is superior, though we find the artist indulging (as with the soldiers in the last drawing) his partiality for costumes that are rather outrés than picturesque. The fashion of the dress in this instance seems to be German of near the Maximilian time. Refined and tender as Mr. H. G. Hine cannot fail to be, we have seen him to more advantage than in the view of the "Chalk Cliffs at Cuckmere, Sussex" (241), seen through a veil of misty spray from the lashing waves below. It may be observed generally that repeated washings of the paper, while procuring delicacy and breadth of tone, is too apt to result in dulness, vapidity, and "woolliness." Mr. Hargitt appears prominently and very creditably in his powerful and richly coloured drawing, "Near Capel Curig" (260). Mr. Houston also is favourably represented in "Kilchurn Castle" (95) and other landscapes, and in a little figure-picture of a child asleep with its doll (52); and Mr. Harry Johnson is at his best in "Haunted" (91), a deserted ruinous cottage with strangely distorted window-panes, dimly discerned in a weird twilight, as the hare glances rustling through the wild overgrowths of the long-neglected garden, and the will-o'-the-wisp floats along the marshy hollow. All Mr. Edwin Hayes's small sketches for sea-pieces are very spirited and skilful. An elegant pictorial feeling pervades Mr. Leitch's landscapes, particularly the small ones, though some are a little heavy in tone. Mr. W. L. Thomas has exhibited nothing so good as his series of subjects from Switzerland. Of these the prettiest is that of the girl in the quaint "Sunday" costume of "Appenzel" (107) watering her flowers at the châlet casement; and the most impressive "The Ribbon Road, St. Gothard's Pass" (287)—the road so named from its long, winding, apparently narrow course along the ledges of the gigantic gorge, though still more remarkable than this view is the numerous lappings of the road among the savage rocks nearer the summit. A word of warm praise is due to the child-head, about lifesize, called "A Pleasant Thought" (272), by Miss Emily Farmer.

The lately elected and younger members are fairly represented. Mr. Seymour Lucas has an effective drawing, "A Question of Date" (29), a dilettante in costume of last century dubiously eyeing one of the huge tilting helms of the fifteenth century. Sir Coutts-Lindsay sends sketches, quite up to the professional level in competency, of some of the numerous convents of Mount Athos (Nos. 99 and 254) and a view in Troas—a picturesque, little-known world. By Lady Lindsay there is a lifesize, carefully modelled head of an Italian boy, "Antonino" (111). Mr. Fulleylove's exterior and interior views at Hampton Court (64 and 251) afford promise. "Waiting for Water, Venice, 7.55 a.m." (265), by Mr. Frank Topham, is the best drawing by him we have seen: water girls or acquajole, with their copper pails near the fountain in the first cortile of the Ducal Palace waiting for the striking of the hour to draw water—the fountains at Venice being opened at stated times twice a day. Messrs. Walter Wilson, Clausen, and Hugh Carter have each gone to Holland for materials and themes. The first, in his largely and boldly handled "Jilted" (228)—a little Dutch girl forsaking a whimpering boy with a boat for another with an apple—has made a notable advance, though his effects of light are still too flickering. In the black-and-white room is the long series of this artist's very clever and lively pen-and-ink illustrations to Mr. C. Pascoe's "Dramatic Notes," which will afford a fund of pleasure and amusement to playgoers. Mr. Carter's Dutch baby, "Left Alone" (105), in its tall, lumbering wooden chair and table combined, and other drawings, are evidently inspired by Israels; but the artist has hardly caught the suggestive air of accident in the master's execution. Mr. Clausen evinces steady progress in his Dutch scene (60) on a canal towing-path, over which hang the mists of "early morning," with a man tracking a barge, and a buxom lass trudging along under the yoke that supports her baskets laden with farm produce. Mr. Walter May, too, is fond of the canals, and polders, and schuyts, and pinks of Holland (though not to the exclusion of other neighbouring coasts and craft), and he, likewise, is wearing ahead. "Dutch Boats, Alkmaar" (305), "Evening at St. Malo" (57), and others, have, in addition to thorough nautical knowledge, a modesty of execution, a refinement of colour, and a sober truthfulness generally, which must be sought out to be appreciated as they deserve to be. "Beechy Island, Winter Quarters of Sir John Franklin, 1845-6" (177), a monochrome drawing by this artist, is authenticated, we believe, by Mr. May's own Arctic experience in early life. Another artist whose aim at refinement and simplicity is commendable, and who also attains much breadth without, as formerly, obvious imitation of David Cox, is Mr. Orrock. But, valuable as breadth is in all art, we must submit that the quality might be displayed in scenery of more interest than that of the "Lincolnshire Coast," although enlivened by cart and horse, and men scouring the sea-margin for shrimps, as we see in No. 37, or by "Shrimpers Unloading" (12)—two of Mr. Orrock's largest drawings. Similar in subject to these is "Smelt-Fishing on the East Coast" (106) and other works by E. C. Holloway, together with the conscientiously executed scenes from the Norfolk coast by C. J. Staniland. Welcome are several contributions, illustrative of the wonders of the animal world, by Mr. Wolf, who, for learning as a naturalist and learning informed by imaginative, and artistic insight—stands almost alone. In "Storks starting for the South" (55) the air is alive with the rising birds, as they soar to fall in, with military accuracy, along the wedge-shaped column already formed in the sky, whilst hundreds still await on the plain their turn to rise. The other drawings are in chalk: "The Merlin," literally "stalking his prey" (186) of goldfinches among thistles; "Storm on the Alps" (160), chamois, ptarmigan, and even the timid hare crowding together for shelter from wind and snow about a sheltering pine; and a pair, "Night" (154), a lion prowling as a rifle flashes upon him (similar to a subject we have engraved), and "Morning" (173), a lion lying dead with a bullet-hole in his side.

The group of painters known also as draughtsmen for wood-engraving, which includes Messrs. C. Green, W. Small, William Simpson, H. Herkomer, and others, are not largely represented in colour; whilst John Tenniel, E. J. Gregory, and others are absent altogether. Several painters in this category have been influenced in water-colours by the practice of the late Frederick Walker, particularly as regards the use of body colour, as they have in illustrative work by his exquisite precision. C. Green has two small figures, a lady reading "The Lady's Magazine for 1820" (356), herself dressed in the hideous fashion of that date; and an attitudinising beau of 1793 (357). The most important drawing by W. Small is "Drying Herring Nets—Banff" (277), with many good qualities, barring harshness of colouring. But by both these artists there are in the small room several series of designs for novels and other illustrations. On these we have not space to expatiate, and can only mention en passant Mr. Green's capital studies of horsey rascals and their dupes in "Racecourse Outsiders" (151)—studies made probably for his "Derby Day." The visitor, however, cannot fail to highly esteem drawings which have gone triumphantly through the trying ordeal of satisfying at once the authors, the public, and the publishers. And some may recall the fact that the present vastly extended application of illustrative art to newspapers and other publications has served to develop the powers, not of several only, but of very many of the leading artists of the day. To the able, adventurous, and learned draughtsman, Mr. William Simpson, the Illustrated London News and its readers are too much indebted as an artistic correspondent from all parts of the world, not for the two coloured sketches he has sent here (but nothing in simple black and white) to be encountered with much pleasure. One represents the magnificent snow-clad "Suffaid Koh Range, Afghanistan, from near Gundamuck" (115); the other (217) the arrival of Dr. Brydon at Jellalabad, "The Sole Survivor" of the massacre of 1842, painted from sketches on the spot and descriptions lately furnished to the artist by Major Bailey, an eye-witness of Dr. Brydon's arrival—the subject treated so pathetically also by Miss Thompson. Mr. Herkomer's sole contribution is an etching of his own head (184); but this is the best etching we have seen by him: note also the pretty group of a couple of children embracing each other in the corner of the plate. Mr. A. C. Gow, who as a painter may be classed with these artists, has a highly-finished excellent drawing, "Stragglers" (78)—wounded soldiers in a barn, a little girl (why such a starveling?) entering the door. Miss Mary L. Gow deserves all encouragement for the decided advance shown in "The Epilogue to 'Romula'" (101)—Romula with a boy at her knee, whom she is teaching.

Among works by other artists—mostly those whose characteristics are known to the public—we must be content to mention "Camels at a Watering-Place, Jaffa" (285), by R. Beavis (whose Academy picture, "En Route to Mecca," we lately engraved); another camel study (39), by Guido Bach; "On the Welsh Coast" (282), by J. Syer—which seems to have more of the conventionality of early works than usual; "None are so blind as those who won't see" (295), by Towneley Green; "Marianina" (367), by E. Bale; sketch by J. Aumonier, very true to nature in general aspect, and others refined in colour by Harry Hine. Venetian and other subjects by W. Wyld; studies with sunset and other effects by J. Mogford; "Pianosa, Coast of Corsica" (326), by J. G. Philp, whose painting has improved with change of scene; "Mountain Road" (75), by E. M. Wymperis; Greenwich Hospital" (40), by F. J. Skill; "Contrast — Moncontour, Brittany" (11), by J. Absolom; "Naples and Vesuvius" (206), from the unfinished and ruinous palace of Queen Joan, at Posilippo, by C. Vacher; a large drawing of a lady trying the effect of a Royalist favour in a mirror (49), by G. G. Kilburne, whose smaller work we much prefer; sketches in Spain and Algiers by Mrs. E. Murray; "A Surrender" (334) by C. Cattermole; "Shellfish Gatherers" (225) by R. Carrick; a rough and ludicrous sketch of a country bumpkin with a kid called "Jack's Darling" (222) by H. B. Roberts, not worthy of the painter; architectural subjects by J. L. Wood; landscapes by J. H. Mole, E. G. Warren, J. W. Whymper; Fahey senior and junior, Penson and Pidgeon, and still-life by Mrs. Duffield and J. Sherrin.

The forthcoming exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery, which will open Jan. 1 next, will contain a number of works by Dutch artists.

In the distribution of prizes to the Royal Academy students last week the silver medal for a painting of a head was awarded to John Henry Henshall, of Manchester.

We regret to learn that Mrs. Louise Jopling is in precarious health, and is ordered by her physicians to abstain from painting, and to take perfect rest for three or four months.

The lecture at the London Institution on the 11th inst. was given to a crowded audience by Mr. Walter Severn on "Sketching from Nature," and was practically illustrated.

Mr. Scharf, Keeper and Secretary of the National Portrait Gallery, South Kensington, informs us that the gallery will be open to the public on Friday, the 26th inst. (Boxing Day).

The French Government have conferred the distinction of the Legion of Honour on Mr. Hubert Herkomer, A.R.A., one of the two English painters who gained a gold medal for art at the last Paris Exhibition.

The Art-Union of London have issued proofs of an important plate engraved in line by Mr. Lumb Stocks, R.A., "Dr. Johnson Awaiting an Audience of Lord Chesterfield," from the original picture by the late Mr. E. M. Ward, R.A. It is a fine picture, and is to be received by all subscribers to the next distribution, in addition to the chance of gaining one out of the 630 prizes, of the aggregate value of £5440.

The sale of the late Sir Charles Rushout's collection of pictures and plate, &c., was concluded yesterday week at Messrs. Phillips and Sons' Rooms, New Bond-street, the total amount realised being upwards of £16,000. A notable feature of the sale was the large number of pictures painted for the family by Angelica Kauffman, and these provoked keen competition, and in most cases realised high prices.

MUSIC.

The supplemental series of performances at Her Majesty's Theatre closed, as intimated last week, on Saturday, with "Oberon," for the benefit of Madame Pappenheim: that of Madame Marie Rose having taken place on the previous Thursday in "Mignon;" "Lohengrin" having been given on the following evening for the benefit of Mdlle. Minnie Hauk, who repeated the meritorious performance of the character of Elsa, which has heretofore been commented on. On the Wednesday afternoon before, the same part was sustained, for the first time, by Madame Hélène Crosmond, who gave a very effective representation of it. Signor Li Calsi continued to fulfil the office of conductor.

Mr. Carl Rosa's new season of performances of opera in English begins, at the same house, on Jan. 10.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert—the eleventh of the series—included a fine performance of Mendelssohn's noble "Antigone" music, for which special arrangements had been made with Mr. Henry Leslie, by whose excellent choir this great work has several times been admirably rendered, as it was in the instance now referred to—directed by Mr. Leslie, who conducted the whole concert. The incidental passages for solo voices in the "Antigone" music were rendered by Messrs. H. Guy, B. Davis, R. E. Miles, and H. D'Egville. Other fine performances on Saturday were those of Mendelssohn's noble eight-part psalm "Judge me, O God," Bach's motet "The spirit also helpeth," and Morley's vivacious part-song "My bonnie lass, she smileth," all heretofore associated with Mr. Leslie's concerts. Mdlle. Marie Breidenstein made a very successful first appearance in Weber's fine concert scena "Ines de Castro," in which the lady displayed a soprano voice of bright quality, and some good declamation and brilliant execution. Balfe's serenade "Good night, beloved," nicely sung by Mr. H. Guy, and Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture completed the programme.

The first concert of the Highbury Philharmonic Society's second season was given at the Highbury Athenæum on Monday evening, when the late Mr. Henry Smart's sacred cantata, "Jacob," was performed for the first time in London. The work was commissioned for and produced at the Glasgow Festival of 1873, and was very favourably noticed at the time. Its performance on Monday last again proved that it contains much skilful writing, although, perhaps, somewhat wanting in distinctive individuality of style. Several of the choruses proved very effective, those being, generally, the strongest portions of the work. The recitative and air for Laban, and the duet for Rachel and Jacob, both in the second part, were much applauded; the singers having been Mr. R. Hilton, Miss Jessie Jones, and Mr. H. Kearton. Other effective pieces having been the recitative and air for the Angel (Mrs. Bradshawe McKay), and the quartet, by the four singers named, in the third part of the cantata. The band and chorus were efficient, and the performance was ably conducted by Dr. Bridge.

Mdlle. Janotha was again the pianist at this week's Monday Popular Concert, her solos having been three characteristic pieces—a capriccio by Brahms, a romance by Madame Schumann (composed when she was Clara Wieck), and a novelette by Robert Schumann—all which were charmingly played. A quartet by Haydn and Beethoven's Septet, both led by Madame Norman-Neruda, respectively began and closed the concert, which included vocal pieces gracefully rendered by Miss Lillian Bailey.

Last Saturday night the first Promenade Concert at the Royal Aquarium, under the direction of Mr. C. Dubois, attracted a large audience and passed off successfully.

The annual concert in aid of the funds of the Post-Office Orphan Home took place at St. James's Hall on Saturday evening, and was very successful. The programme, which was a very full one, included the names of the following artistes, all of whom gave their services for the occasion:—Madame Marie Roze (Her Majesty's Opera), Madame Liebhart, Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Elene Webster, Madame Cross-Lavers, Madame Frances Brooke, Miss Orridge, Madame Osborne Williams, Miss E. G. Maile, Miss de Fonblanque, Madame Mary Cummings (Her Majesty's Opera), Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Percy Blandford, Mr. Wallace Wells, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Henry Cross, Mr. Walter Clifford, Mr. Frederick King, Miss Albert (piano), Mr. Viotti Collins (Royal Italian Opera) (violin), Mr. Oluf Svensden (flautist to the Queen), Mr. John Thomas (harpist to the Queen), Mr. G. Grossmith, jun., the British Glee Union, and (as conductors) Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mr. Lehmeyer, and Mr. W. Ganz. Notwithstanding the length of the programme, several encores were demanded and accorded. The institution in whose aid this concert was given has no building of its own. The orphans, at present ninety-seven in number, are boarded out in schools or private homes, and are maintained and educated, with periodical visitation by the committee, until they are, if boys, fourteen, if girls, fifteen, years of age. The boys for the most part enter the service of the Post Office. The charity is supported by subscriptions within the Post Office, and by public contributions.

A grand evening amateur concert, conducted by Signor Adelman, was given at the residence of Miss Pattisson, 20, Clifton-gardens, Maida-hill, on Tuesday, to aid in the maintenance of forty new beds lately added to the University College Hospital.

The last of the "London Ballad Concerts" before Christmas took place on Wednesday, with a varied selection, including many favourite old English songs and ballads.

Messrs. Shedlock and Lochner closed their series of interesting "Musical Evenings," at the Lancaster Hall, Notting-hill, last week. The next series is to begin in April.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" ("Lobgesang") and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" constituted the programme of Mr. William Carter's concert of Thursday at the Royal Albert Hall.

The third of the excellent chamber concerts of Messrs. Carrodus and E. Howell took place at the Beethoven Rooms on Thursday evening. On the same evening, Madame Sainton-Dolby gave a concert at Steinway Hall, the programme having comprised a varied selection of vocal music performed by pupils of her Academy.

The Sacred Harmonic Society's forty-eighth Christmas performance of "The Messiah" took place yesterday (Friday) evening, the principal singers announced having been Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas.

The Royal Albert Hall Amateur Orchestral Society opens its eighth season this (Saturday) evening with a concert in aid of the funds of the German Hospital, Dalston. The orchestral concert of the students of the Royal Academy of Music also takes place, at St. James's Hall, this (Saturday) evening.

The competition for the Santley Prize of ten guineas, for the competitor who may be judged to "accompany best and to transpose at sight," took place at the Royal Academy of Music on Monday. There were nine candidates, and the prize was awarded to Richard Harvey Löhr.

Mr. Henry Gadsby's new cantata, "The Lord of the Isles," will be performed on Monday next by the Brixton Choral Society. The composer will preside at the pianoforte, the conductor being Mr William Lemare. The vocalists are Mr. James Sauvage, Mr Wallace Wells, Mr. Gerard Coventry, Mr Henry Winter; and Mrs. Bradshaw McKay and Madame Clara Suter.

THEATRES.

A new play connected with the name of Mr. James Albery must always excite a certain amount of interest. Though not all his works are equal to "The Two Roses," they invariably indicate a delicacy of conception and an elegance of composition that far remove him from the ranks of the ordinary playwright. He claims to be a dramatist of no common order, and his claims are to a great extent justified. We could have wished that he had avoided the seductions of what it has become fashionable to call "the Ring," and been content to take his lot with those whose genius, it is now acknowledged, adds unrecognised literary wealth to the country. The new drama which he has this week contributed to the Court Theatre, now under the enlightened management of Mr. Wilson Barrett, is entitled "The Old Love and the New." It is a play in five acts, written by Bronson Howard, and adapted to the English stage by Mr. James Albery. The story is obvious enough from the title, and the poetic interest which it possesses is sure to recommend it to the fashionable and intelligent audiences of the Chelsea theatre. Its representation commands the talents of an efficient company, with Miss Amy Roselle as the leading attraction. The part of the heroine is exceedingly well adapted to this lady's especial aptitude, and will add to her laurels. Other characters are ably supported by Mr. Charles Coghlan, Mr. David Fisher, Mr. Edmund Leathes, Mr. G. Anson, Mr. Winfred Emery, and several ladies of talent. This is decidedly a strong company; they are also materially assisted by some excellent scenery painted by Messrs. George Gordon and Harford, together with Walter Hannand Bruce Smith, and some incidental music by Mr. Robert Stoffel. In all respects, Mr. Wilson Barrett commands esteem by the careful manner in which the new drama has been prepared for the stage. The battle, however, is not yet decided. An ambitious originality in the mode of treating the theme troubled and disturbed not a few; others regarded it as mere caprice. But things of this kind find their level; and frequently public opinion, after a fair trial, decides for the author. The work will be variously criticised, and will lead to much discussion. The play, as originally written by Mr. B. Howard, has already been acted in America, but it has been much improved by Mr. Albery. He has imparted to it a pathos, which secures the sympathy of an intelligent audience.

The Folly was reopened on Saturday, when Mr. H. J. Byron generously appeared as the substitute for Mr. J. L. Toole, whose illness and sorrow prevent him from at present appearing before the public. The play performed was "Not Such a Fool as He Looks," Mr. Byron personating with his usual power Sir Simon Simple. The impersonation, as our readers know, is of the most diverting sort—one of those quiet delineations in which Mr. Byron excels. Mr. E. W. Gordon as Mr. Mould was good, Mr. H. Westland as Frederick Grantley amusing, and Mr. John Billington as Mr. Daniel Murgatroyd appropriately forcible. Miss Roland Phillips and Miss Eliza Johnstone deserve commendation as Felicia Craven and Mrs. Morton. The talent of such performers should be found sufficiently attractive until Mr. Toole himself shall be enabled to return to the boards.

The Opéra Comique seeks, by an ingenious arrangement, to give an extended life to "H.M.S. Pinafore," by organising a performance of the opera by children. The music has been revised to suit the voices of the young performers, who personate the characters with a neatness and intelligence that surprises as well as pleases. The entertainment is altogether unique, and must become exceedingly popular. We do not mention the names of the individual artistes, out of a regard for their future, which, in such cases, we fear, may be compromised by a too early trial. In itself it is a marvel, and is adapted to give a peculiar sensation of delight to adult audiences, at an exhibition which is full of contrasts and suggestions that provoke more reflection than can be expressed in a limited space.

Mr. Hollingshead has issued the following account of his stewardship of the Gaiety Theatre:—"To the public. To-day, Dec. 20, is the eleventh anniversary of the opening of the Gaiety Theatre. During these eleven years the house has only been closed sixty nights, and has been opened for 434 day performances; in other words, it has been kept open by me for twelve years and eleven weeks in the space of eleven years. Though our present programme would have carried us successfully through Christmas, it will be temporarily withdrawn after Christmas Eve in favour of one of those special holiday entertainments which I have been accustomed to produce for several years past. 'Gulliver,' however, will only be played for a limited number of nights, and after it is withdrawn the burlesque of 'Robbing Roy" will resume its run. At Easter the Hanlon Lees will appear in their eccentric pantomimic farce, 'The Voyage en Suisse,' which has been a great and peculiar success in Paris, and has been done into English by Mr. Reece. 'The French Plays,' as announced, will begin on May 24. The performances will be an annual feature in the Gaiety programme, and every care will be taken to render each foreign season worthy of its predecessor."

Messrs. Maskelyne and Cook have introduced a new Christmas programme to the public at the Egyptian Hall. In addition to the wonderful performances of Mr. Maskeleyne's androids, it includes a talking automaton cockatoo, an automaton creeping and coiling serpent, and the flight of Mr. Maskelyne off the fully lighted stage, with no visible means of support.

Vice-Chancellor Malins had before him yesterday week a friendly suit, "Buckstone v. Fraser," brought on behalf of the family of the late Mr. J. B. Buckstone, the actor. Sir William Fraser, trustee of a fund of about £1200 raised during the lifetime of the deceased, asked the Court to sanction a scheme for the investment of the balance, in order to pay the widow and her family an annuity of £80 as long as the money lasted. His Lordship acceded to the application.

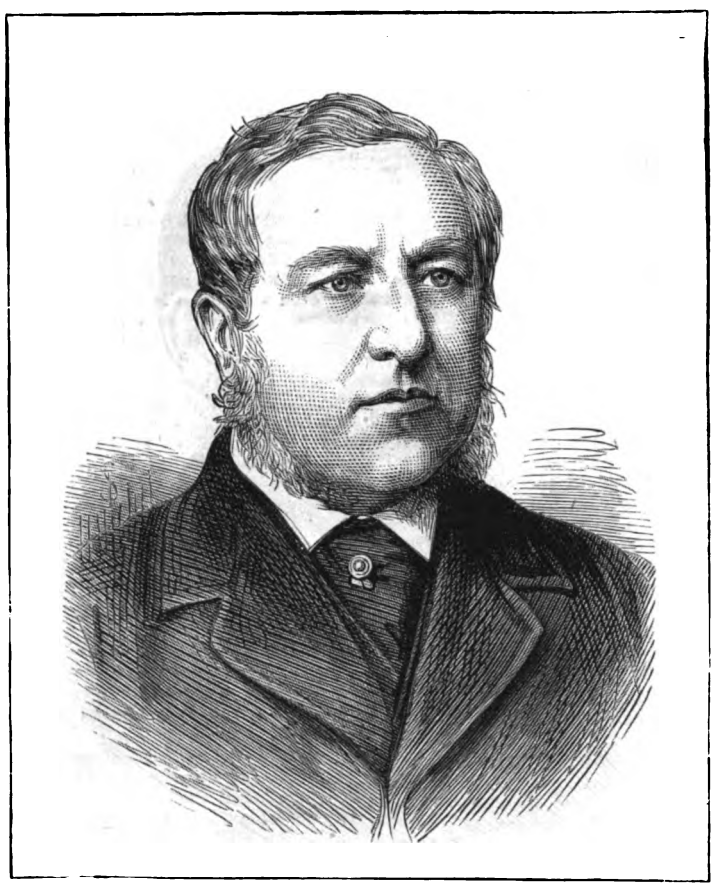
A NEW CHRISTMAS PASTIME:

THE GAME OF THE ROAD.

Acrostics were known to have been written in Greece and Rome in days before the Christian era; but they obtained great favour in France in the sixteenth century, and were made highly popular in England in Queen Elizabeth's reign, chiefly through the ingenious verses of the courtly poet Sir John Davies. Though Dryden and Addison sneered at them as antiquated modes of wit which had long been exploded from the commonwealth of letters, yet they continued to hold their own as harmless methods for procuring innocent amusement united to no little dexterity of invention. The single acrostics, however, have long since given place to the double acrostics—those enigmas or charades, or "novel and ingenious riddles," as I termed them, when I had the pleasure of first introducing them to the public in the pages of the Illustrated London News Aug. 30, 1856. They at once hit the public fancy; and answers to the five Double Acrostic Charades that I wrote in that number of this Journal, and in the number for Sept. 13, poured in from correspondents in each quarter of the globe. Since then Double Acrostics have been published in numberless newspapers and periodicals, and, after twenty-three years of public service, still maintain the popularity that they immediately obtained on their first appearance in this Journal.

A similar success will not, probably, await my suggestion for a new Pastime; but, without any apology, I add it to the multiplicity of ways and means that now exist for healthily occupying the intellects and memories of young and old of both sexes, who have met together to spend a few hours in varied games and amusements, whether at Christmas or any other season. I start the idea from the old story of two bagmen—an intelligent and hard-working class, who, perhaps, were better acquainted than the generality of people with the scenery of Great Britain. The story goes, that these two bagmen laid a wager that one of them would name the prettiest road in all England. But the wager had to be drawn, for the one traveller named the road from Warwick to Leamington, while the other traveller named the road from Leamington to Warwick. That was many years ago, before the railway age, and when there were fewer houses between the two towns than there are at the present time. But the anecdote suggests the new game that may be added to the novelties of the Christmas season—the Game of the Road.

Let each person in the company be asked to name, either by word of mouth or in writing, some road with which they are acquainted, in whatever county, country, or quarter of the globe it may happen to be. Thus, for example, and borrowing from the bagmen—"Name and describe the prettiest road that you know." And so with other roads, such as the ugliest road, the loneliest road, the hilliest road, the straightest road, the broadest road, the narrowest road, the roughest road, the weariest road, the dreariest road, the busiest road, the dustiest road, the noisiest road, the quietest road, the muddiest road, the most circuitous road, the steepest road, the most romantic road, the most ancient road, the road by the prettiest lake, the road by the loveliest river, the road by celebrated castles, the road by the greatest number of mansions, or abbeys, or deer-parks, or historic spots, or battle-fields, &c.



In the replies to such questions as these, much information could be interchanged, and travellers would be able to give their personal experiences of foreign lands. The game would afford instruction, as well as amusement, especially to the young; would not require any preparation, and would only tax the powers of memory in an agreeable way. An hour might be pleasantly spent in this pastime, which is susceptible of many variations—in short, of Roads' variations; and he who was adjudged to have given the best answers, might be dubbed, for that evening, the Colossus of Rhodes. CUTHBERT BEDE.

The Corporation of Rochester last Saturday sealed a petition to Parliament in favour of the undertakings proposed to be carried out by the Corporation, for which a bill has been introduced. These include the construction of spacious docks in the Medway, towards which the Corporation will contribute; the purchase and extension of the waterworks, the embankment of the Medway, and other important undertakings.

OBITUARY.

LADY WOOD.

Emma Caroline, Lady Wood, died at an advanced age, on the 15th inst., at Belhus, her son-in-law's seat in Essex. Her Ladyship was youngest daughter of Sampson Mitchell, Esq., R.N., of Croft West, Cornwall, Admiral in the Portuguese Navy, and was married Feb. 16, 1820, to the Rev. Sir John Page Wood, second Baronet, eldest son of Sir Matthew Wood, Bart., M.P., twice Lord Mayor of London. Of the marriage there was a numerous issue: the eldest son was the late Sir Francis Wood, Bart., and the fifth is the gallant Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C., K.C.B. Of the daughters, the fourth, Emma, married, 1853, Sir Thomas Barrett Lennard, Bart., of Belhus. Lady Wood was left a widow Feb. 21, 1866. Her husband's only surviving brother is William Page, Lord Hatherley. Lady Wood, the authoress of several popular novels, was a woman of rare accomplishment, good sense, and warmth of feeling. Her life was spared to admit of her participation in the universal gratification the well-earned honours of her son have afforded.

MR. ATKINS DAVIS.

John Nicholas Crofts Atkins Davis, Esq., Deputy Inspector-General of Army Hospitals, died recently at his residence in Dublin. This much-lamented gentleman, long associated with the Royal Artillery, and well known for the interest he took in genealogical pursuits, was eldest son of the late James Thomas Davis, Esq., Royal Artillery, Acting Deputy-Inspector of Ordnance Hospitals in the Peninsular War, by Mary, his wife, daughter of John Atkins, Esq., of Fountainville, in the county of Cork. Mr. Atkins Davis's youngest brother, the late Thomas Davis, was the brilliant poet and eloquent orator of the Young Ireland Party.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Thomas Waters, Esq., Major Royal Marine Light Infantry, on the 6th inst., at Hook, Surrey, in his ninety-ninth year.

The Rev. George Robert Kensit, for nearly fifty years Vicar of Betchworth, Surrey, in his seventy-fifth year.

Colonel Arthur Hill Millett, late Bengal Staff Corps, formerly Inspector-General of Police H.A.D. India, on the 8th inst., aged forty-eight.

Leadbetter Uppleby, Esq., of Wootton, Lincolnshire, J.P. and D.L., late Major R.N. Lincoln Militia, on the 5th inst., in his eighty-first year.

William Mitchell-Innes, Esq., late Captain 13th Hussars, eldest son of Alexander Mitchell-Innes, Esq., of Ayton Castle, in the county of Berwick, by Charlotte Gordon, his first wife, daughter of Sir Thomas Dick-Lauder, Bart., on the 7th inst.

Louisa Paulina, Lady Boughey, wife of Sir Thomas Fletcher Fenton Boughey, Bart., and youngest daughter of Thomas Giffard, Esq., of Chillington, in the county of Stafford, by Lady Charlotte Courtenay, his wife, sister of William, tenth Earl of Devon, on the 10th inst., at Aqualate, near Newport.

Eleanor Irving Matheson, wife of Alexander Matheson, Esq., M.P., of Ardross and Lochalsh, N.B., on the 6th inst., at Ardross Castle. She was great-granddaughter of John, second Earl of Egmont, and sixth daughter of Spencer Perceval, Esq., of Elm Grove, Ealing, eldest son of the Right Hon. Spencer Perceval, the Prime Minister. Mrs. Matheson was married in 1860, and leaves a large family.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

Mrs. Wigram, the wife of Major Wigram, distributed the prizes to the 26th Middlesex (Customs and Docks), on the 11th inst., in the large hall at Cannon-street Hotel. Lieutenant-Colonel Kennard, M.P., the commanding officer, in his opening address, stated that the enrolled strength of the regiment had risen during the past year from 787 to 809; the efficients, in the same time, increasing from 770 to 796.

Yesterday week the Duchess of Connaught presented, in St. James's Hall, the prizes won by members of the London Irish during the past year. The Duke of Connaught, who is the Honorary Colonel of the regiment, bore testimony to their soldierly bearing at Aldershott.

Colonel Stanley, Secretary for War, delivered the prizes yesterday week to the members of the Liverpool Rifle Brigade. He said that the chief objection to arming the volunteers with Martini-Henry rifle was that of expense. As to the idea of a volunteer legion for active service, he would not say that circumstances might not render such a contingent acceptable; but at present volunteers ought to confine themselves within the sphere at first marked out for them.

In the Guildhall last Saturday the Lady Mayoress presented the prizes won during the past year by the 2nd London; and Colonel Burnaby made some remarks on the history of the City of London Volunteers.

Colonel Waller, R.A., and Colonel Fremantle presented the prizes to the 3rd Middlesex Artillery and the 37th Middlesex respectively. The question of the want of proper drilling places for the various metropolitan corps was mentioned.

On Tuesday evening the annual distribution of the prizes won during the past season in great gun and carbine practice by the 3rd Essex Volunteer Artillery Brigade was held in the Townhall, Stratford, in the presence of a large company. Lieutenant-Colonel Hughes, the commanding officer, in opening the proceedings, gave some particulars of the condition of the brigade, which showed a considerable improvement over that of the preceding year.

Colonel A. Lyon-Fremantle will present the prizes to the West London (4th Middlesex), at St. George's Hall, this (Saturday) evening.

Last week there was not a single head of live cattle, sheep, or pigs landed at Liverpool from the United States and Canada, a circumstance which has not occurred for many months past. The quantity of fresh beef brought during the same period was, however, large; and the arrivals of mutton, though not up to the previous week, were still above the average of recent weeks; making a total of 6857 quarters of beef, 1444 carcases of mutton, and 103 dead pigs.

The Home Secretary has nominated to the Recordership of Portsmouth (vacant by the death of Mr. Serjeant Cox) Mr. George Deedes Warry, the leader of the Hampshire Circuit.—Mr. Prideaux, Q.C., Recorder of Exeter, and leader of the Western Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Bristol, in the place of Mr. Kingdon, Q.C., deceased; and Mr. Collins, Q.C., Recorder of Poole, has been appointed Recorder of Exeter.—Mr. Prior Goldney, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Poole, in succession to Mr. Collins; and Mr. G. F. Speke, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Helston, in his place. Mr. Speke was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1849.—Mr. Haden Corser, of the Oxford Circuit, has been appointed deputy stipendiary magistrate of the Wolverhampton district, as a temporary measure, owing to the indisposition of Mr. Boughey.

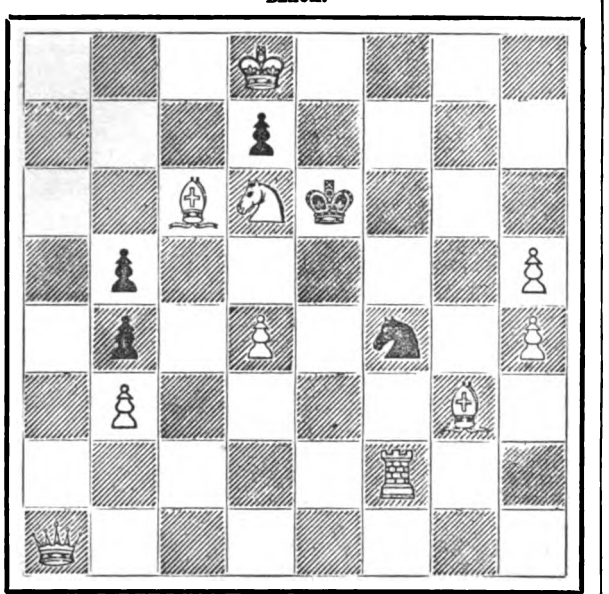
SOLUTION OF PROBLEM No. 1867.



WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q to Kt 3rd	Any move
2. Mates accordingly.

NOTE.—This problem was corrected after publication by the author placing a Black Pawn on K Kt 4th. The position has evoked a great deal of interest among our correspondents, and we have consequently been overwhelmed with suggestions for its correction. The simplest and most effective of these is that received from East Marden: substituting a Black Pawn for the Black Knight on Q Kt 7th.

PROBLEM No. 1870.

By J. PAUL TAYLOR.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

One of ten Games played sans voir simultaneously by Mr. BLACKBURNE during his recent visit to the Potteries. His adversary in this Game is Mr. ASKEW, of Burslem.—(Allgaier Gambit.)

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr. A.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. P to K B 4th	P takes P
3. Kt to K B 3rd	P to K Kt 4th
4. P to K R 4th	P to Kt 5th
5. Kt to K 5th	B to Kt 2nd
6. P to Q 4th	Q to K 2nd

The correct continuation is 6. Kt to K B 3rd, followed by 7. P to Q 4th, should White play the K B to B 4th. The move in the text is ill-timed, and subjects Black to an assault that prevents him developing his forces on the Queen's side.

7. Kt to Q B 3rd	P to Q B 3rd

Occupying the square required for the Q Kt.

8. B takes P	B takes Kt
9. P takes B

Much better than 9. B takes B. The Pawn is now effectively placed, preventing the advance of the adverse Q P.

9.	P to K R 4th
10. B to B 4th	P to K B 3rd
11. Q to Q 4th	P to Q Kt 4th
12. B takes Kt	P takes P
13. B takes P	R takes B
14. B to Q 6th	Q to Kt 2nd
15. Q takes Q	R takes Q

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr. A.)
16. Castles (K R)	R to B 2nd
17. P to K 5th	P to Q Kt 5th
18. R takes R	K takes R
19. R to K B sq (ch)	K to Kt 2nd
20. Kt to K 4th	Kt to R 3rd

It would have been better to have played the Bishop; the Knight has no more scope for action here than he had at home.

21. Kt to Kt 5th	P to B 4th

Useless, of course; for White has now a forced mate in nine moves.

22. R to B 7th (ch)	K to Kt sq
23. P to K 6th

The next move explains the object of this one.

23.	P takes P
24. B to K 5th	Kt to Kt sq

This is, so far, his best move, that it enables him to interpose the Kt and defer the inevitable mate one move.

25. R to Kt 7th (ch)	K to B sq
26. Kt to B 7th (ch)	K to K sq
27. Kt to B 6th (ch)	K to B sq
28. R to R 7th	Kt to B 3rd
29. B to Q 6th (ch)	Kt to K 2nd
30. B takes Kt.	Mate.

Two chess clubs in New York are just now furnishing the chess world with another illustration of the truism that history repeats itself. In the year 1851 there were two chess clubs in London, amid the jarring sounds of whose recrimination the project of the first international chess tournament seemed likely to be relegated to the limbo of failures; and we now find the New York and Manhattan Chess Clubs engaged in a similar feud. It appears that the New York Chess Club will have nothing to do with the tournament fixed for next January unless the meetings are held within its precincts, and the members of the Manhattan, while solemnly affirming that, before their attention was thus directed to the place of meeting, they had formed no pretensions to such special honour for themselves, they are now convinced it should not be conferred upon the claimants. There is not much to choose between the two associations as regards the locality of their place of meeting. The New York Club meets in a café at the city end of Second-avenue; the Manhattan, at another café in the Bowery. The squabble strikes us as one between two rival "Restaurateurs," and the straight road out of it is to have nothing to do with either.

We give another instalment of "Delta's" reminiscences:—"In my last note I omitted to mention that I had a pleasant tête-à-tête, at Ries', in March, 1849, with the veteran player Alexandre, and had one stubbornly-contested game with him. He must have been then nearly eighty years of age. I was anxious to play with Buckle, but he had always some other opponent. I watched, however, with much intent more than once his play at the Divan. He appeared to me to be the best English player there, and second only in the chess arena to Staunton. After my friendly rencontre with Harwitz at Brighton, he paid me a short visit at my home when he came down to Scotland. Our play was, upon the whole, quite equal. He won the odd game at my house; and I, en revanche, won the odd game of him some years after at London. The end-position of this last game, played in 1860, was published in the Schachzeitung of that year. It is the only souvenir which I have of the games that we played at Brighton, in London, and at my Scottish home. In the spring of 1852 Löwenthal paid me two visits, and we played together. About thirty games, mostly Gambits, of which more than the half were drawn and the won games were equal. I found, from my comparative want of first-rate practice at chess, that it was very hard work to keep my own with two so able and accomplished players as Harwitz and Löwenthal. I recorded at the time, and sent on to Staunton, at least the half of the games that I played with Löwenthal, as my English friend had expressed a desire to have some samples of our play, that he might publish them in the Chessplayers' Chronicle. Löwenthal's opinion of our play was, that he knew the openings better than I did, and the Pawn endings fully as well; but that I had the better of him in the grand 'combinations,' as he called it, in the thick of the fight! I believe that his view was the correct one, for, if I was not floored in the opening of the game, I found that it was comparatively plain sailing afterwards. Löwenthal and Harwitz were both most agreeable men to play with, and never lost their temper at chess. Many chessplayers are like the poets, an 'irritabile genus!'"

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Feb. 22, 1879) of Mr. Edward Backhouse, late of Ashburne, Bishopwearmouth, Durham, banker, who died on May 22 last at Hastings, was proved on the 8th ult. at the Durham district registry by Alfred Backhouse, the brother, and Edward Backhouse Mounsey and James Edward Backhouse, the nephews, the executors, the personal estate, including leaseholds, being sworn under £180,000. The testator devises the Duke's House estate and other properties to his wife, Mrs. Katharine Backhouse, for life, and at her decease to the children of his deceased brother, Thomas James Backhouse, subject to the payment of £8000 to the children of his deceased sister, Mrs. Lucy Backhouse Mounsey; he also leaves to his wife his mansion at Ashdowne for life, certain household effects, furniture, books, goods and chattels, and a pecuniary legacy of £15,000; to his executors £500 each; to his brothers-in-law, John and Edward Mounsey, annuities of £150 each for their respective lives; to his said nephew, Edward Backhouse Mounsey, his mansion-house at Seaton Carew; and other bequests. He devises and bequeaths all his shares in collieries and the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust to pay his wife £10,000 per annum for life if she shall so long remain his widow, and if she shall marry again to pay her £5000 per annum for life; and as to the ultimate residue, one third is to go to his brother Alfred, one third equally between the children of his said deceased brother, and the other third equally between the children of his said deceased sister. In the event of the testator having any children after the execution of his will, which, we believe, was not the case, most of the foregoing bequests are revoked.

The will (dated July 30, 1878) with a codicil (dated Nov. 28 following) of Mr. Edward Greaves, late of Avonside, in the parish of Barford, Warwickshire, who died on July 6 last, has been proved at the Birmingham district registry by Edward Seymour Greaves, the nephew, and Brabazon Campbell, the acting executors, the personal estate in the United Kingdom being sworn under £90,000. The testator bequeaths £100 each to the Church Missionary Society, the Warneford Hospital, Leamington; the Queen's Hospital, Birmingham; the Church Association, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the Christian Knowledge Society; £50 to the Warwickshire Natural History Society; to his godson, Edward Thomas Ward, £12,000 and certain parts of his property at Barford; upon trust for his stepdaughter, Mrs. Harriette Anne Smith, £6600, and other legacies. The remainder of his property at Barford, the residue of his personal estate in England, and all his heritable and movable property in Scotland, the testator leaves to his said nephew, Edward Seymour Greaves; and the residue of his real estate in England to his nephew Richard Methuen Greaves. The deceased was for many years member of Parliament for Warwick.

The will (dated Feb. 4, 1869) of Mr. Thomas Hollings, late of Cliff Villa, Clifton, near York, who died on Oct. 19 last, was proved on the 4th inst. by John Hollings, the brother, the sole executor, the personal estate being sworn under £70,000. The testator devises his mansion-house and lands at Copt Hewick, in the parish of Ripon, to his nephew, Herbert John Butler Hollings; and bequeaths £4000 each to the three daughters of his said brother John; an annuity of £150 to his cousin, Martha Jane Fox; a legacy of £300 and an annuity of £10 to his servant, John King; £1000 each to his cousins, George Thornton and Henry Thornton; 50 guineas for a ring to his friend, Richard Ridehalgh; one year's wages to each of the regular servants in his house except John King; and the residue of his real and personal estate to his said brother.

The will (dated Dec. 23, 1868) with a codicil (dated Sept. 23, 1876) of Mrs. Frances Charlotte Fleming, formerly of No. 61A, Portsdown-gardens, but late of No. 31, Queen's-gate, Kensington, who died on the 6th ult., was proved on the 2nd inst. by Charles Henry Fleming, the son, the acting executor, the personal estate being sworn under £40,000. The testatrix, after making specific bequests to several of her children, leaves the residue of her property between her children, William, Charles Henry, Catherine, Frances Margaret, Mary, Maria Elizabeth, Alice, and Gertrude.

The will (dated April 29, 1879) of Mr. William Farmer, late of No. 67, Westminster Bridge-road, sculptor, who died on the 6th ult., was proved on the 10th inst. by Charles Edward Stowell, the Very Rev. Joseph Moore, and Henry Wheeler Barnes, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £20,000.

The will (dated March 25, 1873) with a codicil (dated April 6, 1878) of Mr. William Carter, late of Effingham Cottage, Copthorn, Surrey, who died on Oct. 8 last, was proved on the 3rd inst. by William Carter, and Robert Joseph Carter, and William Henry Carter, the sons, the surviving executors, the personal estate being sworn under £25,000.

The will (dated July 4, 1879) of Mr. Leonard A. Montefiore, late of 18, Portman-square, who died on Sept. 6 last, has been proved by his brother Claude Montefiore and James Rendel, his executors, the personal estate being sworn under £10,000. Among numerous other legacies the testator bequeaths £1000 to the Childrens' Hospital, Great Ormond-street; the sum of £100 each to the Jews' Infant School, Commercial-street, Whitechapel; the Jews' Westminster Free School, Greek-street; the Hospital for Incurable Children, Cheyne-walk, Chelsea; and the Metropolitan Association for befriending Young Servants; and the sum of £50 each to the Women's Provident and Protective League, the Charity Organisation Society, and the Society for the Suppression of Vice.

The will (dated Jan. 18, 1877) of Miss Elizabeth Courage, late of Denmark-hill, who died on Oct. 22 last, was proved on the 4th inst. by Miss Harriett Living, the niece, the personal estate being sworn under £10,000. The testatrix bequeaths to her servant Emma Tarrant, £500; to her servant Mary Tarrant, £30; and the residue to her said niece.

The will (dated May 6, 1876) of Sir George Benvenuto Buckley Mathew, C.B., K.C.M.G., formerly her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Emperor of Brazil, but late of Clydesdale Villa, Leamington, who died on Oct. 22 last, at No. 16, Suffolk-street, Pall-mall East, was proved on the 29th ult. by Arthur Earle and Charles Guy Pym, the acting executors, the personal estate being sworn under £3000.

A memorial to the late Prince Imperial, in the form of a cross, is to be placed on Chiselhurst-common.

Dr. Hunter, Director-General of Statistics to the Government of India, gave an address on "Indian Finance" at Birmingham yesterday week. He advocated a treaty of commerce between England and India, as the only solution of the import duty difficulty.

The Archbishop of York on the 11th inst. opened at Sheffield the Wostenholm Memorial Hall, a building which has been erected at a cost of £11,000 by a lady of Sheffield in memory of her husband, who was a leading cutlery manufacturer. It is a gift to the town, and consists of a café, mission-room, and lecture-hall, with ample provision for rational recreation for working men.

IMITATION MEANS MERIT.
THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.
The Ladies are indebted for this fabric to no supposititious individual, but to Mr. LOUIS, the inventor. It has fairly aroused the jealousy of velveteen manufacturers, as is proved by the number of kinds now advertised, all claiming an equality with the "Louis," which has given such universal satisfaction since it obtained so great a success under its own distinctive title. Imitations, of course, have been numerous. One has had to change its name, and retire from its infringment, paying legal expenses; whilst others have been such transparent counterfeits that they can scarcely deceive. They even resort to the stamping of their various names every yard on the back, a method first practised by Mr. Louis to prevent ladies being imposed upon when requiring his spécialité. The "LOUIS" is the only Permanent Oriental Blue Black. It has received the well-merited praise and approval of the various fashionable journals, and one (in alluding to these frequent imitations) denounces the practice as "A MEAN and CONTEMPTIBLE way to divert from their proper channels the fruits of a legitimate enterprise and labour."

ON an average about every seven days
OPPOSITION VELVETEENS to the LOUIS are started and endeavoured to be introduced to public notice, under one name or another. Not only is the style of making up, and the stamping of the name on the back of every yard resorted to
IN ORDER TO DECEIVE,
but they are actually asserted to be equal or superior.
The Proprietor of the LOUIS Velveteen, whilst admitting that "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," cannot but caution the public that the genuine article is stamped Every Yard at the Back the "Louis Velveteen," in plain letters.
Avoid all imitations under whatever names they are offered.

CHLORODYNE.
DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
COUGHS, ASTHMA,
COLDS, BRONCHITIS, &c.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
This wonderful remedy was discovered by Dr. J. Collis Browne, and the word Chlorodyne coined by him expressly to designate it. There never has been a remedy so vastly beneficial to suffering humanity, and it is a subject of deep concern to the public that they should not be imposed upon by having imitations pressed upon them on account of cheapness and as being the same thing. Dr. J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne is a totally distinct thing from the spurious compounds called Chlorodyne, the use of which only ends in disappointment and failure.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne; that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE is a liquid medicine which assuages pain of every kind, affords a calm and refreshing sleep without headache, and invigorates the nervous system when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE is the
GREAT SPECIFIC for CHOLERA.
DYSENTERY,
DIARRHŒA.
Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians that he had received a despatch from her Majesty's Consul at Manilla to the effect that cholera had been raging fearfully, and that the only remedy of any service was Chlorodyne.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1864.
The General Board of Health, London, reports that it acts as a charm. One dose generally sufficient.
Dr. Gibbon, Army Medical Staff Calcutta, states:—"Two doses completely cured me of diarrhœa."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE
rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, SPASMS, COLIC,
PALPITATION, HYSTERIA.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE
is the true palliative in
NEURALGIA, GOUT, CANCER,
TOOTHACHE, RHEUMATISM.
From Dr. B. J. Boulton and Co., Horncastle.
"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct sedative and anti-spasmodic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.
The immense sale of this remedy has given rise to many unscrupulous imitations.
N.B.—Every bottle of genuine Chlorodyne bears on the Government stamp the name of the inventor.
DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE.
Sold in Bottles, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d.
J. T. DAVENPORT,

DR. DE JONGH'S
(KNIGHT OF THE ORDER OF LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM, KNIGHT OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR)
LIGHT-BROWN
COD-LIVER OIL,
proved by nearly thirty years' medical experience to be
THE ONLY COD-LIVER OIL
which produces the full curative effects in CONSUMPTION, DISEASES OF THE CHEST, THROAT AFFECTIONS,
DEBILITY OF ADULTS, WEAKNESS OF CHILDREN,
RICKETS,
SCROFULOUS DISORDERS.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.
DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, that DR DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

DR. HUNTER SEMPLE,
Physician Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest.
"I have long been aware of the great reputation enjoyed by the LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL introduced into medical practice by Dr. DE JONGH, and have recommended it with the utmost confidence. I have no hesitation in stating my opinion, that it possesses all the qualities of a good and efficient medicine. Its taste is by no means disagreeable, and might even be called pleasant. I have found DR DE JONGH'S OIL very useful in cases of Chronic Cough and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."

JOSEPH J. POPE, Esq., M.R.C.S.,
Late Staff Surg., Army, Prof. of Hygiene, Birkbeck Institution.
"I found during my Indian experience that the worth and character of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL remained unchanged by tropical heat or foreign climate, and it was, from its uniformity of character, particularly adapted for long-continued administration. The value of 'hydro-carbons' in all debilitated states of the system is now becoming thoroughly recognised; and it is, without doubt, from the animal oils and fats, rather than from their vegetable substitutes, that we may hope to derive the surest benefit. The Oil of Dr. DE JONGH places in everyone's reach a reliable and valuable remedy, one that cannot be too widely recognised."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capsuled IMPERIAL Half-Pints, 2s. 6d.; Pints, 4s. 9d.; Quarts, 9s.; by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the World.

ALLEN AND HANBURYS'
"PERFECTED" COD-LIVER OIL
is not only freer from taste and smell than any oil ever before offered to the public, but it does not give rise to the nausea and eructations which render the use of ordinary oil, even of the finest quality, so repulsive. It is the pure oil, made at A. and Hs.' own factory in Norway, and prepared by an entirely new and special process. It presents in the most effective condition all the invaluable properties of the remedy. All who have difficulty in taking Cod-Liver Oil should insist on having A. and Hs.' "PERFECTED" OIL. Sold only in Impl. ½ Pts., 1s. 4d.; ½ Pts., 2s. 6d.; Pts., 4s. 9d.; Qts., 9s. Trade mark a plough. Of all Chemists. One pint free to any address in the United Kingdom for 5s.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1879.

It is well that Christmastide infolds the memory of facts and sentiments fitted to stimulate hope and joy in the breasts of men, for we greatly need just now something cheerful to fall back upon. The year 1879 has been an exceptionally trying one. Neither in regard to weather, to production, to commerce, or to politics has it been genial in its character, and some traces, we fear, of its unfriendly influence may be detected in the tone of the public mind. It needs a short spell, at least, of cheerier days to restore to it equanimity. That externally the chances of our need will be supplied by the Christmas Holidays do not appear to be very strong. Wintry weather, and that, moreover, of a severe type, has prevailed for some time over Western Europe. Foggy days and frosty nights have sorely tested the constitutional strength of that large majority who have neither leisure nor opportunity to take part in the out door exercises and sports of the season. Most of us, it is true, have still some reserve of vitality, latent, it may be, but nevertheless not wholly inaccessible. Things are not intolerable with us, even if our outlook is of a sombre hue. The stronger, accordingly, is our motive to colour the life which remains to us with all the warmth and brightness of the ensuing festival. We may do this, at least to a considerable extent, by resolutely going out of ourselves, and, with manly energy, setting ourselves to promote the good of others. We cannot do much, perhaps, but something we can all do. The instruments available for our purpose may be comparatively weak and adapted only to bring about temporary and superficial effects; but, such as they are, the employment of them will raise our spirits above the region of factitious depression. There are few amongst us who cannot derive an increase of benevolent energy from the old-fashioned lines—

> Christmas comes but once a year,
> And when it comes it brings good cheer.

The progress of the arts has brought with it new methods of pleasure-giving intercommunication between mind and mind. The very literature of Christmastide has grown to be what we may fairly style a novel luxury. Some of the best minds do not shrink from contributing their quota to the intellectual pleasures of the season. Oh! what would we not have given in our youthful days for the treasures which are now provided for mental regalement. Unlike the abounding materials of mere physical gratification, they are usually devoid of deleterious stuff. They may be fed upon by the intellectual powers without ruin to the digestive organs. Some of them may be light and trifling; the bulk of them may chiefly serve for present entertainment; but almost all of them contain some nutriment that may serve to enrich, mentally or morally, the system that receives them. Then, to "Christmas books" let us add "Christmas cards." Light, tasteful, fascinating missives—in every variety of pleasing guise they pass from home to home, from family to family, from friend to friend, to touch momentarily and to quicken into instant flame any spark of love that may have smouldered during the year under the dust and ashes always associated with the world's drudgery. A breath of true love, a sign of affectionate remembrance, a token that one's life is not wholly buried in one's own affairs, inevitably tends to purify the heart; and if Christmas brought with it no more powerful agencies to pierce the hard crust of everyday existence than those connected with the literature and art to which the festival has given rise, we have reason enough to welcome it with gladsome anticipation.

But Christmas offers us other and, perhaps, higher recommendations than those we have adverted to. It is the special time of social gatherings. Myriads upon myriads of homes draw to their respective hospitable boards those members of the circle who are still within reach, or who have not yet formed centres of their own. Such gatherings, no doubt, have their drawbacks. Some guest of last year may this year be missing, and the vacant seat may recall sorrowful reminiscences. There may be, as, for the most part, there must be, some almost visible declension of enthusiastic sympathy between members whose pursuits take them into widely-distant spheres of thought, feeling, and occupation. A little formality, some stiffness, nay, occasional altercation, may take off that edge of pleasure which Christmas jovialities appear to warrant. But the real value of these meetings will be better tested by the yearning desire which the remembrance of them quickens in the bosom of those who have left their home, either permanently for other lands, or for a fixed period in the service of their country. Christmas always touches their hearts as no other Festival does. They hail it and, if possible, observe its rites, with a gladness and depth of emotion seldom experienced even by those at home. They are often recalled by it to the domestic influences which, it may be, find no other way of access to their hearts. Nor, again, ought we, nor can we, forget what the Festival is to children—how real, how joysome, how stirring, how fraught with wholesome influences for time to come.

After all, however, Christmastide claims even a higher style of devotion and activity than any we have yet mentioned. "Peace on earth and goodwill to men" is its motto, and such should be the aim and tendency of the motives which it calls into exercise. Especially should this be the case amid the severities by which we are surrounded. Be it remembered that Christmas liberality to those who stand in need of it may be safely indulged without pauperising effects. It is an occasion too seldom recurrent to undermine the sense, or the spirit, of independence. It need enervate no one. It may go where it lists without harm to any. Even our criminals and the inmates of our unions will have their brief flash of enjoyment, and we may leave them to their respective authorities. But, outside their domain, how many thousands there are who must be sought out with a view to, we will not say their relief, but their realisation of at least a blessed interval of the "good will" which Christianity should inspire. Few of us, we trust, are in the least likely to forget this. Few require any incitements beyond those incident to the Festival and to the season. A little discriminative wisdom in the dispensation of charity at such a time is all that is needed. Even where, individually, one may be at a loss to make one's bounty do the best for its objects, there are plenty of philanthropic organisations ready and even eager to aid him in the task.

THE COURT.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Louise of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold, arrived at Osborne House on Thursday week from Windsor Castle. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar visited her Majesty the next day, and remained to luncheon. On Sunday the Queen, Princess Louise of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service, performed at Osborne by the Rev. Canon Prothero. Her Majesty's customary Christmas gifts to those attached to the Court and to the several Royal estates, as well as to the poor of Windsor, have been distributed in the usual manner.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales were present at a concert given yesterday week by the Amateur Orchestral Society at the Royal Albert Hall in aid of the funds of the German Hospital, Dalston. Princess Christian visited the Prince and Princess of Wales at Marlborough House on Saturday, and remained to luncheon. Prince Ferdinand of Glücksburg and Prince Louis of Battenberg left Marlborough House for the Continent. The Prince and Princess attended Divine service on Sunday at St. Mark's, Hamilton-terrace, St. Marylebone. The Rev. Canon Duckworth, the Vicar, officiated. Their Royal Highnesses have returned to Sandringham for the Christmas. The Royal gifts to the dependants upon the Norfolk estates have been distributed at Sandringham.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh gave a dinner party and carpet dance during the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales at Eastwell Park. The Duke, Admiral Superintendent of Naval Reserves, will early in the ensuing year inspect the London brigade of this force.

Lord Beaconsfield has left town for Hughenden, Lord Salisbury for Hatfield, Lord Cranbrook for his seat at Hempstead, Mr. Cross for Eccleriggs, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon for Goodwood, the Duke of Northumberland for Alnwick Castle, Colonel the Right Hon. F. A. Stanley, M.P., for Witherslack Hall, Viscount Sandon for Sandon Hall, and the Lord Chancellor and Countess Cairns for Lindisfarne Lodge, Bournemouth. Lord Carlingford arrived at The Priory, Chewton Mendip, on Saturday, from Dudbrook, Essex.

The marriage of Viscount Lewisham, M.P., with Lady Mary Coke, fourth daughter of the Earl of Leicester, took place on Thursday week at Holkham church. The bridegroom was accompanied by his brother, the Hon. Henry C. Legge, of the Coldstream Guards, as best man. The bride, who was given away by her father, was attended by ten bridesmaids—namely, the Ladies Frances, Elizabeth, and Georgiana Legge, sisters of the bridegroom; Ladies Evelyn and Muriel Murray, Ladies Winifred and Hilda Clements, Miss Nora Strutt, and Miss Julia Buller, nieces of the bride, and Miss Garnier. The bride wore a dress of white satin, trimmed with old point lace and orange-flowers, and, over a wreath composed of orange-blossoms, a veil of the same old lace. Her jewels were pearls and diamonds. The bridesmaids were dressed in white costumes, and each lady wore a brooch on which was a jewelled fly, the gift of the bridegroom. The nuptial rite was performed by the Rev. A. Napier, Vicar of Holkham, assisted by the Hon. and Rev. George B. Legge, uncle of the bridegroom. After the ceremony the Earl of Countess of Leicester entertained a large party at breakfast. Lord Lewisham and his bride left Holkham for Cromer to pass the early days of the honeymoon. The bride's travelling-dress was of a rich ruby colour trimmed with dark fur, with jacket and bonnet to match. Lady Mary's wedding presents numbered about 300, including gifts from the Prince and Princess of Wales and presents from the tenantry on Lord Dartmouth's estates.

THE JEWS' SOUP KITCHEN, SPITALFIELDS.

In Fashion-street, Spitalfields, which is by no means a street of fashion, the benevolence of well-to-do Jewish Londoners has established this winter an institution for that divine and human good office, feeding the hungry and destitute poor, which is enjoined by the Law and the Prophets, as well as by the Christian Gospel. This charity of the Israelites, indeed, in whom there is no guile, does not confine itself to the relief of Jewish poverty, which occupies its own place in that depressed quarter of East-End London; but the poor Jewish are first attended to, as there are several other local agencies, connected with the Church and Dissenting religious associations, for the benefit of distressed families among the general population. We give an Illustration of the Jews' Soup Kitchen, at which, on three nights of each week during the hard season, about 450 gallons of soup, and from 12 cwt. to 14 cwt. of bread, are given away to more than 500 needy families. The distribution is admirably conducted by Mr. G. Myers, the superintendent of this charitable establishment. It is managed by a committee, of which Mr. D. Jameson is president, and Messrs. Samuel Levy and F. E. Lezard are vice-presidents; the Rev. Dr. N. M. Adler, Chief Rabbi, is patron; and among the subscribers are Sir Moses Montefiore, the Rothschilds, and several members of the Corporation of the City of London.

Eton College closed yesterday week for the Christmas vacation. The holidays last till Jan. 21.

Lord Colville of Culross, K.T., has been unanimously elected chairman of the Great Northern Railway Company, in the place of the late Colonel Duncombe.

Sir Massey Lopes, M.P., as one of the Lords of the Admiralty, on the 18th inst. distributed the prizes to the cadets on board the training-ship Britannia, at Dartmouth, and in the course of his address said that the materiel and personnel of the Navy were never better or more efficient than at the present time. He encouraged the cadets to follow the example of illustrious naval officers who had gone before them in upholding the dignity and honour of the British flag in every quarter of the globe.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 18th inst. the amendment proposed by M. Keller to the Public Worship Budget, in favour of restoring the salaries of Archbishops and Bishops to their former amounts, was, although supported by the Government, rejected by 257 to 226 votes. The House further resolved to adhere to the various items of the Budget as previously voted, thus rejecting the modifications introduced by the Senate. A motion made by M. Perin, of the Extreme Left, for the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry into the penitentiary system in New Caledonia, was accepted by the Minister of Marine, and adopted. In the Senate on the 19th, after the adoption of a certain number of bills of local interest, M. Léon Say, Minister of Finance, laid before the House the Budget amended by the Chamber of Deputies, which was immediately consigned to the Finance Committee. Subventions of 12,000f. to the Théâtre des Nations and the Théâtre de l'Opera Populaire were afterwards voted by 151 to 37. A "scene" in the Chamber of Deputies has been followed by the resignation of the whole of the Waddington Cabinet. The crisis was provoked by M. Raynal, who, after having unsuccessfully asked General Gresley in private to dismiss from the army M. de Carayon Latour for the part he took at a Chambord banquet on Michaelmas Day, publicly demanded it from the Tribune, and pointed out that while M. Latour remained unpunished two of his subordinates, who were present on the same occasion, had been removed from their commands The Minister for War replied that he would not overrule the finding of a military Court, walked straight out of the House, and proceeding to the Elysée, handed his resignation to the President. A similar step was taken by all his colleagues. M. de Freycinet was charged to form a new Cabinet, but the result of his efforts was not known when our early edition was put to press on Monday evening. Both Houses have adjourned till Jan. 14.

After having been put off for a week on account of the extremely bad state of the weather, the fête for the benefit of the sufferers by the inundations in Murcia was given on the 18th inst. in Paris, with great success.

M. Maze, a Moderate Republican, was on Sunday elected deputy for Versailles by 4480 votes against 1264 given to M. Buffenoir, the Radical candidate.

GERMANY.

Prince William of Prussia, the eldest son of the Crown Prince, has had a fall, causing a slight contusion of the right leg, which confined him to his room for a few days.

By an overwhelming majority, the Upper House of the Prussian Assembly has approved the bill for enabling the State to acquire proprietary rights over private railways. The Lower House concluded on the 18th a debate upon a petition from the town of Elbing against the action of Herr von Puttkammer, Minister of Public Worship, in interdicting the opening of an unsectarian school in that town, and rejected by 245 votes to 147 a motion of Dr. Gneist to refer the petition to the Government for consideration.

Yesterday week the Minister of Finance, in reply to a question, stated that in Upper Silesia the destitution had recently increased, and that 80,000 people were in extreme want. The distress was mainly due to a bad harvest and disastrous floods, and had been rendered more severe by a hard winter, typhus fever, and usury. After the holidays the Government would bring forward proposals for affording relief to the sufferers. Last Saturday, after transacting some unimportant business before a row of almost empty benches, the House of Deputies adjourned for the Christmas holidays till Jan. 8.

At a banquet given at Strasbourg last Thursday, at which most of the members of the Provincial Committee were present, General von Manteuffel made a speech, in which he said it was far from his intention to judge those who had turned their backs upon Alsace-Lorraine, who did not bring up their children on the mother-soil, or who held themselves aloof from the deliberations of the district Diets and Provincial Committee. His present object was to gain for Alsace-Lorraine full independence in regard to legislation and the Imperial Constitution. Alsace-Lorraine had neither been occupied nor annexed, but reclaimed after a series of wars which had been forced upon Germany. He added that Alsace-Lorraine, having now equal rights with all the other provinces of the Empire, ought to resume its former place among them. At the present moment it was in a transition state, and the General urged the co-operation of all classes, with the view of shortening even the period of transition.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Emperor Francis Joseph received the Presidents of the Austrian and Hungarian Delegations on the 18th inst. In reply to an address which they presented, his Majesty said that the close alliance with Germany was a guarantee that universal tranquillity would be established. In Bosnia and the Herzegovina the Government was earnestly carrying out its task of conferring the benefits of civilisation upon these provinces, so severely tried by the neglect and confusion of centuries. At a sitting of the Delegation of the Austrian Reichsrath held the next evening the bill submitted by the Common Austro-Hungary Ministry for the defrayal of the common expenses for January and February next year was read unanimously the second and third time.

The Upper House of the Austrian Reichsrath on the 18th inst. again voted upon the Army Bill, and unanimously adhered to its former decision in favour of the measure as originally introduced by the Government. Both Houses thereupon elected representatives for a Committee of Conference. The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath passed the Army Bill last Saturday by the necessary two thirds vote, in the form proposed by the Government.

The Austrian Army Bill has been rejected by the Cis-Leithan Parliament, a smaller number than the requisite two thirds majority voting for the second clause, which determined the fate of the whole measure.

The Croatian Diet on Saturday last adopted the bill for the prolongation of the compromise between Croatia and Hungary, after two stormy sittings, by 44 votes to 13.

RUSSIA.

It has been officially announced that the stay of the Empress in a southern climate has not proved so beneficial as was expected.

The Daily News correspondent at St. Petersburg hears from a good source that it has been decided to grant in January next municipal institutions in all the chief towns of Poland, and to allow the use of the Polish language in the sittings of the Councils.

AMERICA.

The Times correspondent at Philadelphia telegraphs an account more than a column in length of General Grant's reception at Philadelphia on the 16th inst. The pageant appears to have been one of the most imposing ever seen in the United States. The procession contained 70,000 men and 25,000 horses, the route traversed was nine miles in length, and the number of spectators is said to have been at least 1,000,000. The procession was, however, too much to handle in a single day. Although it started at half-past ten in the morning, it was almost nightfall before the last division started, and when night set in the procession broke up, all leaving the line wherever they might be. General Grant, whose welcome is said to have been most enthusiastic, dined in the evening with the surviving members of his Cabinets, General Sherman, and other distinguished guests. He declared the demonstration to have exceeded anything he had expected.

General Grant has denied having accepted the presidency of the Nicaragua Canal Company, but has declined to make any further statement in regard to the subject.

We learn from the Philadelphia correspondent of the Times that Senator Cameron, Pennsylvania, has been elected chairman of the Republican National Committee; and that General Mahone, by the combination of the Readjusters and the Republicans in the Virginian Legislature, has been elected United States senator for Virginia.

Fifteen hundred dollars were subscribed at a meeting at St. Paul, Minnesota, last week, for the relief of the Irish poor. A large meeting was held at San Francisco yesterday week to express sympathy with the sufferers from the prevailing distress in Ireland. A resolution was adopted that Mr. Parnell be invited to visit San Francisco during his tour in the United States. A plan was also agreed upon for the collection of funds for the relief of Irish distress.

CANADA.

A despatch from Ottawa states that the Official Gazette contains notice of an application to the Dominion Parliament for powers to incorporate a company to construct a railway from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, and to establish a line of ocean steamers in connection with the new railway. Two notices have already appeared in the Gazette respecting similar applications for the formation of companies for the construction of a line of railway from Sault de St. Marie, in Michigan, to Lake Nipissing, in Upper Canada; and a third notice to the same effect was published yesterday week.

Sir Leonard Tilley, Finance Minister of the Dominion, in a public speech delivered at the capital on Nov. 27, claimed that results are justifying his contention that the new tariff would affect imports from the United States rather than from Great Britain. He stated that during the first two months of the current fiscal year (July and August) the imports of leading manufactures from England showed a falling off in value of only 9 per cent as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year, while the imports from the United States had fallen off 47 per cent in the same time. For the first three months, notwithstanding the large importations made in anticipation of the new tariff, and which were not then exhausted, the value of imports from Great Britain had decreased only 10 per cent, while that of those from the United States had fallen off 50 per cent. In cotton goods he had expected to find the diminution very great; but during these three months there was actually an increase of 8 per cent from Great Britain, although there was a decrease of 43 per cent from the United States. In iron and steel manufactures there was an increase of 40 per cent from Great Britain, and a decrease of 33 per cent from the United States. The increase in value of leather goods imported from Great Britain was 20 per cent, with a decrease from the United States of 43 per cent.

SOUTH AFRICA.

Our latest news from Cape Town is at length definite and complete. The storming of Moirosi's stronghold has been speedily followed by the fall of Secocoeni's town. We may now look, therefore, for an end of the whole series of troubles in which we have been involved in South Africa. The attack was made at daybreak on Nov. 28. Colonel Murray commanded the centre, Captain Ferrier the right, and Captain Carrington the left wing. The Swazies attacked the place from the east. The town was captured and the caves were cleared at ten o'clock in the morning. Subsequently all the forces stormed the place. Captain Macaulay, late of the 12th Prince of Wales's Royal Lancers, and Captain Lawrell, of the 4th Hussars (Queen's Own) were killed; Captain Beeton, Lieutenant O'Grady, of the 4th Regiment, and Lieutenant Dewar, of the King's 1st Dragoon Guards, were severely, and Captain Maurice was slightly wounded. The enemy's loss was heavy. The Colonial Secretary has returned to Cape Town.

The New York Times says:—"The third and last Session of the forty-sixth Congress will begin on the first Monday in December, 1880, and will expire by the limitation of the existence of the Congress, March 4, 1881." March 4, 1881, is also the day on which the twenty-first Parliament of the United Kingdom will expire by limitation of law, unless its life shall have been previously cut short by proclamation.

A Bluebook containing further correspondence respecting the affairs of South Africa has been issued. It extends over 231 pages, and is accompanied by a map of the native territories beyond the boundaries of Griqualand West. The despatches extend from Sept. 12, 1878, to Aug. 14, 1879. Another Parliamentary paper issued is a return of warrants and orders relating to public records.

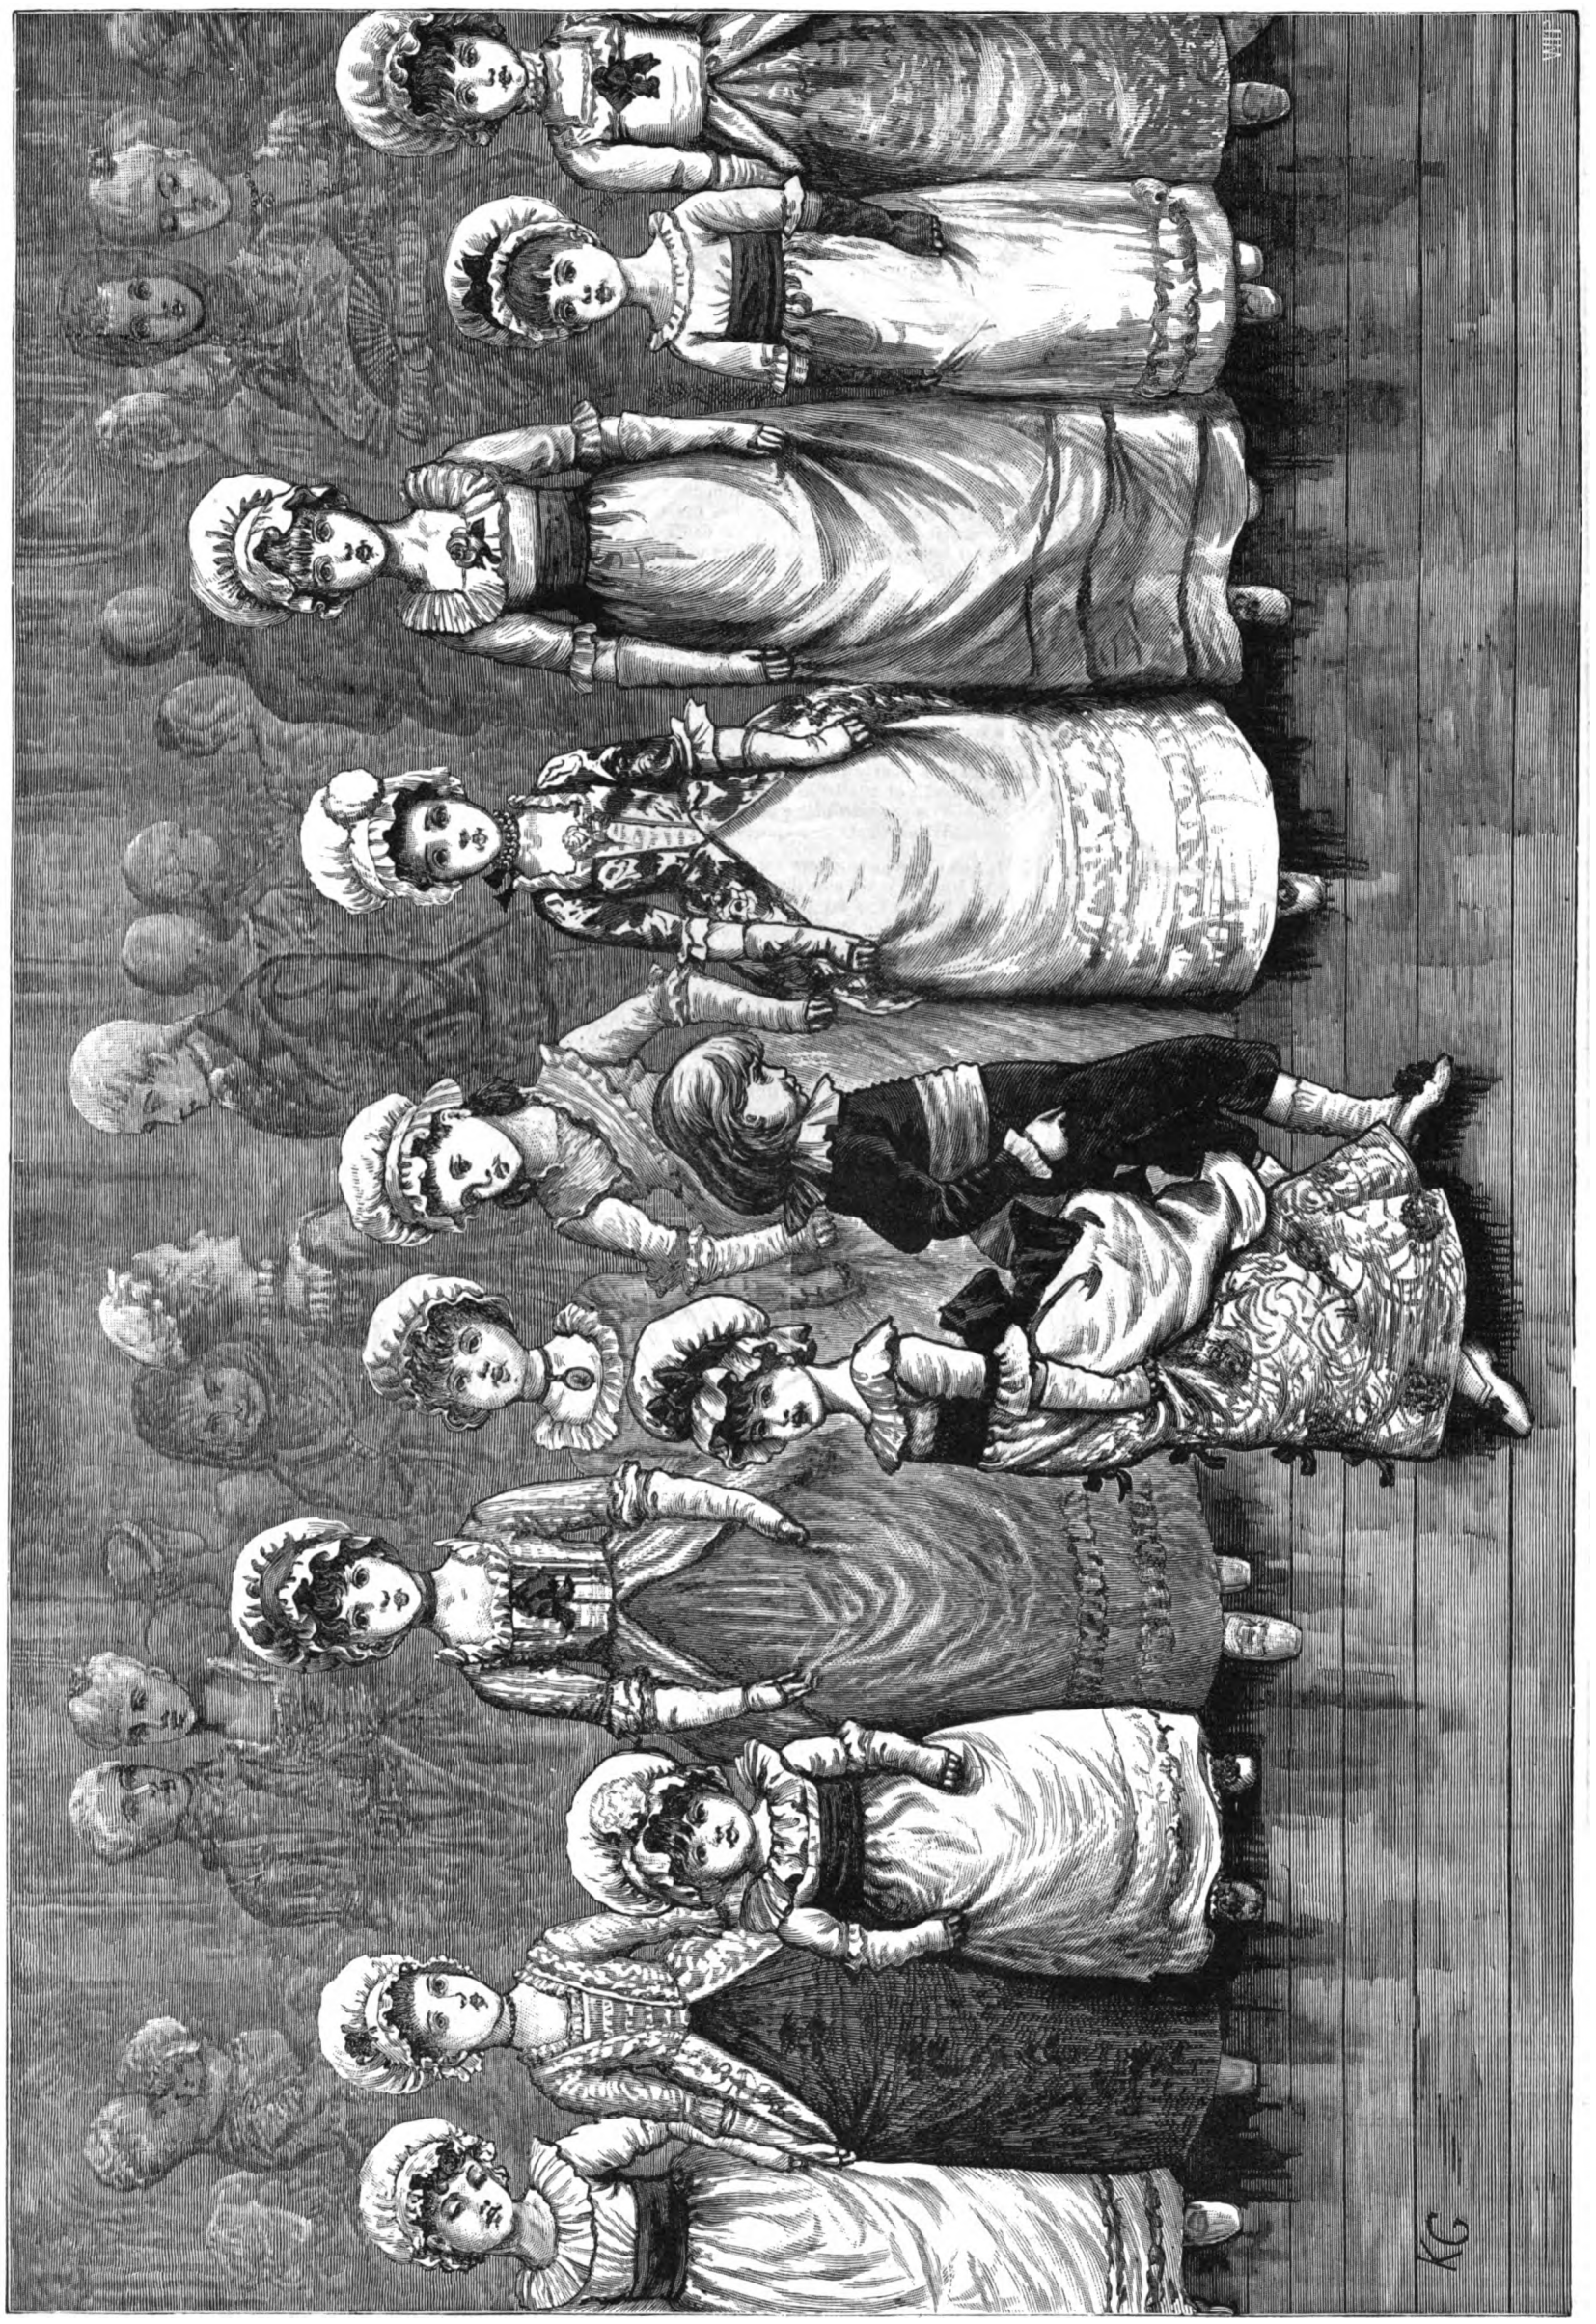
SIRDAR ABDUL KHALIK KHAN, CHIEF OF BEZOOT.

SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. W. SIMPSON, LATE IN AFGHANISTAN.



THE AFGHAN WAR.

The position of affairs with the British army at Cabul, which was described last week, continues to be a subject of much anxiety. General Sir Frederick Roberts has collected his troops within the cantonments at Sherpur, a mile and a half north of the city of Cabul, below the Bemaroo or Behmaru range of hills. A reconnaissance sketch map of Cabul and its environs, which is engraved for this number of our Journal, shows the topographical situation of Sherpur.

The following extract from a letter written in October, soon after the British occupation of Cabul, will assist the comprehension of neighbouring localities.

"About a mile and a half to the north-east of the Bala Hissar is the site of the British cantonments occupied by our troops in 1840 and 1841. We went over the ground in the course of a recent morning ride; but, beyond the remains of a small part of the rampart on the western side, there is nothing now to show that the place ever consisted of anything other than the fields of rice and Indian corn that now cover it. The gardens and trees that used to adorn it were all destroyed and utilised as forage or fuel before the troops left the cantonments on their disastrous march to Jellalabad; and the houses and barracks were burned to the ground by the fanatical mob of Afghans the instant they were vacated. It was difficult for us to realise the fact that here there was for two years a large British cantonment in which English ladies and children had lived. Ascending the low range of hills behind the village of Behmaru, 500 yards north of the old cantonment, on which the blood of many a gallant British soldier was spilt in those terrible months of November and December, 1841, an excellent and extensive view of the surrounding plain is obtained. The village of Behmaru is still the same miserable collection of mud hovels which I imagine it was forty years ago, when it so often gave cover to our implacable enemies. The forts which encircled the cantonments, and whose names have yet a mournful celebrity to us, are still standing, but most of them in a dilapidated state. The Rakab Bashi Fort, which cost British troops upwards of 200 men to capture, would now be untenable against any attack. Mahomed Sherif's Fort, from which a British garrison of European and native troops was once disgracefully driven, still stands in good condition. The famous commissariat fort, the loss of which was one great cause of the subsequent disasters, has been considerably altered. Mahmoud Khan's Fort, at which our troops never were bold enough to look, still looks as formidable a place as it must have then appeared to our panic-stricken Generals. Between the last-mentioned fort and the Cabul River is the spot where the British Envoy was murdered. The site of the cantonments has been universally condemned, and the size of the work was also too great for defence. But when one remembers that the garrison consisted of five thousand British troops, with abundance of ammunition, there can be no doubt that, however disadvantageous the position was, if they had been properly handled, all the Afghans in the country could never have triumphed over them. From the hill behind Behmaru a good view of the Bala Hissar and the City of Cabul is obtained, and on the other north side stretches out the green meadow of Wazirabad, the centre of which is occupied by a lake, which sometimes dries up. On the very side of the old British cantonments the late Ameer, Shere Ali Khan, commenced the erection of an enormous line of barracks for his troops. The design, which is being carried to completion by the present Ameer, is to form a huge fortified inclosure, one side of which will be formed by the Behmaru hills already mentioned. The side parallel to the hills is almost complete. It is about a mile long, and consists of a series of small rooms, but built against a high thick mud wall, having an arched verandah running along the front. The western side has also been nearly finished. The official name of this imposing-looking place is Sherpur, after the late Ameer, but the people generally talk of it as the new city. It could easily contain half the city of Cabul within its walls. The late Ameer intended to have built himself a palace here, and we were shown a site on the brow of the hill which he had levelled for it."

Our Special Artist lately in Afghanistan, Mr. William Simpson, who accompanied the head-quarters of Lieutenant-General Sir S. Browne in the advance through the Khyber Pass to Jellalabad a twelvemonth ago, contributes the portrait which he sketched of Abdul Khalik Khan, a Mohammedzai, the Chief of Bezoot. The district of Bezoot, he informs us, is situated on the north side of the Cabul river, opposite Jellalabad. This local and tribal ruler, Abdul Khalik Khan, met the column of troops under command of Sir Samuel Browne, in December of last year, at Chardeh, on its march to Jellalabad, and offered his services as a friend and ally. He remained from that time in the British head-quarters camp, attached to Major Cavagnari, the Political Officer, as a sort of native agent with the other Afghan tribes. From the knowledge he had of the country and its people, Abdul Khalik Khan was enabled to make himself useful, and he continued with the camp until the treaty of Gundamuk with Yakoob Khan was concluded, making quite a prominent figure amongst the staff and its visitors. Our Special Artist further supplies two Illustrations of ordinary rustic or village life in Afghanistan, from his sketches taken on the march, or in his excursions up the adjacent valleys; and these are of a peaceful and pleasing character. The disposition of little children, at the age when they are fond of making mud-pies, is not very different in Afghanistan from that of children in other countries. The children's heads are generally shaven, leaving tufts here and there—some of these tufts are plaited into rather longish tails, which hang down. One peculiarity is that all Afghan children wear charms, which are generally verses of the Koran sewn up into cloth or leather, and worn by strings round the neck. The other sketch is that of Afghan women busied in spinning, which is an occupation common to many parts of the East where woollen fabrics are worn. In Afghanistan there are sheep and goats, and the wool of the camel is also made into cloth; and the cold winter of the climate demands warm clothing. Although not seen on the plains of India, where the thinnest of cottons is enough for the heat, this is a common sight in Afghanistan and in the Himalayas, where the cold winter also demands a warm covering for the body. The spinning is produced by giving the two cross bits of wood, on which the yarn is wound, a jerk with the fore finger and thumb, by which it whirls round, and this twines the portion of thread by which it hangs.

ADVANCE ON CABUL.

At the time of going to press with our first edition telgraphic messages from Lord Lytton had been received announcing that General Gough has found himself strong enough to move forwards from Jugdullak. He quitted that post on Sunday, in compliance with a request from General Roberts, who, writing on the 18th inst., strongly urged an immediate advance in light marching order, because he had reason to believe the road open the whole way to Cabul. General Gough takes with him only 1400 men altogether, as it was necessary to leave a sufficient force behind him at Peizeran and Jugdulluk to keep open his communications. At Lataband, however, some twenty miles on the road, he is to pick up a force numbering 700 men, which appears to have been left there all this time without the Viceroy being acquainted with the fact. If General Gough was rightly informed when recently telegraphing that the whole country in his front had risen, this body must have been placed in somewhat perilous circumstances, and will scarcely be sorry when relieved by the Jugdulluk column. It would appear from the tone of General Roberts's despatch urging this immediate advance that his chief object in pressing it was to obtain sufficient reinforcements to enable him to assume a vigorous offensive. The Sherpur cantonments need a large garrison to man their long lines of defences, and it would be very risky work, therefore, for General Roberts to sally forth until reinforced, since everything depends upon the safety of the supplies stored at Sherpur. A Calcutta telegram states that General Roberts, before evacuating Bala Hissar, "made arrangements" for destroying the bulk of the ammunition there stored. The same source of information asserts that the whole of the guns which fell into our hands from first to last had been removed to Sherpur and there parked before the evacuation took place.

A despatch from the Viceroy of India reports General Gough to have commenced his march from Jugdulluk on Sunday for Cabul. His communications were harassed by Ghilzais; but they were driven off with loss. Reinforcements from General Bright's column are moving up along the whole line, and the 12th British regiment reached Jellalabad on Monday. Azmatullah Khan, who is in command of the Ghilzais, is stated to have been wounded, and there are indications that his followers are deserting.

The Government of India publishes a note explanatory of the military situation in Afghanistan, which commences by showing that General Roberts has now with him 7500 effective troops and twenty-three guns, with ample transport and ammunition, and five months' supplies. The troops are in excellent health, and the whole force is collected and sheltered within a very strong intrenched position at Sherpur. General Roberts has further 214 guns of various calibre, many being rifled, together with large stores of ammunition for the defence of the intrenchments, which can easily be held by 2500, leaving 5000 free for offensive action. The troops now under the command of General Bright, stationed between Jumrood and Jugdulluk, number 12,000, with thirty guns, supplies for two months, and complete divisional and brigade carriage. Orders have further been issued for the formation of a reserve division at Peshawur, consisting of three cavalry and ten infantry regiments, with twenty-four guns. General Stewart has 9000 effective troops, with sixty-two guns, at and below Candahar; and General Watson has 9000 men and twenty guns in the Kurum Valley, making a total field force of 45,000 men, with 160 guns, which is considered ample for present requirements.

Before an audience which crowded the extemporised theatre from floor to ceiling, "The Trinummus" of Plautus was presented for the third and last time on the 18th inst. in the dormitory of St. Peter's College, Westminster.

The vast hall of Christ's Hospital presented on the night of the 18th inst. an animated spectacle. Preparatory to the breaking up for the Christmas vacation the Bluecoat boys gave their annual concert to a large audience of their relatives and friends. The Rev. G. Bennett, B.A., officiated as conductor; Mr. R. Hopkins, bandmaster; Mr. H. Collingwood Evans, organ; and Mr. Arthur Fox, pianoforte accompanist. The programme ranged from "The March of the Israelities," in "Eli," through a miscellaneous selection of sacred and secular music, including hunting, pastoral, and heroic songs and pieces, and embracing also airs from the lighter operettas, such as "Pinafore" and "Les Cloches de Corneville." All were given with spirit and precision.

"SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY."

It may be doubted whether the sweetest strain of Mozart ever so stirs the pulses as the simple, jigging tune to which "Sir Roger de Coverley" is danced. This favourite country dance, if shorn now of some of its complex figures, is still as deservedly in request at Christmas Parties as it was in the good old times whereof Addison wrote, and of which Miss Kate Greenaway has drawn a characteristically quaint picture. At first glance the forming of two parallel lines, one of ladies and the other of gentlemen, may be objected on the score that each is separated from his partner for too long a period. But what of that? This is not unseldom an absence which emphatically makes the heart grow fonder. He must have a heart of adamant who could resist the light artillery of a maiden's eyes firing love-laden missiles point-blank at him. And then the opportunity for frequent tender pressures as the couples bend and pass beneath the arch of arms, with the supreme moment when at last the time arrives for the last couple to be first, and the opportunity is given by the long anticipated exhibition of terpsichorean skill of the old school. "Doth not a meeting like this make amends" for each momentary separation? The cynic may admire "Sir Roger de Coverley" for quite another reason. He may attribute a host's delight at hearing the familiar tune to the knowledge that it is generally the last dance, and that the prolonged festivity is at length on the eve of closing. But we refuse to enter into the feelings of our cynic for a single moment. Let us return to our "Sir Roger de Coverley," and lose our hearts once again to the prim, demure little ladies whom Miss Kate Greenaway has limned with dainty grace. Let us say, in conclusion, that, as ladies have shown a marked inclination to revert to the fashions of fifty or a hundred years ago in a modified form, it would not be a matter of surprise if this Illustration should serve as a model for the dresses of many a Children's Fancy Ball, such as the Lord Mayor of London delights his young friends with in the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House.

TRUE CHRISTMAS CHEER.

But once a year—but once a year,
The proverb says that Christmas comes;
And when it comes it brings good cheer,
With turkey, beef, mince-pies, and plums.
The scarlet-berried holly decks
The Cot, the Hall, the House of Prayer;
And many a pearly jewel flecks
The bough of mistletoe so rare.
The proverb bring us all good cheer,
When Christmas comes but once a year!

But, not alone good cheer for board,
Still less for revel and excess;
Though Plenty has our tables stored,
It will not bring true happiness,
While Want and Misery stalk the land,
And widows mourn and orphans pine.
With thankful heart and open hand,
Give what is lent and is not thine;
Oh, this will bring the best of cheer
When Christmas comes but once a year!

True Christmas cheer is warmth of heart,
And love of men for love of God;
To bear their pang, to feel their smart;
To tread the path that Christ has trod,
Good-will to men and Peace on earth!
This keynote of our Christmas song
Should bring us truest cheer and mirth,
And tune our lives the twelvemonth long.
This would ensure true Christmas cheer,
Not for one day, but all the year!

CUTHBERT BEDE.

At the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week the finance committee submitted the estimates of the sums required to be raised by rate in the metropolitan district for 1880. The total net charge for the ensuing year is £645,500, against a net charge in 1879 of £581,196.

The Psychological Society of Great Britain has resolved, almost unanimously, that, inasmuch as it was founded by Mr. Serjeant Cox for a special object, which has in some measure been attained, and as his loss is practically irreparable, it is expedient that the society should be dissolved as from the 31st inst.

The wardmotes in the city of London were held on Monday, and members were elected to the Court of Common Council. In the large majority of cases the retiring representatives were re-elected. Some conversation occurred at several of the meetings in respect to public improvements in progress or contemplated; and satisfaction was expressed at the purchase by the Corporation of Burnham Beeches.

Yesterday week the Mansion House Committee of the Rowland Hill Memorial met for the dispatch of business in the Long Parlour. Mr. Alderman Nottage presided. The fund was reported to amount to between £6000 and £7000. The names of Lord Beaconsfield and others were added to the committee. A colonial sub-committee was appointed to aid the committee's appeal, as was also a working men's committee.

The annual meeting of the Metropolitan Hospital Sunday Fund was held on the 18th inst. at the Mansion House. Sir Rutherford Alcock presided at the commencement of the proceedings, and Alderman Sir Sydney Waterlow at the close. Sir Rutherford Alcock said they had every reason to be satisfied with the year's collections, which, notwithstanding the depression which existed in the country, were larger than in the previous year. The rules which had been in force during the past year were renewed for the current year, and the council were re-elected. June 13 was fixed as Hospital Sunday for 1880.

It is proposed to open in South London an industrial exhibition for three weeks at Easter, 1880, if manufacturers and artisans will send for exhibition a sufficient number of articles. It is especially desired to show the various stages of art manufacture, such as colour-printing, pottery, and so forth. It is also proposed to hold at Easter, 1881, an exhibition limited strictly to the actual work of the exhibitors. Both exhibitions will be held in the rooms of the South London Working Men's College and those of the Free Library. All communications respecting them should be addressed to the secretary, Mr. William Rossiter, at the College, 143, Upper Kennington-lane.

The Lord Mayor presided on the 18th inst. at a meeting of the Court of Common Council, held in the Guildhall. As chairman of the Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee, Mr. Hart moved a report recommending that a gratuity of £3500 should be given to the City solicitor, Mr. Nelson, and £350 to Mr. L. F. Littell, in respect of services relative to the preservation of Epping Forest. Some amendments were proposed, but the report of the committee was eventually adopted, the sum to be given to Mr. Littell having, however, been unanimously increased to £500. Mr. John Cox gave notice of his intention of moving the rescinding of so much of the motion as related to the City solicitor.

A RELENTLESS PARENT.

BY R. BLACK.

"There's no time to lose, Sir; the bell's a-ringing," said a waiter, respectfully, to a young gentleman, some twenty years of age, who was walking restlessly up and down the coffee-room at the principal hotel of a certain English seaport, which shall be called Eastport, and who appeared to be in a brown study.

"Are you sure there's no telegram for me?" asked the young gentleman, almost fiercely, as he walked to the door of the hotel.

"Quite sure, Sir. No letter, Sir; nor yet no telegram."

"My luggage has been taken on board?"

"All aboard, Sir, this ten minutes; you'd better look sharp, Sir. I wish you a pleasant voyage, Sir."

The young gentleman smothered a sigh, which was very like a groan, and, nodding to the waiter a farewell and an acknowledgment which he could not trust himself to express in words, rushed across the road, down the steps, and over the plank which led on to the deck of a fine steamer. He was just in time.

"Touch and go," said the waiter to a chamber-maid, who was looking on with much interest; and he added, with a knowing leer, "She might ha' sent him her love by telegraph, mightn't she, Betsy?"

The chambermaid laughed and blushed, and went about her business.

Meanwhile the young gentleman had descended to the cabin, thrown himself upon a sofa, and, turning his face to the ship's side, buried his head between his arms, whilst his whole frame was convulsed with emotion. Thus he lay for a while, and was all unconscious of what went on around him. Else he would have seen that he did not altogether escape notice. A certain couple had entered the cabin; gazed at him for a moment; exchanged whispers, and departed as noiselessly as they had come. But he knew nothing of it.

And yet they were a noticeable couple—a fine, elderly gentleman, with silver hair, and a young girl of seventeen or eighteen summers, fair-haired, grey-eyed, graceful as laburnum, bright as a sunbeam, gentle as a dove. At sight of the prostrate, heaving figure, as they entered the cabin, they started and looked at each other inquiringly. All her brightness had vanished.

"In trouble, I fear," whispered the gentleman mournfully.

She stole one wistful glance at the prostrate form, and, sighing softly, whispered back, "Poor fellow! Let us go."

And so they left him solitary. Men say that Pity is akin to Love. But youth is elastic. Not many minutes had elapsed ere the young gentleman was on deck, moving briskly about and talking gaily with anybody who would encourage him. He was soon aware, and he was pleased to be aware, that he was evidently an object of some interest to an elderly gentleman with silver hair and to a fair young girl, as sweet as honeysuckle. Why he should be, he could not divine; but to be conscious that he was, caused him a strange elation. Somehow or other, he ceased to feel lonely; it was plainly with kindly eyes that they regarded him and followed his movements; and, though some time might elapse before an opportunity would offer for making their acquaintance, he felt a sense of sympathetic companionship in their mere presence. And fortune favoured him beyond his hopes. That very day, at dinner, it fell to his lot to sit next to the elderly gentleman; and, although the grey-eyed damsel, as sweet as honeysuckle, sat on the other side of the silver-haired stranger, yet she dipped occasionally, with soft, low tones, into the desultory conversation; and she called the elderly gentleman "papa," so that the young man's soul danced with delight and his heart sang one continual strain: "Here, by God's grace, is the one maid for me." Now, in the course of conversation, it so happened that the elderly stranger, who described himself as a colonial merchant, returning to his own country, happened to mention the name of Winterville.

"That is my name," said the young man.

"Really!" exclaimed the elderly stranger. "I wonder if you can be related to the gentleman I mean; he has a charming villa on the Thames between Putney and Barnes, called, I think, Middlehouse."

"So has my father," rejoined the young man, with a rather rueful smile.

"Dear me!" exclaimed the elderly gentleman; and, turning to his daughter, he said,

"Laura, this is young Mr. Winterville, son of the Mr. Winterville of Middlehouse Villa, on the Thames."

The effect of this information upon Laura was singular: she bowed and smiled, and said, "Oh, indeed!" in the ordinary way, but somehow her voice seemed harsher than heretofore, and her manner seemed to have grown quite cold and stiff.

"It is only fair now," resumed the elderly gentleman, "that you should know all about us. My name is Paterson, and this is my youngest and only unmarried daughter."

Why Laura should have slightly flushed, with a sort of petulant displeasure, at her father's explicit statement, young Winterville could not conceive, but he could not help observing that she did flush.

"Your father," continued Mr. Paterson, "did some little legal business for me when I was in London. You were at college, I believe, at the time, and so we didn't meet. But he told us all about you and your prospects," he added with a knowing look, "and, altogether, his kindness and friendliness towards my daughter and myself I shall never forget."

"A kinder soul never breathed," rejoined young Winterville, his eyes filling with tears. "You would hardly believe that he and his only son could have quarrelled."

"Quarrelled!" exclaimed Mr. Paterson, aghast.

"Irremediably," replied young Winterville, as he rose to leave the table; adding, in a broken voice, "I will tell you all about it some day."

As the father and daughter sat together that evening, they agreed that the sight presented by young Winterville when he lay, in evident mental agony, upon the cabin sofa was fully explained; and such was Laura's sympathetic nature that the tears rolled slowly down her cheeks as she thought of it.

"I wonder what they quarrelled about, papa," she said, tearfully. She was not long left in doubt. In a day or two her father was able to give her the whole history.

"You recollect, my dear," he said, "what Mr. Winterville told us. Young Winterville, his only child, was first of all to be taken into partnership, was ultimately to succeed to the whole business, and was, in the meanwhile, to marry a young lady with a considerable fortune."

Here Laura shuffled slightly with her feet, and moved her head on one side after the fashion of those in whom is the spirit of discontent or dissent.

"But it appears," Mr. Paterson went on, "that he had reckoned without his host. He, like many excellent fathers, had not thought it necessary to seriously consult the person most interested; and the person most interested, though having a shrewd suspicion of what was in the wind, was naturally disinclined to precipitate matters, for fear of wounding a kind father's feelings sooner than was absolutely needful and went on hoping against hope that Time, the great unraveller of all tangles, would set everything straight. But Time turned out to be a broken reed to lean upon. The day came when Mr. Winterville pointed to the comfortable bed he had been for so many years preparing for his son to lie upon, and requested the young gentleman to take possession of it; when, lo! and behold, it turned out that young Mr. Winterville couldn't bear a feather-bed, and could not sleep upon anything but a mattress. In other words, young Mr. Winterville had a perfect horror both of the law and of the young lady; nothing in the world would induce him to embrace the profession or propose to the lady. He would rather die first."

Here Mr Paterson paused; and Laura, looking down at the buckles of her shoes, laughed a careless little laugh.

"It is no laughing matter," resumed Mr. Paterson, gravely; "Mr. Winterville, it seems, for all his kindness, is a very choleric man, and his son inherits that infirmity. So that they came to high words; and the father told the son either to reconsider his determination or to leave the house and shift for himself. I think that that was going a little too far; but, at the same time, I think that Mr. Winterville had good reason to be very much vexed. He was left a widower very soon after his marriage: and, instead of marrying another wife over his son's head, he has devoted his whole life to the son's interest and advancement. He set his heart upon having his son as a partner and upon his son's marriage with that particular young lady. She is Mr. Winterville's ward; and he had ascertained enough to convince him that there would be no obstacle, so far as she was concerned."

Laura hereupon giggled, and the giggle savoured of satire.

"Well," Mr. Paterson went on, "as I have told you, Mr. Winterville offered his son the choice of two unpleasant alternatives—either to do as he was bidden, or to shift for himself. He chose the latter. This accounts for our having him as our fellow-passenger; he is on his way to our own colony, and even proposes to seek his fortune in our own city."

"Poor fellow!" said Laura, with a sigh. "Don't you think you could do anything for him, papa?"

"That remains to be seen," replied Mr. Paterson, drily; "meanwhile, I understand that he has but a few hundred pounds between himself and destitution. His confidence, however, is boundless; and what caused that little scene of which we were witnesses, though I did not let him know, of course, that we were, was that he had written a very proper letter to his father, begging that some compromise might be come to, and praying that, at any rate, a telegram, conveying forgiveness, might be sent at the last moment to cheer him on his voyage; and neither letter nor telegram arrived."

Hereupon the gentle Laura actually whimpered, saying,

"His father was very kind to us, papa; we must do what we can to cheer the poor fellow up."

And the good ship Wellbeloved steamed merrily on its way.

It was the 26th of April, a month of smiles and tears, when the Wellbeloved had steamed out of Eastport for a distant colony. It had started at ten o'clock in the morning. The news of its departure, together with a list of the passengers, had been forwarded to several quarters, and, among others, to that quarter of Lincoln's Inn where the offices of Mr. Winterville were situated. He had reached his offices about the same time at which the Wellbeloved had moved out of port; and he had been sitting for some four hours, in a state of nervous excitement, among the japanned tin boxes which cumbered rather than adorned his private room, but which, nevertheless, by their number and by the names painted in white upon lid or side, bore witness to the extent and respectability of his business. His were not the clients to give a lawyer much dirty work to do; they were the sort of clients who are always marrying or giving in marriage and requiring settlements to be drawn up, who are always making wills and bequeathing or inheriting property, who are always purchasing estates or buying up leases, and who have few disputes but such as are settled by the most decorous and expensive proceedings in Chancery. Hundreds of thousands of pounds passed through his hands in the course of a year; and it is generally believed that the passage of money through a lawyer's hands is not to be effected without some process whereby a percentage of it "sticks." Mr. Winterville, at any rate, had found it to be so; pounds, shillings, and pence, whether in the form of one pound one, or of thirteen and four pence, or of six and eight pence, or even of the ridiculously small sum of three and four pence, had stuck to his hands as if he had dipped them in treacle. And happy, thought the neighbours, was the only son of a man endowed with so convenient a stickiness. Yet that son's heroic contempt for the law and all its works would have found its most faithful echo in a once famous "notice to correspondents," which used, in the "good old days," to appear weekly in a celebrated sporting paper: "Legal questions are not answered by us under any circumstances, but are at once consigned to the waste-paper basket." Hence those tears; hence the dispute between father and son; hence the restlessness with which the father now sat in his room, gazing hopelessly around him at the evidences of his successful career, and reflecting mournfully that the labour of his life had been in all vain and that the son for whom he had worked and sacrificed himself had rejected both the profession to which the father had destined him and the marriage for which the father had so carefully paved the way. And yet Mr. Winterville wore an expectant, if not a hopeful, air: his eyes wandered constantly towards the door, as if he were waiting for somebody or something. And at last the somebody entered with the something. A clerk came into the room, handed Mr. Winterville a paper in silence and departed as suddenly as he had entered. Mr. Winterville hastily tore open the paper, which contained, on unquestionable authority, intelligence of the Wellbeloved's departure and a list of the passengers who had started on board of her. And in that list was the name of George Winterville. The paper fell from Mr. Winterville's hand, which he struck heavily upon the desk in front of him, and his face flushed angrily, as he muttered to himself—

"So he wouldn't trust me; he wouldn't even telegraph!"

Then the flush died away; a deadly paleness succeeded; and his eyes grew moist, as he sighed and murmured—

"I didn't think it of George; I knew he was passionate and obstinate, as I am; but I always thought he was a good, kind, loving lad at bottom."

He sat pondering for a while; and gradually his face grew harder and harder to look at, as if it were the outward and visible sign of an inward hardening of the heart. He rose up from his chair, walked to and fro with a heavy, determined tread, and jerked out from between his closed teeth:

"Forgive! Not if he went down on his knees. I'll wipe the remembrance of him out altogether. I'm not an old man—only forty-six. I'll begin life afresh. I'll marry again. I'll have another son; at least, it may so happen, and I may have one who will not despise my profession or defy me. He'll not do for poor Mary, though; she couldn't wait so long as that. We must see what can be done for her. What hurts me most is to think that the boy wouldn't trust me. The ungrateful scoundrel! I was prepared to come to almost any terms. Well, it's all over now. I'll not do anything in the common way: make myself miserable all the rest of my days, and then leave him a shilling for a rope, and all the remainder of my money to a reformatory for refractory children. I'll punish him worse than that. Perhaps he'll live to see another son of mine, bearing his own name and standing in the comfortable shoes that were made for himself. I'll teach him to treat me with contempt as well as distrust. I told him to just telegraph 'Yes' or 'No;' and though I should have been hurt if he had telegraphed 'No,' I was ready to make a further concession. But he chose to go off in a huff. The consequences be on his own head. As for me, I'll not lose a minute."

And, true to his word, he put on his overcoat and sallied forth. It was one of those days in April when an overcoat, a wrapper for the throat, and an umbrella are both banes and blessings—the former during the half-hours when the sun is as warm as in July, and the latter during the alternate half-hours, when, what with rain and hail and bitter wind, the thermometer and the barometer must have hard work to keep up with the humours of the elements. Still the weather was rather in harmony with Mr. Winterville's state of mind. He had taken train to Putney; and as he walked along the road which leads from Putney to Barnes-common he could not help remarking, for all his mental perturbation, how that, notwithstanding the curious mixture of atmospheric influences, the trees were steadily progressing towards the appearance they are expected to wear in spring. Here and there the branches hung out their light-green signals of plentiful foliage to come; and here and there the gardens were gay with blossoms white and pink. And the thrushes were busy, flying from tree to tree and peering inquisitively beneath the blossoms. They appeared to be examining the chances of fruit for the coming season; and after each examination they would burst into a joyous song, as if to express their confidence that, though the hail might rattle spitefully among the branches, yet all would be well with the cherry, and the currant, and the plum, and whatsoever else is bright to look upon and juicy to taste. The scene, in fact, was such as the singer has described with French vivacity and in French verse—

Comme un critique sournois,
Avril des jardins s'approche,
Et se glisse en tapinois,
De la grêle plein sa poche.

Mais les grives n'ont pas peur,
Et m'ont donné l'assurance,
Que le fruit tient sous la fleur,
L'avenir sous l'espérance.

And, from time to time, the gloom cleared off from Mr. Winterville's face, and a light came into his eyes, as if he, too, felt a similar assurance. At last he stopped before a very small but a very neat little house, standing in the primmest and trimmest of gardens. He knocked at the door, and inquired of the tidy young maid-servant who answered his summons if Mrs. Ingle were at home. The reply was affirmative; and he was shown into a very pretty little room, where he had not long to wait before he received a pleasant greeting from a lady whose presence was as placid and benign as that of the silvery moon on a summer's night. And yet, withal, there lurked in her dark-blue eyes a something which seemed to bear witness that still waters run deep, and to promise an agreeable revelation to anyone who could succeed in sounding their depth. This lady was Mrs. Ingle, thirty-five years of age, a widow, without children, with a face, a figure, and, above all, a complexion which made all who gazed upon her feel a sudden sense of refreshment.

"This is a most unexpected pleasure, Mr. Winterville," she said, cordially. "You are generally too busy to make formal calls."

"I have come, Mrs. Ingle," he replied, with a grave air, "to ask for your co-operation."

"My co-operation!"

"Yes; your co-operation, if you will give it me. I have a plan for the success of which it is necessary that a lady should co-operate with me, and I could think of none whose co-operation I should desire more than yours."

"Dear me!" she exclaimed; and, as if the want of co-operation had suggested the question, asked, with apparent irrelevance, "How is your son?"

"I have no son," he replied, sternly.

"Good Heavens!" she cried, in unaffected consternation. "Has anything happened to him?"

"If you will kindly listen to me," he replied, overcoming with an effort the emotion which his voice betrayed, "I will tell you the whole story in a few words. George has run away. He started this morning for the colonies, as I know on the best authority. He behaved shamefully both to me and to my ward, Mary Highfield, whom you are so fond of. He knew perfectly well how my heart was set upon his joining me in my business, and how her heart was set upon him; and, when I informed him that, in my opinion, the time had come when he should think of seriously buckling to at my office, as soon as he had taken his degree at the University, and should become formally engaged to Mary, he actually reviled my profession and declared that rather than marry Mary Highfield, against whom, however, he acknowledged that he had nothing worse to say than that she had no individuality, and that she was nothing but a pretty doll, he would hang himself at my garden gate. He asserted that he had done all he very well could to show her that he was indifferent to her; and that, if she had imbibed a contrary notion, it was principally my fault, and partly hers for being so easily led by the nose and for not exercising her own wits. It turned out that he had the queerest idea about professions in general, and especially about the law, which, when we had once lost our tempers, he abused unmercifully, quoting the Judge who was asked by an indignant suitor whether he did not sit upon the bench to administer justice, and who replied cynically, "Oh, dear no; I sit here to administer the law." He abused the Navy as a pack of arbitrary tyrants and helpless slaves; the Army as swaggering dress-pegs in time of peace and hired cut-throats in time of war; medical men as the undertaker's friends; clergymen as seekers after social position and after the loaves and fishes, on pretence of being ministers of the gospel; and lawyers as a sort of social scavengers. He vowed that commerce was the only pursuit worth following; that to commerce England owed her position among the nations; and that commerce, in such a country as ours, ought to be more fully represented than it ever has been, by the few cases of Lord Overstone and others, among the peerage. He ridiculed the idea of giving more honour to families whose founders came over as "first murderers," or something of that kind, with the Conqueror, and who probably never did anything else, than to families whose founders had helped to make England the treasury of the world. Many a rat, he said, could boast that his ancestors came over with the Conqueror in the very same ship. And he solemnly pledged his word that he would be prouder to be descended from a Cobden or a Bright or anybody who had helped to repeal the Corn Laws and promote Free Trade, themselves being connected with trade, than from Richard Cœur de Lion himself. In fact, my dear Madam, he raved like a madman; I also, I am afraid, raved like a madman; we quarrelled; I forbade him the house; he determined to emigrate and seek his fortune in the colonies and in commerce; he took his passage by steamer from Eastport; he thence wrote me a very proper but somewhat stiff letter. I relented, and begged him at the last moment to send me word by telegraph whether he would postpone his departure and trust all to me; and the ungrateful scoundrel declined to trust me, but left England without even forwarding a syllable in reply. That is what hurt me most, Mrs. Ingle, that my boy refused to trust me."

Here Mr. Winterville completely gave way.

"It is very sad," said Mrs. Ingle, when he had partially recovered himself;" "may I ask you what you propose to do?"

"Do!" exclaimed Mr. Winterville, fiercely; "I mean to wipe him clean out of my remembrance. Hitherto I had lived for him; now I will live for myself. I have a plan, but it needs co-operation. Will you co-operate?"

"But what can I do?"

"Dear Mrs. Ingle," replied Mr. Winterville, clearing his throat and drawing his chair close to her. "You are a widow and I am a widower. That should make us sympathetic. You are childless, and I," he added, not without emotion, "I, too, am childless. That should make us more sympathetic. My plan I can scarcely reveal to you in its entirety; but 'it is the first step that costs,' and that step I can and will at once unfold to you. I need not tell you that I have always admired you; you must be aware that everybody admires you. But I have done more; I have—have—put great restraint upon myself for the sake of that—that—ungrateful boy. There is now no further need for this. Well, then, the first step in my plan is to—to—marry again. Will you, so far, co-operate?"

He had taken her hand, which she did not withdraw. She hung down her head; her cheeks turned scarlet; and for a little while she made no reply. She was a good, kind, gentle soul; her thoughts reverted to the discarded son, and her heart was full of compassion for him. Perhaps some whisper came to her from somewhere, saying, "Blessed are the peacemakers!" and enhancing the delight with which she thought how sweet it was to be loved once more, and how much sweeter it was to be wife than widow. She was recalled to herself by the question, repeated in an agitated voice,

"Will you—will you co-operate?"

"I will," she answered, looking suddenly up with a bright smile, and falling into the arms that were open to receive her.

"One thing," said Mr. Winterville, severely, when the usual demonstrations were over, "I have to request: don't let that fellow's name be ever mentioned between us."

She turned cold with horror; but she forced a smile, and answered, diplomatically, without any promise:

"Perhaps you'll think better of it."

"Never;" he rejoined emphatically.

And so Middlehouse Villa, Putney, had a new mistress. And the years flew by after their fashion; one, two, three, four, and five. The sixth was not yet completed; but it was destined to be the most momentous of them all. Very early in that year Mr. Winterville had been much exercised in mind by the receipt of the following letter:—

"Mumbo City, Jumboland, Scrape Colony.

"My dear Father,—I can bear it no longer; especially as I expect to visit England before the end of the year, and am anxious to know how I shall be received by you. I feel sure you will be glad to learn that things have prospered with me beyond belief. I have a very flourishing business; I have the most charming wife that ever saw her reflection in the looking-glass; and I have the three dearest children that ever inherited their mother's eyes. One thing only has preyed upon my mind all these years: that I parted on bad terms with you. Oh! if you had only listened to my request, and had sent me a word or two of forgiveness and encouragement by telegraph, even at the last moment, you would have spared me some very bitter hours and the only pang my life has known. Pray write and say that Laura and I and the babes may expect a kind reception from grandpapa. If I haven't written to you before, it is because I feared that a harsh reply would render Laura unhappy; but now that we are coming to England, I can refrain no longer.

"Your most affectionate son,
"George Winterville."

In due time came an answer.

"Middlehouse Villa, Putney, London.

"Undutiful Boy,—I have wiped you as far as possible out of remembrance. I have another George Winterville, and he has two brothers, John and Charles; and one of them will, no doubt, take to the law. They have a sister, Louisa. For, three weeks after you ran away, I married again, and have ever since been as happy as the day is long, except when your image comes to disturb me. Mary, too, is happily married, and has a family. When I think that I should probably have been a miserable old bachelor, slaving for you and quarrelling with you to this day, if you had complied with my request, I am glad, very glad, that you did not telegraph to me from Eastport. What you mean by complaining that I did not telegraph to you I don't know. You can't have expected a second telegram. On the whole, things appear to have turned out in the best way they could for everybody—for you, though you don't deserve it, and for me and for Mary. I'm sure we ought to be much obliged to you; and so if you and your wife and your brats choose to call here, you can do so without fear, though I have warned you that I have another George Winterville in your place. I don't relent in the least; but, as I consider myself to some extent indebted to you for your undutifulness, I shall be ready to receive you and yours as acquaintances.

G. Winterville."

"Not very encouraging," said young Winterville to his wife, who shrugged her shoulders despairingly.

Great, therefore, was their astonishment when, upon their arrival in England and upon paying their earliest visit to Putney, Mr. Winterville, senior, fell upon his son's neck and, hugging him affectionately, exclaimed,

"My boy! my boy! my dear, good boy! I have done you gross injustice. Come into my study at once."

The pair entered the study; and the father, with nervous fingers, spread before his son a telegram, dated the very morning of the Wellbeloved's departure from Eastport, and couched in these terms; "If you will leave all to me, wait where you are till I come. Telegraph 'Yes' or 'No.'"

The son turned pale, and looked inquiringly at his father, who explained, breathlessly,

"It was never sent; the fellow kept it back for some inexplicable reason or other, and has only to-day returned it, out of compunction, I suppose. It arrived mysteriously at the office this morning."

"You don't know who the villain is?"

"No; if I did, I'd"——

"What?"

"Well, I really think, under the circumstances, considering how happily things have turned out, I'd propose that we should—present him with a very handsome testimonial. You are indebted to him for Laura, recollect."

Young Winterville burst out laughing.

"We will ask her opinion," he said.

THE QUEEN OF THE FAIRIES.

The drawing-room's hushing and all its glad faces
Expectant are waiting her coming to see;
The audience are settling well in their places;
It 's time that her Majesty ready should be;
So make her white tiny frock sweet with red roses,
And let not a small golden tress go astray.
When the curtain rings up and, in rising, discloses
Our Queen, she should throw into shadow each fay.

You smallest of greatnesses, let us survey you,
With smiling awe, gaze on your ripple of curls;
Ah, pet of small beauties, who would not obey you,
You daintiest of Queenships, you rarest of girls?
Baby eyes in their blue gaze, how pure and how tender,
With light from the heaven they so lately have left!
Our homage of love to their bright joy we render
And pray of that light they be never bereft.

A moment—our Queenship, whom love has been schooling
To small pretty gestures of sway and command,
Will bound on the stage, her domain to be ruling,
And be, 'mid her small elves, despotic and grand;
To glow in a bright world of lime-light and spangles,
Of painted mossed lawns and of woodlands wild-rosed,
Of glades such as listened to Shakspeare's fays' wrangles,
And banks where Titania in moonlight reposed.

And does her small heart with dear baby hopes flutter,
Like real grown-up actors, to play well her part,
With dazzling effects, her sweet speeches to utter,
And capture some small kingly Oberon's heart?
And what with that starred magic wand will you do, dear?
Without it, we feel all your charm and your spell;
To make us for ever, glad subjects to you, dear,
Your laughs and your lisped words will do just as well.

Tranformation scenes many await our small beauty,
Slid on by old Time as she trips o'er life's stage;
Ah, may she, as good as now, still do her duty,
As pure and as bright, through all acts on to age!
And, all through her every hour, may our treasure
Be gladsome and dear as she is in this scene,
With but April tears, just to brighten her pleasure!
Now ring up the curtain and on with our Queen!

DOROTHY'S FORTUNE.

WHAT BECAME OF IT, AND WHAT IT BECAME.

BY W. W. FENN.

CHAPTER I.

No one could ever pass the quiet, old-fashioned little parsonage-house of Morton-Hurley, a remote village on the western confines of Gloucestershire, without stopping to look at it a second time, such a picture of rural peace did it present. The quaint, untended garden ended in a perfect little wilderness of intermingling underwood and shrubs; and the moss-covered dwelling itself was surrounded by tall rooknest-dotted elms, through which glimpses were obtained of the antique grey church, with its porch buried in thickly-clustering ivy.

From the front of the house wound a little flower-bordered path, leading to a white-painted gate opening on the road; and, on the tranquil summer evening when this story opens, a sweet, gentle-faced girl, dressed in deep mourning, passed along the path to the gate, and looked down the road. She did not wait long before her expectant eyes lighted up in happy recognition, as a fine-looking young fellow came at a brisk pace up to the gate.

As they stood there for a moment, hand locked in hand, it would have been hardly possible to find a comelier pair of lovers, for lovers they had been for more than a year past. He was Guy Farrell, a young gentleman who had been residing in the neighbourhood some eighteen months past learning to farm, and had naturally come to be on intimate terms with the Rector of the parish. She was the Rector's daughter, Dorothy Chaplin, and equally naturally had readily listened to the tender words which fell from Guy's lips soon after they began to know each other.

But the prospects of an alliance had, up to the present time, seemed remote, inasmuch as the Rev. Hugh Chaplin, besides having evinced the greatest reluctance to part, in his wifeless old age, with his only child, would apparently have nothing to give her, whilst Guy was entirely dependent on a very small allowance from his father. So time had gone on, as it often has under similar circumstances, without any definite plans being arrived at, until, suddenly, the clergyman was seized by an illness which terminated fatally.

It was then found by his will that he had bequeathed all his worldly possessions to his daughter. These, to the surprise of everybody—for he had been a moody, uncommunicative man—consisted of a hundred shares valued at £20 a piece in the "Rippleton Grand Junction Waterworks Company." The concern was prosperous, and, the shares being at par, Dorothy had thus become an heiress to the tune of £2000.

When she took her lover's arm and strolled away with him from the garden gate, down the narrow, winding road on this particular evening, her father had been dead some six or eight weeks, and, pending the evacuation of the Rectory in favour of the new incumbent, Dorothy's old governess had come to her as a companion in her loneliness.

The lovers had seldom spoken of money before, but, now that Dorothy had control over £2000, it became the subject upon which their whole future seemed to depend. It was as if time had been annihilated, and as if the happy consummation of their hopes had suddenly come within reach. So Guy discussed with Dorothy what ought to be done with her little fortune.

"You see, dear love," he said, "that at the best the poor pittance my father can allow me and the interest of your £2000 will scarcely keep us going here in England, where no money can be made in farming without capital; but in a new country, where land is cheap yet fruitful, and where a man may hope by diligence and probity to make a stand, we should be rich with what we have. You would not mind going away with me?"

"To the end of the world, Guy, if you wished it," she answered, as, putting one hand upon his shoulder, she looked affectionately into his clear grey eyes.

"Well, it would be pretty nearly the end of it; for Queensland, which I am thinking of, is about as far off from where we are now walking as we could well get on this planet."

"Indeed, dear, I should not hesitate for a moment; I have no ties in England, now that dear father is gone; nothing to live for, Guy, but your love."

"Then you will let me take the money to do with as I please, will you?"

"Certainly; of what other use can it be to me?"

"Good; then listen to what I propose. I have been thinking over it, and I fancy I see my way. We must realise—that is, sell these hundred shares. They give you but little over five per cent now—rather more than a hundred a year. Could I lay out the £2000 half as successfully as Will Marsham did his £1000, on the other side of the world, why, in a few years we should get more than thirty per cent for it."

"Ah! I don't understand much about per-centage and all that sort of business," she answered. "Only show me how I am to make the money over to you, and then do as you think best."

"Oh! you will only have to sign your name to a transfer, and I will go to London to-morrow and arrange it all. Then I will run down to my people and propound our plans to the governor. It's rather a strange coincidence, by-the-by, isn't it, that my own old home should be so near this place, Rippleton? Why, I can recollect the opening of these waterworks, and the making of the conduit for miles in the old neighbourhood. The water is brought all the way from Thornmere."

"You will not be away long, Guy, will you?" said Dorothy, with a little tone of protest in her voice.

"No, dearest; in less than a week I shall be back here again to you."

Then the happy pair, continuing their stroll, chatted upon matters nearest to their hearts, after the fashion common to such moments in life, until night fell, and they parted, as they had met, at the garden gate.

CHAPTER II.

"Don't sell for a day or two, my dear Sir, if you can help it. Rippleton Waterworks are going up hourly. Let me see; twenty pound shares, fully paid—yes, they are now at twenty-three; in a week's time they will be at twenty-six, probably."

Thus the stockbroker, Mr. Birtles, of Throgmorton-street, to young Farrell, when, two days later in London, the business had been discussed.

So Guy, taking the advice of Mr. Birtles, consented to wait, and took the train, an hour or two afterwards, to Baylesthorpe, where his father lived, within five miles of the great manufacturing town of Rippleton.

His family approved of his plans, and congratulated him upon the good fortune which had so unexpectedly dawned upon his engagement with the Rector's daughter. Nor was he content with discussing his future with his parents merely, but, on the second day after his arrival, he must needs ride into Rippleton to talk it over with some of his old schoolfellows and friends in that populous town. One of these was the leading solicitor of the place, a certain Mr. Monk, who, contrary to Guy's experience with the other friends he had been talking to, pulled a very grave face the moment the Rippleton works were mentioned.

"Bless my heart, Guy!" cried Mr. Monk, suddenly rising from the paper-strewn table at which he was sitting in his private room; "you don't mean to say you did not sell, when you found they were at twenty-three?"

"Certainly not; and very lucky I didn't," answered the young man; "for they have gone up two more since. See here!" and he held out the Times, turned down at the money market article.

The lawyer glanced at it for a moment; threw the paper down contemptuously; looked at the door of the room, walked to it, and turned the key; and then, drawing a chair close alongside of Guy's, sat down.

"Now, as one of your father's oldest friends," he said, almost in a whisper, "pray let me advise you, my dear boy. Don't delay another moment; sell at once. I happen to know (no matter how), and in the strictest confidence I tell you, that a great change is impending. When what I know is known publicly the company's shares will probably go down to less than half their present value."

"But," remonstrated the young fellow, "they are going up now. How do you account for that?"

"I can't account for many things of this kind that happen in the City; but I can surmise a good deal."

"What do you surmise?"

"Simply that the market is being rigged, and that what I have just told you is known to others intimately concerned, who are forcing the shares up, that they may sell at a profit before the crash comes. Take my advice; don't delay another day."

But Guy did delay. He refused, in his inexperience of such matters, to believe in the possibility of such contingencies.

"At any rate," he said to himself, "I won't sell whilst the shares are rising; I will keep my eye upon them; and when there's a sign of their declining it will be time enough to follow Monk's advice."

Two days later, however, his watchful eye was startled by discovering in the morning paper that there was a sign of their decline; they had dropped five, and gone back to twenty-one.

"Ah, well," he said, deliberately to himself, "this does look as if Monk might be right. There may be a screw loose after all. Perhaps I had better write to Birtles and tell him to sell." With this he sat down in his father's study, where he had been reading the newspaper, and wrote a brief note accordingly. Then he carried it to the post-bag hanging in the hall and dropped it in.

Now, if our young friend had any grave fault it consisted of over-deliberation; it was not due to want of energy or enthusiasm, but from a placid, even sort of temperament, which, while it was extremely useful in many affairs of life, not unfrequently became the reverse, and promptitude of action was a thing unknown to him. Nor was he a procrastinator exactly, but he hated, as he put it, doing anything with a rush.

The following day a letter from Dorothy telling him that she was not well, took him back at once to his love and his farming at Morton Hurley.

He found that she had caught a chill, and was forbidden to leave her room, so that a day or two elapsed after his return before he was able to see her, and to tell her all he had been doing whilst away. When they at last met, and their happy greetings were over, of course Dorothy's fortune again became the leading topic touched on.

"I am expecting to hear from Birtles," Guy said; "he ought to have sent me his account, and the transfer of the shares for you to sign; I believe the money won't be paid over until this is done, though, upon my word, I don't know much about the manner in which this sort of business is transacted; still, I'll give him another day or two."

"Perhaps he has sent his letter to Baylesthorpe?" suggested Dorothy.

"Why, yes, of course, how stupid of me! I dated my letter from there; he could not know I was coming on here immediately; I did not know it myself, but it is odd the Governor has not forwarded the letter, he knew what I was doing, and approved; I'll drop him a line."

The post, however, had left for that evening, and another four and twenty hours passed before Guy's letter to his father had even been started for its destination. Then Mr. Farrell, sen., happened to be away from home, and did not answer it at once, so that a matter of a week elapsed ere Guy heard from his father to the effect that no letter had reached Baylesthorpe for him.

He was a little troubled at this; but, ignorant as he was about Stock Exchange matters, he did not attribute great importance to the delay; and it was only when he received the following letter from Mr. Birtles in answer to one of inquiry which he wrote direct to that eminent financier, that the true state of affairs was revealed.—

"Throgmorton-street, E.C.,
July 10, 1859.

"Dear Sir—

"I am in receipt of your favour of yesterday, and deeply regret to tell you that I never received your letter of the 1st inst., in which you say you directed me to sell shares.

"I have made every inquiry, and feel perfectly confident that it was never delivered at my office.

"This is the more to be regretted; since between this and then, Rippleton Waterworks have most unexpectedly fallen very low.

"It appears that the great brewers there, in sinking a deep well for their own purposes, have come upon an unlimited amount of water of the first quality, and that steps are already being taken to establish means for supplying the town and adjacent districts.

"The effect of this will, in all probability be, that in a week's time the shares will be unsaleable. I have therefore sold, upon my own responsibility, a hundred for you immediately on the receipt of your letter this morning at fourteen discount—i.e., each £20 share for £6. You may, at first, feel inclined to blame me perhaps for this, but you will scarcely do so when I tell you that within the last hour, since I sold, they have gone down two more, and in all likelihood before the day is out there will be no market for them whatever. I will get a transfer prepared immediately and forward it for signature; meanwhile, I am, dear Sir, your's obediently,

"Robert Birtles."

For many minutes after reading and re-reading this letter, Guy was unable to comprehend the full meaning of its contents. But, as the truth slowly opened upon him, he experienced the first great shock of trouble life had yet presented him with.

Dorothy was looking over his shoulder as he read, and was much slower in understanding the letter than Guy. But when at length, after a prolonged silence, she looked into her lover's face she read there, in characters unmistakable, that a great calamity had happened.

"What does it mean, Guy?" she said anxiously. "Why do you look so pale?"

"It means, darling," he answered, without looking at her, "that we are ruined, that your little fortune is lost, and that I am the cause."

"Impossible!" she cried. "There must be some mistake! At least, it can be through no fault of yours, whatever has happened; it must be this dreadful Mr. Birtles who is to blame, if what you say be true; but I cannot believe it; you don't understand these things; you don't understand the meaning of what he writes."

"Ah! I don't understand these things, that's quite certain; but I do understand what he writes," went on Guy, dropping into a chair, and burying his face in his hands.

"Oh! Guy! don't, don't be so cast down!" cried poor Dorothy. "Have not we still got each other?" And she sank on her knees by his side.

CHAPTER III.

To dwell on the immediate effects of this painful catastrophe and the wreck of the life hopes of this loving pair, would serve little purpose here. It was but one of the many similar blows that are being rained down by destiny all around us daily.

Guy could find no relief save in action, and the following morning he literally, for the first time in his life, rushed off to London and then back to Baylesthorpe, with a view, poor fellow, of discovering the cause of the letter's miscarriage; "as though," as he afterwards said, "that could possibly do any good." Arrived at his father's house the deliberative element in his character in a measure reappeared, and in this instance was of the greatest service to him, as the future proved. Mr. Farrell, sen., dwelt in a small, old-fashioned house, standing in its own grounds. He had lately retired upon a pension from his official duties as manager of a bank at Rippleton, and, though living with his wife and several younger children in the quietest and most economical fashion, maintained, amongst other methodical habits, that common one, as we have seen, of having a post-bag hung in the hall all day. At five o'clock every evening this was carried by the gardener to the village post office at Baylesthorpe, about a mile off. The post-mistress kept the key, and the gardener fetched the bag back every morning after the arrival of the mail with the precision of clock-work. The investigation of these and kindred circumstances took Guy naturally to the village post office; this was at a baker's shop, kept by a very old woman named Prior, and her son, and to whom, of course, Guy had been well known for years. After briefly outlining his case, Guy went on,

"Now, Mrs. Prior, I don't want to get anybody into trouble, but I mean to trace this missing letter if it be possible. It was on the first of July that I put it into my father's bag, and this is the twelfth. He has not much correspondence, so perhaps you can remember taking it out."

No! she couldn't rightly remember any particular letter; her memory wasn't as good as it was, but she knew that if it came there it must have been put into the regular bag and dispatched by the cart as usual, and she rather resented the suspicion which, as she said, Master Guy seemed to be putting on her.

"No; I don't suspect you or anybody," he said; "but, for my own satisfaction, though it can do little good, I mean to get at the bottom of this terrible business, which has so utterly ruined my prospects. So now, Mrs. Prior, be kind enough to show me exactly what you do when my father's man hands you the bag—here it is."

He had brought it down himself this evening and gave it to her as he spoke. She was standing behind the little counter, which was covered with loaves, small bags of flour, an array of little jam tarts, lollypops in bottles, and other curious wares of that sort dealt in by similar rural establishments. Pushing some of these aside, so as to clear a space, she proceeded, under protest, to comply with Guy's request, and, selecting a key from a bunch she took from her pocket, opened the bag and turned out its contents. Some four or five letters fell out—these she gathered slowly up in her thick-knuckled rheumatic old hands, and in doing so some of them tumbled on to the floor on her side of the counter. "Ah, there now!" cried Guy, "that is how my letter may have got mislaid; you don't know how many you let fall: one may easily scatter out of your sight and be left, perhaps, under the counter for a month. Allow me just to come round and have a look;" and, suiting his action to his words, he passed to the other side of the counter, whilst the old woman was still fumbling with her handful of letters and protesting that such a thing never had happened or could happen.

Below the till and one or two other drawers the counter was hollow, and the space was partly filled up with piles of biscuit-tins, empty boxes, baskets, &c.; and, though the cavity was dark, Guy saw that one of the fallen letters had lodged upon a projecting part of this storage. Again he exclaimed, and now rather angrily, as he picked up the missive,

"See here, you might have easily overlooked this if it had fallen between these boxes, instead of on them. What if that should have been the fate of my letter, and that it is there still! You must let me have a candle, Mrs. Prior, and I must turn out everything underneath this counter."

Attracted by this bit of commotion, young Prior, a sturdy, pale-faced man, in shirt-sleeves, apron, and white cap, came forward from the bakery to hear what was going on. It being briefly explained, he naturally took up his mother's cause, and at first seemed inclined to resist Guy's persistent determination to search; but, when threatened by the latter that the management of the office should be reported to head-quarters, he sulkily acquiesced and began slowly removing the lumber.

"Give me a candle," said Guy. "I'll look underneath while you take out the boxes, Mr. Prior."

Being supplied with a farthing dip, and dropping on his knees, he kept a watchful eye upon all the dust and rubbish which turned up as each article was removed. For several minutes nothing came in view but bits of paper, straw, and the like; the place looked as if it had not been swept out for years. Nearly everything at length had been moved except a low, heavy box on which many of the baskets, &c., had been standing, and which was almost beneath the exact spot where the old woman emptied the letters on to the counter.

"Well, there arn't nothing there, is there? and I hope you are satisfied now," said Prior, gruffly.

"No, I am not," answered Guy. "I must have this box out; there's a wide space behind it," and he tugged away at the article, as he spoke, until he had pulled it clear of the counter. Then he bent forward with the candle. His eye immediately fell upon something light; he picked it up, and lo! there was his letter to Mr. Birtles! all smeared and begrimed.

We need not record the expressions of indignation and anger and the threats with which Guy Farrell left the post-office. Nor is it worth while lingering over the state of dejection which succeeded after he had recounted to his father and mother what had happened. It gave him a strange feeling thus again to hold in his hand the missive, the non-delivery of which had been so fatal to him. But these people must be punished," he said, calmly, after a while, "for the sake of others. They must not hold that office a day longer—it is too atrocious to think of. The wretched old woman and her sulky brute of a son, they were always rude and churlish ever since I can remember them. I'll write to the Postmaster-General this moment."

Evening had fallen by this time; the three were sitting near the open French window giving upon the lawn. The gardener suddenly appeared at it, and, asking pardon, said, "Mr. Prior, from the post office, had just come round, begging to speak to Mr. Farrell or Mr. Guy. In a moment a second figure appeared—that of Prior himself. Then followed a long harangue, and a scene that was not without a rough pathos in it. This man, so sulky, rude, and churlish but an hour or two before, was on his knees, abject in his humility and almost eloquent in his appeal. He besought, entreated, and pleaded that the fault might be overlooked for the sake of his old mother; it would be their ruin.

"Well," said Guy, when Prior had finished, "God help you; you have ruined me, but that truly is no reason why I should ruin you—it would be but poor satisfaction. Have a care for the future. See to the post-bags yourself, and I will hold my tongue."

"I think you have done well, Guy," said his father, when they parted for the night. "It will be a lesson to Prior, I believe; and it is not our part to punish."

A few days later, and, without having settled any definite plans for the future, young Farrell returned to Morton-Hurley a broken-spirited man.

Twilight was stealing over the landscape, and as he came up to the dear, well-known garden-gate, and no gentle greeting met his ear, and no welcome light gleamed from the little library window of the parsonage, he fairly broke down, and, leaning against the gate, groaned aloud.

In a minute or two he felt his hands gently pulled down, and heard Dorothy's sweet voice bidding him take comfort.

"Guy, dear!" she said, "remember we are only where we were just before poor father died: we were full of hope then, why can we not be so now? Don't you know you used sometimes to say then, 'I will work my way out to Queensland, and join Will Marsham; and it will be hard if my strong arms and willing heart cannot make a home for my little wife.' Of course they can, Guy. Go; and take the poor £600 that is left of my fortune, and do what you can. I shall go out as governess (as I always meant to do), and my dear old friend Miss Cranstoun will find me a situation, and give me a home in my holidays, and look after me; and we shall write constantly to each other, Guy, and all will come right at last. What matters it if even we have to wait ten years? We need never lose hope, for are we not all the world to each other?"

He had no words to answer her with, and could only press her hand, as his head dropped on her shoulder, whilst she soothed him as alone a loving, noble-hearted woman can.

Then, when he was a little calmer, she went on. "You know my father's successor begs me to remain here as long as it suits me; I need be in no hurry to move. Thus there is plenty of time; so come in with me, Guy, and we will settle exactly what should be done."

Before that evening's close these two young hearts, with the help of the older and more matter-of-fact woman, had faced the sad truth that they must, for the present, bid each other farewell, and meet the coming years alone, but yet not without hope. It was settled that Guy was to start for another hemisphere, and join Will Marsham in Queensland. A year ago he had more than once proposed this in a half-joking way. He would arrange his business matters, therefore, and take passage for Australia forthwith. Dear old Miss Cranstoun assured him that Dorothy should be well taken care of; and before the lovers parted that night some hope had again filled their hearts.

Guy seemed suddenly endowed with the foresight of an experienced man. He first of all arranged matters with the farmer in whose house he had lived; then he turned all his available possessions into ready money, absolutely refusing to touch even a part of the £600, which, with due legal formalities, had by this time, been paid over to Dorothy. He then bought himself a serviceable outfit, including agricultural implements, and went down to Baylesthorpe, to bid good-by to his family and old friends, not forgetting Mr. Monk. That gentleman evinced no small amount of admiration for the young fellow who was so full of hope and determination, and carefully abstained, like a true friend, from blaming him for not having listened to his first advice respecting the shares. At length, with a clear £50 in his pocket, which was all that his father, who had other boys and girls to provide for, could give him, our young colonist declared himself ready to start in the great race of life.

CHAPTER IV.

Guy Farrell sailed for the Antipodes, and Dorothy Chaplin found herself installed as governess in the home which Miss Cranstoun had no difficulty in finding for her.

Weary seemed the days to her, we may be sure, as they rolled slowly on; but, by degrees, buoyed up by the hope that all would be right in the end, she became tolerably contented and happy. Every letter received from Guy during his voyage out, also spoke of hope and contentment, and it was only after a year had elapsed that any tidings reached her calculated to inspire despondency. But then, alas! things began steadily to go wrong; his health failed, and, being without capital, he had nothing but his own manual toil to depend on for his daily bread. He was obliged to fall back for assistance upon his friend Marsham; for months he was laid up under his roof, and, but for his care and watching, he would, in all probability, have succumbed to the fever which laid him low. Still, when at last he was able once more to put his shoulder to the wheel, he did not prosper. Nothing but ill luck beset him; where other men's ventures turned to gold, his failed, or only so far succeeded as to leave him but little better off than when he first arrived in the colony.

Marsham assisted him again and again to the utmost of his power. The eternal want of capital baulked his progress; and, in a word, without following in detail the many misfortunes which overtook him, Guy Farrell became, at the end of four or five years, thoroughly disheartened. Dorothy's affectionate, encouraging letters, and the small sums of money she insisted on sending him, and which had many a time spurred him to renewed exertions, began to lose their effect. Again he had a severe bout of illness; and he finally determined that there was nothing for it but to return to the old country, and endeavour to start afresh in some new line of life.

"At least," he said, "I shall be able to see her sometimes there; and, as this separation is leading to nothing, I cannot be worse off than I am now!"

Dorothy, too, came to the same conclusion; for the love existing between them had in nowise been chilled by the lapse of time; and, the deferred hope having made them both heart-sick, they looked forward eagerly to the day which should see them once more side by side, vain and hopeless yet though the meeting might be.

And so it came to pass that, within five years of the time, when he had lost sight of the English coast, he again saw it rise above the horizon, as he looked out with grateful eyes from on board a homeward-bound vessel steaming up the British Channel. Off Plymouth a pilot was taken on board. Guy was standing amidst a small knot of the steerage passengers, watching this man as he came up the ship's side from his boat, and observed that he was accompanied by a young fellow, whose look contrasted strangely with that of the seafaring functionary.

His dress and appearance was that of a dapper City clerk; and directly he set foot on deck he called out, with a voice and manner which reminded Guy of his short and disastrous experience of the Stock Exchange,

"Any one on board of the name of Farrell? Mr. Guy Farrell? Anybody by that name here?"

Guy was within arm's length of him; and, drawing himself up, said, quietly, and with some astonishment,

"Yes; my name is Farrell—Guy Farrell. What do you want with me?"

"Oh, indeed," answered the clerk. "Soon found, that's lucky. Are you really Mr. Farrell? I was told you'd be on board, and here you are! You are to come on shore in the pilot-boat. Yes, to be sure. Now I look at you again, I remember you—a good deal changed though. This letter is for you," and he handed one to Guy, who pounced on it with an eagerness which showed he at once recognised from whom it came.

In Dorothy's well-known hand he read these words:—

"Come on shore with the bearer of this. I am waiting for you, and have such good news."

Without a moment's delay, Guy gave a few hasty directions about his small kit and followed the young man down the ship's side to the pilot-boat just as she was pushing off.

"You appear to recognise me," were his first words as they sailed landward. "Pray who are you, and how do you come to know me?"

"At present," answered the young clerk, "I have the honour of being in the confidence of John Monk, Esquire, of Rippleton, solicitor, and I am his chief clerk. My name is Putteridge, and when I saw you last I was office boy only; but by diligence and attention to business—but there, it's not for me to blow my own trumpet. I last saw you more than five years ago in Mr. Monk's office."

"Is Mr. Monk, then, with Miss Chaplin now in Plymouth?"

"No, Sir. He did me the honour of intrusting the young lady to my charge. I brought her down two days ago. She would insist on coming. She was so very anxious to see you; and money being no object——he hesitated.

"Pray, go on," said Guy. "Pray explain this unlooked-for circumstance."

"Pardon me, no! I have said too much, perhaps, already. She particularly requested me to leave all explanations to her. She wanted to surprise you."

"Well, she has done that most thoroughly, already," answered Guy; but he little thought how much more there was in store for him.

Within half an hour he held Dorothy in his arms.

Divested of all incoherence and explanatory exclamations, this is what she had to tell.

"Mr. Monk, Guy," she said, "has been our good genius. It appears that dreadful old woman Mrs. Prior had another son who had been gold-digging for years in California. He returned just after his mother's death, two years ago. Then, the strange thing is that he died, too, within a very short time, so that the poor baker and post-master, as the next of kin, found himself the inheritor of all his Californian brother's wealth; and how much that is we don't even know at present—not the full extent of it, I mean."

"But what is that to us?" asked Guy.

"Why, just this—that it all belongs to me, or rather to you, for what's mine is yours."

"Impossible!"

"Not at all. There are yet more wonders in store for your dear old sunburnt ears to drink in," cried Dorothy, playfully patting her lover's cheek. "Listen. Your forbearance in overlooking the grave business of that mislaid letter seems to have sunk deep into Prior's heart, for when he found himself a rich man he began making inquiries about you, and as to what had been the real nature of the misfortune which had befallen you through the non-delivery of the letter. Being after a time referred to Mr. Monk, he told him exactly what had happened. Then," said Prior, "I mean to make good the loss the young lady sustained." "That will cost you £1400," said Mr. Monk, "and the interest on it perhaps a couple of hundred more." "All right," said Prior, "I shall do that," and then and there he handed over a mass of bank-notes to Mr. Monk. Mr. Monk's account to me of this scene was really touching. The mixture, too, of contrition and regret for what had happened, with the off-hand manner in which the man threw about his newly-gotten wealth, Mr. Monk said was most amusing. He didn't want any receipt or that sort of thing, he said; he only wanted to be sure Miss Chaplin got the money; and, finally, through Mr. Monk, I have got the money, so that my fortune after all, Guy, you see, is still intact.

"Very wonderful, and a great piece of good-luck," responded Farrell. "One must be thankful, indeed. At the same time, it only leaves us where we were five years ago."

"No, indeed it does not; for there is a greater surprise for you yet to come; only it is very sad, at the same time. What do you think? Within a week of Prior's paying over this money, he called again on Mr. Monk and asked whether he thought we should be married now. Of course, Mr. Monk said he could not tell; but he supposed that, if you could get something to do when you came back, we should; otherwise, it was doubtful. Whereupon Prior replied, 'Then, I'll make it certain. I have got no one belonging to me now, since poor old mother's gone—I've no one to leave my money to; so, if you'll be so kind, I should like to make my will and to make the young lady my heiress.' Well, of course, as Mr. Monk said, it was not his business to object; and he drew the will, as he called it, and within half an hour it was all duly signed and settled. 'Now, then,' said Prior, 'I am going to London to look about me a bit.' And will you believe it, dear Guy, the poor fellow started that evening by the mail train from Rippleton, and was killed in the terrible accident which happened to it within a mile or two of London, and of which of course you have heard nothing, for it only happened three weeks ago."

It signifies little to inquire what was the extent of Dorothy Chaplin's inheritance; but that it was all sufficient to bring about the dearest wish of her heart we may be sure, and the wonderful combination of events here narrated are always spoken of by the Rippleton community in the comprehensive words of "Dorothy's Fortune."

SEASONABLE CHEER.

This drawing of the kitchen of a baronial hall, with the captivating culinary Phyllis, irresistibly suggests how great a loss to Art was the death Valentine Bromley. His sunshiny nature assuredly let sunshine into a shady place when he drew with felicitous touches the lissom handmaiden whose good looks are the best of books, adding, as they do, chapter and verse, with a soupçon of flirtation thrown in for seasoning, to the quaint surroundings of the broad fireplace, primitive mantelpiece, minutest of windows, holly and ham-decked rafters of this indispensable adjunct to a baronial hall a century ago. "No baron, esquire, or knight of the shire," we warrant, would have disdained to tread a measure with sweet Margery on Christmas Eve, when, in accordance with the time-honoured custom, the servants danced and held revel in the fine old hall. "Seasonable Cheer," in fine, could not possibly be presented in more acceptable guise.

The Court of the Drapers' Company have given twenty-five guineas to the Society for Preventing Street Accidents and Dangerous Driving.

Mr. Rowland Matthews concluded the sale of the art-properties of the late Hon. St. John Buller, of Portrane Manor, Ireland, the total of the two days' sale being £5732 18s. 6d.

The theatre of the London Institution was crowded on the 18th inst. with an audience which had gathered to listen to a lecture by Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., Oxon, on Carols for Christmas and other Festive Seasons.

London was on Monday night enveloped in the densest fog that has been experienced this winter. At an early hour in the evening travelling both by rail and road became almost wholly stopped.

Yesterday week the anniversary festival of the Commercial Travellers' Schools was held at the Freemasons' Tavern—Mr. Warren De La Rue in the chair. During the evening contributions to the amount of £1716 were announced.

An ordination was held at St. Paul's on Sunday by the Bishop of London, who was attended by the Dean of St. Paul's, the Archdeacon of Middlesex, the Rev. Prebendary Cadman, and the Rev. Dr. Gifford.

The Crystal Palace School of Practical Engineering has completed the seventh year of its existence, and it was stated at the distribution of certificates to the successful students last Saturday that during that period there had been inspected and signed no less than 90,000 lecture questions.

The managers of the Royal Institution have awarded the Actonian prize of £105 to Mr. G. S. Boulger, F.L.S., F.G.S., for an essay on The Structure and Functions of the Retina in all classes of Animals, viewed in Relation with the Theory of Evolution.

The Lady Mayoress distributed on the 18th inst. the prizes and rewards won by the children of the Asylum for Deaf and Dumb, in the Old Kent-road. Her Ladyship attended in state, and was accompanied by Mr. Sheriff Woolloton in his official robes, Mr. Under-Sheriff Crawford, and several ladies and gentlemen. There are already 300 children provided for, some in the building in the Old Kent-road and the remainder in the branch establishment at Margate. In addition to these, thirty will be elected on the second Monday in January. An idea of the amount of success which had attended the teaching given at the asylum may be formed from the fact that many of the children had gone up for examination to the Arts and Science Department of South Kensington, and some of them have been awarded prizes and certificates. The Head Master highly praised the children under his charge. Specimens of the children's writing, drawing, and needlework were on view; and the scholars gave a series of pantomimic illustrations.

The form which it has been decided the English memorial to the late Princess Alice shall take is the endowment of the Hospital and School for Nurses in Darmstadt which her late Royal Highness founded, and in which, up to the time of her lamented death, she took a great and practical interest. Indeed, the loss of the support which the late Grand Duchess gave to this institution would have seriously imperilled its efficiency, but for the aid which the trustees of the English Memorial Fund are enabled to permanently guarantee to it. The surplus, after the endowment of the hospital, will be given towards the maintenance of other kindred institutions in which the Princess was personally interested. The following inscription will be placed on the hospital in Darmstadt:—"This Hospital and School for Nurses, founded by her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Hesse, Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland, has been endowed for ever as a memorial of her Royal Highness by those in Great Britain and Ireland, India, and the Colonies who reverenced her pure and noble character, and her life of loving self-sacrifice. Si monumentum requiris, circumspice. Obiit December 14, 1878."

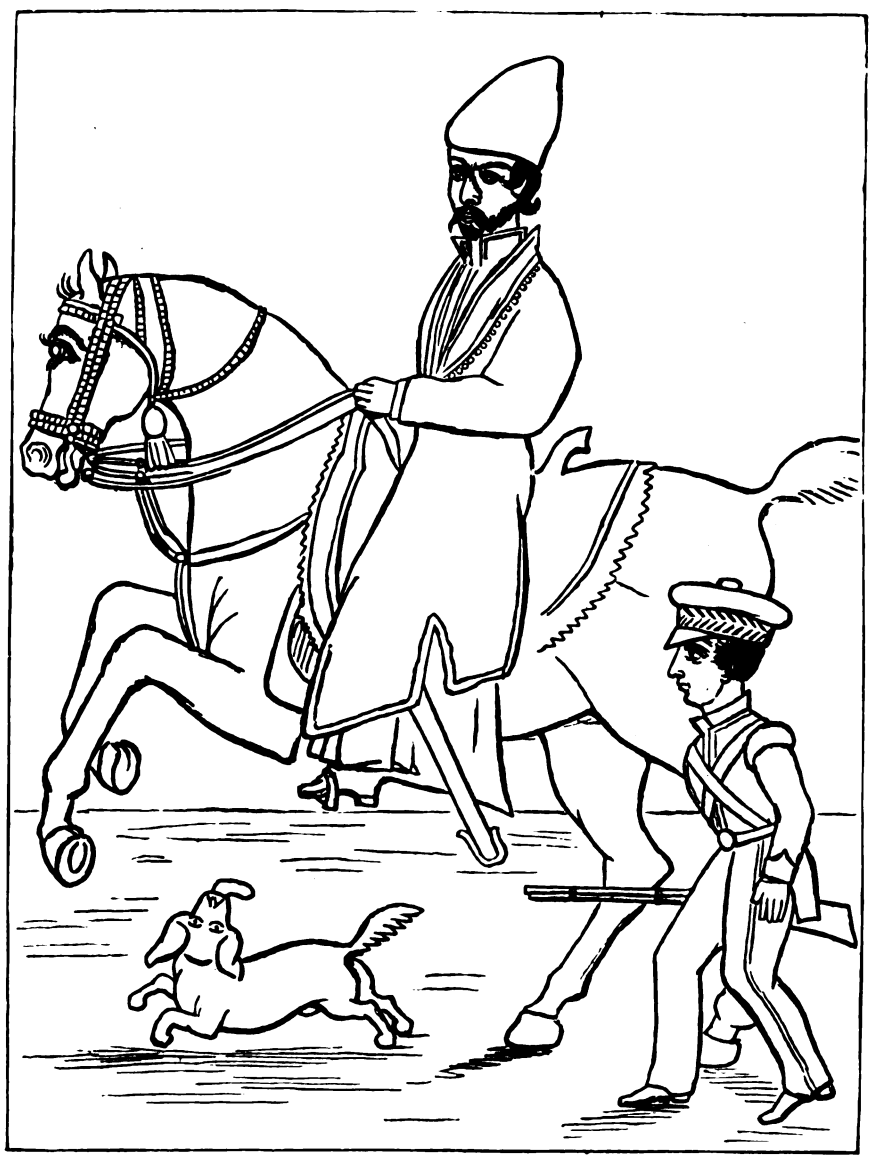
ACHILLE'S TOILET.

M. Dubois' establishment lies in one of the streets in the vicinity of the Rue Mouffetard, Paris, a locality which in many respects is nearly represented in London by Seven Dials. His accommodation is limited. He has, in fact, only one room, as well ventilated as anybody could wish. A few plates, a candlestick, a washing-tub, and an old box labelled Fragile, in a somewhat dilapidated condition, constitute his household goods. His æsthetic sense is not without objects to admire. A pot of flowers breaks, in form and colour, the monotony of his limited dresser, and his own uninstructed hand has sketched, with the sublime carelessness of genius, on the old egg-box a rude cartoon of, let us say, the Pope of Rome or Madame Dubois, of M. Gambetta or his own eldest son and heir.



The population of Paris is, perhaps, especially fond of pets. The pets themselves are mostly to be pitied; but every one of them is the occasion and cause of some special industry. M. Dubois, whom the artist represents to us in his working-day apparel, has taken upon him the care of dogs. He loves them as tenderly as Chaucer's Prioress Madame Eglantine her "smale houndes." He looks after their cleanliness and neatness of their person. He is, in fact, a tondeur.

It is the opinion of Buffon that the barbet or poodle is a beast of high intelligence and deep-seated affection; mais, he adds, (alas! that not hingshould be perfect from our mundane point of view) mais la longueur de son poil l'expose à se crotter affreusement en marchant par les rues. In this imperfection, however, M. Dubois and other members of his guild rejoice. The more frightfully the dogs are befouled, the more earnestly does M. Dubois agree with Dr. Pangloss in his optimism. Like the priests of Siam, who are said to reserve to themselves the sole and exclusive right of improving the divine majesty of their countenance by cutting off their own eyebrows, the professional fraternity of M. Dubois lay claim to a mystic, immemorial privilege in the matter of shaving other folks' poodles.

Here is a dog under the hands of the dog's barber. Achille is quite at home. The barber is a burly fellow, with black bristly hair, which he has himself cropped à la malcontent; not, in human judgment, a man to invite respect or trust. Yet Achille looks up to him with both. In the breast of that animal these feelings are, we may infer from the cast of his countenance, mingled with ineffable delight at his own appearance. If ever there was a conceited poodle, Achille is that dog. Whether he is being dressed for dinner—not, indeed, in the ominous sense in which that phrase would have been understood at the time of Paris' last siege, during which dog was sold at 4f. the pound, but as an honoured and welcomed guest—or whether he is about to take an airing in the Jardin des Tuileries, he evidently considers his coat will not discredit his company. As a young lady dressed for her first ball, calmly confident in the muslin honours thrust upon her, looks forward in pleasing anticipation of being the belle of the room, so Achille, supported by the steady consciousness of his own deserts, awaits without impatience a favourable verdict from every judicious observer. And all this is owing to the artistic skill of the tondeur.

Let us hope he has his reward in ready money, besides an approving conscience, and that he will not suffer such disappointment in this respect as once befell one of his own calling. It is an old story; but is there anything whereof it may be said, "See, this is new?" A dog was quietly following a gentleman over the Pont Neuf. "That is a very pretty dog," said a dog-shaver, "but he would be improved by a little clipping. If Monsieur would permit me ——." "Certainly," said the gentleman. The artist with the sounding shears began his work. "You would like a fringe left about his ankles?" "If you please," said the gentleman. "And a delicate tuft on the top of his tail?" "By all means," said the gentleman. "And now," said the tondeur, having given the finishing touch with the painful care of a Michael Angelo or a Leonardo da Vinci, "now, that will be just five francs." "Doubtless," said the gentleman. "you are perfectly right; but—it is not my dog!"

A CHRISTMAS SAINT.

St. Nicholas' Day, Dec. 6, comes sufficiently near to Christmas to permit us to call him a Christmas Saint, even if his patronage of children did not extend so far into the Christmas week, that the Child-Bishop whom it was once the custom to elect on St. Nicholas' Day, maintained his office and authority up to Holy Innocents' Day, Dec. 28. And, when this custom was first suppressed by Henry VIII., in 1542, and, after a revival in Mary's reign, was finally abolished in the latter part of the reign of Queen Bess, it was but to give place to the institution of the Eton Montem, which was formerly held, not at Whitsuntide (as it was latterly, until its suppression in 1844), but at Christmas, when, a pathway having been cut through the snow from Eton to Salthill, the Captain and his followers walked in procession to the hill, where the chaplain read mock prayers (which Queen Charlotte vetoed) and then kicked his clerk down the hill! He might have said to him, as Launce said to Speed, "There! and St. Nicholas be thy speed!"

It was, too, on Holy Innocents' Day—also called Childermas Day—that the Boy-Bishop preached his sermon and took a prominent part in the Church services, the little St. Nicholas, as he was called, having on the previous day appeared in great state in the cathedral or church, wearing his cope and mitre, bearing his pastoral staff, singing complin, incensing the altar, giving his benediction to the kneeling crowd of worshippers, and receiving the submission of the cathedral dignitaries. At Childermastide, Dec. 27, the little St. Nicholas was at the height of his importance; and, on Childermas Day, in order to keep alive in their children's minds the Herodian Massacre of the Innocents, mothers were wont to whip their little ones; so that the day was regarded as an unlucky day, both for infants and adults; and, in many towns, muffled peals were rung upon the church bells. The (literally) childish custom of electing a Boy-Bishop dated from a remote period; for, when Edward I. was on his way to Scotland, a Boy-Bishop said vespers before him on St. Nicholas' Day. The boy was elected to the office by his brother choristers, and he and they were called "St. Nicholas and his clerks;" and they are spoken of under that name by Shakspeare, in the scene in the inn-yard at Rochester, in the first part of the play of King Henry IV. Their travesties of sacred services were repaid by such liberal gifts and plentiful dinners that the Christmas holidays must have been highly enjoyed by these mediæval youngsters, who had good cause to bless their patron saint, St. Nicholas. Costly velvet copes, golden mitres, and rich suits of pontificals were kept for the Boy-Bishop and his attendants in York Minster, St. Paul's Cathedral, and all the chief places of worship throughout the land; and if the Boy-Bishop died between Dec. 6 and Dec. 28 he was buried in episcopal robes, and with all the honours that would have been paid to a veritable Bishop. The tomb of one of these may be seen in Salisbury Cathedral. The Roman Sigillaria, or Feast of Infants, which brought their Saturnalia to a close, would seem to coincide with Holy Innocents' Day and Childermas-tide.

The legend that constituted St. Nicholas as the patron saint of little boys is anything but a pleasing or edifying story, and may be told briefly. He was born of a good family, in the year 309, at Patura, in Lycia; and, having embraced the Christian religion at an early age, even, as an infant, observing all fast-days by an almost entire abstention from his natural nutriment (!), he was created Bishop of Myra by Constantine the Great. He was present at the Council of Nice, where he boxed the ears of Arius, who had annoyed him. He, probably, died Bishop of Myra, and holy oil flowed from his tomb, and other marvels were there shown for many centuries, until the year 1087, when the bones of the Saint were stolen and removed to Bari, in Southern Italy, where they were buried in St. Stephen's Church. Miracles followed, and pilgrimages were made; and St. Nicholas' Day is still observed at Bari as one of their chief festivals. An Asiatic parent sent his two sons to be educated at Athens, and ordered them to call at Myra on their way, in order that they might receive the blessing of the good St. Nicholas. Arriving late, they put up at the Inn, where the landlord murdered them, and, cutting up their bodies, salted the pieces, and laid them in a pickling-tub to be sold as pork. This wicked deed was revealed in a vision to St. Nicholas, who went to the landlord and taxed him with the crime, which the conscience-stricken man acknowledged. St. Nicholas then prayed that the mangled remains should be reunited, and that the youths should be restored to life. The miracle was accomplished, and the two youths stepped unhurt from the pickling-tub and embraced the feet of the holy man. Another version of the legend is that, in a time of great scarcity, a certain man killed three children, cut them up, salted their limbs, and served them up as pork to St. Nicholas and other guests; but that the Saint detected the nature of the horrible dish, and, throwing its contents into the pickling-tub, commanded the three children to step forth from it, alive and whole. This latter version of the legend would seem to have been adopted by the mediæval artiste, who usually depicted St. Nicholas giving his episcopal benediction to three little boys standing naked in a tub—who, happily, seem to be there for sanatory, and not culinary purposes.

A large and wonderfully elaborated glass-picture of this incident will be familiar to many, as it forms a central portion of the west window of the nave of St. Nicholas Church, Great Yarmouth, the largest parish church in England. The stained glass is believed to be about three centuries old, and was brought from some church on the Continent. The saint is depicted in the most gorgeous episcopal robes, engaged in performing the miracle of the pickling-tub. In such a church as this—dedicated in the name of St. Nicholas, about the year 1100, by Bishop Herbert de Lozinga—it seems a pity that St. Nicholas should only appear as the patron saint of little boys, and not as the protector of sailors and seafaring men, who also claim him as their patron saint. This was in consequence of his having saved mariners who had invoked his aid from perishing in the waves. There are several stories to that effect, with Cilicia, the Holy Land, and other places, for the scenes of the various legends. Dr. Bowring has translated a Servian poem, in which 300 friars, on board two tempest-tossed vessels, are represented as crying, "Help, O God! and help, O holy Nicholas! Would that thou, where'er thou art, were with us!" Upon which the saint suddenly appeared to them, and "saved the whole three hundred friars," with their offerings, their golden wax, and snowy incense. It was told to me, beneath the figure of St. Nicholas, in Yarmouth church, that no less than 376 churches on the English coast were dedicated in his name. Other churches in towns on navigable rivers, such as Newcastle-on-Tyne and Worcester, might be added to the list; and I write these lines in a Rutland village, where the church is St. Nicholas, I having previously been intimately connected with a Huntingdonshire village where the church was also St. Nicholas. In both these cases he was, probably, taken as the patron saint of boys; as they are churches where it was not likely that sailors would come to make their votive offerings, or hang up their garments, as they did in the days of Horace.

That little St. Nicholas, the Boy-Bishop, with his young companions, must have had a rare time of it during Christmas, any date between the years 1462 and 1586, when the sacred mysteries and dramas were performed, and the scenes of the Nativity, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Massacre of the Innocents, were represented with clever mechanical effects. The Star of the Magi was made to move by means of ropes and threads; and, in the Corporation books of Great Yarmouth, there are numerous entries of the expenses of hanging and scouring the star, leading the star, ryving the star, making a new balk-line and a nine-thread line to lead the star, &c.

But schoolboys must not monopolise St. Nicholas, for he is considered as the patron-saint of maidens in France, Italy, Holland, and elsewhere; and, when the eve of his day came round, the girls in convents used to hang empty stockings at the door of the Abbess's room, and find the next morning that the good St. Nicholas had filled them with bonbons and other presents. This custom is still observed at Christmas-time, not only on this side the Atlantic, but also in America, a boot or shoe sometimes taking the place of the stocking for the reception of the Christmas gifts. Scribner's magazine for boys and girls is called "St. Nicholas," he being the patron-saint of New York, as well as of the great Russian Empire. Portionless but marriageable maidens were wont to invoke St. Nicholas, who was said to pursue the (to them) very agreeable custom of throwing through their bed-room windows, left purposely open, purses full of money to provide them with marriage portions. To this effect, there is a lengthy legend concerning a poor nobleman of Patara, whose three lovely daughters were dowered by the mysterious purses of the good St. Nicholas. Evidently, he was a most popular patron and protector, especially among young people, and one whose charities, kindness of heart, and liberality in bestowing gifts, were a great aid to the spending of a happy Christmas. The Sheffield election, the polling for which took place on Monday last, resulted in the return of Mr. Waddy. The numbers were—For Waddy (Liberal), 14,062; Wortley (Conservative), 13,584: majority for Waddy, 478.

The publishers of The Atlantic Monthly gave a breakfast at Boston, Massachusetts, on the 3rd inst., to commemorate the seventieth birthday of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson have sold the autograph MS. of Handel's opera "Amadigi," 73 pp. folio, for £35 10s., and that of Mozart's Quintet in D major, 39 pp., for 43 guineas. These were from the collection of the late Mr. F. Smee, of the Bank of England.

We have received the twelfth volume of the "M.C.C. Cricket Scores and Biographies." Although the work, in the words of the compiler, "is to be considered a collection of facts and dry statistics only," yet it is of the greatest value to cricketers, being a complete record of the games during 1871-2-3. The biographies are short, but contain everything of general interest connected with each player.

Captain Bedford Pim, R.N., M.P., has read a paper on the proposed Panama Canal at a meeting of the Society of Arts. He proposes an alternative route to that from Greytown. From Pim's Bay, on the Atlantic, forty miles from Greytown, he would commence by cutting a canal down to the Rama river, a distance of about ten miles. The Rama river carries deep water about twenty miles into the interior, and the remaining seventy miles to the Lake of Nicaragua would traverse land offering no particular difficulty. From San Miguelito, on the Lake Nicaragua, the canal would run to the northern shores of Lake Managua, and thence to Port Realejo, on the Pacific, the total distance being 290 miles.

In response to an appeal to the Duchess of Marlborough, the Lord Mayor of London has expressed his willingness to receive sums in the aid of the distress in Ireland, and to help the fund by his own contribution.—Mr. Ripley, M.P., has contributed £200 to the Duchess of Marlborough's fund for the relief of the distress in Ireland. The hon. gentleman urges that a committee for collecting subscriptions should be formed in Bradford, where there is a large Irish population.—At a public meeting in Liverpool last week it was resolved to start a subscription for the aid of the famine-stricken in the West of Ireland. The Duchess of Marlborough's letter was referred to in graceful terms.—The Clothworkers' Company have sent one hundred guineas to the fund.—The Duke of Hamilton writes to say that the distress among the poorer classes in the western districts of Donegal is already intense, and, unless some relief outside local sources is afforded, the consequence may be deplorable.—We are requested to announce that subscriptions to the Duchess of Marlborough's Relief Fund for Irish Distress may be paid to the London and Westminster Bank, as well as to the Bank of Ireland.

The new Holborn Townhall was opened on the 18th inst. The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, on the part of the Corporation of London, Sir J. McGarel Hogg, Bart., M.P., chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and Sir Andrew Lusk and Mr. Torrens, the members for Finsbury, took part in the ceremony. Mr. J. Orde Hull, chairman of the Holborn District Board of Works, presided. The key of the building, which was inclosed in an ornate, elaborately ornamented ebony casket, constructed by Mr. J. W. Benson, was presented to the Lord Mayor through Sir J. McGarel Hogg from the Board of Works, when the Chief Magistrate declared the edifice open as a public institution. The building is stately, well proportioned, and commanding. Built of red Fareham brick and Portland stone, in the Renaissance style, the architects, Messrs. Isaacs and Florence, have displayed excellent taste in the treatment of the details. A considerable number of decayed and uncomely buildings had been cleared away to secure a fitting site for the hall, which, adjoining Theobald's-road, stands well back from the thoroughfare, with abundant space and light in front. The cost of the site and erection of the building has been £50,000.

Reduction of agricultural rents have recently been made as follows:—Lord Carlingford, the Lord Lieutenant of Essex, has remitted 10 per cent upon the rents due at Michaelmas, and 5 per cent upon the rents for the preceding half-year, on his estates in the county. He has also announced his intention of giving his tenants in future the concurrent right of shooting on their several farms.—Lord Crewe has instructed the agents on his Cheshire and Staffordshire estates to allow tenant farmers from 15 to 25 per cent in cash on their Christmas rents, according to their circumstances. His Lordship expresses a hope that the pecuniary assistance will strengthen and encourage his tenants to combat their undoubtedly great difficulties. The feeling between Lord Crewe and his tenantry is one of the greatest cordiality.—The Earl of Rosslyn has agreed to a reduction of 10 per cent on the rental of the tenants on his estate in Fife—Mr. Charles Morrison, of Basildon House, near Reading, has announced to his tenants that in consequence of the recent bad seasons for agriculture in England he will remit at the rent audit in January (inclusive of that deducted at Michaelmas) 50 per cent of their rents on the year.—A most liberal allowance has been made by Lord Northwick to his agricultural tenants in Worcestershire. He returned 25 per cent in cash and artificial manures in the last half-year's rent; and at the same time intimated his intention to continue the same allowance up to Lady-Day, 1892, by which time he trusts the present depression will have passed away.

POLITICAL.

The guiding mind of the adroit debater who yet leads the Conservative party palpably influenced the utterances of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Leeds on Saturday, and it may be that the confident tone in which both Sir Stafford Northcote and Mr. E. Stanhope spoke was intended to influence the voting at the Sheffield election on Monday. Mr. Gladstone's two slips in Midlothian—his putting the Income-Tax at sixpence instead of fivepence, and his mistaking Scotland for "the land of the leal," yielded the Chancellor of the Exchequer opportunities for indulging in the somewhat lumbering attempts at badinage which pass with him for humour. But Sir Stafford's protracted defence of the Budgets of the Government, and his endeavour to show that really, after all, the natural expenditure of the present Ministry was not much more than that of Mr. Gladstone's, amounted only to a prolix exemplification of the truth of the French adage, Qui s'excuse, s'accuse! Turning to Mr. Bright's Rochdale speech, Sir Stafford Northcote lamented that the right hon. gentleman should have gone uncommonly near advocating a Republic in this country. He maintained that the views of the Government were still supported by the majority of the nation; defended the Ministerial action in Afghanistan, and looked forward to a satisfactory issue from existing embarrassments; whilst the close of both Sir Stafford speeches had the usual Ministerial ring, and affirmed that the "honour and welfare of the country" were best looked after by the present Government. Mr. Bourke likewise spoke in the same strain at the luncheon in the Townhall, and at the large meeting in the Drill-hall. But it was reserved to Mr. Stanhope, throwing completely on one side the mantle of conciliatory politeness he usually adopts when addressing the front Opposition bench, to develop a sprightliness of attack and a fertility of anecdote worthy the leader, who, he predicted, would again be triumphant at the general election.

In Mr. Bright's forcible speech at Rochdale on the 18th inst., when the right hon. gentleman welcomed Mr. Potter home from the United States, there was a return of his old fire and vigour. It was clear that whilst he regretted his inability to accept the President's invitation to the White House, whilst he exalted the American Republic at the expense of European monarchies and empires, and still hoped that America would in time adopt Free Trade, Mr. Bright spoke from the deepest conviction. It was the "Tribune of the People" speaking again with his pristine earnestness, and lashing every institution of the land with which he disagrees. Many must disagree with his sweeping denunciation of the Ministry, and the strong language with which he assailed every establishment to which he has been antagonistic throughout his career; but it is impossible to deny the power and sincerity of the right hon. gentleman's latest speech.

At Christmastime it would be fruitless to touch on the many other addresses that have been delivered by lesser stars; and it will be sufficient to add that the opposing views have been ably supported by Sir William Hart Dyke, Mr. Leatham, and others.

WORD PUZZLES.

I.

Within a stately mansion I abide,
With like companion ever at my side;
At ball and banquet looking fiercely glum,
And, when the cheering shakes the rafters, dumb;
At youth and beauty gliding through the dance,
Quite unperturbed in soul, I coldly glance;
Nor cry, when savours to my nostrils come,
"Fe-fi-fo-fum! I must and will have some!"
Though groan the tables there, to me at least
The dinner is a Barmecidal feast.
Take off my head, and then I represent
A damsel's mind, on her first ball intent;
Or waiting anxiously the following day
For him to call, and wondering what he 'll say.
An article indefinite detach
And then the whole will find in me his match.
Where else I could be paired I do not know,
Unless to Sacred Chronicles we go;
For one is mentioned there, of kingly powers,
Whose name and nature so accord with ours,
That if an ancestry we boast at all
Him our forefather we might safely call:
(One hears at times his name spelled out at lecture—
A technicality of architecture).
Sole relic left, a letter of strange doom,
That, set in glory, lingers yet in gloom;
Now hard, now soft; at times to eyesight clear,
Yet unapparent to the keenest ear.
Full many a time, impervious to remorse,
The carter jerks me at his jaded horse,
That fears the oft-accompanied sting of whip,
So labours painfully a livelier skip.

II.

A knight of me is named in song.
Drop the first letter, I belong
By right to those who labour truly;
And, should it be withheld unduly,
Another letter from me spurning,
I feel myself with anger burning.
If this same case crop up at law,
And I myself by chance withdraw,
Then, heading a report, you 'll see
Last fragment of poor little me;
Except one letter left behind,
Which shows whence blows a dreaded wind;
And when the pointer turns its way
All invalids shrink with dismay.

III.

To say I 'm narrow, little clue will give,
Since great and small are merely relative.
You would be in me if a furious bull
In some deep-sunken lane should meet you full.
Of my first letter shorn, why then perforce
My last goes with it as a thing of course;
And in my lopped state you may plainly see
I stand for some peculiarity.
Another gone, my last one comes again,
And I a tough material put in train,
Which duly made will vessels keep from wreck,
Or fitly ornament a villain's neck.
One less—and up the Thames, on pleasure bent,
You pitch on me, perchance, our picnic tent;
Still further shorn—the reader's ready wit
By intuition will alight on it;
And at the last thin atom left of me
Will give a guess that suits me to a t.—J. L.

Messrs. De la Rue are this year rather late in the issue of their various admirable and useful productions. Their pocket-books, diaries, calendars, and Christmas cards have for many years been distinguished for their extreme neatness. The issues for this year are models of clear arrangement and artistic workmanship. Where colour is used much taste is displayed, and in all cases the printing is perfect. Their Christmas cards are marked by originality in design, and are produced in a finished manner. The embroidery pictures chromo-lithographed on satin are especially worthy of note.

Messrs. M'Corquodale and Co. have issued their "Railway Diary" for the new year. It contains a mass of information of special use to those concerned in railway finance or who are engaged in the working of railways.

The Christmas number of the Gardener's Magazine contains several additional pages, and is profusely enriched with well-executed woodcuts. The almanack, too, is very ornate and well printed.

The Professional Pocket-Book; or, Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1880, specially adapted for professional engagements, is published, under the immediate direction of Sir Julius Benedict, by Waterlow and Sons, and by Rudall, Carte, and Co.

DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE. Adapted for Home Education and for Schoolmistresses and Pupil-Teachers. By ROBERT JAMES MANN, M.D., late Superintendent of Education at Natal.

"In a series of short and easy lessons he discusses, in a clear and taking manner, almost every question on which the least experienced head of a family would require information—air and ventilation; food, cookery, and drink; heat, clothing, and washing; health, home, and money; and he never fails in being equally lucid, accurate, and practical. There have been many similar works, but after testing this, the latest of them, on a number of salient points, we have no hesitation in recommending it as in every respect worthy of confidence."—Examiner.

Post 8vo, cloth, 355 pp., 2s. 6d.,

DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND HOUSEHOLD SCIENCE (Standard 5 of the Whitelands Series of Standard Reading Books for Girls). Edited by Rev. J. P. FAUNTHORPE, M.A., Principal of Whitelands Training College. Dedicated, by permission, to his Grace the Duke of Westminster, K.G.

"It is a thoroughly eminent and comprehensive manual, and contains more information than half a dozen primers of health or social science. It would be a useful book to add to village lending libraries, or to give as prizes in Sunday schools, or as presents to young servants. It is, indeed, a pity that this, or some other book of the same sort, is not more commonly in use in so-called ladies' schools and private school-rooms. If mistresses as well as maids knew and acted up to the wise lessons contained in this little book, the price of which is only half-a-crown, there would be a marked increase in the domestic happiness of that large part of the community who cannot afford to pay accomplished cooks and experienced housekeepers."—Saturday Review.

SIMPLE LESSONS. Chiefly intended for Home Use and Elementary Schools. By Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, G. PHILLIPS BEVAN, F.G.S., Dr. MANN, F.R.G.S., J. C. BUCKMASTER, B.A., Mrs. BENJAMIN CLARKE, J. J. POPE, R. A. PROCTOR, B.A., Rev. F. O. MORRIS, M.A., Rev. G. HENSLOW, F.L.S., Rev. T. E. CRALLAN, M.A. Contents: Our Bodily Life—How and Why we Breathe—Food—Drink—Cookery—Plain Needlework—Clothing—Air and Ventilation—The Sicknesses that Spread—Weather—Astronomy—Birds—Flowers—Money.

THE SIMPLE LESSONS are also published separately, 3d. each, or 16s. per 100 assorted. The set of 14, in card case, 3s.

"It would be difficult to award too high praise to this little volume. It consists of a series of leaflets, now bound up together, teaching the simple facts of domestic economy and elementary science. Each series is contributed by a writer of acknowledged eminence in his own department. These 'Simple Lessons' are chiefly intended for elementary schools. But, if the knowledge of the children is not to put the parents to shame, it is no less desirable that the book should circulate throughout the cottage homes of England. We can imagine no better present for the wife of an artizan."—Academy.

Fcap folio, 12s. 6d.,

AN ATLAS OF ANATOMY; or, Pictures of the Human Body. In 24 Quarto Coloured Plates, comprising 100 separate Figures, with Descriptive Letterpress by Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, Member of the London School Board, Author of the Physiological Sections of "Simple Lessons for Home Use," &c.

"It is hoped that this work, being issued at a comparatively low price, may be found useful both to science teachers and to students of all kinds. To the private student whose access to anatomical preparations and physiological laboratories is limited such a book is indispensable. Again, children, with their keen interest in the facts of Nature, and with their fresh, undistracted minds full of curiosity about what is around them, are almost always found to take a deep interest in the wonderful structure and functions of their own bodies. Thus this volume would generally be found an acceptable gift to an intelligent youth of twelve or fourteen, and would afford him useful instruction for his adult life."—Extract from Preface.

Folio, price 7s. 6d. each,

NOTICE.

THE MAGAZINE OF ART. Vols. I. and II.—The permanent value of these volumes, as affording a comprehensive view of contemporary art, is now fully recognised, and the volumes are rendered increasingly valuable on account of the limited number of copies now remaining in the Publishers' hands, and from the fact that, owing to the large number of high-class Illustrations, and the manner in which they are produced, it will be impossible to reprint the volumes so as to publish them at the present price.
The Publishers, therefore, feel bound to give notice that the price of Volume I. will, on Jan. 1, 1880, be raised from 7s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.
A Notice respecting Vol. II. will appear in a subsequent Part of THE MAGAZINE OF ART, when a date will be fixed for the increase in price of this volume also. Meanwhile it can still be supplied at 7s. 6d.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.

Happy Days! There is something of regret and gloom in the first appearance of grey hairs; our prospects are often blighted by their premature appearance. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER happily affords a safe and sure means for restoring them again to the freshness and beauty of youth. Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER is no new low-priced article.

It is the old-established standard and reliable article known and spoken most highly of in every civilised country. Every good thing for the hair that the most scientific men of the Old and New World can suggest are combined in Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. It requires only a few applications to restore grey hair to its youthful colour and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. Dandriff is quickly and permanently removed. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER.

There are two special qualities which determine and fix the superiority and excellence of Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER:—First—Its prompt, quick action, and the new growth, life, and vigour that it is sure to give to the hair, never failing by a few applications TO RESTORE GREY OR WHITE HAIR TO ITS YOUTHFUL COLOUR, imparting to the hair a delightful aroma, fresh, delicate, and unchangeable in any climate. Second—Its easy application without any previous preparation of the hair: without that sticky and disagreeable sulphur odour found and complained of in other preparations. It never stains the skin or linen. It retains the hair in any desired position, and is cooling and cleansing to the scalp.

FLORAL BELL, FRAGRANT ELIXIR OR LIQUID DENTIFRICE.

The admiration of the world, "THE FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE." Language fails to give expression to the beauty or the utility of a beautiful set of white teeth. With no other charm the possessor may well feel proud. Dentists, chemists, and physicians all recommend and use the FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is truly unequalled for cleansing, preserving, and beautifying the teeth, giving them a pearl-like whiteness and hardening the gums. It removes all tartar hardens the enamel, arrests decay, and imparts to the breath at all times a most delightful fragrance.

A few drops on the brush night and morning is all sufficient. Tooth pastes and powders are discarded after a trial of FLORAL BELL FRAGRANT ELIXIR or LIQUID DENTIFRICE. It is purely vegetable, which may account for the absence of froth in your mouth during its use. A chemical that produces froth may be necessary in soap to cleanse the skin, but all chemicals are certain destruction to the teeth. The enormous and constantly increasing sale for this article enables the proprietor to offer it at the very low price of Two Shillings and Sixpence in large Bottles. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers. Wholesale Depôt, 114 and 116, Southampton-row, London.

BREIDENBACH'S PHLOMIS (Sweet Scented). Beautifully fragrant and lasting. 2s. 6d. to 40s. Bottle. BREIDENBACH'S MACASSARINE, invaluable for preserving the growth of the Hair. 1s., 2s. 6d., 5s. Bottle. Of all Chemists and the Makers, 157a, New Bond-street.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR. If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots where the glands are not decayed. Ask any Chemist for "The Mexican Hair Renewer," price 3s. 6d. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath. Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Florline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke, being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants. It is perfectly harmless, and delicious as sherry. Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London. Retailed everywhere.

SOZODONT.—The Peerless liquid Dentifrice. Its use imparts the most fragrant breath; it beautifies, cleanses, and preserves the teeth in a surprising manner. It gives a delightfully fresh taste and feeling to the mouth, removing all Tartar and Scurf from the Teeth, completely arresting the progress of decay, and whitening such parts as have already become black by decay or neglect. Impure Breath caused by Bad Teeth, Tobacco, Spirits, or Catarrh, is neutralised by Sozodont. The price of the Fragrant Sozodont is 3s. 6d., put up in large bottles, fitted with patent sprinklers for applying the liquid to the tooth-brush. Each bottle is inclosed in a handsome toilet box. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers, and by JOHN M. RICHARDS, Great Russell-street, London. Observe the Name SOZODONT on the label, box, and bottle.

KEATING'S COUGH LOZENGES CURE COUGHS, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS. Medical testimony states that no other medicine is so effectual in the cure of these dangerous maladies. One lozenge alone gives ease. They obtain no opium nor any violent drug. Sold by all Chemists, in Tins, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d.

BLAIR'S GOUT PILLS. The best English Remedy for Gout an Rheumatism. Sure, safe, and effectual. No restraint of diet required during their use, and are certain to prevent the disease attacking any vital part. Sold by all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per Box.

WILLIAMS'S ANTI-BILE. LIVER COMPLAINTS. Williams's Anti-Bile or Anti-Bilious Elixir is the celebrated remedy for Liver Complaints, Bile, Biliousness, Pains in the Head, Backache, Giddiness, Loss of Appetite, Indigestion, and Stomach Disorders. Price 2s. 9d. per Bottle. Sent free 36 stamps from the Laboratory, 10, Oxford-terrace, Hyde Park, London. Any Chemist will procure it. Write for my Pamphlet on Liver Complaints and it will be forwarded post-free.

WILLIAMS'S TASTELESS LIVER PILLS act gently on the liver and bowels, cleansing the system from all impurities. Price 1s. 1½d. per Box; post-free, 15 stamps. Address as above.

ON an average about every seven days OPPOSITION VELVETEENS to the LOUIS are started and endeavoured to be introduced to public notice, under one name or another. Not only is the style of making up, and the stamping of the name on the back of every yard resorted to

IN ORDER TO DECEIVE,
but they are actually asserted to be equal or superior.
The Proprietor of the LOUIS Velveteen, whilst admitting that "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," cannot but caution the public that the genuine article is stamped Every Yard at the Back the "Louis Velveteen," in plain letters.
Avoid all imitations under whatever names they are offered.

IMITATION MEANS MERIT.
THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.
The Ladies are indebted for this fabric to no supposititious individual, but to Mr. LOUIS, the inventor. It has fairly aroused the jealousy of velveteen manufacturers, as is proved by the number of kinds now advertised, all claiming an equality with the "Louis," which has given such universal satisfaction since it obtained so great a success under its own distinctive title. Imitations, of course, have been numerous. One has had to change its name, and retire from its infringment, paying legal expenses; whilst others have been such transparent counterfeits that they can scarcely deceive. They even resort to the stamping of their various names every yard on the back, a method first practised by Mr. Louis to prevent ladies being imposed upon when requiring his specialité. The "LOUIS" is the only Permanent Oriental Blue Black. It has received the well-merited praise and approval of the various fashionable journals, and one (in alluding to these frequent imitations) denounces the practice as "A MEAN and CONTEMPTIBLE way to divert from their proper channels the fruits of a legitimate enterprise and labour."

ZULU WAR OFFICERS.

An Illustration was given last week of the ceremony performed by the Queen at Windsor Castle, in personally decorating with the insignia of her Order of the Bath a number of military officers and others who have recently served with distinction in the Afghan and Zulu Wars. The portraits of many of those gentlemen have appeared in our Journal, with short memoirs of their careers, during the past twelvemonth. We now present those of Sir Edward Strickland, K.C.B., Commissary-General; Major-General Newdigate, C.B.; Lieutenant Colonel J. North Crealock, C.B.; Lieutenant-Colonel Drury Lowe, C.B.; Mr. E. W. H. Webb, C.B., Commissary; and Surgeon-Major Cuffe, C.B., all of whom have distinguished themselves in South Africa.

Sir Edward Strickland was born in 1821, third son of the late Gerard Edward Strickland, of the ancient knightly family, Strickland of Sizergh Castle, Westmorland, one of whom bore the banner of St. George at the battle of Agincourt. After being educated at Stonyhurst College, he entered, in 1840, the Commissariat branch of the service, and thus served in Canada, Australia and Tasmania, New Zealand, Malta, and the Ionian Islands. He was sent to Turkey on special service in 1853, at the outbreak of the war with Russia, and was senior Commissariat officer with the division of the army in the Crimea which was commanded by the Duke of Cambridge. He had charge also of this department of the British force in occupation of Greece from 1855 to March, 1857, when he was appointed one of the joint Commission ordered by the three protecting Powers to examine the financial state of Greece. In 1867, he was nominated a C.B. for distinguished services in the field during the New Zealand war of three years previous. His successful efforts to overcome the huge difficulties of transport and supply of provisions to the army in Zululand excited general admiration. Sir Edward has been twice married; and his present wife, daughter of General Tatton Brown Grieve, C.B., of Orde House, Northumberland, accompanied him through the recent wars in South Africa.

Major-General Edward Newdigate was one of the four general officers who were sent out to assist Lord Chelmsford, with the large reinforcements of troops dispatched from England immediately after the news of the disaster of Isandhlwana. An account of his previous services, which were highly meritorious, appeared at that time, since which there has been frequent occasion to notice his command of one division of the army in Zululand, that which was usually accompanied by the head-quarters of the Commander-in-Chief, and his conduct of most important operations in the late war.

Lieutenant-Colonel John North Crealock, of the 95th Regiment, entered the Army in 1854, and served in the Indian Mutiny campaign of 1858, at the siege and capture of Kotah, the battle of Kota ke Serai, where he was wounded, the general action resulting in the capture of Gwalior, the siege and capture of Pourie, and surprise of the enemy's camp at Kunrye; for which he received the medal with clasps, and was twice mentioned in despatches. He served as Military Secretary to Lord Chelmsford, without a day's intermission, from beginning to end of the Zulu War.

Lieutenant-Colonel Drury Lowe, of the 17th Lancers, one of the regiments sent out in March to reinforce the army in Zululand, has gained renown as a most active and skilful leader of light cavalry, and the usefulness of his services has been repeatedly acknowledged.

Surgeon-Major Charles MacDonogh Cuffe, who entered the medical department of the Army in 1863, serving in India and Arabia, was appointed Assistant-Surgeon to the 11th Hussars, and served with his regiment above seven years. He was promoted to the rank of Surgeon-Major in April, 1876, and proceeded to the Cape of Good Hope in October, 1877, arriving in that command just at the commencement of hostilities against the Galekas. He served as principal medical officer of the Transkeian Field Force under Colonel Glyn, C.B., throughout the campaign, and at its conclusion received the thanks of the Director-General of the Army Medical Department. He then proceeded to the Transvaal, and joined the force then being organised under Brigadier-General Wood, V.C. He acted as principal medical officer of the flying column throughout the Zulu campaign, and was favourably mentioned in despatches. He again received the thanks of the Director-General. We are informed that Surgeon-Major Cuffe was educated at the Catholic University of Ireland, during the rectorship of the Rev. Dr. Newman (now Cardinal Newman), and received his professional education at the Catholic University Medical School, and at the Richmond Hospital, Dublin. As a student he won several prizes in literature, science, and medicine. His brother, Surgeon G. M. Cuffe, also serves her Majesty in the Naval Medical Service.

Commissary E. W. H. Webb received his first commission in October, 1858, and served in the Military Train, with the rank of Captain, but was promoted in February, 1870, to his present rank; and his exertions during the late war to forward the supplies from Natal, and to organise the dépôts of provisions for the different advancing columns, have earned high official commendation.

The state apartments of Windsor Castle are open to the public.

At a recent meeting of the Court of Common Council the City Lands Committee submitted a model design for marking the boundary of the City's jurisdiction on the site of Temple Bar. The committee had selected a model which would not only indicate the site on which Temple Bar stood, but, while marking the City's boundary, it would provide a rest for foot-passengers crossing the street from the Law Courts. The court unanimously adopted the committee's report.

The authorities of the Post Office are, it is stated in the Times, about to issue a new penny postage-stamp, which has been chosen after a good deal of consideration. It is a great improvement upon the present stamp in form, the colour is lighter and more cheerful than the brick-dust red with which letter-writers are familiar, while the Queen's bust shows much more clearly. The gum seems also to be of better quality; and the new stamp will thus, we hope, be pleasenter to deal with than that now in use. An additional advantage for revenue purposes is that, being printed in a fugitive colour, the new stamp cannot be cleaned. Messrs. De La Rue are the contractors.

The Prince of Wales has signified his willingness to inaugurate the new Literary and Mechanics' Institute Building which has been erected at Windsor at a cost of about £5000, as a memorial to the late Prince Consort. The Literary and Mechanics' Institute was established nearly half a century ago, and the late Prince Consort during his lifetime took great interest in its welfare. The foundation-stone of the new building was laid at the commencement of the year by Prince Christian. Mrs. Richardson-Gardner, the wife of the sitting member, has promised a lifesize statue of the Prince Consort, to be placed in a niche in the front of the building, the cost to be about £200. The date of the inauguration, according to present arrangements, will be Jan. 10.

THEATRES.

Mr. Hollingshead appears to have made a judicious managerial movement for the employment of the surplus members of his large company attached to the Gaiety. He has rented for the nonce the Olympic, and provided them with a new drama, called "Such a Good Man," in three acts, and written for the occasion by Messrs. Walter Besant and James Rice. The result proved not to be so favourable as might have been expected, the new comedy being rather of a grave complexion, and holiday audiences preferring for the most part fun to serious reflection. We may hope, however, that they may yet be converted to a more rational view of the purpose of dramatic entertainment. The story is very simple, and almost conveyed in the title. Sir Jacob Escombe, Bart. (Mr. J. Maclean), is a rich contractor, who bears a good character and labours to pass as a philanthropist, nevertheless is fraudulent as a trustee and dishonest as a man of business. The exposure of his hypocrisy is the grand incident. Another is an episode in which John Gower (Mr. J. D. Beveridge), his managing clerk, attempts his rescue by imparting to him the secret of an invention which by saving labour would redeem his affairs, on condition that he would permit him to marry his niece, Rose Escombe (Miss Fanny Josephs). But, when he finds that this arrangement would render the poor girl miserable, he destroys the machine. A way, however, is found out of this difficulty, and a happy conclusion is secured. No doubt the drama, which is carefully written, will improve on acquaintance.

The managers of the St. James's have reasonably enough sought to obtain a prestige for their new home by representing there a new play by the Laureate. Mr. Tennyson has gone to Boccaccio for a theme, "The Falcon," which he has dramatised in one act. Poetical readers will remember that this was one of the subjects chosen by Barry Cornwall for his "Dramatic Scenes," with which he commenced his poetical career. The incident is one æsthetically pathetic, and commends itself to the literary taste. The poor Count Federigo, sacrificing his favourite falcon to serve as a repast for the Lady Giovanna, whom he loves, touches at once the heart. No wonder that she surrenders at discretion. We draw no contrast between Barry Cornwall's dramatic scene and the Laureate's play. The play is well mounted and well acted. Marcus Stone has contrived a splendid Italian cottage for the scene. Mrs. Kendal, also, as the Lady is a superb and beautiful figure; and Mr. Kendal as the poor Count a stately and picturesque image. The verses fall pleasantly on the ear. Mr. Tennyson was not in the house to witness his triumph; but his son, Mr. Hallam Tennyson, undertook to communicate the good tidings to his father.

CHRISTMAS NOVELTIES.

Pantomimes have advantages not possessed by any other form of dramatic composition. They have the best season of the year at their command, and the almost exclusive use of the stage. The season of Christmas is, in fact, the dramatic season of the great houses. The entire population, including children and a large number of adults, who never visit theatres at any other time, is then in the habit of thronging them for six or more weeks, and paying at the doors a ready sum of money, yielding a profit equal to the rent of the house for the whole year. The very frivolity of the amusement commends it to the masses and the inexperienced. For the sake of this exceptional entertainment, every sort of regular drama is postponed, and when attempted necessarily finds a scanty audience. Had the education of the popular mind been the object in view, advantage of the festive season would have been taken for the performance of lofty tragedy or elegant comedy, that the multitude of the people might have the opportunity of acquainting themselves with the noblest examples of the dramatic art. Either of these may follow the pantomime season, but audiences have then to be forced into the houses by means more or less ingenious, but fatal to the prosperity of elaborate works. In their place modern managements, almost exclusively commercial, prefer the lighter pieces supplied by playwrights who belong to what is denominated the Ring. On this subject there is an excellent article in "The Theatre" of this month. The writer proves satisfactorily that the first pieces of new and unknown authors have generally been the most successful; and concludes his argument with saying that "the pressing requirement of the theatre is a manager who has the courage to avail himself of the wealth of dramatic genius which lies outside the Ring." This saying deserves to be pondered well by those who have the true interests of the stage and the theatrical public at heart.

Meanwhile, under the needy and ignorant government to which the stage of our day has been condemned, even the favoured pantomime has suffered. No new themes have been worked for many a year, and we frequently quit the theatre feeling that pantomime itself is in a moribund condition. We begin with

DRURY-LANE.

The pantomime is written by the Brothers Grinn, and treats the familiar "Blue Beard" in a genial and festival style, by means of a company full of the spirit of fun, including the talented Vokes Family, and graced with the music of Ferdinand Wallerstein. There is a ballet of one hundred coryphées. The pantomime opens with a scene in Albania, the village of Komonixon-gateo, suffering under the failure of the vintage. Ibrahim is accordingly anxious to urge on the marriage of his daughter Fatima with Bluebeard (Mr. Fred Vokes); but Fatima is in love with Selim, a sailor (Miss Jessie Vokes). Bluebeard is connected with the Demon of the Desert, and causes Selim's shipwreck. The rest of the inc dents follows the nursery legend, which is extended through eleven scenes, elaborately painted by Messrs. Henry Emden, Cuthbert, Bruce Smith, F. Fenton, and William Telbin. The spectacle, it is said, has been provided at a fabulous expense.

COVENT GARDEN.

"Sindbad the Sailor" is the theme and title of the pantomime. It is written by Frank Green, and illustrated with new and magnificent scenery by Julian Hicks. The ballets are arranged by M. Dewinne and the music is provided by W. C. Levey. Scene I. shows us the Web of Witchery, with Aphrophora, the Fairy Fiend (Miss Annie Stuart), amongst the Spiders she has subdued. Wishing to check all adventurous spirits and to stay the march of progress, she objects to Sindbad undertaking his voyages of discovery; and, hearing that he is about to start upon one of his expeditions from Bagdad, departs in her fairy chariot in order to prevent him. Her plotting is, however, overheard by Cupid (Miss Marie Williams), who is reclining among the roses, and who flies on the "wings of love" to foil her plans. Next, we see the port of Bagdad, with the good ship Battledore preparing for her voyage. The Captain, Mustapha Jenks (Mr. G. H. Macdermott), has a daughter, Zelica (Miss Annie Rose), who, being enamoured of Sindbad (Miss Fanny Leslie), resolves to follow him on his adventures. In this scene we are also introduced to Ali Ben-Bolt, otherwise Buccaneering Billy (Mr. Herbert Campbell) a pirate of tender years. Rahat Lakoum, the Captain's wife (Mr. Arthur Williams), several midshipmen, represented by Mesdames Emily Duncan, Julia Vokins, D. Frustone, Nora Davis, Grace Otway, Clara Fisher, &c., and a wonderful monkey, played by Master C. Lauri, all of whom accompany Sindbad on his voyage, which the Fairy Fiend arrives too late to prevent. The following scene represents the Battledore very much at sea; through the combination of Thunder, Lightning, Wind, and Rain, who are summoned to the aid of the Fairy, the good ship sinks on the oyster reef, "twenty thousand leagues under the sea." Here Cupid turns up to the rescue with a diving-bell. We are also treated to a chorus by real natives, and a ballet of Sea Nymphs, headed by Mdlle. Colombier. We then proceed to the cuddy on board H.M.S. Bib, on which the whole party have taken refuge after a wonderful exhibition of cookery on the part of Rahat, and Billy Cupid guides the vessel. The Big Roc's Nest, where the Old Man of the Sea (Miss Jenny Rogers), faithful to the story, nearly brings Sindbad to grief, follows, and the Captain, Billy, and Rahat indulge in horse exercise on some highly trained ponies from Jerusalem. The gigantic Roc ultimately flies off with Sindbad and the Captain to the Diamond Valley, wherein takes place a grand procession of the court of the King and Queen of the Valley of Diamonds. The head of the modern Memnon on the borders of the scientific frontier forms the oracle consulted by Sindbad and his friends. The irrepressible Fairy Fiend endeavours once more to accomplish their destruction, but is prevented by Cupid, who wafts everybody through the clouds to the grand transformation of a Christmas Card.

GAIETY.

Here we have not, to speak literally, a pantomime, but a spectacle of a very elaborate kind in four acts and twelve tableaux, written by Mr. Henry J. Byron, and arranged by Mr. John Hollingshead. Gulliver's Travels constitute the theme and supply the story of the eccentric drama, that of sea-voyages and shipwrecks, leading to the discovery of Liliput and the Brobdignagian kingdom, together with a curious island called the Island of Comic Song. Here we may expect most of the comic business, including the military evolutions of an infant army, the antics of a giant baby and nurse, the eccentricities of comic singers and dancers, a flying ballet, and other entertainments. In many of these Gulliver himself is an actor. The scenery has much to recomend it, being painted by the eminent artists Mr. Beverly, Messrs. Grieve and Son, Mr. F. Lloyds, Mr. Perkins, and Mr. Hann. The music, by Herr Meyer Lutz, and the ballets, arranged by Mr. D'Auban, are both sure to be satisfactory. Among the characters are to be found Misses Farren, Vaughan, Gilchrist, Louis, and Wadman; Messrs. Terry, Royce, Elton, Squires, De Voy, Leclercq, and Butler; and a company of children, six playing the principal parts and one hundred acting as supernumeraries, under the direction of Mr. Exley. The piece is produced under the direction of Mr. Soutar.

ALHAMBRA.

A grand new Christmas Musical Fairy Spectacle, in four acts and seventeen tableaux, entitled "Rothomago; or, the Magic Watch," founded on the celebrated French Féerie, and rearranged for the English stage by H. B. Farnie, was produced on Monday, with new and original music expressly composed for this presentation by Messrs. E. Solomon, P. Bucalossi, Gaston Serpette, and G. Jacobi. The gorgeous scenery by Mr. A. Calcott, Mr. F. Lloyd, and assistants; the magnificent costumes from designs by M. Wilhelm, executed by Miss Fisher, M. and Madame Alias, and Mrs. May; the elaborate properties and mechanical effects by Mr. J. Buckley; the stage effects and machinery by Mr. F. Sloman; gas by Mr. White; limelight and transparencies by M. Kerr. There were three grand ballets, invented and arranged by M. Bertrand, with original music by M. G. Jacobi. The action is so extensive, that it can be only indicated, not fully expressed. It is in four acts. The first shows how King Impecunioso XIX. ordered a marriage banquet, and how the Royal tradesmen declined to furnish the same. The Court Sorcerer, Rothomago, is applied to in vain. The Court visit the Sorcerer's Den, who is considerably astonished at the success of his incantation. The act ends with the exhibition of the Kingdom of the Fleeting Hours, the Halls of Time, and the Seven Ages of Man Illustrated. The second act introduces us to the Village School of Seidlitzpowderburg, where the Hours begin their work by watching over Forget-me-Not, and the King, accompanied by his daughter and Sylph, seek to grind the razors and mend the umbrellas of the district. The scholars arrive for compulsory education. We have next the Outskirts of the Village, the Vineyards in Vintage Time, and a grand Vintage Ballet, terminating with an apotheosis tableau, "The Triumph of Bacchus." The third act shows us the Forest of Virgin Snow in Freezeland, and the Gorge of Lost Footsteps. The travellers lose their way, and eventually leave the inhospitable North in a balloon, exhibiting the Transit of the Aerial Ship, and conducting us to the Excursion Office, Cairo. Here the balloon descends, and the travellers take tickets to visit the Nile. The fourth scene presents the Pyramids and a Dream of Old Egypt. The caravan halts under the shade of Memnon, and Dodo is lulled to forgetfulness by the Hours, now Maidens of the Nile. "Memnon" forms the subject of a grand Egyptian ballet, including the Sacrid Ibis (Mdlle. Pertoldi), Ismael, an Assyrian Prince (Miss Matthews); Cleopatra, the "Serpent of Old Nile" (Miss Denevers); and the Priestesses of the Ibis. The last act shows Old Rothomago working a windmill, and finding he can't make it go; how Angosturas' magic wand turns the French landscape into a Chinese river city, and all the peasants into orthodox Mongolians. The drama finishes with the Floating City of the Flowery Land, the picture of the Mandarin's Mansion, the apparition of the Fairy Fan, and the Palace of Porcelain. On this occasion there is an international congress of all the ceramic notabilities of the world, under the name of the "Grand Ballet Céramique; or, International Congress of all the Porcelains" (in which Mdlle. Rozelli, from Paris, Turin, Milan, and Bordeaux, made her first appearance in England), with which this splendid drama concludes.

NATIONAL STANDARD THEATRE.

The Pantomime is entitled "Blue Beard Re-Wived." The barber Mustapha is introduced rejoicing over the fact of his youngest daughter having a suitor in the person of the great Blue Beard. Fatima is, however, in love with Selim, the barber's apprentice. Her sister Anne looks forward to getting rid of Fatima, and marrying Selim herself. The great Blue Beard arrives and gives notice he will come in state at midday on the morrow to bear away his bride. The scene changes to a grand set view of the country between Blue Beard's castle and Mustapha's house. The stage is crossed by several bridges, which soon become alive with the multitudes in gorgeous attire, forming the state retinue of the great Bashaw. Fatima is married and borne to her new home. Sister Anne having accompanied her sister, they range through Blue Beard's castle, and Blue Beard gives them the keys of all the rooms, only forbidding them, under pain of death, to visit the blue chamber; but on the departure of the master of the house, the females' curiosity is excited and they determine to just have a peep inside the prohibited door. The party arrive at the blue chamber, a magnificent vaulted chamber approached by golden doors: here the audience are introduced to the mysteries of Blue Beard's Wives, who are seen making merry over the idea of a new victim being added to their numbers. Fatima, Ketcho, and Anne arrive, and, in horror of the sights they see, drop the key of the room and fly from it in terror. A grand spectacular ballet by one hundred ladies, most elaborately costumed with brilliantly jewelled trophies, succeeds. Principal dancer, Mdlle. Sidonie. The spectacle terminates with a brilliant effect called the Shower of Prisms. On Blue Beard's return he insists on the key being found, and then orders his wife to prepare for death. On the castle ramparts, Fatima asks Anne to look from the turrets and signal to Selim, who rushes in, attended by an army of warriors, and defeats Blue Beard's object by killing him and taking Fatima to himself. The Fairy arrives, and in the grand Transformation Scene, "A Coral Reef," she changes the characters, as usual.

ROYAL PARK THEATRE.

"Beauty and the Beast" forms the subject for the pantomime. The poor Prince is transformed into a beast until some maiden shall, by confessing herself in love with the monster, break the spell. Sir Temple Bar, travelling with his friends in search of fortune, sees a rose-bush near him, and without more ado plucks a flower for his daughter Beauty. The Forest Monster, appearing suddenly, tells the party their lives are forfeited unless the lady (on whose account his rose-bush has been despoiled) shall willingly consent to take her father's place and come to be eaten. This the party agree to, and are let go free. The two elder sisters are jubilant at the prospect of getting rid of Beauty, who bids farewell to her home, and arrives at the Enchanted Palace of the Beast, illuminated by countless lights and tenanted by a concourse of Fair White Bears. Here the Beast shows his guest the wonders of the place, and confesses his love for her. She asks permission to return, and, passing through the Palace Gardens, arrives at home, to the astonishment of her father and sisters. She has promised to return, but by her relations' importunities she over-stays the time allowed, and the Beast appears and claims her. She declares she loves him; and immediately the Fairy Queen transforms the Beast back into his princely form, and the characters to the usual pantomime troupe in the grand Transformation Scene, which represents Beauty's Palace of Enchantment.

SURREY.

The pantomime is entitled "Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp; or, Harlequin the Wicked Wizard and the Good Genii of the Enchanted Cave," written by John McArdle. Orlock the Evil Genii is informed that the only means of his obtaining the coveted Magic Lamp is through the aid of a boy named Aladdin (Miss Topsy Venn). Aladdin, who will play truant and defies the School Board, determines to woo and wed a Princess, and, furious at finding a rival, challenges him to fight, but is interrupted by the arrival of the Princess on her road to the bath. Aladdin follows the Princess, who daily comes for her usual wash and brush up. Luminosa, the Good Genii, guards the Magic Lamp, which Aladdin secures. In due course is introduced the Grand Fairy Ballet, invented and arranged by Paul Valentine, introducing Miss Annie Elliott and Miss Topsy Elliott, supported by one hundred charming coryphées. Aladdin, returning to the widow's cottage, narrates his adventures, and, both being hungry, the widow suggests the sale of the lamp at the broker's, and while trying to clean it, are both alarmed by the sudden appearance of Luminosa, who speedily provides a sumptuous banquet, and a bowl of precious gems, which Aladdin at once determines to send by his mother to his lovely Princess. Grand Eastern ballet follows. The Transformation Scene is entitled "Love and Hope, or the Dream of Alciphron," of which the argument is that, once upon a time, Alciphron, an Arab Prince, being overcome by sleep in a thickly-tangled wood, dreamed of the delights which should attend the journey of his true betrothed Zorilda. He dreamed that she has embarked upon the "Ship of the Desert," and the camel bells are heard ringing. The scene is immediately transformed by a blinding sand-storm, through which Zorilda has reached the banks of the sacred Nile. Her vessel upon the rushing tide is tossed about, and sinks; when in the sky appears the presage of Hope, the Southern Cross, at which happy augury the scene changes to a delightful oasis. After many days' search up the sinuous course of the Nile, Alciphron finds his beloved near the source of that wondrous river in a bower of blissful beauty, enhanced by nature's choicest gifts. This gorgeous scene is designed and painted by Mr. Charles Brooke.

PAVILION.

The pantomime at this popular theatre is written by Messrs. W. Green and T. Lindsay Clay, and is entitled "The Children in the Wood; or, Harlequin Cock Robin, the Wicked 'Uncle,' and the Little 'Pledges' that were taken in." The action opens in the Vultures' Glen, where we find the Demon Vulture in Congress with the various birds of prey. He asks their assistance on behalf the wicked Sparrow to slay Cock Robin, and to bring death or misfortune upon the heads of Arthur and Alice, "the Babes," under the guardianship of their Uncle, the Baron Hardup. Scene II. introduces the audience to the Golden Groves of Arcadia, a very beautiful set, whither the children, in dream, are brought to witness the dazzling splendours of Fairyland; and after a Grand Ballet of Birds, we reach Threadbare Hall, the home of the wicked Uncle, where we find the old Nurse bewailing the state of affairs. The rest of the action follows the Legend. Two Ruffians, Beetle-browed Bill and Boozey Benjamin, undertake to carry off and murder the children. The scene is an Autumnal Wood, occupying the full depth of the stage, where the two scoundrels quarrel and the thrilling (comic) combat results in the discomfiture of the more bloodthirsty ruffian. The little ones find themselves lost in the wood, and sink to sleep beneath the spreading boughs, which descend and obscure them from sight, after Robins have covered the Babes with leaves. After some comic incidents, a grand spectacle and diversified entertainment is introduced; but the festivities are stopped by the appearance of the Demon Vulture, and we pass on to the Baron's Brown Study. The Nurse is swallowed by a huge Ogre, down whose throat the Ruffians pursue her. Subsequently at a critical moment the Good Fairy enters, overthrows the Demon power, spreads harmony around, and takes us to the Grand Transformation Scene entitled "Davy Jones's Locker: A Nightmare," invented and painted by Mr. R. M. Hyde.

NEW ALBION THEATRE, POPLAR.

The pantomime this year is called "Jack and Jill; or Harlequin Sing a Song of Sixpence, the Demon Blackbird and the Good Fairies of the Gold and Silver Ferns." The story opens with the meeting of Mother Hubbard, Dame Trot, Mother Redcap, and the Witch of Endow. Clammero, with her partner in mischief, Blackbird, appear, and council the Witches to use their magic influence against Jack. The Good Fairy Goldenfern appears, and reminds them of the Pocket-full of Rye, promises that the Talisman shall be Jack's, and that Jack's fortune shall be made. We have next the home of the Two Young Lovers, watched over and cared for by the Maid Forlorn. While assisting Jill to carry Water from the Well, the horrid Demon Blackbird appears, and the lovers are compelled to wander. Jack receives a telegram from Fairy-land. The Queen's Laundry is a scene full of life and fun, and changes to the Palace of Gold and Silver Ferns. Jack is hailed King, and hastens to prove his gratitude to Jill, and makes her his Queen. The Transformation Scene is emblematic of the Four Elements—Earth, Air, Fire, and Water.

SANGER'S AMPHITHEATRE.

The pantomime is entitled "Aladdin, the Wonderful Lamp, and the Forty Thieves." A congress is convened. Europe, Asia, Africa, and America appear, each attended by a costly suite, mounted on the respective quadrupeds of its nation—the bull, the camel, the elephant, and buffalo. In the forest haunt the Forty Thieves make their grand entry loaded with plunder. Aladdin, having acquired wealth by aid of the lamp, resolves to espouse the Princess; and we are speedily conducted to Aladdin's enchanted palace and witness a magnificent bridal procession, a gigantic stud of horses, ponies, elephants, camels, and zebras, and a grand Chinese ballet by eighty ladies, principal danseuses, Mdlles. Elise Hudson and Sophie Girofli.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

"Little Jack Horner" is the hero chosen for the Pantomime this season; but with this has been interwoven the favourite old nursery legends of Little Goody Two-Shoes (who becomes the sweetheart of Jack) and the Three Bears. The story has been written by Mr. Frank Stainforth, with new music by Mr. William Corri, and produced by Mr. T. H. Friend, Mr. Thos. Rogers painting entirely new scenery, including a most gorgeous Transformation Scene. The second scene takes us to the Peerless Palace of the Passing Hours, where, after a brilliant procession of the Hours, Days, Weeks, Months, and Seasons, Mr. John Lauri's Seaweed Ballet takes place, Mdlle. Luna being the principal danseuse and Miss Lilly Davis dancing a pas de deux with her. In Scene III., Domino Castle, the home of Mother Shipton (Mr. Field), the action of the pantomime commences. Ignorance persuades Tommy Stout and Jemmy Green, two schoolboys who attend the school kept by Goody Two-Shoes, to attack Mother Shipton's dog. The Dame defends him, and in turn is protected from the mob by Jack. Mother Shipton teaches Jack his letters by calling forth a procession of representatives of the old familiar "A was an Archer" series, in fact a most animated alphabet. Ignorance teaches Goody to go and search in a certain Hawthorn Glade for hidden gold, in order that he may get her into his power. Mother Shipton, to foil his wicked attempts, gives Jack the sword of sharpness, the shoes of swiftness, and the scarf of darkness, and sends him on his way after Goody to the Magic Wood. Here Ignorance, who has become a very Black Bear of the Zulu species, accompanied by a White and Brown companion from Russia and Afghanistan, is waiting to pounce upon the innocent Goody. In Scene VII., we come to the Forest Home of the Three Bears, and, while they are out for a stroll, Goody drops in, tastes their porridge, sits in their chairs, and, after trying the others, goes to sleep in the bed of the little bear. Jack rushes in, and, after a terrific struggle, conquers the bears. We are then shown the ramparts of a castle. Jack arrives with an army, and, after a stirring speech, a paraphrase of the famous "Once more unto the breach," and "St. Crispin's Day" speeches in Henry V., the walls are stormed, King Robin's giants are killed, flames burst forth, the bastions are destroyed, and Jack is seen triumphant on the summit of the tower with Goody in his arms. We are then transported to the Home of Queen Mab, the gorgeous Transformation Scene, which introduces cataracts of prismatic waters, with nymphs reclining beneath the moonlight fernery, in the Jewelled Haunt of the Fairy Queen. The Comic Scenes are designed and arranged by Mr. W. H. Harvey (for many years the celebrated Drury Lane Clown), Mr. John Lauri (under whose care the ballets are produced) is the Harlequin. Miss Lilly Davis the Columbine, and Mr. Bekenham the Pantaloon.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The pantomime at the Crystal Palace is on the favourite subject, "Jack the Giant Killer," its full title being "Jack the Giant Killer; or, Harlequin Fairy Spiteful and Good King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table." It has been written by Mr. R. Soutar; the ballets and pantomimic actions are by Mr. John D'Auban, the costumes are by M. and Madame Alias; the music is by Her Meyer Lutz; and the whole is produced under the direction of Mr. John Hollingshead, of the Gaiety Theatre. The story is based on the rival loves of Jack (Miss Lizzie Coote) and the Giant Gorgibuster (Mr. Clifford) for the fair Sybil (Miss Emily Muir). Gorgibuster, aided by the Winds and other elements, incited by his mother, the Fairy Spiteful (Miss Rose Roberts), carries off Sybil; but Jack, encouraged by Good King Arthur and assisted by the Fairy Progress (Miss Lily Lee), pursues the Giant to his home, and, after various and romantic adventures, slays Gorgibuster and releases the maiden, all ending happily with the Grand Transformation Scene, entitled "Our Empire in the East," specially painted by Mr. Charles Brew, from designs by Mr. Alfred Thompson. The Harlequinade which follows is sustained by Clown (Mr. W. Orkins), Pantaloon (Mr. Bishop), Harlequin (Mr. W. Warde), and Columbine (Miss Rose Edmonds). Other attractions of the Christmas holidays will be the wonderful performances of Dr. Carver, the great American marksman; a daily variety entertainment by Mr. and Mrs. H. White, the Edmonds family, and the De Castro acrobats; Professor Bailey's "Punch and Judy;" the great annual fancy fair and bazaar, and the innumerable objects of interest which fill the Crystal Palace.

The London markets, and many of the provincial markets, have been supplied during the last week or two with a quantity of fine fresh salmon from Nova Scotia. These fish have been selling at prices considerably below the ordinary market rates for salmon ruling at this time of the year, when our sole source of supply is from the fisheries at the mouth of the Rhine. They are, however, fully equal to the best Dutch salmon, and the fact that the market price is gradually rising, is a proof that they are held in high repute. The salmon in question were caught last summer in the Bai des Chaleurs, an arm of the sea between Nova Scotia and Lower Canada, and immediately after capture were placed in refrigerating chambers, in which they have been kept ever since, except during the short period necessary to place them on board the vessels which brought them over. This vessel was itself specially fitted for the purpose with refrigerators, and, a large stock of ice being taken on board, the fish have been maintained intact in a state of congelation, and in perfect condition for the table. After being gradually thawed, they present all the appearance of fresh-run salmon taken in the height of the season in any English or Scotch river, being bright, plump, and fat, and the flesh red and flaky. The New York and other American markets have long been supplied with salmon from the Bai des Chaleurs, and the idea of sending them over to England was due mainly, if not entirely, to Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, who visited the bay in the summer, and were struck with the enormous quantities of salmon caught there. The practical embodiment of the idea has resulted in placing an additional and nutritious article of food on the English markets at Christmas-time, when such an addition is peculiarly welcome.

MUSIC.

The usual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" by the Sacred Harmonic Society took place yesterday (Friday) week this being the forty-eighth annual recurrence thereof. The solo singers were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Sir M. Costa conducted, as usual.

The same oratorio was announced for performance by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society on Boxing Day, conducted by Mr. Barnby.

The orchestral concert of the students of the Royal Academy of Music took place at St. James's Hall on Saturday evening, and included some very clever performances on the pianoforte by Mrs. Grantley and Misses E. Goldsboro' and J. Percival, and on the violin by Mr. Sutton. Misses Ambler and M. McKenzie and Mr. Brereton made a highly favourable impression in vocal solos; good specimens of the students' progress in composition having been offered in an overture by C. T. Speer and a scena by A. G. Thomas. An effective programme was closed by a good performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the vocal solos in which were sung by Misses A. Aylward and C. Wyld, and Mr. B. Davies. Mr. W. Macfarren conducted.

The Christmas concert of the London Academy of Music took place last week at St. James's Hall, and went off extremely well.

As briefly intimated last week, the Royal Albert Hall Amateur Orchestral Society opened its eighth season there on Saturday evening with a concert in aid of the funds of the German Hospital, Dalston. The occasion included an effective performance of Goldmark's characteristic symphony, "A Rustic Wedding," by the band, in which the Duke of Edinburgh occupied his customary place as one of the first violins. Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé, respectively, as solo violinist and pianist, contributed to the attractions of the evening, as did Mdlles. Minnie Hauk and Breidenstein, and Herr Henschel in vocal solos. Mr. George Mount conducted as hitherto, and Sir J. Benedict assisted as accompanist. The next concert is to take place on March 6, in aid of the funds of the National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic, Queen's-square.

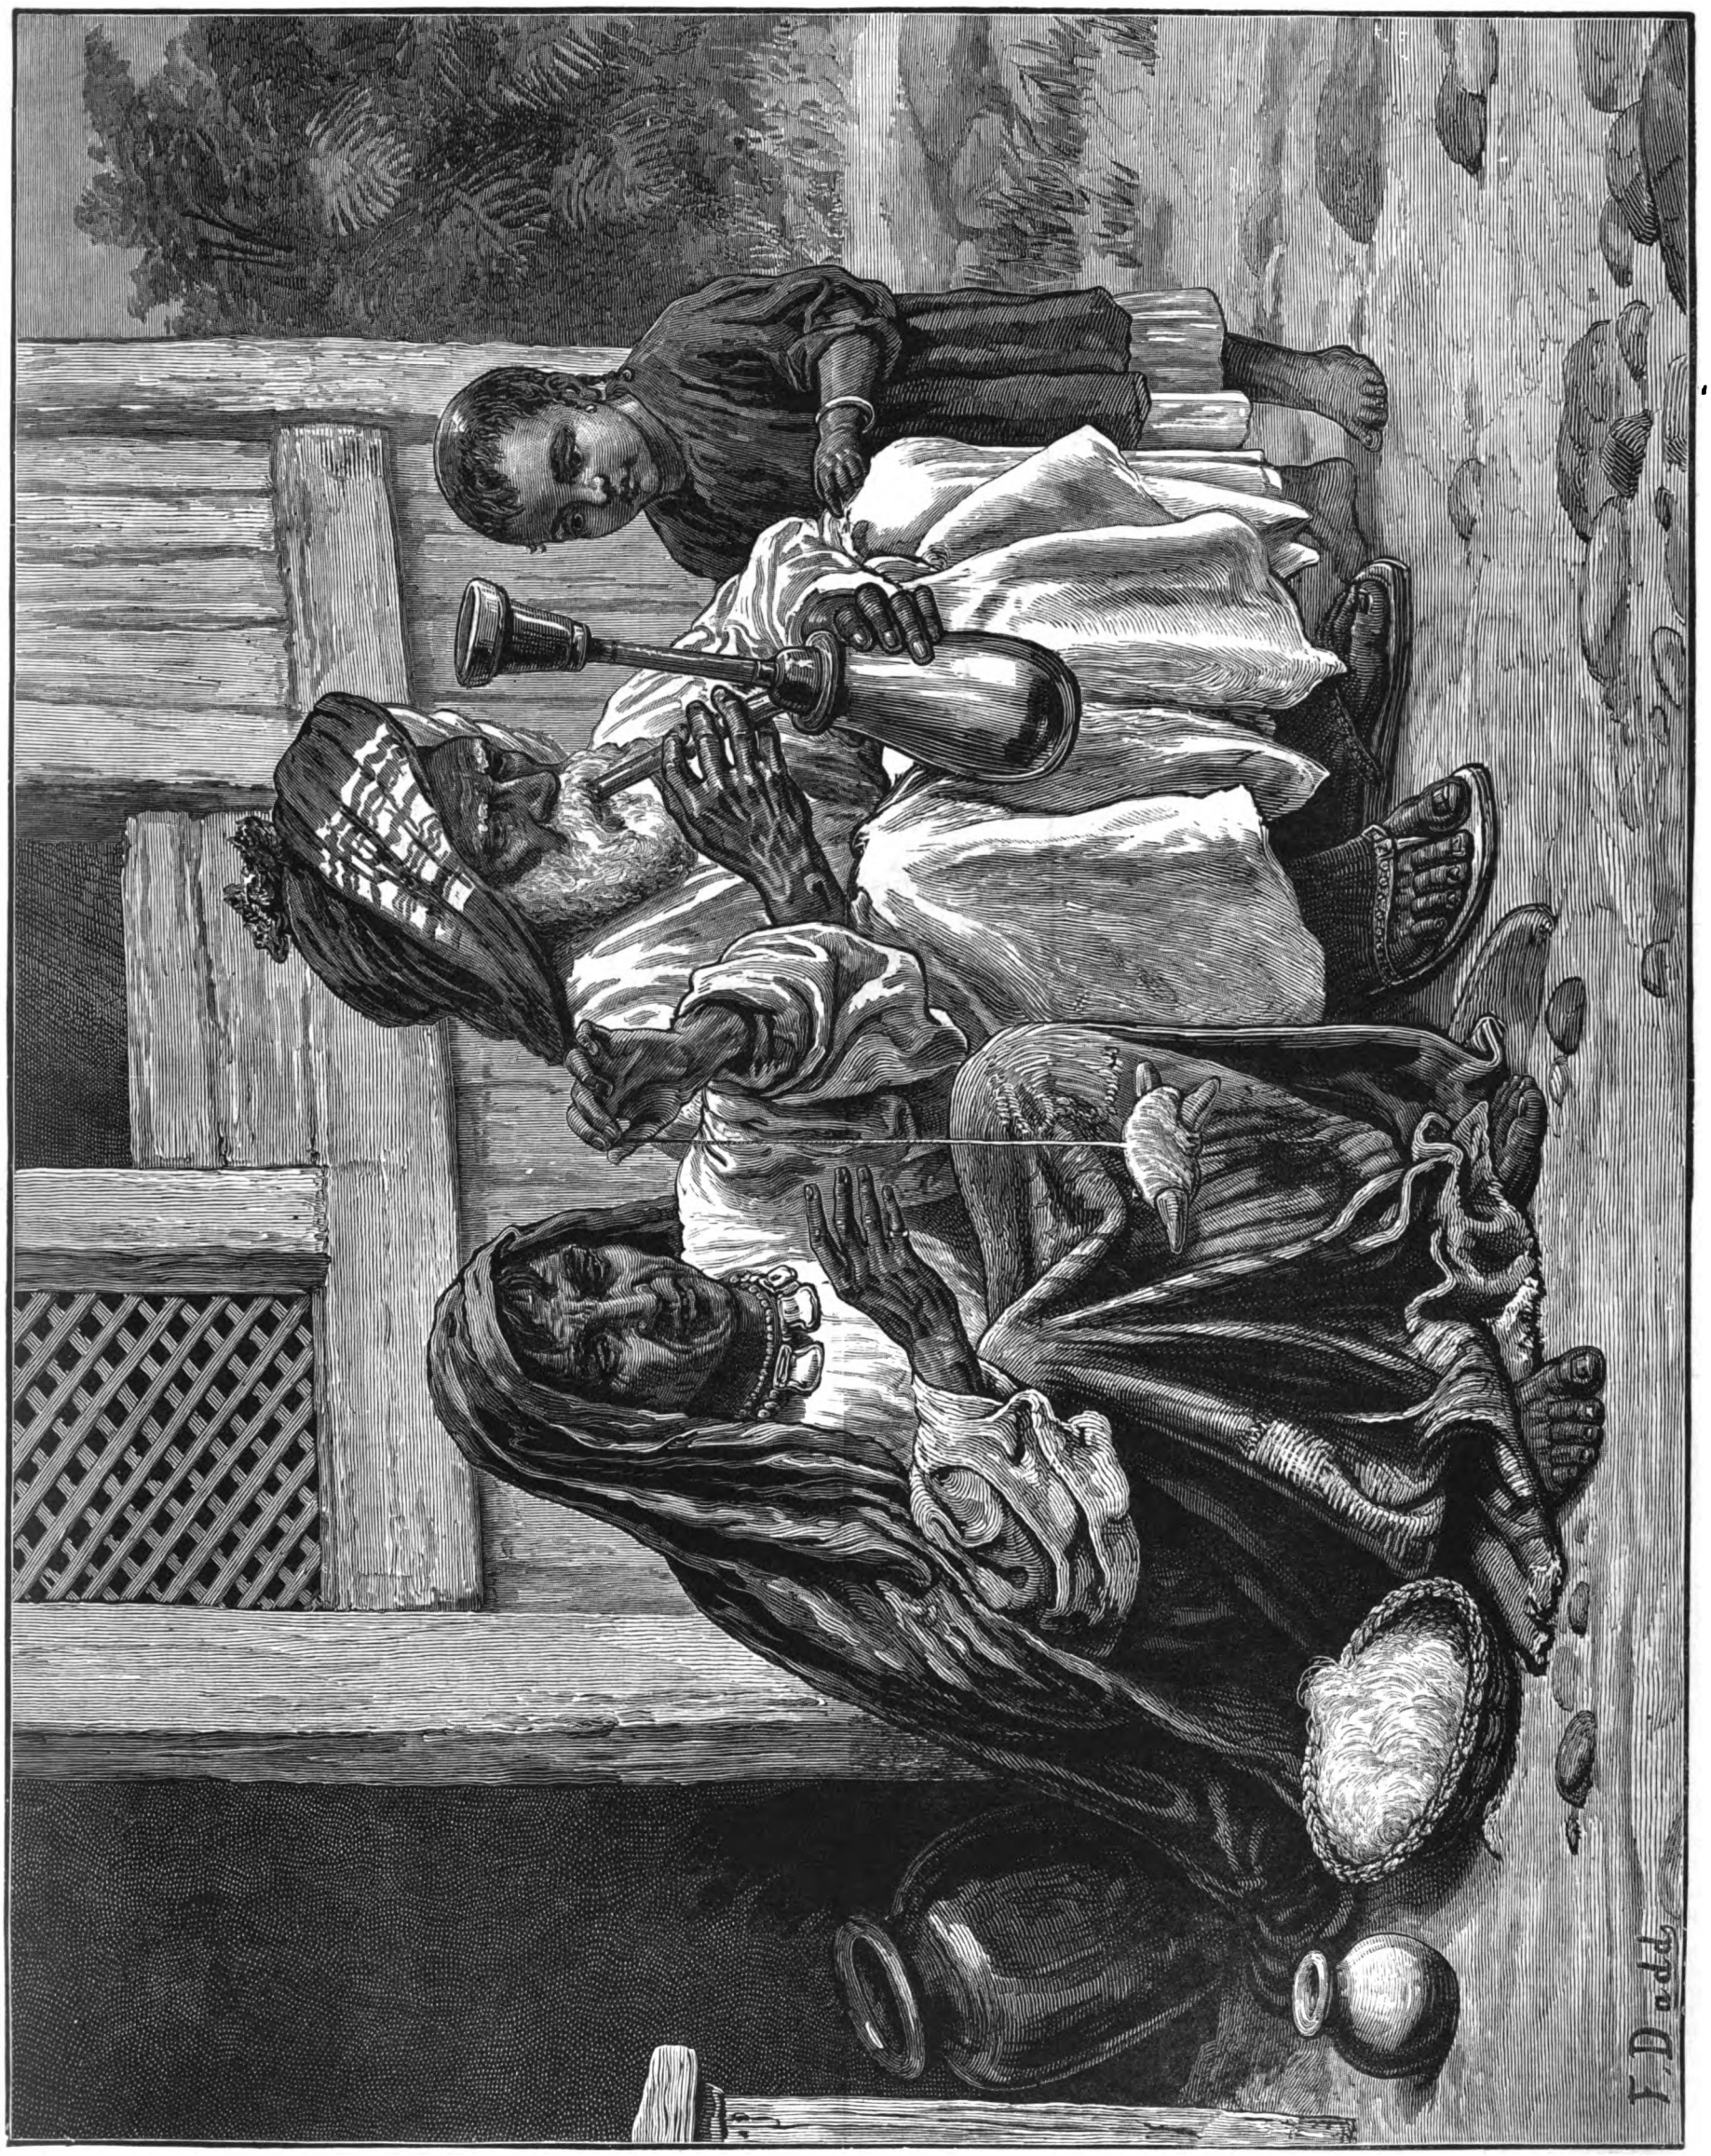
The Monday Popular Concerts are suspended, as usual at this period. The programme of this week's concert comprised Schumann's first string quartet, and that by Haydn in D minor, from op. 76; Chopin's Ballade in G minor, for pianoforte, by Mdlle. Janotha; and Beethoven's Romance in F, for violin, by Madame Norman-Néruda; besides vocal solos by Mr. F. King. The evening concerts will be resumed on Jan. 5, and the afternoon performances on the following Saturday.

Most of the London musical performances are, as usual at this period, suspended for a brief interval. The "London Ballad Concerts" will be resumed on Jan. 3, with an afternoon performance. On Jan. 5 (as already said) the Monday Popular Concerts will recommence. On Jan. 10 Mr. Carl Rosa will open his new season of performances of opera in English at Her Majesty's Theatre. The next concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society will take place on Jan. 16, when Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" will be performed The series of Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace will be continued on Jan. 31.

A committee has been formed for the purpose of presenting a testimonial to Mr. Henry Leslie, the form of which will be decided at a meeting to be specially convened for the purpose. This tribute has been well earned by the long and successful career pursued by Mr. Leslie in the cause of choral singing.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

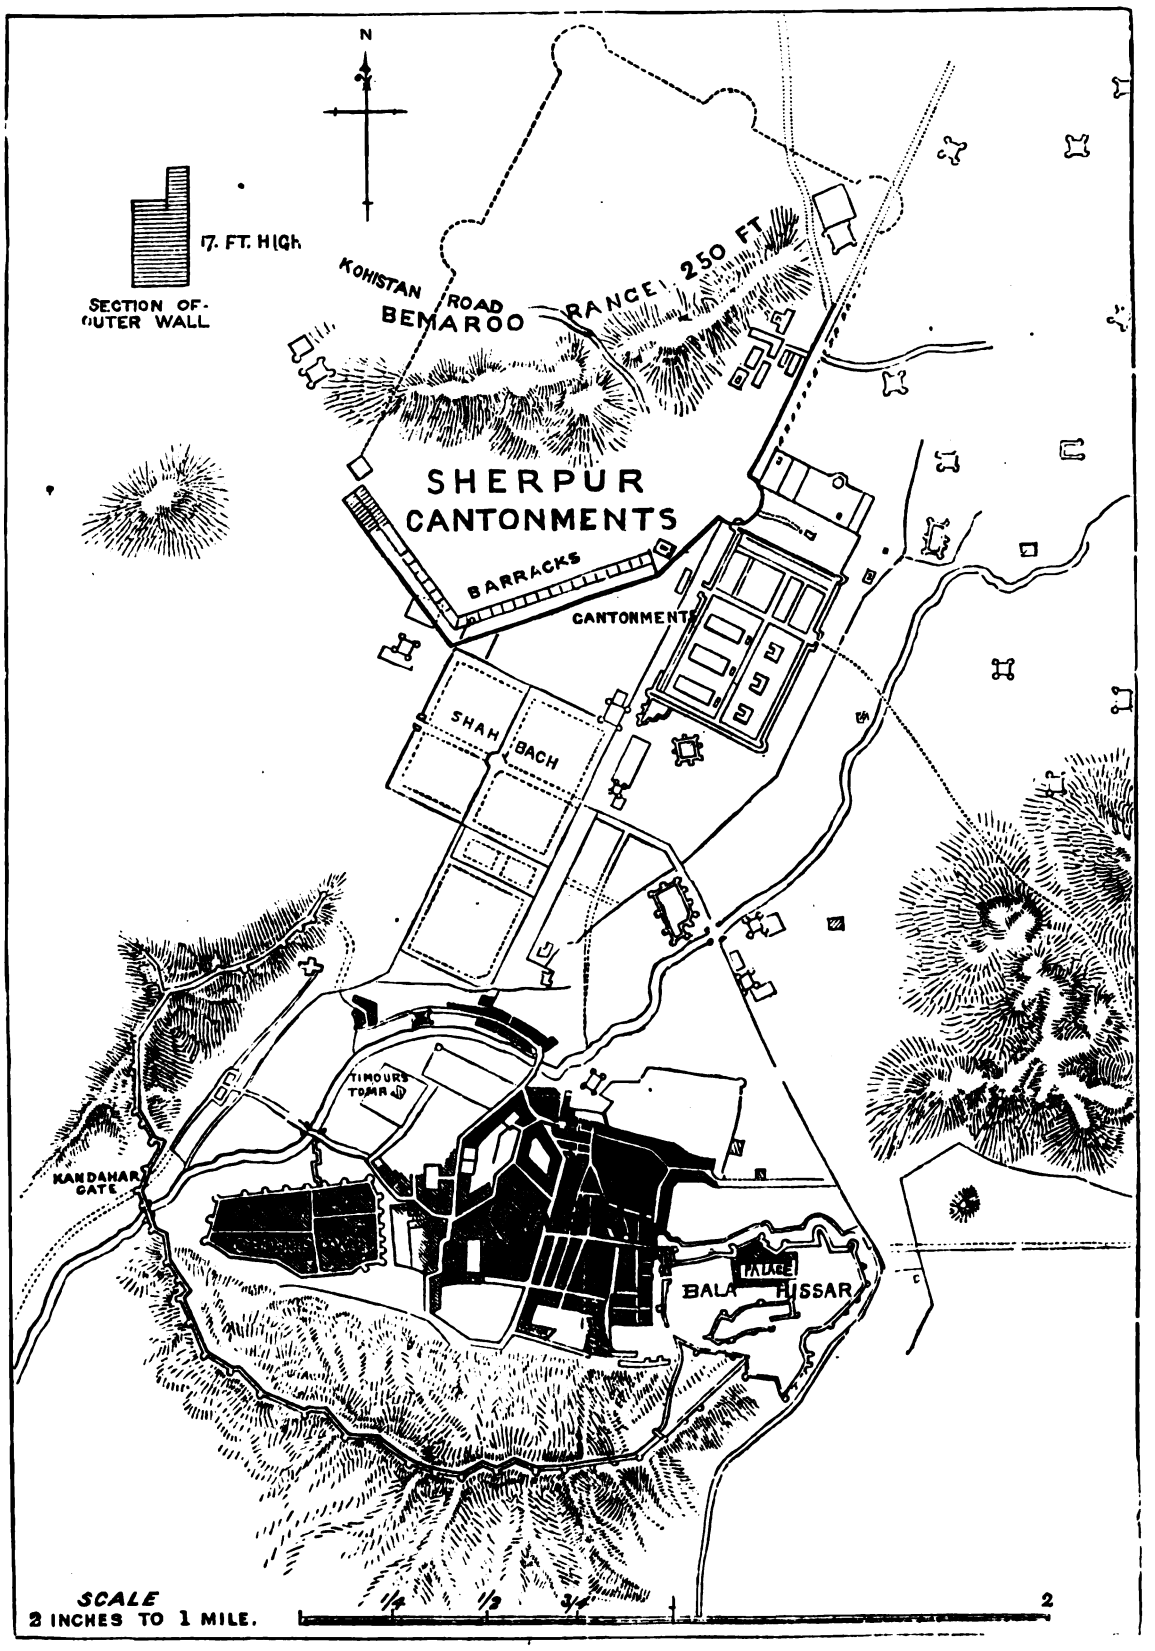
The Christmas number of Messrs. Chappell's "Musical Magazine" is, as usual, devoted to dance music appropriate to the festive season. This years' issue again offers a varied collection of pieces, comprising some spirited quadrilles, a waltz, and a polka, by D'Albert; waltzes by Lamothe, Waldteufel, and Métra; a set of quadrilles by F. Godfrey; and a polka by A. W. Nicholson—altogether nine in number, a liberal return for the price of one shilling.



Messrs. Metzler and Co. have also issued their usual Christmas double number of the "Musical Bijou," the contents of which include "H.M.S. Pinafore Singing Quadrille," a series of sprightly dance movements, with a vocal part, founded on subjects from Mr. W. S. Gilbert's and Mr. Arthur Sullivan's popular comic opera. Other dance pieces, in different forms and styles by well-known contributors, make up a copious shilling'sworth.

"Christmas Album," by P. Tschaïkowsky (Neumeyer and Co.), will prove a seasonable and welcome gift for young pianists. It consists of a series of twenty-four pieces, each with a distinctive title, and all highly characteristic and pleasing in style, while yet being so simple as to be within the powers of very juvenile players. The composer is the most prominent of living Russian musicians, and has distinguished himself by many successful works in the more important forms of composition. In the pieces now referred to he proves his power to interest by the simplest means.

Messrs. Boosey and Co.'s "Royal Song-Books" have several times been noticed by us in reference to their various issues of the songs of different nations—sacred and humorous songs, &c.—and we have now two valuable additions to the series in "The Songs of France," and a second volume of "The Songs of England." The first of these comprises sixty of the charming airs and romances of our Continental neighbours, with French and English text; the latter by Miss X. Hayes. The other volume contains a very large number of English melodies, including many of the most popular traditional ditties, songs, and ballads of the last three centuries—well edited, with new symphonies and accompaniments, by Mr. J. L. Hatton. These handsome and inexpensive books are well adapted for presents, having, moreover, a permanent musical value and interest.



The Children's Bach, The Children's Handel, The Children's Haydn, The Children's Mozart, The Children's Beethoven, The Children's Weber, The Children's Mendelssohn, The Children's Schumann. This series—valuable to juvenile pianists, and well suited for gift-books—is edited by Herr Pauer, and published by Messrs. Augener and Co. At a moderate cost, these volumes supply a copious library of classical music, suitable for young performers, and yet of such intrinsic value as to have interest for the most accomplished pianists. The greatest composers, past and present, have produced much beautiful music that can be interpreted with moderate executive powers, and Herr Pauer has very judiciously culled such portions from the works of the masters above specified; some pieces being originally composed for clavichord, harpsichord, or pianoforte, others being arrangements. Most of them are for one performer; several in each book being duets. The Editor has supplied copious indications of the best fingering for passages of any difficulty, and each volume contains an interesting memoir, and some a good portrait, of the respective composers. These books are eminently calculated for the cultivation of the students' executive skill and appreciative taste.

WOVEN DIPLOMA OF THE GLASGOW TECHNICAL COLLEGE WEAVING SCHOOL.

GLASGOW TECHNICAL COLLEGE WEAVING SCHOOL.

The London Clothworkers' Company, who subscribe £150 yearly to the Glasgow Technical College, have received from that institution an example of the woven device which forms the diploma of proficient knowledge and skill presented to the pupils of the Weaving School there. Similar woven fabrics have been produced at Coventry, and occasionally at Paisley; but this is, we believe, the first time one has been issued for such a purpose. It is not only appropriate, but very convenient, as it may either be framed and hung up like a sampler or made up in a roll to be carried about by its possessor. The design, of which we give an Illustration, does much credit to Mr. Macaulay and his assistants. We are glad to hear that the institution is working with good success. By the assistance of Mr. France, the secretary, we here give a description of the piece of work displayed in our Engraving. The number of sheets of point paper employed in the drawing which was made for it was forty-two, measuring each 20 by 16 inches, which is equal to 13,440 square inches, and this was requisite to produce the finished fabric, measuring only 15 in. by 8 in. The drawing required 2,600,000 careful touches of the designer's pencil to mark the points at which the warp and weft threads intersect each other in the weaving. There were about 7000 large machine cards employed, on which were the holes necessary to be perforated, in order to enable the design to be woven. The silk yarn made use of was No. 170, through a 7200-thread harness of the Scottish scale, operated on by a Jacquard machine of 1650-cord power. The design is of a characteristic nature, attention being given to the arts connected with cloth manufacture and also engineering. On the entablature are figured the words "Glasgow Technical College Weaving Branch, partly endowed by the Worshipful Company of Clothworkers, London;" underneath which Britannia sits surrounded by figures emblematical of the Arts and Industries, the date at which the school was instituted, and the names of the trustees and officials. Below, in the centre, is the Glasgow coat of arms with motto, and a view of the Clyde at each side; while at the end, on the right, is the figure of a female with a hand-winding wheel, and a weaver at a hand-loom underneath, and on the left another female figure spinning by hand, and below it a representation of the modern power loom. At the base are the words—"Diploma granted to —— for excellence, after two sessions' attendance;" the blank to be filled in with the name of the student in embroidered letters.

THE BURST GUN OF H.M.S. THUNDERER.

The disaster which happened in gunnery practice on board H.M.S. Thunderer, on Jan. 2, at the Bay of Ismid, in the Sea of Marmora, has been repeatedly mentioned. One of the two great guns, each weighing thirty-eight tons, which were mounted in the fore turret of that ship, burst in firing with shell at a target, and the muzzle part of the gun was completely blown to pieces. Eleven men, amongst whom were Lieutenant A. H. Coker, R.N., Lieutenant Daniel, Royal Marine Artillery, and Corporal Bolton, with a gunner and seamen, were killed by the explosion, or by fragments of the gun, the shell, and the roof of the gun-turret. Both the burst gun and its companion piece, which remained uninjured, have been brought to Woolwich Arsenal; and the latter is now being subjected, in the Artillery Practice Marshes at Woolwich, to a series of experiments with overloading and irregular loading, which we described last week, for the purpose of ascertaining how such a gun is likely to burst if it be inadvertently or accidentally mismanaged. We now give an Illustration of the actual state of the burst gun, as it appears at Woolwich Arsenal, which may be compared with that we presented on Jan 25, from a drawing by a naval officer, showing the condition of the gun in the shattered and roofless turret of H.M.S. Thunderer. These guns were manufactured by the Elswick Ordnance Company, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and were mounted with the working and loading machinery, on the hydraulic system, devised by Mr. G. Rendel, of that firm. Each gun was 19½ ft. in length; the length of the bore itself was 16½ ft., and the diameter of the bore was 12 inches, rifled with nine grooves, upon the Woolwich increasing system, the twist being completed in a length equal to thirty-five times the width of the calibre. The guns were constructed on the Fraser system of shrunk wrought-iron coils, having several short single coils and a forged breech-piece. They were fired with a charge of 85 lb. of powder and a projectile weighing 700 lb. It is considered probable that the gun was twice loaded, which naturally caused it to burst.

JUVENILE STORY-BOOKS.

A pile of small volumes, prepared by different publishers for the delectation of young folk has stood by us awaiting the very brief notice which our space can afford. These are not volumes of high price and costly artistic decoration, though some of them, besides their readableness and interest as tales of adventure or of domestic life, are made yet more pleasing by the addition of a few Engravings. We can here do little more than state the nature of their contents and the literary treatment of their subjects, without much attempt at criticism; but, in many instances, the names of well-known writers, already practised in this kind of composition, may be deemed quite sufficient.

Several of the books, moreover, which have a right to precedence in our regard, though very suitable reading for boys and girls, are works of literary value, meriting the attention of the elders whose taste may be cultivated in the direction of imaginative and romantic fancy. The Legend of King Arthur, compiled and arranged by J. T. K. (G. Routledge and Sons), cannot be dismissed as a mere child's book; it is meat for reflecting men and women, equally with Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," and being dedicated, by his permission, to the Poet Laureate, seems a fitting companion for his noble cycle of heroic poems. The prose narrative composed by old Sir Thomas Malory, in King Edward IV.'s reign, from the ancient French fabliaux which embodied the Celtic myths of Wales, Cornwall, and Brittany, has furnished to J. T. K., as it did to Tennyson, materials for the tale of genuine chivalry, raised and refined by the purer humane and Christian feeling of our more enlightened age. The execution of this work, the arrangement of the plot and incidents, and the simple, lucid, energetic style, deserve high commendation. The illustrative designs have some artistic merit, and the little volume is elegantly bound.

Not quite such full praise can fairly be awarded to the Tales from Ariosto (C. Kegan Paul and Co.), in which "a Lady" has recast, for the reading of children, the ingenious Italian poet's wondrous stories, before told more roughly by his compatriot Boiardo, concerning the paladins of Charlemagne, Orlando and Ruggiero and Rinaldo, the fair Angelica, the valiant maiden Bradamante, the garden-city of the enchantress Alcina, the hippogriff steed, the sea-monster, the magic shield, and other marvels of antique romance. These stories are less noble and elevated in moral tone, and have really much less dramatic interest, than those of the Arthurian legend. The illustrations, only three in number, are copied from designs in an old Venetian edition of Ariosto, dated 1583.

Mr. Moncure Conway, an American scholar and preacher settled in London, who has already won the favourable regard of the public here, contributes a delightful Necklace of Stories (Chatto and Windus), short tales of original fiction, expatiating freely in the realm of Faery, but inspired with lovely and lofty sentiments, to be impressed, we will hope, on the hearts of many thoughtful children. "The Inviaible Queen" is a dream-like allegory of a kind of Utopia supposed to have grown up on the coast of Virginia, in the old pre-colonial times of North American adventure and imperfect exploration. It is a beautiful conception, and is designed to teach a great moral lesson. The volume is furnished with twenty-five illustrations by Mr. W. J. Hennessy, and is handsomely printed.

The Right Hon. E. Knatchbull-Hugessen, M.P., sometime an Under-Secretary of State, continues to exert his lively fancy in Other Stories, which is the title of his new volume (published by Routledge). These are "The Cab of Murlingford," "Prince Maraflete and the Bilberry Men," the "Legend of Dderfel," the "History of a Cat," and, last but not least or worst, "The Grannies of Giddyhorn." They are certainly very amusing, and that is as much as will be demanded by many juvenile readers. The engravings are drawn by Ernest Griset with his accustomed drollery.

A new edition of Uncle Tom's Cabin, by Mrs. Beecher Stowe, with an introductory history of the authorship, the occasion and motive, the publication, in March, 1852, and the moral, social, and political effects of that powerful work, the herald of the abolition of negro slavery in America, has been issued by Messrs. G. Routledge and Sons. Mr George Bullen, of the British Museum, supplies a "Biographical Account," which gives the titles and dates of all the editions, translations, important reviews, and essays or other published writings founded upon this celebrated story. There are, in the British Museum Library, thirty-five editions of the complete text, eight abridgments or adaptations, and nineteen versions in foreign languages, besides "keys," separate books on the subject, and about fifty review or magazine articles. We suppose the number of copies sold would amount to hundreds of thousands. This edition is beautifully printed, and the pages are ornamented with a red line round their sides; but the woodcuts are scarcely worthy of their place in what should be the standard edition.

Three popular French authors of books for the entertainment of the juvenile mind, rendered into English by competent translators, are presented in fair volumes, with numerous engravings, by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington. The Begum's Fortune, by Jules Verne, is translated by Mr. W. H. G. Kingston; it is not, as might be supposed, an Eastern or Indian tale—one of pagodas and palanquins and gold mohurs—but one of a great iron and steel factory, created by a wonder-working scientific German, in the Oregon territory of the American Far West. To this is appended, in the same volume, M. Jules Verne's idea of the Mutiny of the Bounty among the South Sea Islands. The Serpent Charmer, by Louis Rousselet, author of an elaborate work on the Courts of the Indian Native Princes, is translated by Madame de Hauteville. M. Lucien Biart, whose "Adventures of a Young Naturalist" and "Rambles in the New World" are not forgotten, has got his seafaring story, An Involuntary Voyage, translated by Mrs. Cashel Hoey and Mr. J. Lillie. These will no doubt find acceptance in due proportion to merit.

A very old friend of ours, Sir Edward Seaward's Narrative of his Shipwreck, which we used to like next to "Robinson Crusoe," is reprinted by Messrs Routledge. The authoress of this very interesting work of fiction in the guise of autobiography was Miss Jane Porter, whose genius is here shown even more decidedly than in "The Scottish Chiefs" and "Thaddeus of Warsaw." Those tales were too obviously the offspring of an incidental vein of sentimental fancy opened by the example of the Waverley Novels. In this masterly product of sustained invention, she had free scope for her original powers; and we hope that she will yet gain a large number of appreciating readers, both young and old, by the reappearance of "Sir Edward Seaward" nearly thirty years after her death. The hero, accompanied by his wife, has to live on a desolate island of the ocean by a variety of ingenious shifts; but their idyllic happiness, like that of Milton's Adam and Eve in Paradise, is delightfully portrayed.

A tale of Zululand, not the first or second that has been written since Cetewayo was heard of among us, is Hendricks the Hunter; or, The Border Farm, by Mr. W. H. G. Kingston (Hodder and Stoughton). The author has long since proved his ability to cater, in this style of narrative, for the entertainment of youth. His compilation of Notable Voyages, from Columbus to Captain Parry (Routledge), is what we should prefer to give our son or nephew, as we think real histories of that exciting kind much better than fabricated exploits and adventures. Of Captain Mayne Reid, in like manner, who has produced so many books for boys, there is nothing fresh to be remarked concerning his literary talent, which is displayed anew in Gaspar the Gaucho; A Tale of the Gran Chaco (Routledge).

Warlike adventure in the military and naval services has been utilised by several of the practised story-tellers for the entertainment of boys; thus, in The Young Buglers (Griffith and Farran), by Mr. G. A. Henty, the deeds of the Peninsular Campaign are recited, with the supposed participation in them of two young gentlemen, who have run away from an English private school. The Roll of the Drum, by R. Mounteney Jephson, with five short stories in one volume, keeps alive the fond tradition of martial glory pretty much to the same tune. Thackeray's "Chronicle of the Drum" is far more correctly adapted, we think, to the truth upon that subject. On the other hand, The Reverse of the Shield, by Augusta Marryat (F. Warne and Co.) exhibits very well, in connection with the imaginary experiences of an English boy in France, during the war of Strasburg and Lorraine and the siege of Paris, all the miserable and shameful woes inflicted upon mankind by this criminal pastime of the Emperors and Kings and other patrons of servile soldiership among the plundered nations. For so it still goes on, although, as Cowper truly says,—

> War is a game that, were their subjects wise,
> Kings would not play at.

The volume by Miss Rowsell, entitled St. Nicholas Eve, and Other Tales (Griffith and Farran), contains a good store of interesting and wholesome fiction. Brave Janet, by Alice Lee, is the story of a little girl's trials and moral victories; and this, with "The Children's Trusts," in the same volume (Sampson Low and Co.), will be an excellent New-Year's gift for any of the real little girls there are in the world. It is safe also to recommend, for little ones of seven or eight, Rough the Terrier, by Emily Brodie (J. F. Shaw and Co.), or the story of Pussy's frolics; Only Five, with illustrations by T. Pym, which may be had of the same publisher; also, Judy; or, Only a Little Girl, by "Yotty" Osborn; these little books are very nice, pretty, and amusing.

OBITUARY.

SIR J. NIAS.

Sir Joseph Nias, K.C.B., Admiral (retired), R.N., died at 56, Montagu-square, on the 16th inst. This gallant officer, son of Joseph Nias, Esq., by Ann Cropper, his wife, was far advanced in years. His professional services date back from a distant period. He was in the first three Polar Expeditions, and took part in the Chinese War. He had three medals, and received the insignia of Knight Commander of the Bath in 1867. Admiral Nias married, in 1855, Caroline Isabella, only daughter of John Laing, Esq., of Montagu-square.

MAJOR CURTEIS.

Edward Barrett Curteis, Esq., of Leasam, Sussex, J.P. and D.L., formerly Major 7th Dragoon Guards, died on the 14th inst., aged seventy-four. He was second son of Edward Jeremiah Curteis, Esq., of Windmill Hill and Knells, M.P. for Sussex, by Mary, his wife, daughter and heiress of the Rev. Stephen Barrett, Rector of Rothfield, Kent, and descended from a family of Curteis which possessed property in Kent as early as the thirteenth century. Major Curteis was elected M.P. for Rye in 1832, and represented that borough in the Liberal interest until 1837. He married, first, 1837, Charlotte Lydia, youngest daughter of Thomas Law Hodges, Esq., of Hemsted, M.P., and secondly, in 1841, Frances, daughter of William Kenrick, Esq., M.P., and leaves issue by each marriage.

The deaths have also been announced of—

James Archibald Campbell, Esq., of Inverawe, J.P. and D.L., at Rugby, on the 9th inst., aged seventy-one.

General Richard Cornwallis Moore, C.B., R.A., in Hyde Park-terrace, in his seventy-third year, a distinguished Artillery officer in the Burmese and Chinese wars.

The Very Rev. James Torry, Dean of St. Andrew's, Minister of the Scottish Episcopal Church at Cupar Angus, Forfarshire, for fifty-nine years, on the 15th inst. He was son of Bishop Torry, of St. Andrew's and Dunkeld, and had attained the age of eighty-nine.

John Inglis Jones, Esq., of Derry Ormond, in the county of Cardigan, J.P. and D.L., High Sheriff 1851, formerly in the Royal Dragoons and Royal Horse Guards. He was born in 1829, and married, 1860, Lady Elizabeth Vaughan, daughter of the Earl of Lisburne.

William Cosmo Gordon, Esq., of Fyvie and Marrculter, eldest son of the late Charles Gordon, Esq., of Fyvie, and grandson of the Hon. Alexander Gordon Lord Rockville and Anne Countess of Dumfries and Stair, on the 18th inst. at Fyvie Castle.

Annette-Maria, Lady Hesketh, widow of Sir Thomas Hesketh, fourth Baronet, of Rufford Hall, in the county of Lancaster, died at Torquay, on the 17th inst. She was daughter of the late Robert Bomford, Esq., of Rahinstown House, in the county of Meath, and was married April 3, 1824. Her only daughter, Maria Harriett, married Sir Lawrence Palk, Bart., and her only son was the late Sir Thomas George Fermor-Hesketh, Bart.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Feb. 23, 1877) with a codicil (dated May 1, 1879) of Mr. John Remington Mills, late of Kingswood Lodge, Tunbridge Wells, who died on the 22nd ult., was proved on the 11th inst. by Joseph Trueman Mills, the son, John Morley, and Herbert Dalton, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £1,200,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Louisa Matilda Mills, £500, and all his pictures, plate, books, linen, wine, furniture, household effects, horses and carriages absolutely, and Kingswood Lodge and the income of £120,000 for life; to Harriett Ballard an annuity of £40 for life; to his executors, Mr. Morley and Mr. Dalton, £200 each; to his household servants one year's wages; to the Rev. James Irving £300 per annum for three years from the date of his (testator's) decease, if he shall so long remain Minister of Albion Chapel, Tunbridge Wells; upon trust for his daughter, Mrs. Matilda Swinburne, £42,000, and an additional sum of £10,000 for each child she may have at the time of his death; and the residue of his real and personal estate to his said son, Joseph Trueman Mills. The deceased was a magistrate for Middlesex, Hertfordshire, and Kent, and sat in Parliament, in the Liberal interest, for the borough of Wycombe from 1862 down to the general election of 1868.

The will (dated May 23, 1879) of Edward William Cox, Serjeant-at-Law, late of Moat Mount, in the parish of Hendon, and of No. 36, Russell-square, who died on the 24th ult., was proved on the 11th inst. by Irwin Edward Bainbridge Cox and Harding de Fonblanque Cox, the sons, and Henry Bennett Edwards, the son-in-law, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £200,000. The testator devises his Moat Mount property, subject to certain rights of residence given to his wife and family, to the use of his son Irwin Edward Bainbridge Cox for life, with remainder to his first and every other son successively according to seniority in tail male, and the manor of Taunton Dean, Somerset, is devised to his said son on similar uses; his Dartmoor and Ashburton estates, Devonshire, are divided into three parts, one of which is devised to each of his two sons, and the other part to his daughter, Mrs. Ada Edwards, respectively, in tail general. The testator's residence in Russell-square, with the furniture and effects, he leaves to his daughter, Mrs. Edwards; and there are legacies to his wife, children, grandchildren, brothers, sisters, nephews, nieces, domestic servants, gardener, foreman, manager of printing office, secretary, and another. The residue of the realty, all his newspaper property, including the Field, Law Times, Queen, Exchange and Mart, County Courts Chronicle, The Country, and Royal Exchange, which the trustees are empowered to manage and carry on, and the residue of his personal estate is to be held upon trust, after setting aside 10 per cent of the income as a reserve fund, and 20 per cent to pay off any charges or liabilities on his properties, to pay one fifth of the income to his wife, Mrs. Rosalinda Alicia Cox, for life, if she shall so long remain his widow; and as to the ultimate residue, one third is to go to each of his three children. The deceased mentions that he was a member of the Funeral Reform Association, and he desires his funeral to be as plain as possible, that only the members of his family should follow, and that mourning be not worn more than six months.

Yesterday week Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., Judge-Advocate-General, M.P., opened a cocoa and coffee house at Whitehaven, and delivered an address.

CHESS-NUTS FOR CHRISTMAS.

As we do not believe that any of our readers are superior to the attractive frivolities of the present season, we purpose, this Christmas week, devoting our space to a notice of the lighter phases of chess. Although it is commonly asserted, by persons imperfectly acquainted with the game, that the literature of chess is a dry record of practical play and more or less difficult problems, the truth is that there is no other pastime which has produced so extensive a literature of the imaginative or fanciful, as well as practical, kind. In what is called "practical play" the imagination of the player is largely and constantly exercised in considering the combinations of which the pieces—his own and his adversary's—are susceptible, and, comparing small things to great, an original chess problem is as truly a work of the imagination as a sonnet of Shakspeare's. The antiquity of the game and the uncertainty of its origin, while offering the freest scope for the imagination of the student, cannot fail to excite it, and its progress from the Closet to the Court, thence to the Camp, and in recent times to the School and the Workshop, is a romance, to which a modern sensational novel is a sort of poor relation. Nor is the literature of chess deficient in humour. The style of the earlier writers upon the subject was too heroic in some cases, and too philosophic in others, for levity of any kind; their works are mainly composed of hypothetical accounts of the invention of chess or highly-coloured reflections upon its educational influences; but in our own day Mortimer Collins, George Walker, and Captain Kennedy each sought the aid of chess in delineations of character, whose wit and humour were readily recognised outside the community of chessplayers. It is, of course, not to be expected that a rich vein of humour will be found pervading a treatise upon the openings or a game played over the board, although it is not impossible that some humourist of a future generation may produce a comic problem, for chessplayers in all ages have mostly chosen that branch of the game for the display of fancy. The compositions of the early writers abound with conditional mates by specified pieces or pawns on specified squares, mating in a fixed number of moves, "neither more nor less;" and one relieved himself of much trouble in the construction of problems by stipulating that the attacking pieces should not be subject to capture! The name of this ingenious composer is, or rather was, for he is "gone from among us," Paulus Guarinus, and he left to posterity a manuscript, dated 1512, containing seventy-six positions, or problems, many of which have appended to them the stipulation referred to above. Here is one of them as a specimen:—

White: K at K B 6th, Kt at K B 7th, P at K Kt 6th.

Black: K at K Kt square.

White to play and mate in two moves, White's pieces being inviolable—or free from capture.

The solution is 1. P to Kt 7th, K to R 2nd; 2. P to Kt 8th, promoted to a Bishop. Mates.

Amid the chaff of this author's collection, setting aside the positions taken from Lucena (1495), there is, symbolically, a grain of wheat in the following puzzle:—

Place the White Knights at Q R 8th and Q Kt 8th.
" Black " Q R 3rd " Q B 3rd.

Move the Knights—first the White, say, and then the Black, alternately, and in four moves of each Knight make the Black and White exchange places. The Knights are not to be moved outside the square of squares, the corners of which they occupy in the position described above.

We leave this little puzzle to our readers, and any solutions received shall be acknowledged in the usual way.

In comparatively modern times, the fancy of the chessplayer has run wild in the construction of problems, curious either in form or shape or in the conditions of the solution. Among the category of problems fearfully and wonderfully made, is Lichtenstein's "Chess Monument," in memoriam of the inventor of chess:—

White: K at Q B 2nd, Q at Q 3rd, R's at K sq and K Kt sq, Kt's at Q 5th and Q B 6th, B at Q B 4th, and P at Q 2nd.

Black: K at Q B sq, P's at Q B 2nd, 4th, and 6th, Q 3rd and 5th.

White is to mate with the Pawn in seven moves, without capturing any of the Black Pawns.

The following is the solution, in which White's moves only are given, Black's being all forced:—1. R to Kt 8th (ch), 2. R to K 7th (ch), 3. B to Kt 5th (ch), 4. B to B 4th (ch), 5. B to Q 5th (ch), 6. Q to B 3rd (ch), 7. P to Q 3rd. Mate!

Lichtenstein was a very prolific author in this style, the book from which the above is taken ("Der Schachkünstler," Berlin, 1847) containing many of a similar kind, as the "Gordian Knot," "The Comet," "Goliath's Sling," &c.; but, so far as fecundity is concerned, and not in beauty of conception, he has been surpassed by a composer of a more recent date, M. Schoumoff, of St. Petersburg. The last-named author has published within the last decade a work which opens with an alphabet of chess problems, the pieces on each diagram representing the letters of the alphabet from A to Z, and follows this feat by a series of symbolic problems embracing such very diverse subjects as an episode in the career of Don Giovanni and the Eastern Question.

It will interest everyone in the present day to see a Russian chessplayer solve the Eastern Question in his own way—on the chess-board. In the following position Russia is represented by the White forces and the Turk by the Black:—

White: K at K R sq, Q at K Kt 3rd, B's at K B 7th and Q Kt 5th, Kts at K Kt 4th and Q B sq, B at Q R 4th; Pawns at K R 3rd, K Kt 2nd, K B 3rd, Q B 2nd and 3rd.

Black: K at Q B 3rd, Q at Q B 2nd, R at K 5th, Kts at K sq and Q sq, B at K R sq, Pawns at Q 5th and Q B 4th. White to play, and mate in five moves.

Solution: 1. P takes R (Russia, it will be observed, begins by taking a Castle, a very effective stroke in chess and in war), P to B 5th; 2. R to Kt 4th (dis. ch), K to B 4th; 3. R takes Q (ch) (another effective stroke: the Grand Turk's Consort captured!); Kt takes R; Q takes Kt (ch), Kt to Q B 3rd (one of the great Powers interposing!); 5. Q takes Kt—checkmate. The pieces on the left now form a cross.

In these imitations upon the chess-board of the strategic operations of actual warfare the Russians have excelled; and the best of the kind is a game composed by Petroff to illustrate the brief campaign which ended in the surrender of the famous Hungarian leader Görgey. It will form a fitting conclusion to this gossiping notice of the Curiosities of Chess. The White pieces represent the Russians, the Black ones the Hungarians, and the Black Queen is supposed to be the Hungarian leader.

BLACK.	WHITE.
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to B 4th	B to B 4th
4. P to Q B 3rd	Kt to K B 3rd
5. P to Q 4th	P takes P
6. P to K 5th	P to Q 4th
7. B to Q Kt 5th	Kt to K 5th
8. P takes P	B to Kt 5th (ch)

The campaign was commenced with the most regular movements on both sides; but the Russians should now have posted the Bishop at Q Kt 3rd.

9. K to K 2nd

Görgey here succeeds in astonishing Europe by a manœuvre perfectly novel and unique.

9.	Castles
10. Q to R 4th

Görgey, suddenly quitting Comorn, throws himself upon the advanced Bishop.

10.	Q R to Q Kt sq
11. P to Q R 3rd	B to K 2nd
12. B takes Kt	P takes B
13. Q takes Q Kt P

Carried away by his impetuosity, Görgey falls into the midst of the Russian army, whose commander-in-chief now devises a stratagem, the merits of which can be properly appreciated only by chessplayers. He orders his cavalry to cut off the Hungarian's retreat by throwing itself into a road where, to all appearance, it was devoted to destruction.

13.	Kt to Q B 4th.

This unexpected manœuvre so disconcerted Görgey that he surrendered at discretion. The notes are by M. Petroff, who adds that Görgey (the Black Queen) may be saved, but that he cannot avoid the loss of the campaign, and appends an analysis of the position in support of the argument.

FINE ARTS.

The forthcoming Winter Exhibition at the Royal Academy will be less extensive than the last. There will be no drawings or miniatures. One of the features of the collection will be a number of works by Holbein, all the Academy could borrow, but not comprising some of the more important works of the master which have been already exhibited at Burlington House.

Messrs. J. E. Hodgson and H. H. Armstead have been elected Royal Academicians from the grade of Associate.

The Queen has purchased the painting in oil from nature by Miss C. M. Wood, one of the students of the Female School of Arts, Queen-square, which won the gold medal in the National Competition.

The National Portrait Gallery has recently acquired the following works:—Portraits of Catherine of Braganza, by Huysman; Bolinbroke, by Rigaud; Mrs. Anne S. Damer (from the Anderdon collection); Thomas Grenville, by Mangini; Mrs. Sarah Austin, painted and presented by Lady Arthur Russell; and busts of Sir Robert Peel and W. Etty, R.A., by Mr. Noble, bought at the artist's sale.

A so-called Vasa Murrhina Exhibition has been opened at 294, Regent-street, consisting of specimens of the works in ornamental glass of M. D'Humy, the winner of two medals in the recent Paris Exhibition, and whose productions there were much admired, particularly for the skill displayed in overcoming the difficulty of introducing gold and other metals into the body of the glass—an art which M. D'Humy has carried much farther than one sees in the Venetian "aventurino," tesseræ, and beads, and the production of the Byzantines. The effect obtained by the introduction of the metals is rich, though purists in taste may prefer the soft transparency and sparkling play of glass alone, coloured and white. The specimens are widely varied and not a few are good in style, though their limited number does not admit of the endless variety of fanciful devices presented in Venetian glass. A company is formed called "The Aurora Glass Company," for manufacturing M. D'Humy's glass in England; the glass itself may therefore be expected to be of purer body than that produced abroad. The assumption, however, that this incorporation of the metals with glass is a realisation of the famous "murrhine vases" of antiquity seems to be groundless, and to have hardly so plausible a foundation as the application of the term by old writers to the description of glass largely made at Murano, and called by the Germans "schmelz." The problem as to what was real murrhine has never been solved. But it is not improbable that the natural murrhine was a variety of agate containing tints of purple or red; and fragments of glass have been found at Rome and elsewhere of a very beautiful transparent purple mixed with veins of opaque white, which answers to Pliny's description of the colour of the vases for which such fabulous sums were paid by Roman connoisseurs.

It is stated that the promoters of the Ecclesiastical Art Exhibition, to be held in London next summer, have procured a site in a central position, and intend to erect thereon a building of an ecclesiastical character from plans prepared by Mr. J. P. Seddon.

Canon Greenwell, who has caused so many of the British barrows to be excavated, has presented to the British Museum the large and important collection of urns and other antiquities formed by him during his researches in no less than 234 of these barrows. The discovery of a great part of the collection is recorded in his work, "British Barrows," published by the Clarendon Press in 1877.

On the 18th inst. died, at the advanced age of eighty-five, Mr. Henry Warren, for many years president, and, since his retirement and the succession of Mr. Louis Haghe, honorary president, of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours. On the same day at midnight died Mr. George Edward Hering, the landscape-painter in oil, aged seventy-four.

The death is also announced of M. Jacob Jacobs, aged sixty-seven, the well-known Belgian marine and landscape painter, for many years a professor in the Antwerp Academy.

On the 18th inst. died, aged eighty-four, Mr. George Raphael Ward, the miniature-painter, son of James Ward, R.A., the animal-painter, and father of Mrs. E. M. Ward.

On the 19th inst., at the great age of ninety, died Mr. Dominic Colnaghi, one of the founders of the eminent—and historic, as it may be called—firm of print publishers and art-dealers in Pall-mall East; now represented, we believe, in chief by Mr. Mac Kay.

Sir Brydges P. Henniker, Secretary to the President of the Local Government Board, has been appointed to succeed Major George Graham, who retires from the public service, after a service of thirty-seven years, as Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages for England and Wales.

Dean Lacy was on the 18th inst. consecrated Roman Catholic Bishop of Middlesbrough by Cardinal Manning in the Cathedral of St. Mary. Dr. Cornthwaite, Bishop of Leeds, and Dr. O'Reilly, Bishop of Liverpool, were the assistant Bishops at the consecration. The newly-formed diocese comprises the North and East Ridings of York, which have been severed from the Beverley diocese. At a luncheon which was afterwards held in the school-rooms, the Cardinal presided, supported by Mr. Isaac Wilson, M.P., Mr. Isaac Lowthian Bell, M.P., the Mayor of Middlesbrough, and others.
